Fuggers. German merchants, proverbial for their great wealth. "Rich as a Fugger" is common in Old English dramatists. Charles V. introduced some of the family into Spain, where they superintended the mines.

"I am neither an Indian merchant, nor yet a Fugger, but a poor boy like yourself."—D'Alfieri.

Fulhams, or Fullams. Loaded dice; so called from the suburb where the Bishop of London resides, which, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was the most notorious place for blacklegs in all England. Dice made with a cavity were called "gourds." Those made to throw the high numbers (from five to twelve) were called "high fullams" or "gourds," and those made to throw the low numbers (from ace to four) were termed "low fullams" or "gourds."

"For gourd and fullam holds And 'high' and 'low' become the rich and poor." Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, i, 3.

Fulhams. Make-believes; so called from false or loaded dice. (See above.)

"Have their fulhams at command; Brought up to do their feats at hand." Butler: Upon Gaming.

Full Cry. When all the hounds have caught the scent, and give tongue in chorus.

Full Dress. The dress worn on occasions of ceremony. If a man has no special costume, his "full dress" is a suit of black, open waistcoat, swallow-tailed coat, white neckcloth, and patent-leather boots or half-boots. Academicals are worn in the Universities and on official occasions; and full military dress is worn when an officer is on duty, at court, and at official fêtes, but otherwise, "evening dress" suffices.

Full Fig (Iw.). "En grande figure." Probably "fig" is the contraction of figure in books and journals of fashion, and full fig would mean the height of fashion. It is outrageous to refer the phrase to the fig-leaves used by Adam and Eve, by way of aprons. (See Fig.)

Full Swing (Iw.). Fully at work; very busy; in full operation.

Fulsome. "Ful" is the Anglo-Saxon ful (foulness), not ful (full); "some" is the affix meaning united with, the basis of something; as, gladsomemettlesome, game-some, lightsome, frolic-some, etc., etc.

"No adulation was too fulsome for her [Elizabeth], no flattery of her beauty too great." - Green: Short History of England, chap. VIII, sec. 3, p. 356.

Fum, or Fung harang. One of the four symbolical animals supposed to preside over the destinies of the Chinese Empire. It originated from the element of fire, was born in the Hill of the Sun's Halo, and has its body inscribed with the five cardinal virtues. It has the forepart of a goose, the hind-quarters of a stag, the neck of a snake, the tail of a fish, the forehead of a fowl, the down of a duck, the marks of a dragon, the back of a tortoise, the face of a swallow, the beak of a cock, is about six cubits high, and perches only on the woo-tung tree. It is this curious creature that is embroidered on the dresses of certain mandarins.

Fum the Fourth. George IV.

"And where is Fum the Fourth, our royal bird." - Byron: Don Juan, XI, 78.

Fumago (2 syl.). A tax for having a fire, mentioned in Domesday Book, and abolished by William III. (Latin, fumans, smoke.)

Fume. In a flame. In ill-temper, especially from impatience. "The French say, "Fumer sans tabac; Fumer sans pipe" (to put oneself into a rage). Smoking with rage, or rather with the ineffectual vapour of anger.

"A! Biscuit, it est comical Fumer en homme amoureux,
Et terrible qu'en il se fume.
Le manoucr (il fume).

Fun. To make fun of. To make a butt of; to ridicule; to play pranks on one. (Compare Irish fun, delight.)

Like fun. Thoroughly, energetically, with delight.

Fun. Look at the dunces with, what they've done.
Just simply by stickin' together like fun."-Lowell: Belfield Papers (First Series, vi, Manner 5).

Fund. The sinking fund is money set aside by the Government for paying off a part of the national debt. This money is "sunk," or withdrawn from circulation, for the bonds purchased by it are destroyed.

Funds or Public Funds. Money lent at interest to Government on Government security. It means the national stock, which is the foundation of its operations.

A fall in the funds is when the quotation is lower than when it was last quoted.

A rise in the funds is when the quotation is higher than it was before.

To be interested in the funds is to have money in the public funds.

To be out of funds, out of money.

Funeral means a torchlight procession (from the Latin, fumus, a torch), because funerals among the Romans took place at night by torchlight, that magistrates and priests might not be violated by seeing a corpse, and so be prevented from performing their sacred duties.

"Fumus [a funeral], from fumus or fumulos [smokes] - originally made of ropes." - Adams: Roman Antiquities (Funeral).

Funeral Banquet. The custom of giving a feast at funerals came to us from the Romans, who not only feasted the friends of the deceased, but also distributed meat to the persons employed.

"Thrift, thrift, Horatio! the funeral baked meats But coldly furnish forth the marriage table." - Shakespeare: Hamlet, I, 2.

Funeral Games. Public games were held both in Greece and Rome in honour of the honoured dead. Examples of this custom are numerous: as at the death of Azai (son of Arcas, father of the Arcadians); the games instituted by Hercules at the death of Pelops; those held at the death of Oedipus; the games held by Achilles in honour of his friend Patroclus (Hom. Ilid, book xviii.); those held by Anais in honour of his father Anchises (Virg. Aenid, book v.); the games held in honour of Aitlaes (Hercules); those in honour of Brasidas (Thucydides); and those in honour of Timoleon mentioned by Plutarch. The spectators at these games generally dressed in white.

"Unluckily as Fungo'so in the play." - Pope: Essay on Criticism (120).

Funk. To be in a funk may be the Walloon "In de funk sun," literally to "be in the smoke." Colloquially to be in a state of trepidation from uncertainty or apprehension of evil.

Funny Bone. A pun on the word humerus. It is the inner condyle of the humerus; or, to speak technically, the knob, or enlarged end of the bone terminating where the ulnar nerve is exposed at the elbow: the funny bone. A knock on this bone at the elbow produces a painful sensation.

Furbelow. A corruption of falbula, a word in French, Italian, and Spanish to signify a sort of flounce.
   "Flounced and turbelowed from head to foot."
   —Addison.

Furca (See Fossa and Forx.)

Furocam et Flagellum (gallows and whip). The meanest of all servile tenures, the bondman being at the lord’s mercy, both life and limb. (See Forx.)

Furies (The Three). Tisiphone (Grievous, or Avenger of blood), Alocto (Im- placable), and Megera (Disputious). The best paintings of these divinities are those by Il Giottino (Thomas di Stefano) of Florence (1224-1556), Giulio Romano (1492-1546); Pietro da Cortona (1596-1669), and Titian (1477-1576).

Furies of the Guillotine (The). The tricoteuses—that is, Frenchwomen who attended the Convention knitting, and encouraged the Commune in all their most bloodthirsty excesses. Never in any age or any country did women so disgrace their sex.

Furox. Son of Occasion, an old hag, who was quite bald behind. Sir Guyon bound him “with a hundred iron chains and a hundred knots.” (Spenser: Faire Queene, book 11.)

Fusber’ta. Rinaldo’s sword is so called in Orlando Furioso. (See Sword.)

“This awfull sword was as dear to him as Dullina or Fusberta to ther respective masters.”
   —Sir W. Scott.

Fusiller’s. Foot-soldiers that used to be armed with a fusil or light musket. The word is now a synonymer, as the six British and two Indian regiments so called carry rifles like those of the rest of the infantry.

Fuss. Much ado about nothing. (Anglo-Saxon, fist, eager.)

“So full of flame, so full of fume,
   She seemed to be nothing but a bubble.”
   —Hood: Miss Kilmansey, part III, stanza 12.

Fus’tian. Stuff, bombast, pretentious words. Properly, a sort of cotton velvet. (French, fuseau; Spanish, fustan; from Fustat in Egypt, where the cloth was first made.) (See Domast; Camelot.)

“Some scurril squint collection of fustian phrases, and unpolish words.” —Hoyden: Four Minds of the Echeneus, i. 2.

Fusian Words. Isaac Taylor thinks this phrase means toper’s words, and derives fusian from fuster, Old French for a cask, whence “fusty” (tasting of the cask). It may be so, but we have numerous phrases derived from materials of dress applied to speech, as velvet, satin, silkem, etc. The mother of Artaxerxes said, “Those who address kings must use silken words.” In French, “faire parole de velour” means to fatten with velvet words in order to seduce or win over.

Futile (2 syl.) is that which will not hold together; inconsistent. A futile scheme is a design conceived in the mind which will not hold good in practice. (Latin, futu, to run off like water, whence futile.) (See Scheme.)

G.

G. This letter is the outline of a camel’s head and neck. It is called in Hebrew גג (a camel).

G.C.B. (See Bah.)

G.H.V.L. On the coin of William III. of the Netherlands is Groot Hertog Van Luxemburg (grand duke of Luxembourg).

G.M. The initial letters of Grand Old Man; so Mr. Gladstone was called during his premiership 1881-1885. Lord Rosebery first used the expression 26th April, 1892, and the Right Hon. Sir William Harcourt repeated it, 18th October, the same year; since then it has become quite a synonym for the proper name.

Gab (g hard). The gift of the gab. Fluency of speech; or, rather, the gift of boasting. (French, gabber, to gasconade; Danish and Scotch, gab, the mouth; Gaelic, gab; Irish, cab; whence our gap and gape, gabble and gobbled. The gable of a house is its back.)

“Ther was a good man named Job
   Who lived in the land of Uz,
   He had a good gift of the goalm,
   The same thing happened us.”

“Thot were one of the knights of France, who hold it for glory and pastime to gab, as they term it of exploits that are beyond human power.”
   —Sir W. Scott: The Talisman, chap. ii.

Gabardine (3 syl.). A Jewish coarse cloak, (Spanish, guadaina, a long coarse cloak.)

“Ye call me musheker, cut-throat dog,
   And spit upon my Jewish saltsatine.”
   —Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, i. 3.

Gabel’ Gabelle (g hard). A salt-tax. A word applied in French history to the monopoly of salt. All the salt made in France had to be brought to the royal warehouses, and was there sold at a price fixed by the Government. The iniquity was that some provinces had to pay twice as much as others. Edward III. jokingly called this monopoly "King Philippe's Salie law." It was abolished in 1782. (German, gab, a tax.)

Gaderlinzie, or A gaderlinzie man (g hard). A mendicant; or, more strictly speaking, one of the king's bedesmen, who were licensed beggars. The word gaban is French for "a cloak with tight sleeves and a hood." Lanzie is a diminutive of taine (wool); so that gader- linzie means "coarse woollen gown." These bedesmen were also called blau-gowans (q.v.), from the colour of their cloaks. (See above, GABARDINE.)

Gabriel (g hard), in Jewish mythology, is the angel of death to the favoured people of God, the prince of fire and thunder, and the only angel that can speak Syriac and Chaldee. The Mahometans call him the chief of the four favoured angels, and the spirit of truth. In mediæval romance he is the second of the seven spirits that stand before the throne of God, and, as God's messenger, carries to heaven the prayers of men. (Jerusalem Delivered, book i.) The word means "power of God." Milton makes him chief of the angelic guards placed over Paradise.

"Betwixt these rocky pillars Gabriel sat, Chief of the angelic band."—Paradise Lost, iv. 549-550.

Longfellow, in his Golden Legend, makes him the angel of the moon, and says he brings to man the gift of hope.

"I am the angel of the moon . . .
Nearest the earth, it is my lot . . .
That best illumines the midnight way.
I bring the gift of hope . . ."—The Scarlet Plume, i.

* It was Gabriel who (we are told in the Koran) took Mahomet to heaven on Al-borak (q.v.), and revealed to him his "prophetic lore." In the Old Testament Gabriel is said to have explained to Daniel certain visions; and in the New Testament it was Gabriel who announced to Zacharias the future birth of John the Baptist, and that afterwards appeared to Mary, the mother of Jesus. (Luke i. 26, etc.)

Gabriel's horn. Haizum.
Gabriel's hounds, called also Gabble Racket. Wild geese. The noise of the bean-goose (Anser cygnus) in flight is like that of a pack of hounds in full cry. The legend is that they are the souls of unchristened children wandering through the air till the Day of Judgment.

Gabriel's (3 syl.; g hard). La Belle Gabrielle. Daughter of Antoine d'Estaing, grand-master of artillery, and governor of the Isle de France. Henri IV., towards the close of 1590, happened to sojourn for a night at the Château de Cœuvres, and fell in love with Gabrielle, then nineteen years of age. To throw a flimsy veil over his intrigue, he married her to Damerval de Liancourt, created her Duchess de Beaufort, and took her to live with him at court.

"Geevant ne Gabrielle,
Perce de mile deruls,
Quand la plume ampute,
À la metre de Mars."—Henri IV.

Gabrina, in Orlando Furioso, is a sort of Potiphar's wife. (See under AEGEO.) When Philander had unwittingly killed her husband, Gabrina threatened to deliver him up to the law unless he married her; an alternative that Philander accepted, but ere long she tired of and poisoned him. The whole affair being brought to light, Gabrina was shut up in prison, but, effecting her escape, wandered about the country as an old hag. Knight after knight had to defend her; but at last she was committed to the charge of Odorico, who, to get rid of her, hung her on an old elm. (See Odorico.)

Gabrielotta (g hard). Governess of Brittany, rescued by Amadis of Gaul from the hands of Balan, "the bravest and strongest of all the giants." (Amadis of Gaul, bk. iv. ch. 129.)

Gad (g hard). Gadding from place to place. Wandering from pillar to post without any profitable purpose.

"Give water no passage, neither a wicked woman liberty, to sod her own."—Buchanand xvi. 25.

Gad-about (A). A person who spends day after day in frivolous visits, gadding from house to house.

Gad-fly is not the voring but the goosing fly. (Anglo-Saxon, gad, a gout.)

Gad-steel. Flemish steel. So called because it is wrought in gads, or small bars. (Anglo-Saxon, gad, a small bar or gout; Icelandic, gadtr, a spike or gout.)

"I will give a leaf of brass,
And with a gad of steel will write these words . . ."—Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, iv. 1.

Gadshill, in Kent, near Rochester. Famous for the attack of Sir John Falstaff and three of his kinsman companions on a party of four travellers, whom they robbed of their purses. While the robbers were dividing the spoil, Pouns and the Prince of Wales set upon them, and "oufaced them from their prize . . ." and as for the "Hercules of flesh," he ran and "roared for mercy, and still ran and roared," says the prince, "as ever I heard a bull-calf." Gadshill is also the name of one of the thievish companions of Sir John. (Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, ii. 4.)

"Charles Dickens lived at Gadshill.

Gaels. A contraction of Goidheals (hidden rovers). The inhabitants of Scotland who maintained their ground in the Highlands against the Celts.

Gaff (g hard). 'Crooked as a gaff. A gaff is an iron hook at the end of a short pole, used for landing salmon, etc. The metal spurs of fighting-cocks. In nautical language, a spar to which the head of a fore-and-aft sail is bent. (Irish; Gaelic; gaf; Spanish and Portuguese, gafa.)

Gaffer (g hard). A title of address, as "Gaffer Grey," "Good-day, Gaffer." "About equal to "mate." (Anglo-Saxon, gaffer, a comrade.) Many think the word is "grandfather." (See GAMMER.)

"If I had but a thousand a year, Gaffer Green, If I had but a thousand a year," Gaffer Green and Robin Rough.

Gags, in theatrical parlance, are interpolations. When Hamlet directs the players to say no more "than is set down," he cautions them against indulgence in gags. (Hamlet, iii. 2.) (Dutch, gauzen, to cackle. Compare Anglo-Saxon, gaf, the jay.)

Gala Day (g hard). A festival day: a day when people put on their best attire. (Spanish, gala, court dress; Italian, gala, finery; French, gala, pomp.)

Galactic Circle (The) is to sidereal astronomy what the ecliptic is to planetary astronomy. The Galaxy being the sidereal equator, the Galactic circle is inclined to it at an angle of 63°.

Galahad, or Sir Gahalith (g hard). Son of Sir Launcelot and Elaine, one of the Knights of the Round Table, so pure in life that he was successful in his search for the Sangrail. Tennyson has a poem on the subject, called The Holy Grail.

"There Galahad sat, with many a grace, Yet without meanness in his face," Sir W. Scott: Bridei of Traquair. i. 13

Gal'isor (Dow). Brother of Amadis of Gaul, a gay libertine, whose adventures form a strong contrast to those of the more serious hero.

Galate'a. A sea-nymph, beloved by Polyphem'e, but herself in love with Acis. Acis was crushed under a huge rock by the jealous giant, and Galatea threw herself into the sea, where she joined her sister nymphs. Carlo Maratti (1625-1713) depicted Galatea in the sea and Polyphem'e sitting on a rock. Handel has an opera entitled Acis and Galatea.

Galatea (3 syl.). Hector's horse.

"There is a thousand Hector in the field; Now here he fights or Galatea his horse, And there Jack's work." Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, v. 3

Galaxy (The). The "Milky Way." A long white luminous track of stars which seems to encompass the heavens like a giraffe. According to classic fable, it is the path to the palace of Zues (1 syl.) or Jupiter. (Greek, gala, milch, genitive, galaktos.)

"A galaxy of beauty. A cluster, assembly, or coterie of handsome women.

Gale's Compound. Powdered glass mixed with gunpowder to render it non-explosive. Dr. Gale is the patentee.

Galen (g hard). Galen says "Nay," and Hippocrates "Yes." The doctors disagree, and who is to decide? Galen was a physician of Asia Minor in the second Christian century. Hippocrates—a native of Cos, born B.C. 460—was the most celebrated physician of antiquity.

"Galen. A generic name for an apothe- cary. Galenists prefer drugs (called Galenical medicines), Paracelsians use mineral medicines.

Galloctotii (Martius). Louis XI.'s Italian astrologer. Being asked by the king if he knew the day of his own death, he craftily replied that he could not name the exact day, but he knew this much: it would be twenty-four hours before the decease of his majesty. Thersites, the soothsayer of Tiberius, Emperor of Rome, made verbally the same answer to the same question.

"Can the pretended skill ascertain the hour of one's own death?"

"Only by referring to the fate of another," said Galadion.

"I understand not thine answer, and hours

"Know them, O king," and Martius, "that this only I can tell with certainty concerning mine own death, that it shall take place exactly twenty-four hours before your majesty's:"

Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward, chap. xxix

Galera'sa (g hard), according to Ariosto, was wife of Charlemagne. (Orlando Furioso, bk xxi.) (See CHARLE-

"Galère (2 syl.). Que dalle allait-il faire dans cette galère? (What business had he to be on that galley?) This is from Molière's comedy of Les Fourberies... de Scapin. Scapin wants to bamboozle Géronde out of his money, and tells him that his master (Géronde's son) is detained prisoner on a Turkish galley, where he went out of curiosity. He adds, that unless the old man will ransom him, he will be taken to Algiers as a slave. Géronde replies to all that Scapin urges, "What business had he to go on board the galley?" The retort is given to those who beg money to help them out of difficulties which they have brought on themselves. "I grant you are in trouble, but what right had you to go on the galley?"

Voyage la Gallice. (See Vogue.)

Galea's (g hard). A river of Puglia, not far from Tarentum. The sheep that fed on the meadows of Galea's were noted for their fine wool. (Horace: 2 Carmenm Liber, vi. 10.)

Gallia (g hard). A Moorish princess. Her father, King Galadile of Toledo, built for her a palace on the Tagus so splendid that the phrase "a palace of Galia" became proverbial in Spain.

Galliaufré or Gallimaufré (g hard). A medley; any confused jumble of things; a hotchpotch made up of all the scraps of the harder. (French, galimafré; Spanish, gallofré, "broken meat," gallafré, a beggar.)

"He was both high and low, both rich and poor, both young and old, one with another, Ford.
He loves too gallyaufré [all sorts]."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives, ii. 1.

Gall and Wormwood. Extremely disagreeable and annoying.
"It was so much gall and wormwood to the Indians."—Mrs. E. Lytton Bulwer.

Gall of Bitterness (The). The bitterest grief; extreme affliction. The ancients taught that grief and joy were subject to the gall, affection to the heart, knowledge to the kidneys, anger to the bile (one of the four humours of the body), and courage or timidity to the liver. The gall of bitterness, like the heart of hearts, means the bitter centre of bitterness, as the heart of hearts means the innermost recesses of the heart or affections. In the Acts it is used to signify "the sinfulness of sin," which leads to the bitterest grief.

"I perceive them not in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of impiety."—Acts viii. 23.

Gall of Pigeons. The story goes that pigeons have no gall, because the dove sent from the ark by Noah burst its gall out of grief, and none of the pigeon family have had a gall ever since.

"For sin the Flood of Noah
The dove she had none."—Jameson: Popular Ballads (Lord of Birkin's Daughter).

Gall's Bell (St.). A four-sided bell, which was certainly in existence in the seventh century, and is still shown in the monastery of St. Gall, Switzerland.

Gallant (g hard). Brave, polite, courteous, etc. (French, galant.)

Gallery. To play with one eye on the gallery. To work for popularity. As an actor who sacrifices his author for popular applause, or a stump political orator "orates" to catch votes.

"The instant we begin to think about success and the effect of our work— to play with one eye on the gallery— we lose power, and touch, and everything else."—Rudyard Kipling: The Light That Failed.

Galley (g hard). A printer's frame into which type from the stick (g.v.) is emplaced. In the galley the type appears only in columns; it is subsequently divided into pages, and transferred to the "chase" (g.v.). (French, galère.)

Gally Pence. Geneoese coin brought over by merchants ("galleymen"), who used the Galley Wharf, Thames Street. These pence, or rather halfpence, were larger than our own.

Galli (g hard). France.
"Imperium im caelestis, Gallia sultanna caelestis."—Thomson: Solomon.

Galli Amae (transl. Gaul). Gallia Narbonensis was so called from the "braccæ" or trousers which the natives wore in common with the Scythians and Persians.

Gallia Comata. That part of Gaul which belonged to the Roman emperor, and was governed by legates (legati), was so called from the long hair (cornu) worn by the inhabitants flowing over their shoulders.

Gallia nes. The nine virgin priestesses of the Gallic oracle. By their charms they could raise the wind and waves, turn themselves into any animal form they liked, cure wounds and diseases, and predict future events. (Gallia mythology.)

Gallicism (g hard). A phrase or sentence constructed after the French idiom: as, "when you shall have returned home you will find a letter on your table." Government documents are especially guilty of this fault. In St. Matt. xx. 32 is a Gallicism: "I have compassion on the multitude, because they continue with me now three days, and have nothing to eat. (Compare St. Mark viii. 2.)

Gallium Merleburghæ. French of "Stratford-atte-Bowe."

"There is a spring which (so they say), if any one tastes, he murders his French [Gallium merleburghæ], so that when any one speaks that language he goes and speaks the French of Marlborough [Gallium Merleburghæ]."—Walter Map.

Gallivantus. A giant who lived with Hocus-Pocus in an enchanted castle. By his magic he changed men and women into dumb animals, amongst which was a duke's daughter, changed into a roe. Jack the Giant Killer, arrayed in his cap, which rendered him invisible, went to the castle and read the inscription: "Whoever can this trumpet blow, will cause the giant's overthrow." He seized the trumpet, blew a loud blast, the castle fell down, Jack slew the giant, and was married soon after to the duke's daughter, whom he had rescued from the giant's castle. (Jack the Giant Killer.)

Gallinafry. (See Gallinaffrey.)

Gallipot (g hard) means a glazed pot, as galleygen (3 syl.) means glazed tiles. (Dutch, gierpot, glazed pot.) In farce and jest it forms a by-name for an apothecary.

Gallo-Belgicus. An annual register in Latin for European circulation, first published in 1598.

"I'll tell thee all, And told for news with as much diligence As if we were in Gallo-Belgicus."—Thomas More: The Hurt. (1660)

Gallow. (See Caddice.)

Galloway (g hard). A horse less than fifteen hands high, of the breed which originally came from Galloway in Scotland.

"Throw him downstart, know we not Galloway wages?"—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., i. 4

"The knights and esquires are well mounted on large bay horses, the common people on little Galloways."—N. L. J. de L. Enspress, book 1, chap. xi., p. 25.

Gallowglass. An armed servitor (or foot-soldier) of an ancient Irish chief.

Gallius Numidicus (G.). A turkey cock. Our common turkey comes neither from Turkey nor Numidia, but from North America.

"And bedecked in borrowed plumes, he strolls over his parter as solemnly as any old Gallius Numidicus over the farmyard."—Pam; Tech. (1298)

Galore (2 syl, g hard). A sailor's term, meaning "in abundance." (Irish, go leor, in abundance.)

"For his Poll he had trifles and gold galore, besides of prize-money quite a store."—Jack Robinson.

Galvanism (g hard). So called from Louis Galvani, of Bologna. Signora Galvani in 1790 had frog-soup prescribed for her diet, and one day some skinned frogs which happened to be placed near an electric machine in motion exhibited signs of vitality. This strange phenomenon excited the curiosity of the experimenter, who subsequently noticed that similar convulsive effects were produced when the copper hooks on which the frogs were strung were suspended on the iron hook of the larder. Experiments being carefully conducted, soon led to the discovery of this important science.

Galway Jury. An enlightened, independent jury. The expression has its birth in certain trials held in Ireland in 1635 upon the right of the king to the counties of Ireland. Leitrim, Roscommon, Sligo and Mayo, gave judgment in favour of the Crown, but Galway opposed it: whereupon the sheriff was fined £1,000, and each of the jurors £1,000.

Gam. (See Ganeklon.)

Gama (g hard). Vasco da Gama, the Portuguese, was the first European navigator who doubled the Cape of Good Hope.

"With such mood seas the daring Gama fought...Incessant laboured round the stormy Cape."—Thomas: Summer.

Vasco da Gama. The hero of Camoëns' Lusitão. He is represented as sagacious, intrepid, tender-hearted, pious, fond of his country, and holding his temper in full command. He is also the hero of Meyerbeer's posthumous opera, L'Africaine.

"Gama, captain of the venturesome land, Of bold enterprise, and born for high command, Whose martial life, with prudence close allied, Ensured the smiles of fortune on his side."—Camoëns: Lusitão, bk. 1.

Gamaheu. A natural camel, or ungulato. These stones (chided agate) contain natural representations of plants, landscapes, or animals. Pliny tells us that the "Agate of Pyrrhus" contained a representation of the nine Muses, with Apollo in the midst. Pausanias calls them natural tulipans. Albertus Magnus makes mention of them, and Gaffret, in his Curiositatis monies, attributes to them magical powers. (French, camouche, from the oriental gemahnum, camoucha, or camouche.)

"When magic was ranked as a science, certain conjunctions were called "Gamahean unions."
Gamaliel. In the Talmud is rather a good story about this pundit. Caesar asked Gamaliel how it was that God robbed Adam in order to make Eve. Gamaliel's daughter instantly replied, the robbery was substituting a golden vessel for an earthen one.

Gambo'ge (2 syl., first g hard, second g soft). So called from Camb'odia or Camboja, whence it was first brought.

Game includes hares, pheasants, partridges, grouse, heath-game, or moor-game, black-game, and bustards. (Game Act, 1, 2, Will. IV.) (See SPORTING SEASON.)

Game. Two can play at that game. If you claw me I can claw you; if you throw stones at me I can do the same to you. The Duke of Buckingham led a mob to break the windows of the Scotch Puritans who came over with James I., but the Puritans broke the windows of the duke's house, and when he complained to the king, the British Solomon quoted to him the proverb, "Those who live in glass houses shouldn't throw stones."

You are making game of me. You are chaffing me. (Anglo-Saxon, gamyn, jest, scoffing.)

Game-egg. A bad or lame leg. (Welsh, gam; Irish, gam, had, crooked.)

Game for a Spare. Are you game for a spare? Are you inclined to join in a bit of fun? The allusion is to game-cocks, which never show the white feather, but are always ready for a fight.

Game is not worth the Candle (The). The effort is not worth making; the result will not pay for the trouble. (See CANDLE.)

Game's Afoot (The). The hare has started; the enterprise has begun.

"I see you stand like greyhounds to the slip,
Straining upon the shoot. The game's afoot.
Follow your sport! And upon this charge
Cry 'God for Harry! England and St. George.'"

Shakespeare: Henry V, iii, i.

Gam'elyn (3 syl., g hard). The youngest of the three sons of Sir Johan de Bounys. On his death-bed the old knight left "five plowes of land" to each of his two elder sons, and the rest of his property to Gamelyn. The eldest took charge of the boy, but entreated him shamefully; and when Gamelyn, in his manhood, demanded of him his heritage, the elder brother exclaimed, "Stand still, gadelyng, and hold thy peace!" "I am no gadelyng," retorted the proud young spirit; "but the lawful son of a lady and true knight." At this the older brother sent his servants to chastise the youngling, but Gamelyn drove them off with "a pestle." At a wrestling-match held in the neighbourhood, young Gamelyn threw the champion, and carried off the prize ram; but on reaching home found the door shut against him. He at once kicked down the door, and threw the porter into a well. The elder brother, by a manœuvre, contrived to bind the young squire to a tree, and left him two days without food; but Adam, the spencer, unloosed him, and Gamelyn fell upon a party of ecclesiastics who had come to dine with his brother. "Sprinkling holy water on the guests with his stout oaken cudgel," The sheriff now sent to take Gamelyn and Adam into custody; but they fled into the woods and came upon a party of foresters sitting at meat. The captain gave them welcome, and in time Game-lyn rose to be "king of the outlaws." His brother, being now sheriff, would have put him to death, but Gamelyn constituted himself a lynch judge, and hanged his brother. After this the king appointed him chief ranger, and he married. This tale is the foundation of Lodge's novel, called Euphene's Golden Legacy, and the novel furnished Shakespeare with the plot of As You Like It.

Gam'mon (g hard). A corruption of grandmother, with an intermediate form "granmer." (See Halliwell, sub voce.)

Gammer Gurton's Needle. The earliest comedy but one in the English language. It was "Made by Mr. S., Master of Arts." The author is said to have been Bishop Still of Bath and Wells (1543-1607).

Gam'mon (g hard). A corruption of game use. Stuff to impose upon one's credulity; chaff. (Anglo-Saxon, gamen, scoffing; our game, as "You are making game of me.")

Gammon (g hard) means the leg, not the buttock. (French, jamon, the leg, jambe; Italian, gambe.)

Gam'mut, or Gam'ut (g hard). It is gamma ut, "ut" being the first word in the Guido-von-Arrezzo scale of ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la. In the eleventh century the ancient scale was extended a note below the Greek proslenb'omy note (our A), the first space of the bass staff. The new note was termed gamma (gamma), and when "ut" was substituted by Arrezzo the "supernumerary" note was called gamma or ut, or shortly gam'mut.
—i.e. "G ut." The gammut, therefore, properly means the diatonic scale beginning in the bass clef with "G."

Gamp (Mrs.), or Sarah Gamp (g hard). A monthly nurse, famous for her bulky umbrella and perpetual reference to Mrs. Harris, a purely imaginary person, whose opinions always confirmed her own. (Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit.)

"Mrs. Harris, I says to her, if I could afford to lay out all my fellow creators for nothing, I would gladly do it. Such is the love I bear 'em."

Punch caricatures the Standard as "Mrs. Sarah Gamp," a little woman with an enormous bonnet and her characteristic umbrella.

A Sarah Gamp, or Mrs. Gamp. A big, pawky umbrella, so called from Sarah Gamp. (See above.)

Gamps and Harrises. Workhouse nurses, real or supposititious. (See GAMP.)

"Mr. Gathorne Hardy is to look after the Gamps and Harries of Lambeth and the Strand."—The Daily Telegraph.

Gan'abim. The island of thieves and plagiarists. So called from the Hebrew ganah (a thief). (Rabbinists: Pantagruel, iv. 60.)

Gander (g hard). What's sence for the goose is sence for the gander. Both must be treated exactly alike. Apple-sauce is just as good for one as the other. (Anglo-Saxon goes, related to gons and gans. The d and r of gan-a are merely euphonic; the a being the masculine suffix; thus ban-a was the masculine of hen. Latin, anser.)

Gander-leugh. Fully cliff; that mysterious land where anyone who makes a "goose of himself" takes up his temporary residence. The hypothetical Jedediah Cleishbotham, who edited the Tales of My Landlord, lived there, as Sir Walter Scott assures us.

Gander-month. Those four weeks when the "monthly nurse" rules the house with despotic sway, and the master is made a goose of.

Gan'elon (g hard). Count of Mayence, one of Charlemagne's paladins, the "Judas" of knights. His castle was built on the Blocksberg, the loftiest peak of the Hartz mountains. Jealousy of Roland made him a traitor; and in order to destroy his rival, he planned with Marsillus, the Moorish king, the attack of Rouscavilles. He was six and a-half feet high, with glaring eyes and fiery hair; he loved solitude, was very taciturn, disbelieved in the existence of moral good, and never had a friend. His name is a by-word for a traitor of the basest sort.

"Have you not held me at such a distance from your counsels, as if I were the most faithless spy since the days of Ganelon?"—Sir Walter Scott: The Abbot, chap. xlix.

"You would have thought him [Ganelon] one of Atriun's Hume, rather than one of the paladins of Charlemagne's court."—Cromemone, iii.

Ganem (g hard), having incurred the displeasure of Caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, effected his escape by taking the place of a slave, who was carrying on his head dishes from his own table. (Arabian Nights' Entertainments.)

Gan'esa (g hard). Son of Siva and Parbutta; also called Gnumputty, the elephant god. The god of wisdom, forethought, and prudence. The Mercury of the Hindus.

"Ganovoy bright and Ganerea sublime Shall bless with joy their own propitious clime."—Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, i.

Gang a-gley (To). To go wrong. (Scotch.)

"The best-laid schemes of mice and men Gang all asky."

Gang-board, or Gang-way (g hard). The board or way made for the rowers to pass from stem to stern, and where the mast was laid when it was unshipped. Now it means the board with cleats or bars of wood by which passengers walk into or out of a ship or steamboat. A gang is an alley or avenue.

"As we were putting off the boat they laid hold of the gang-board and unhooked it off the boat's stem."—Cook: Seven Voyages, bk. iii. chap. iv.

Gang-day (g hard). The day in Rogation week when boys with the clergy and wardens used to gang round the parish to beat its bounds.

Gangway (g hard). Below the gangway. In the House of Commons there is a sort of bar extending across the House, which separates the Ministry and the Opposition from the rest of the members. To sit "below the gangway" is to sit amongst the general members, neither among the Ministers nor with the Opposition.

Clear the gangway. Make room for the passengers from the boat, clear the passage. (See GANG-BOARD.)
Gardening

Ganges (The) is so named from gang, the earth. Often called Gunga or Ganga.

"Those who, through the curse, have fallen from heaven, having performed abstinence in this stream, become free from sin; cleansed from sin by this water, and restored to happiness, they shall enter heaven and return again to the gods. After having performed abstinence in this living water, they become free from all iniquity."—The KAMAGRAMA (section xxx).

Ganna. A Celtic prophetess, who succeeded Velle'da. She went to Rome, and was received by Domitian with great honours. (Tacitus: Annals, 35.)

Ganor (g hard), Gineura (g soft), or Guinever. Arthur's wife.

Ganymede (8 syl.; g hard). Jove's cup-bearer; the most beautiful boy ever born. He succeeded Hephaestus in office.

"When Ganymede above His service ministered to mighty Jove," Book of Amos.

Gara. A tract of land inhabited by a people without heads. Their eyes are in their shoulders, and their mouth in their breast. (Hakluyt's Voyages.) (See BLEMMYES.)

Gape (g hard). Looking for gapeseed. GAPing about and doing nothing. A corruption of "Looking a-gapeseed." Gaping is staring about with one's mouth open. A-gapesing and a.d.a-trapesing are still used in Norfolk.

"Seeking a gape's nest." (Devonshire.) A gape's nest is a sight which people stare at with wide-open mouth. The word "nest" was used in a much wider sense formerly than it is now. Thus we read of a "nest of shelves," a "nest of thieves," a "cosy nest." A gape's nest is the nest or place where anything stared at is to be found. (See MARE'S NEST.)

Gar'ga'ntua (g hard). The giant that swallowed five pilgrims with their staves and all in a salad. From a book entitled THE HISTORY OF GARGANTUA, 1594, Lanham, however, mentions the book of Gargantua in 1377. The giant in Rabelais is called Gargantua (q.v.).

"You must borrow me Gargantua's mouth first before I can utter so long a word," is a word too great for any mouth of this age's size."—Shakespeare: AS YOU LIKE IT, III. 2.

Garagantuan. Threatening, bullying. (See preceding.)

Garble (g hard) properly means to sift out the refuse. Thus, by the statute of 1 James I. 19, a penalty is imposed on the sale of drugs not garbled. We now use the word to express a mutilated extract, in which the sense of the author is perverted by what is omitted. (French, garber, to make clean; Spanish, garbilar.)

"A garbled quotation may be the most effectual perversion of an author's meaning."—Wycherley: Donna Gallant, p. 16.

? One of the best garbled quotations is this: David said (Psalm xiv. 1), "There is no God" (omitting the preceding words, "The fool hath said in his heart.")

Garci'as (g hard). The soul of Pedro Garcia. Money. It is said that two scholars of Salamanca discovered a tombstone with this inscription:—"Here lies the soul of the licentiate Pedro Garcia;" and on searching for this "soul" found a purse with a hundred golden ducats. (Cf. BLISS, Preface.)

Gar' dar'ke (4 syl.; g hard). So Russia is called in the Eddas.

Garden (g hard). The garden of Joseph of Arimathea is said to be the spot where the rotunda of the Holy Sepulchre now stands.

The Garden or Garden Sect. The disciples of Epicurus, who taught in his own private garden.

"Epicurus in his garden was languid; the birds of the air have more enjoyment of that food."—See home.

Garden of England. Worcestershire and Kent are both so called.

Garden of Europe. Italy.

Garden of France. Amboise, in the department of Indre-et-Loire.

Garden of India. Oude.

Garden of Ireland. Carol.

Garden of Italy. The island of Sicily.

Garden of South Wales. The southern division of Glamorganshire.

Garden of Spain. Andalusia.

Garden of the Sun. The East Indian (or Malayan) archipelago.

Garden of the West. Illinois; Kansas is also so called.

Garden of the World. The region of the Mississippi.

Gardener (g hard). Get on, gardener! Get on, you slow and clumsy coachman. The illusion is to a man who is both gardener and coachman.

Gardener. Adam is so called by Tennyson.

"From you blue sky above us breast.
The great old gardener and his wife [Adam and Eve]

Smile at the chance of long descent."

Lady Clara Vere de Vere

"Thus, old Adam's likeness, Get to dress this garden."

Gardening (g hard). (See ADAM'S PROFESSION.)
Father of landscape gardening. Lenotre (1613-1700).

Gargamelle (3 syl., 9 hard) was the wife of Grangousier, and daughter of the king of the Parpaillons (butterflies). On the day that she gave birth to Gargantua she ate sixteen quarters, two bushels, three pecks, and a pipkin of dirt, the mere remains left in the triphe which she had for supper; for, as the proverb says—

"Scratch tripe as clean as you can.
A little of thir will still remain."

Gargamelle. Said to be meant for Anne of Brittany. She was the mother of Gargantua, in the satirical romance of Gargantua and Pantagruel, by Rabelais. Motteux, who makes "Pantagruel" to be Anthony de Bourbon, and "Gargantua" to be Henri d'Albret, says "Gargamelle" is designed for Catherine de Foix, Queen of Navarre. (Rabelais, i. 4.)

Gargantua (9 hard), according to Rabelais, was son of Grangousier and Gargamelle. Immediately he was born he cried out "Drink, drink!" so lustily that the words were heard in Beauce and Bibaros; whereupon his royal father exclaimed, "Que grand tu es!" which, being the first words he uttered after the birth of the child, were accepted as its name; so it was called "Gah-gran'-tu-as," corrupted into Garg-an-tu-a. It needed 17,913 cows to supply the bade with milk. When he went to Paris to finish his education he rode on a mare as big as six elephants, and took the bells of Notre Dame to hang on his mare's neck as jingles. At the dinner of the Prussians he restored the bells, and they consented to feed his mare for nothing. On his way home he was fired at from the castle at Vaux-Fort, and on reaching home combed his hair with a comb 900 feet long, when at every "ruke," seven bullet-halves fell from his hair. Being desirous of a salad for dinner, he went to cut some lettuces as big as walnut-trees, and ate up six pilgrims from Sebastian, who had hidden themselves among them out of fear. Picrochole, having committed certain omissions, was attacked by Gargantua in the rock Clermond, and utterly defeated; and Gargantua, in remembrance of this victory, founded and endowed the abbey of Theleme [Tr-lame]. (Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 7.)

Gargantua is said to be a satire on Francois I., but this cannot be correct, as he was born in the kingdom of the butterflies, was sent to Paris to finish his education, and left it again to succour his own country. Motteux, perceiving these difficulties, thinks it is meant for Henri d'Albret, King of Navarre.

Gargantua's mare. Those who make Gargantua to be François I. make his "great mare" to be Mme. d'Estatpes. Motteux, who looks upon the romance as a satire on the Reform party, is at a loss how to apply this word, and merely says, "It is some lady." Rabelais says, "She was as big as six elephants, and had her feet cloven into fingers. She was of a burnt-sorrel hue, with a little mixture of dapple-grey: but, above all, she had a terrible tail, for it was every whit as great as the steeple pillar of St. Mark." When the beast got to Orleans, and the wranglers assaulted her, she switched about her tail so furiously that she knocked down all the trees that grew in the vicinity, and Gargantua, delighted, exclaimed, "Je trouve beau ce!" wherefore the locality has been called "Beauce" ever since. The satire shows the wilfulness and extravagance of court mistresses. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel, book i. 16.)

Gargantua's shepherds, according to Motteux, mean Lutheran preachers; but those who look upon the romance as a political satire, think the Crown ministers and advisers are intended.

Gargantua's thirst. Motteux says the "great thirst" of Gargantua, and "mighty drought" at Pantagruel's birth, refer to the withholding the cup from the laity, and the clamour raised by the Reform party for the wine as well as the bread in the eucharist.

Gargantuan. Enormous, inordinate, great beyond all limits. It needed 900 ells of Châtelleraut linen to make the body of his shirt, and 200 more for the gussets; for his shoes 406 ells of blue and crimson velvet were required, and 1,100 cow-hides for the soles. He could play 207 different games, picked his teeth with an elephant's tusk, and did everything in the same "large way."

"It sounded like a Gargantuan order for a drain."—The Standard.

A Gargantuan course of studies. A course including all languages, as well ancient as modern, all the sciences, all the -ologies and -onomies, together with calisthenics and athletic sports. Gargantua wrote to his son Pantagruel, commanding him to learn Greek, Latin, Chaldaic, Arabic; all history, geometry, arithmetic, and music; astronomy and natural philosophy, so that "there be not a river in all the world thou dost not know the name of, and nature of all its fishes; all the fowls of the air; all the several kinds of shrubs and herbs; all the metals hid in the bowels of the earth; with all gems and precious stones. I would furthermore have thee study the Talmudists and Cabalists, and get a perfect knowledge of man. In brief, I would have thee a bottomless pit of all knowledge." (Rabellius: Panteurgul, book ii. 8.)

Gargitio. One of the dogs that guarded the herds and flocks of Ger'yon, and which Hercules killed. The other was the two-headed dog, named Orthos, or Orthros.

Gargouille, or Gargoil (g hard). A water-spout in church architecture. Sometimes also spelt Gargoyle. They are usually carved into some fantastic shape, such as a dragon's head, through which the water flows. Gargouille was the great dragon that lived in the Seine, ravaged Rouen, and was slain by St. Romains, Bishop of Rouen, in the seventh century. (See DRAGON.)

Garibaldi's Red Shirt. The red shirt is the habitual upper garment of American sailors. Any Liverpudlian will tell you that some fifteen years ago a British war might be discerned by his blue shirt, and a Yankee "salt" by his red. Garibaldi first adopted the American shirt, when he took the command of the merchantman in Baltimore.

Garland (g hard).

A chaplet should be composed of four roses, and a Garland should be made of bound oak leaves, interspersed with roses. J. E. Cawson: Handbook of Heraldry, chap vi. p. 16.

Garland. A collection of balls in True Lovers' Garland, etc.

Nuptial garlands are as old as the hills. The ancient Jews used them, according to Selden (loc. cit.), iii. 659: the Greek and Roman brides did the same (Vaughan, Golden Grove); so did the Anglo-Saxons and Gauls.

"There ornamentum properanl to a wife. A ringe on her fynge, a brooch on her breast, an a garnond on her heade. The eyne be twickened, the loye, the breast closeke, in hectic and lasteste, the earne shone, and the durtie of the ornament of wedlock."—Leland: Dives and Papater (4:20).

Garlick is said to destroy the magnetic power of the leadstone. This notion, though proved to be erroneous, has the sanction of Pliny, Solinus, Ptolemy, Plutarch, Albertus, Mathiolas, Ruesus, Raulanctus, Renoeus, Langius, and others. Sir Thomas Browne places it among "Vulgar Errors" (book ii. chap. 3).

"Martin Rualaneus saith that Ononis and Garlick... hinder the attractive power of the magnet, and rob it of its virtue of drawing iron, to which Renoeus agrees, but thus: "all lies"—W. Salmon: The Complete English Physicall, etc., chap. xx. p. 182.

Garnish (g hard). Entrance-money, to be spent in drink, demanded by jail-birds of new-comers. In prison slang garnish means fettors, and garnish-money is money given for the "honour" of wearing fettors. The custom became obsolete with the reform of prisons. (French, garnissage, trimming, verb garnir, to decorate or adorn.) (See Fielding's and Smollett's novels.)

Garratt (g hard). The Mayor of Gavvill. Garratt is between Wands- worth and Tooting: the first mayor of this village was elected towards the close of the eighteenth century; and his election came about thus: Garratt Common had been often encroached on, and in 1798 the inhabitants associated themselves together to defend their rights. The chairman of this association was entitled Mayor, and as it happened to be the time of a general election, the society made it a law that a new "mayor" should be chosen at every general election. The addresses of these mayors, written by Foote, Garrick, Wilkes, and others, are satires on the corruption of electors and political squibs. The first Mayor of Garratt was "Sir" John Harper, a retailer of brick dust in London; and the last was "Sir" Harry Dimsdale, muffin-seller, in 1798. Foote has a farce entitled The Mayor of Gar ratt.

Garraway's, i.e. Garraway's coffeehouse, in Exchange Alley. It existed for 216 years, and here tea was sold, in 1657, for 16s. up to 50s. a pound. The house no longer exists.

Garrote or Gartotte (2 syl., g hard) is the Spanish garrote (a stick). The original way of garrotting in Spain was to place the victim on a chair with a cord round his neck, then to twist the cord with a stick till strangulation ensued. In 1831 General Lopez was garrotted by the Spanish authorities for attempting to gain possession of Cuba; since which time the thieves of London, etc., have adopted the method of strangling their victim by throwing their arms round his throat, while an accomplice ripes his pockets.
Gaunt

Garter (g hard). Knights of the Garter. The popular legend is that Joan, Countess of Salisbury, accidentally slipped her garter at a court ball. It was picked up by her royal partner, Edward III., who gallantly diverted the attention of the guests from the lady by binding the blue band round his own knee, saying as he did so, "Honi soit qui mal y pense" (1348).

Wearing the garters of a pretty maiden either on the hat or knee was a common custom with our forefathers. Brides usually wore on her legs a host ofgay ribbons, to be distributed after the marriage ceremony amongst the bridegroom's friends; and the piper at the wedding dance never failed to tie a piece of the bride's garter round his pipe. If there is any truth in the legend given above, the impression on the guests would be wholly different to what such an accident would produce in our days; but perhaps the "Order of the Garter," after all, may be about tantamount to "The Order of the Ladies' Champions," or "The Order of the Ladies' Favourites."

Garvies (2 syl., g soft). Sprats. So called from Inch Garvie, an isle in the Frith of Forth, near which they are caught.

Gascona'do (3 syl., g hard). Talk like that of a Gascon--absurd boasting, vainglorious bragadocio. It is said that a Gascon being asked what he thought of the Louvre in Paris, replied, "Pretty well; it reminds me of the back part of my father's stable." The vainglory of this answer is more palpable when it is borne in mind that the Gascons were proverbially poor. The Dictionary of the French Academy gives us the following specimen: "A Gascon, in proof of his ancient nobility, asserted that he used in his father's house no other fuel than the batons of the family marshals."

Gastrol'ters. People whose god is their belly. (Rabelais: Pantagruel, iv. 58.)

Gat-tooth (g hard). Goat-tooth. (Anglo-Saxon, get.) Goat-toothed is having a lickerish tooth. Chaucer makes the wife of Bath say, "Gat-toothed I was, and that became me wele."

Gate Money. Money paid at the gate for admission to the grounds where some contest is to be seen.

Gate-posta. The post on which the gate hangs and swings is called the "hanging-post"; that against which it shuts is called the "banging post."

Gate of Italy. That part of the valley of the Adige which is in the vicinity of Trent and Rovere'do. A narrow gorge between two mountain ridges.

Gate of Tears [Rabelanadel]. The passage into the Red Sea. So called by the Arabs from the number of shipwrecks that took place there.

"Like some ill-destined bark that steers In silence through the Gate of Tears." (T. Moore: Fire-Worshippers.)

Gath (g hard), in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, means Brussels, where Charles II. long resided while he was in exile.

"Had thus old David[Charles II.]... Not dared, when fortune called him, to be king, At Gath an exile he might still remain."

Tell it not in Gath. Don't let your enemies hear it. Gath was famous as the birthplace of the giant Goliath.

"Tell it not in Gath; publish it not in the streets of Askelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph."—2 Sam. i. 20.

Gathered - dead. The Bible phrase, "He was gathered to his fathers."

"He was (for he is gathered) a little man with a copper complexion."—Incest, p. 25.

Gathers (g hard). Out of gathered. In distress; in a very impoverished condition. The allusion is to a woman's gown, which certainly looks very seedy when "out of gatherers"—i.e., when the cotton that kept the "pleats" together has given way. (Anglo-Saxon, gader-sun, to gather, or pleat.)

Gaucherie (3 syl., g hard). Things not commode: behaviour not according to the received forms of society; awkward and untoward ways. (See above.)

Gau'difer (g hard). A champion, celebrated in the romance of Alexander. Not unlike the Scotch Bruce.

Gaudy-day (.d). A holiday, a feast-day. (Latin gaudes, to rejoice.)

Gaul (g hard). France.

"Insulting Gaul has roused the world to war." (Thomson: Antiquus.)

"Shall haughty Gaul invasion threat?"—Burns.

Gaunt (g hard). John of Gaunt. The third son of Edward III.; so called from Ghent, in Flanders, the place of his birth.

Gauntgrim (g hard). The wolf.

"For my part (said he), I don't wonder at my cousin's refusing Brun the bear and Gauntgrim the wolf... Brun is always in the suite, and Gauntgrim always in a passion."—E. H. Lytton: Pilgrim of the Rhine, chap. xii.

Gauntlet (g hard). To run the gauntlet. To be hounded on all sides. Corruption of gaullope, the passage between two files of soldiers. (German, ganglanfen or gassenlanfen.) The reference is to a punishment common among sailors. If a companion had disgraced himself, the crew, provided with gauntlets or ropes' ends, were drawn up in two rows facing each other, and the delinquent had to run between them, while every man dealt him, in passing, as severe a chastisement as he could.

* The custom exists among the North American Indians. (See Fenimore Cooper and Mayne Reid.)

To throw down the gauntlet. To challenge. The custom in the Middle Ages, when one knight challenged another, was for the challenger to throw his gauntlet on the ground, and if the challenge was accepted the person to whom it was thrown picked it up.

"It is not for Sam, reduced as she is to the lowest degree of social position, to throw the gauntlet to the right and left."—The Penns.

Gautama (g hard). The chief deity of Burmah, whose favourite offering is a paper umbrella.

The four sublime virtues of Gautama are as follows:

1. Pain exists.
2. The cause of pain is "birth sin."
3. Pain is ended only by Nirvana.
4. The way that leads to Nirvana is—right faith, right judgment, right language, right purpose, right practice, right obedience, right memory, and right meditation (right in all).

Gautier and Garguille (French). All the world and his wife.

Se moquer de Gautier et de Garguille (to make fun of everyone). Gautier-Garguille was a clown of the seventeenth century, who gave himself unhounded licence, and provoked against himself a storm of angry feeling.

Gauvaine or Ga'wain = Gau-wain (2 syl., g hard). Sir Gauvane the Courteous. One of Arthur's knights, and his nephew. He challenged the Green Knight, and struck off his head; but the headless knight picked up his poll again and walked off, telling Sir Gauvaine to meet him twelve months hence. Sir Gauvaine kept his appointment, and was hospitably entertained; but, taking possession of the girdle belonging to the lady of the house, was chastised by the Green Knight, confessed his fault, and was forgiven.

* "The gentle Gauvaine's courtesies rare.
  Hector de Mars and Poffmore,
  And Laurelot that evermore
  Looked still upon the Queen."—Sir W. Scott: Bride of Tramale, ii. 13

Gavelkind (g hard). A tenure in Wales, Kent, and Northumberland, whereby land descended from the father to all his sons in equal proportions. The youngest had the homestead, and the eldest the horse and arms.

: Coke: (1) Institutes, 494) says the word is "of old use in all the kind, but Lamarrus suggests the Anglo-Saxon gavol or gavel, rent; and says it means "land which yields rent."" gavel iuy, rent family derived from land. There is a similar Irish word, uadallac, a family tenure.

Gawain (g hard). (See Gauvaine.)

Gawroy (g hard). One of the race of flying women who appeared to Peter Wilkins in his solitary cave. (Robert Fulke: Lyver Wdgins.)

Gay (g hard). They are the king's candles. A French phrase, alluding to an ancient custom observed on the 6th of January, called the "Eve or Vigil of the Kings," when a candle of divers colours was burnt. The expression is used to denote a woman who is more showily dressed than is consistent with good taste.

Gay Deceiver (J). A Lothario (g.r.); a libertine.

"I immediately quitted the precincts of the castle, and posted myself on the high road, where the gay deceiver was sure to be intercepted on his return"—Le Sage: Adoress of Tid Bhan (Smollett's translation). (178.)

Gay Girl. A woman of light or extravagant habits. Lady Anne Berkeley, dissatisfied with the conduct of her daughter-in-law (Lady Catherine Howard), exclaimed, "By the blessed sacrament, this gay girl will beggar my son Henry." (See above.)

"What is thy name? Some gay girl, God it wot, Hath brought thee thus upon the very foot" (i.e.,
  But you on your high house, or into a pass Chatter: Contortory Tales, 5:6.)

Gaze (1 syl, g hard). To stand at gaze. To stand in doubt what to do.

A term in forestry. When a stag first hears the hounds it stands dazed, looking all round, and in doubt what to do.
Heralds call a stag which is represented full-faced, a "stag at gaze."

"The American army in the central states remained wholly at gaze." — Lord Mahon: History.

"As the poor frightened deer, that standst at gaze, Wildly determining which way to fly." — Shakespeare: Much Ado About Nothing, III. 40, 35-39.

Gazette. (See LYMNE-HOUND.)

Gazette. (2 syl., g hard.) A newspaper. The first newspapers were issued in Venice by the Government, and came out in manuscript once a month, during the war of 1653 between the Venetians and Turks. The intelligence was read publicly in certain places, and the fee for hearing it read was one gazetta (a Venetian coin, somewhat less than a farthing in value).

"The first official English newspaper, called The Oxford Gazette, was published in 1661. At Oxford where the Court was held on the removal of the Court to London, the name was changed to The London Gazette. The name was reversed in 1690, during the great Fire. Now the official Gazette, published every Tuesday and Friday, contains announcements of patents, premonitions, bankruptcies, dissolutions of partnerships, etc. (See News-Paper.)

Gazetted (g hard). Published in the London Gazette, an official newspaper.

Gaznavides, (3 syl.) A dynasty of Persia, which gave four kings and lasted fifty years (993-1043), founded by Mahmoud Gazni, who resigned from the Ganges to the Caspian Sea.

Gear (g hard) properly means "dress," In machinery, the bands and wheels that communicate motion to the working part are called the gearing. (Saxon, gieran.)

In good gear. To be in good working order.

Out of gear. Not in working condition, when the "gearing" does not act properly; out of health.

Gee-up! and Gee-woo! addressed to horses both mean "Horse, get on." Gee = horse. In Notts and many other counties nurses say to young children, "Come and see the gee-woo." There is not the least likelihood that Gee-woo is the Italian gio, because gio will not fit in with the rest of the other terms, and it is absurd to suppose our peasants would go to Italy for such a word. Wow! or Woo! (g.e.), meaning stop, or halt, is quite another word. We subjoin the following quotation, although we differ from it. (See COME ATHER, WOO-ST.)

"Et cum sic choramur, et coepimus cum quantus goriam suscitarum ad illum virum suam eum, dicenda etsi non jussit pedem persecuturam, quae mihi pungensque ex stimulo calcabatur." — Dialogus Ciceropera (1488).

Geese (g hard). (See GANDER, GOOSE.)

Geese save the capital. The tradition is that when the Gauls invaded Rome a detachment in single file clambered up the hill of the Capitol so silently that the foremost man reached the top without being challenged: but while he was striding over the rampart, some sacred geese, disturbed by the noise, began to cackle, and awoke the garrison. Marcus Manlius rushed to the wall and hurled the fellow over the precipice. To commemorate this event, the Romans carried a golden goose in procession to the Capitol every year (B.C. 300).

"Those concerned in these orders, That to the Capitol were waders, And hence then upon patrol, With noise-alone left off the Gauls." — Butler: Hudibras, v. 2.

All his scorns are geese, or All his scorns are turned to geese. All his expectations end in nothing; all his boasting ends in a snore. Like a person who fancies he sees a swan on a river, but finds it to be only a goose.

The phrase is sometimes reversed thus, "All his geese are scorns." Commonly applied to people who think too much of the beauty and talent of their children.

Every man thinks his own goose scorns. Everyone is prejudiced by self-love. Every crow thinks its own nestling the fairest. Every child is beautiful in its mother's eyes. (See Aesop's fable, The Eagle and the Ocel.)

Latin: Summ cuique pulchrillum. Sua cuique sposa, mihi mea. Sua cuique res est carissima. Asinum asino, suum pulcher.

German: Eine gute mutter halt ihre kinder vor die schonsten.

French: A chaque oisss on dit "pour b'ain.

Italian: A ogni gran laison 'belli i suoi grottalini. Ad ogni uccello, suo nido e bello.

The more geese the more lovers. The French newspaper called L'Europe, December, 1865, repeats this proverb, and says:—"It is customary in England for every gentleman admitted into society to send a fat goose at Christmas to the lady of the house he is in the habit of visiting. Beautiful women receive a whole magazine . . . and are thus enabled to tell the number of their lovers by the number of fat geese sent to them." (The Times, December 27th, 1865.)

Truly the Frenchman knows much more about us than we ever "dream of in our philosophy."

Geese. (See GOOSE, CAG MAG.)
Gehenna (Hebrew, ג 혇נה hard). The place of eternal torment. Strictly speaking, it means simply the Valley of Hinnom (ג הינום), where sacrifices to Moloch were offered and where refuse of all sorts was subsequently cast, for the consumption of which fires were kept constantly burning.

And made his grove, the pleasant valley of Hinnom, Toppled therein; And black Gehenna called, the terror of hell. Miller: Paradise Lost, book 1.

Gelert (g hard). The name of Llewellyn's dog. One day a wolf entered the room where the infant son of the Welsh prince was asleep; Gelert flew at it and killed it; but when Llewellyn returned home and saw his dog's mouth bloody, he hastily concluded that it had killed his child, and threw it through with his sword. The howl of the dog awoke the child, and the prince saw too late his fatal rashness. Beth-gelert is the name of the place where the dog was buried. (See Beth-Gelert, Dog.)

A similar story is told of Czar Praw of Russia. In the Goda Romanovna the story is told of Volvilevus, a knight, but instead of a wolf the dog is said to have killed a wolf. The story occurs again in the Seven Wise Masters. In the Sammarit version the dog is called an elephant and the wolf a "black snake." In the Hitopadesa (v. 3) the dog is an otter; in the Arabic a weasel; in the Mongolian a polecat; in the Persian a cat, etc.

Gellatly (Duie). The idiot servant of the Baron of Bradwardine. (Sir W. Scott: Waverley.) Also spelt Gellatly.

Gemara (ג מארה hard), which means "complement," is applied to the second part of the Talmud, which consists of annotations, discussions, and amplifications of the Jewish Mishna. There is the Babylonian Grima and the Jerusalem Grima. The former, which is the more complete, is by the academicians of Babylon; the latter by those of Palestine.

"Scribes and Harpists... set little value on the study of the law itself, but made it on that of the commentaries of the rabbis now embodied in the Mishna and Gemara." Hulse: Life of Christ, vol. ii. ch. xxxv. p. 61.

Gemmogog, Son of the giant Oro-medon, and inventor of the Poulan shoes—i.e., shoes with a spur behind, and turned-up toes fastened to the knees. These shoes were forbidden by Charles V. of France in 1563, but the fashion revived again. (Duchat: Outres de Rabelais.)

According to the same authority, giants were great inventors: Erix invented legere-moain; Gebrana, drinking healths; Gemmagog, Poulan shoes; Haymouche, drying and smoking neat's tongues; etc. etc.

Gems. (See JEWELS.)

Gendarmerie. "Men at arms," the armed police of France. The term was first applied to those who marched in the train of knights; subsequently to the cavalry in the time of Louis XIV, to a body of horse charged with the preservation of order; after the revolution to a military police chosen from old soldiers of good character; now it is applied to the ordinary police, whose costume is half civil and half military.

Gender-words: Billy, nannie; bear, sow; buck, doe; bull, cow; cock, hen; dog, bitch; ewe, tup; grooms = man; he, she: Jack, Jenny; male, female; man, maid; woman; master, mistress; Tom, tup, dam; and several "Christian names; as in the following examples:

Billy: Dog, hound.
Jenny: Jack and Jenny; he, she, hers.
Horn: The horn (if sex is referred to).
Maid: Male and female donkey. (See Ass.)
Elephant: Bull and cow elephant; male and female elephant.
Fox: Dog and bitch fox; the bitch is also called a vixen.
Gnome cock.
Merchant, gentlewoman or lady.
Bride: Billy and Nanny goat; he and she goat, billy goat.
Hare: Jack and doe hare.
Beau: Horse, he, her, female.
Knaves: Knaves, swan.
Lamb: Ewe lamb; tup lamb.
Mancry, woman.
Mew, mermaid.
Milkman, milkmaid, or milk-woman.
Must, mouschen.
Otter: Dog and bitch otter.
Parti, cock and hen partridge.
Peacock, peahen.
Phaeton: Cock and hen phaeton.
Dog: Beer and sow pig.
Rabbits, Buck and doe rabbit.
Rat, A Jack rat.
Schoolmaster, schoolmistress.
Sew: Bull and cow. The bull of this sex under six years of age is called a "Bachelier." Servant: Male and female servant; man and maid servants.
Singer, songstress; man and woman singer.
Sir John, Lady (Mary).
Sparrow: Cock and hen sparrow.
Sword: A cow and cow swan, hen-swan.
Turkey cock and hen.
Wash or washerwoman.
Whale: Bull or Univer, and c.w.
Wren: Jervis, cock Rotterdam, Tom tit; etc.
Wolf: Dog, wolf; bitch or she-wolf.

Generally the name of the animal stands last; in the following instances, Geneva, a Swiss city that became famous for its watch-making industry.

The following requires no gender...

Genoa, where the young Galen was born...

Henrietta Maria, the daughter of the King of Scotland, Indoor she was born.

Hannah, an Aramaic expression for her woman's name.

Henry VIII, the father of the young Galen, Indoor he was born.
Genève (St.). The sainted patroness of the city of Paris. (422-512.)

Genii King. King Solomon is supposed to preside over the whole race of genii. (D’Herbelot: Notes to the Koran, c. 2.)

Genitive Case means the genus case, the case which shows the genus; thus, a bird of the air, of the sea, of the marshes, etc. The part in italics shows to what genus the bird belongs. Our is the adjective sign, the same as the Sanskrit sya, us udaka (water), udakasya (of water, or aquatic). So in Greek, demos (people), demus-los (belonging to the people), or genitive demus-los, softened into demos-lo. In Chaucer, etc., the genitive is written in full, as The Clerk’s Tale, The Cakes Tale, The Knights Tale, The Miller’s Tale, etc.

Genius, Genii (Roman mythology) were attendant spirits. Everyone had two of these tutelaries from his cradle to his grave. But the Roman genius differ in many respects from the Eastern. The Persian and Indian genius had a corporeal form, which they could change at pleasure. They were not guardian or attendant spirits, but fallen angels, dwelling in Ginnest, under the dominion of Ebis. They were naturally hostile to man, though compelled sometimes to serve them as slaves. The Roman genius were tutelary spirits, very similar to the guardian angels spoken of in Scripture (St. Matt. xviii. 10). (The word is the old Latin genus, to be born, from the notion that birth and life were due to these du genitaux.)

Genius (birth-wit) is innate talent; hence propensity, nature, inner man.

"Genius genus servus carnis" (to-morrow you shall indulge your inner man with wine), Horace, 3 Crus, xvii. 11. "In dulcejere genus" (to give loose to one’s propensity), Persius, v. 151. "De sancto genere sumus" (to stint one’s appetite, to deny one’s self), Terence: Phormio, i. 1. (See above.)

Genius. Tom Moore says that Common Sense went out one moonlight night with Genius on his rambles; Common Sense went on many wise things saying, but Genius went gazing at the stars, and fell into a river. This is told of Thales by Plato, and Chaucer has introduced it into his Miller’s Tale.

"So ferde another clerk with astronomy: / He walked in the fields for to prey / Upon the sturies, what they should befall, / Till he was in a marle pot a-fall." — Canterbury Tales, 3.457.

My evil genius (my ill-luck). The Romans maintained that two genii attended every man from birth to death—one good and the other evil. Good luck was brought about by the agency of "his good genius," and ill luck by that of his "evil genius."

Genius Loci (Latin). The tutelary deity of a place.

"In the midst of this wreck of ancient books and utensils, with a gravity equal to (that of) Marcus among the ruins of Carthage, sat a large black cat, which, to a superstitious eye, might have presented the genius loci, the tutelar demon of the apartment." — Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. iii.

Genoa, from the Latin, genu (the knee); so called from the bend made there by the Adriatic. The whole of Italy is called a man’s leg, and this is his knee.

Genovefa (g soft). Wife of Count Palatine Siegfried, of Brabant, in the time of Charles Martel. Being suspected of infidelity, she was driven into the forest of Ardennes, where she gave birth to a son, who was nourished by a white doe. In time, Siegfried discovered his error, and restored his wife and child to their proper home.

Genre Painter (genre I syl). A painter of domestic, rural, or village scenes, such as A Village Wedding, The Young Recruit, Blind Man’s Buff, The Village Politician, etc. It is a French term, and means, "Man: his customs, habits, and ways of life." Wilkie, Oastade, Girard Dow, etc., belonged to this class. In the drama, Victor Hugo introduced the genre system in lieu of the stilted, unnatural style of Louis XIV’s era.

"We call all those ‘genre’ characters, wherein are painted the styles of the rustic, the countryman, and the farm, pictures of real life." — E. C. Stedman: Poets of America, chap. iv. p. 26.

Gens Braccata. Trousered people. The Romans wore no trousers like the Gauls, Scythians, and Persians. The Gauls wore "bracoata" and were called Gens bracatin.

Gens Togata. The nation which wore the toga. The Greeks wore the "pallium" and were called Gens palatini.

Gentle (g soft) means having the manners of geneted persons—i.e., persons of family, called gens in Latin.

"We must be gentle, now we are gentlemen." — Shakespeare: Winter’s Tale, 1.2.

The gentle craft. The gentleman’s trade, so called from the romance of Prince Crispin, who is said to have made shoes. It is rather remarkable that the "gentle craft" should be closely connected with our snob (q.v.).

"Here Hans Sachs, the cobbler poet, laureate of the gentle craft.

Wissel of the Twelve Wise Masters, in huge folios sung and laughed."

The gentle craft. Angling. The pun is on gentle, a maggot or grub used for baiting the hook in angling.

Gentle Shepherd (The). George Grenville, the statesman, a nickname derived from a line applied to him by Pitt, afterwards Earl of Chatham. Grenville, in the course of one of his speeches, addressed the House interrogatively, "Tell me where? tell me where?" Pitt hummed a line of a song then very popular, "Gentle shepherd, tell me where?" and the House burst into laughter (1712-1720).

Gentlemen (g soft). A translation of the French gentilhomme, one who belongs to the gens or stock. According to the Roman law, gens-men, or gentlemen, wore those only who had a family name, were born of free parents, had no slave in their ancestral line, and had never been degraded to a lower rank.

Gentlemen of the four arts. A vulgar upstart, with-out manners, with-out wit, with-out money, and with-out credit.

Gentlemen of Paper and Wax. The first of a new line ennobled with knighthood or other dignity, to whom are given titles and coat-armour. They are made "gentlemen" by patent and a seal.

Geology (g soft). The father of geology. William Smith (1769-1810).

Géomancy (g soft). Divining by the earth. So termed because these diviners in the sixteenth century drew on the earth their magic circles, figures, and lines. (Greek, gr, the earth; manteia, prophecy.)

Geometry (g soft) means land-measuring. The first geometeria was a ploughman pacing out his field. (Greek, gr, the earth; metron, a measure.)

George II. was nicknamed "Prince Tit." (See Title.)

George III. was nicknamed "Farmer George," or "The Farmer King." (See Farmer.)

George IV. was nicknamed "The First Gentleman of Europe," "Fumm the Fourth," "Prince Florizel," "The Adonis of fifty," and "The Fat Adonis of fifty." (See each of these nicknames.)

George, Mark, John (SS.). Nostradamus wrote in 1566:

"Quand Geoses Deus crucifecera,
Coe Marc le resuscitera,
Et que St. Jean le portera,
La fin du monde arrivera."

In 1886 St. George's day fell on Good Friday, St. Mark's day on Easter Sunday, and St. John's day on Corpus Christi—but "the end of the world" did not then arrive.

George (St.) (g soft). Gibbon, in his Decline and Fall, ii. 323, asserts that the patron saint of England was George of Capadocia, a turbulently Arius Bishop of Alexandria, born to pieces by the populace in 360, and revered as a saint by the opponents of Athanasius; but this assertion has been fully disproved by the Jesuit Paperbroch, Milner, and others.

That St. George is a veritable character is beyond all reasonable doubt, and there seems no reason to deny that he was born in Armorica, and was beheaded in Diocletian’s persecution by order of Dativus, April 23rd, 303. St. Jerome (331-420) mentions him in one of his martyrologies; in the next century there were many churches to his honour. St. Gregory (540-604) has in his Sacramentary a "Preface for St. George's Day;" and the Venerable Bede (672-735), in his martyrology, says, "At last St. George truly finished his martyrdom by decapitation, although the gests of his passion are numbered among the apocryphal writings."

In regard to his connection with England, Ashmole, in his History of the Order of the Garter, says that King Arthur, in the sixth century, placed the picture of St. George on his bannys; and Selden tells us he was patron saint of England in the Savon times. It is quite certain that the Council of Oxford in 1222 commanded his festival to be observed in England as a holiday of lesser rank; and on the establishment of the Order of the Garter by Edward III. St. George was adopted as the patron saint.

The dragon slain by St. George is simply a common allegory to express the triumph of the Christian hero over evil, which John "the Divine" beheld under the image of a dragon. Similarly, St. Michael, St. Margaret, St. Silvester, and St. Martha are all depicted as slaying dragons; the Saviour and the Virgin as treading them under their feet; and St. John the Evangelist as charming a, winged dragon from a poisoned chalice given him to drink. Even John Bunyan avails himself of the same figure, when he makes Christian encounter Apollyon and prevail against him.

George (St.), the Red Cross Knight (in Spenser’s Faerie Queene, bk. I.), represents Piety. He starts with Una (Truth) in his adventures, and is driven into Wandering Wood, where he encounters Error, and passes the night with Una in Hypocrisy’s cell. Being visited by a false vision, the knight abandons Una, and goes with Duessa (False-faith) to the palace of Pride. He leaves this palace clandestinely, but being overtaken by Duessa is persuaded to drink of an enchanted fountain, when he becomes paralysed, and is taken captive by Orgoglio. Una informs Arthur of the sad event, and the prince goes to the rescue. He slays Orgoglio, and the Red Cross Knight, being set free, is taken by Una to the house of Holiness to be healed. On leaving Holiness, both Una and the knight journey towards Eden. As they draw near, the dragon porter flies at the knight, and St. George has to do battle with it for three whole days before he succeeds in slaying it. The dragon being slain, the two enter Eden, and the Red Cross Knight is united to Una in marriage.

St. George and the Dragon. According to the ballad given in Percy’s Reliques, St. George was the son of Lord Albert of Coventry. His mother died in giving him birth, and the new-born babe was stolen away by the weird lady of the woods, who brought him up to deeds of arms. His body had three marks: a dragon on the breast, a garter round one of the legs, and a blood-red cross on the arm. When he grew to manhood he first fought against the Saracens, and then went to Syria, a city of Libya, where was a stagnant lake infested by a huge dragon, whose poisonous breath ‘had many a city slain,’ and whose hide “no spear nor sword could pierce.” Every day a virgin was sacrificed to it, and at length it came to the lot of Sabra, the king’s daughter, to become its victim. She was told to the stake and left to be devoured, when St. George came up, and vowed to take her cause in hand. On came the dragon, and St. George, thrusting his lance into its mouth, killed it on the spot. The king of Morocco and the king of Egypt, unwilling that Sabra should marry a Christian, sent St. George to Persia, and directed the “sophy” to kill him. He was accordingly thrust into a dungeon, but making good his escape, carried off Sabra to England, where she became his wife, and they lived happily at Coventry together till their death.

A very similar tale is told of Hesione, daughter of Laomedon. (See HERCULES, SEA MONSTERS.)

St. George was for England, St. Denis was for France. This refers to the war-cries of the two nations—that of England was “St. George!,” that of France, “Montjoie St. Denis!”

“Our ancient word of courage, fair St. George,”

Inspire us with the queen of fiery dragons.

Shakespeare: Richard III., v. 3.

When St. George goes on horseback St. Yves goes on foot. In times of war lawyers have nothing to do. St. George is the patron of soldiers, and St. Yves of lawyers.

St. George’s Arm. The Hellespont is so called by the Catholic Church in honour of St. George, the patron saint of England. (Payeboch : Actes des Saints.)

St. George’s Channel. An arm of the Atlantic, separating Ireland from Great Britain; so called in honour of St. George, referred to above.

St. George’s Cross. Red on a white field.

St. George’s Day (April 23d). A day of deception and oppression. It was the day when new leases and contracts used to be made.

George a’ Green. As good as George a’ Green. Resolute-minded; one who will do his duty come what may. George a’ Green was the famous pinder or pound-keeper of Wakefield, who resisted Robin Hood, Will Scarlett, and Little John single-handed when they attempted to commit a trespass in Wakefield.

“Were ye held as George a’ green,
I shall make hold to turn again.”

Samuel Butler, Hudibras.

George Eliot. The literary name of Marian Evans [Dewes], authoress of Adam Bede, Mill on the Floss, Felix Holt, etc.

George Geich. The hero of a novel by Mrs. Trafford [Ridell]. He is one who will work as long as he has breath to draw, and would die in harness. He would fight against all opposing circumstances, while he had a drop of blood left in his veins, and may be called the model of uniriting industry and indomitable moral courage.

George Sand. The pen-name of Mme. Dudevant, born at Paris 1804. Her maiden name was Dupin.
George Street (Strand, London) commences the precinct of an ancient mansion which originally belonged to the bishops of Norwich. After passing successively into the possession of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, the archbishops of York, and the Crown, it came to George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. The second Duke of Buckingham pulled down the mansion and built the streets and alley called respectively “George” (street), “Villiers” (street), “Duke” (street), “Of” (alley), and “Buckingham” (street).

Geraint’ (g hard). Tributary Prince of Devon, and one of the knights of the Round Table. Overhearing part of Enid’s words, he fancied she was faithless to him, and treated her for a time very harshly; but Enid nursed him so carefully when he was wounded that he saw his error. “Nor did he doubt her more, but rested in her fault, till he crowned a happy life with a fair death.” (Tennyson: Idylls of the King; Enid.)

Geraldine (3 syl. a soft). The Fair Geraldine. Lady Elizabeth Fitzgerald is so called in the Earl of Surrey’s poems.

Gera’ium (g soft). The Turks say this was a common mallow changed by the touch of Mahomet’s garment.

The word is from the Greek geranos (a crane); and the plant is called “Crane’s Bill,” from the resemblance of the fruit to the bill of a crane.

Gerda (g hard). Wife of Frey, and daughter of the frost giant Gymir. She is so beautiful that the brightness of her naked arms illuminates both air and sea. Frey (the genial spring) married Gerda (the frozen earth), and Gerda became the mother of children. (Scandinavian mythology.)

German or Germaine (g soft). Pertaining to, or related to, as consuls-german (first cousins), german to the subject (bearing on or pertinent to the subject). This word has no connection with German (the nation), but comes from the Latin germanicus (of the same germ or stock). First cousins have a grand- father or grandmother in common.

Those that are germains to him, though removed fifty times, shall all come under the hangman.”—Shakespeare: Winter’s Tale, iv. 3.

German. Johan de Maire says, “Germany is so called from Caesar’s sister Germana, wife of Salvius Braban.” Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Ebraucus, a mythological descendant of Brute, King of Britain, had twenty sons and thirty daughters. All the sons, except the eldest, settled in Germany, which was therefore, called the land of the Germans or brothers. (See above.)

“[German] An happy man in his first days he was, And happy father of fair progeny; Not so many weeks as the year has So many children did he multiply! Of which were twenty sons, who did apply Their minds to praise and chaste arms desire.

These germains did subdue all Germany, Of whom it bright...”

German Comb. The four fingers and thumb. “Se yoguet du pynge d’Almaine” (Rabelais). He combed his hair with his fingers. Oudin, in his Dictionnaire, explains pynge d’Almaine by “les doix et la dite.” The Germans were the last to adopt periwigs, and while the French were never seen without a comb in one hand, the Germans adjusted their hair by running their fingers through it.

“He apparelled himself according to the season, and after wards combed his head with an Almain comb.”—Robert: Carthagin and Punicqu, book 1. 21.

German Silver is not silver at all, but white copper, or copper, zinc, and nickel mixed together. It was first made in Europe at Hildberg-hausen, in Germany, but had been used by the Chinese time out of mind.

Gerryman’der (g hard). So to divide a county or nation into representative districts as to give one special political party undue advantage over others. The word is derived from Elbridge Gerry, who adopted the scheme in Massachusetts when he was governor. Gilbert Stuart, the artist, looking at the map of the new distribution, with a little invention converted it into a salamander. “No, no!” said Russell, when shown it, “not a Salamander, Stuart; call it a Gerry-mander.”

To gerryman’der is so to hocus-pocus figures, etc., as to affect the balance.

Gerst-Monat. Barley-month. The Anglo-Saxon name for September; so called because it was the time of barley-beer making.
Gertrude (2 syl., 9 hard). Hamlet's mother, who married Claudius, the murderer of her late husband. She inadvertently poisoned herself by drinking a potion prepared for her son. (Shakespeare: Hamlet.)

Gertrude (St.), in Christian art, is sometimes represented as surrounded with rats and mice; and sometimes as spinning, the rats and mice running about her distaff.

Gertrude of Wyoming. The name of one of Campbell's poems.

Gervais (St.). The French St. Gervais, June 19th. (See SWITHIN.)

In 1725, Bulliot, a French banker, made a bet that his son, named Gervais, would not be able to run more or less for forty days afterwards. The bet was taken by so many people that the entire property of Bulliot was pledged. The bet was lost, and the banker was utterly ruined.

Geryon (9 hard). A human monster with three bodies and three heads, whose oxen ate human flesh, and were guarded by a two-headed dog. Heracles slew both Geryon and the dog. This fable means simply that Geryon reigned over three kingdoms, and was defended by an ally, who was at the head of two tribes.

Geryon's, A giant with three bodies; that is, Philip II. of Spain, master of three kingdoms. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, v. 11.)

Gessler (9 hard). (See Desmin.)

Gessler (g hard). The Austrian governor of the three Forest Cantons of Switzerland. A man of most brutal nature and tyrannical disposition. He attempted to carry off the daughter of Leuthold, a Swiss herdsman; but Leuthold slew the ruffian sent to seize her, and fled. This act of injustice roused the people to rebellion, and Gessler, having put to death Mechelchel, the patriarch of the Forest Cantons, insulted the people by commanding them to bow down to his cap, hoisted on a high pole. Tell refusing so to do, was arrested with his son, and Gessler, in the refinement of cruelty, imposed on him the task of shooting with his bow and arrow an apple from the head of his own son, Tell succeeded in this dangerous skillful, but in his agitation dropped an arrow from his robe. The governor insolently demanded what the second arrow was for, and Tell fearlessly replied, "To shoot you with, had I failed in the task imposed upon me." Gessler now ordered him to be carried in chains across the lake, and cast into Kusnacht castle, a prey "to the reptiles that lodged there." He was, however, rescued by the peasantry, and, having shot Gessler, freed his country from the Austrian yoke.

Gesta Romana rum (g soft), compiled by Pierre Berceur, prior of the Benedictine convent of St. Etien, Paris, published by the Roxburg Society. Edited by Sir F. Madden, and afterwards by S. J. Harriette.

Gesta or Gest (g soft). A story, romance, achievement. From the Latin gesta (exploits).

"The scene of these gesta being laid in ordinary life."—Dictionary of National Biography.

Get (To). To gain; to procure; to obtain.

"Get wealth and place, if possible with grace; if not, by any means get wealth and place."—Horace (Satires) says:—"Rem facis, recto si possis; si non, rem facis."—Dr. Withers.

Get by Heart (To). To commit to memory. In French, "Apprendre une chose par cœur;"

Get One's Back Up (To). To show irritation, as cats set up their backs when angry.

Get-up (4). A style of dress, as "His get-up was excellent," meaning his style of dress exactly suited the part he professed to enact.

Get up (To). To rise from one's bed. To learn, as "I must get up my English." To organise and arrange, as "We will get up a bazaar."

Gethsemane. The Orchis maculata, supposed in legendary story to be spotted by the blood of Christ.

Gewgaw (g hard). A showy trifle. (Saxon, ge-gaw, a trifle; French, joujou, a toy.)
Giants or Gne'bros. The original natives of Iran (Persia), who adhered to the religion of Zoroaster, and (after the conquest of their country by the Arabs) became waifs and outlaws. The term is now applied to fire-worshippers generally. Hanway says that the ancient Ghebers wore a casque or belt, which they never laid aside.

Ghibelline (g hard), or rather Waiblingen. The war-cry of Conrad's followers in the battle of Weinsberg (1140). Conrad, Duke of Swabia, was opposed to Henry the Lion, Duke of Saxony, whose slogan was (Juelph or Walfo, his family name.

Ghost. To give up the ghost. To die. The idea is that life is independent of the body, and is due to the habituation of the ghost or spirit in the material body. At death the ghost or spirit leaves this tabernacle of clay, and either returns to God or abides in the region of spirits till the general resurrection. Thus in Ecc. xii. 7 it is said, "Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it."

"May death, and wasted away, ye, man give up the ghost, and where is he?"—Job xix. 26.

The ghost of a chance. The least likelihood. "He has not the ghost of a chance of being elected," not the shadow of a probability.

Ghoul. (See Fairy.)

Giafrur (Jiafrur). Pacha of Abydos, and father of Zuleika. He tells her he intends to marry her to Kara Osman Ogloo, governor of Magnesia; but Zuleika has betrothed herself to her cousin Selim. The lovers flee, Giafrur shoots Selim, Zuleika dies of grief, and the pacha lives on, a heart-broken old man, ever calling to the winds, "Where is my daughter?" and who answers, "Where?" (Byron: Bride of Abydos.)

Giall. The infernal river of Scandinavian mythology.

Giallar Bridge. The bridge of death, over which all must pass to get to Heliheim. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Giallar Horn (The). Heimdall's horn, which went out into all worlds whenever he chose to blow it. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Gian ben Gian (g soft). King of the Gians or Gnebi, and founder of the Pyramids. He was overthrown by Aza-zil or Lucifer. (Arab superstitions.)

Ghebers. (See previous entry.)

Giant of Literature (The). Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709-1783). Also called "the great moralist."

Giants (g soft).

(1) Of Greek mythology, sons of Tartaros and Ge. When they attempted to storm heaven, they were hurled to earth by the aid of Hercules, and buried under Mount Etna.

(2) Of Scandinavian mythology, were evil genii, dwelling in Æsirheim (giants' land), who had the power of reducing or extending their stature at will.

(3) Of nursery mythology, are cannibals of vast stature and immense muscular power, as strong as their rage and treacherous. The best known are Blunderburs (g. r.), Cornoran (g. r.), Gallianus (g. r.), Gombo (g. r.), Megadore and Bellyman.

(4) In the romance of the Tartarina and Pantraguel, by Rabelais, giants mean princes.

Of these giants the following are noteworthy:
12 feet in height: A skeleton discovered at Lucerne in 1527. Dr. Plater is our authority for this measurement.
21 feet in height: Amucklafer of the Broken Teeth, was 12 cubits in height. (A cubit was 21 inches.)
30 feet in height: Teutoburges, whose remains were discovered near the Rhine in 1613. They occupied a tomb 30 feet long. The house of another gigantic skeleton was discovered by the action of the Rhine in 1846. If this was a human skeleton, the height of the living man must have been 30 feet.
40 feet in height: Ormon, according to Pilicy, was 50 cubits in height.
160 feet in height: Andromed was said by Phinarch to have been 60 cubits in height. He furthermore adds that the grave of the giant was opened by Nemes.
330 feet in height: The "monster Polyphemus" is said that his skeleton was discovered at Trang in burial, in the fourteenth century. If this skeleton was that of a man, he must have been 300 feet in height.

(6) Giants of Real Life.

ANAK (of Bible history), father of the Anakim. The Hebrew spies said they were mere grasshoppers in comparison with these giants (Joshua xxv. 14; Judges i. 20; and Numbers xxiii. 23).
ANAK. (See ANAK.)
ANUB (or Cis) was 10 feet in height. He was grandson of Recham Dannius, Nicias assures that he had seen him.
BARSELE (Edgar) was 7 feet 4 inches. He died in 1795, and was buried in St. Dunstan's churchyard.
BISSON (Godfrey) was 7 feet 11 inches. He was a native of Kent, and was exhibited in London in 1642. His wife (Anna Swann) was the same night.
BLACKEN (Henry) was 7 feet 4 inches, and most symmetrical. He was born at Torkhil, in Sussex, in 1726, and was called "The British Giant."
BRADY (William) was 7 feet 9 inches in height. He was born in 1796, and died 1853. His length is duly registered in the parish church of Market Wombourne, in Yorkshire, and his right hand is preserved in the museum of the College of Surgeons.
BRICK (J. J.) exhibited under the name of Anak, was 7 feet 8 inches in height at the age of 25. He was born in 1816 at Romanchamp, in the Vosges, and visited England in 1823. His arm had a stretch of 63 inches, and were therefore 32 inches too long for symmetry.
BRIDGE (Charles) was 8 feet 8 inches in height. This Nor- man giant was exhibited in London in 1808.
BRIDY (John) was 7 feet 9 inches in height, and his brother was about the same. They were natives of Durham, in Yorkshire.
CHAJO, the Chinese giant, was 7 feet 2 inches in height. The native name of this Chinese giant was Cheung-Woo-Tam. He was exhibited in London in 1845-1846, and again in 1850. He was a native of the Celestial Empire.
CHARLEMAGNE was near 8 feet in height, and was so strong he could squeeze together three horses with his hands.
COTER (Fritha) was 8 feet 7 inches in height. This Irish giant dwelt at Clifden, Bristol, in 1827. A cast of his hand is preserved in the museum of the College of Surgeons.

Giants

DANIEL, the porter of Oliver Cromwell, was a giant, and was contemporary with Murphy (see below), and died at Marseilles.

ELRAZER was 7 cubits (nearly 14 feet). Vitellius sent this giant to Rome; and he is mentioned by Eutropius. The height of Goliath was 6 cubits and a span.

Nothing can be a greater proof that the cubit was not 21 inches, for no recorded height of any giant at least reached 10 feet. The nearest approach to it was Gabara, the Arabian giant (a feet 9 in hose) mentioned by Piny, and Middleton says he was 10 feet in height. Probably a cubit was about 16 inches.

ELIENK (Joseph), was 7 feet 10 inches in height; he was a sealman, and exhibited in the Cosmorama, Haymarket, London.

EVANS (William) was 8 feet at death. He was a porter of the Custom House, and died in 1622.

FANK (Aug.) was 7 feet 6 inches in height. He was an Irishman whose name was Francis Sheridan, and died in 1750.

FRENZ (Louis) was 7 feet 4 inches in height. He was called "the French giant."

FRIEDN (court giant of Eugene 111.) was 11 feet 6 inches.

GABARA, the Arabian giant, was 9 feet 9 inches. This Arabian giant is mentioned by Piny, who says he was the tallest man seen in the days of Claudius.

GEOLOGY was 8 feet. This Swedish giant was exhibited in the early part of the nineteenth century.

GOLIATH was 6 cubits and a span (11 feet 9 inches, if the cubit = 21 inches, and the span = 9 inches).

See note to the giant ELEIZER. If the cubit was 18 inches, then Goliath was the same height as the Arabian giant Gabara.

GORDON (Avery) was 7 feet in height. She was a woman, and died in 1537, at the age of 10.

HALE (Robert) was 7 feet 6 inches in height. He was born at Sowerton, in Norfolk, and was called "the Norfolk giant" (1452-1682).

HARMAN (Harley) was nearly 8 feet in height.

"(Ellis of Norway)," was 7 feet 4 inches in height, and was called the "Norway giant." Sir Thomas Stamford was said he was 6 feet 8 inches in height.

HOLMES (Regan) was 7 feet 6 inches in height.

HE was an American giant, and died at the age of 10.

HORNET (James) was 7 feet 6 inches in height. He was born in Cork, Ireland, and died in 1750.

MCDONALD (Samuel) was 6 feet 10 inches in height. This Scotchman was usually called "the Scotchman."

MORPHY was 8 feet 10 inches in height. This Irish giant was contemporaneous with O'Brien (see below), and died at Marseilles.

O'BRIEN, or CHARLES BYRN, was 8 feet 4 inches in height. The skeleton of this giant is preserved in the College of Surgeons.

O'BRIEN (Patrick) was 8 feet 7 inches in height.

Os, King of Persia. According to tradition, he lived 3,000 years, and walked beside the Ark during the Flood. One of his horses formed a bridge over the river Hudson. His heel (Dentatomy in 11) was 6 cubits by 4.

If the cubit was really 21 inches, this would make the bed 12 feet by 10. The great bed of Wences, Herb, is 12 feet by 15. (See above, Elkhuz."

OSBY (Humphry) was 7 feet 6 inches in height at the age of 17, and weighed above 23 stone. He was born in Norway. (See above, Harriada.)

POTTS was a "cubit in height" (7 feet 6 inches). He was an Indian king who fought against Alexander the Great near the river Hyphasis. (Quintus Curtius: De rebus gestis Alexandri Magni.)

Whatever the Jewish cubit was, the Roman cubit was made longer than his inches. He was a native of Friesland, and both his father and mother were of another race.

SALMENON (Murton) was 7 feet 4 inches in height.

He was called "The Mexican Giant."

SAM (Aug.) (See Macdonald.)

SHERIDAN. (See above, Frank.)

SWANS (Anne Hannah) was 7 feet 1½ inches in height. She was a native of Nova Scotia.

TOLLEK (James) was 8 feet at the age of 24. He died in February, 1809.

Josephine Meyers, and a Jew to 2 feet 2 inches. Because asserts that he had seen a man nearly 1 foot tall, and a woman fully 10 feet. Gaspier Basler speaks of a Swiss giant of 7 feet in height. Del Rio tells us he himself saw a Piedmontese in 1572 more than 9 feet in height.

He, in Notes and Queries, August 14th, 1875, tells us that his father knew a lady 8 feet in height, and adds: "her head touched the ceiling of a good-sized room."

Vanderbrook says he saw at Congress a black man 9 feet high.

In the museum of Trinity College, Dublin, is a human skeleton 8 feet 4 inches in height.

THOMAS Hall, of Williamson, was 5 feet 9 inches at the age of 3.

A giant was exhibited at Rome in the early part of the eighteenth century 17 feet 10 inches in height.

Grapes, the surgeon, tells us of a Swedish giantess, who, at the age of 6, was over 10 feet in height.

TURI, the naturalist, tells us he saw in Brazil a giant 12 feet in height.

Ths book published, in 1725, an account of a South American giant, the skeleton of which he measured. It was 11 feet 5 inches.

GIANT'S CAUSEWAY, in Ireland. A basaltic mole, said to be the commencement of a road to be constructed by the giants across the channel, reaching from Ireland to Scotland.

GIANTS' DANCE (Thre). Stonehenge, which Geoffrey of Monmouth says was removed from Kilburns, a mountain in Ireland, by the magical skill of Merlin.

"If you (Anchus) are desirous to honour the tiny monument of these men [who routed Hengist] with an ever-lasting monument, send for the giants Danus and Finglas, which are in Kilburns; a mountain in Ireland," Geoffrey of Monmouth: British History, book viii. chap. 10.

GIANT'S LEAP (Ther). Lam-Goemag. The legend is that Corineus (Syl.), in Giants' War 517

Gift-horse

his encounter with Goemagog, or Gog- magog, slung him on his shoulders, car- ried him to the top of a neighbouring clifF, and heaved him into the sea. Ever since then the cliff has been called Lam- Goemagog. (Thomas Boreman: Gigant- tick History; 1741.)

Giants' War with Jove (Thuc.)
The War of the Giants and the War of the Titans should be kept distinct. The latter was after Jove or Zeus was god of heaven and earth, the former was before that time. Kronos, a Titan, had been exalted by his brothers to the sup- remacy, but Zeus made war on Kronos with the view of dethroning him. After ten years' contest he succeeded, and hurled the Titans into hell. The other war was a revolt by the giants against Zeus, which was readily put down by the help of the other gods and the aid of Hercules.

Giaour (jowr-er). An unbeliever, one who disbelieves the Mahometan faith. A corruption of the Arabic Kâfr. It has now become so common that it scarcely implies insult, but has about the force of the word "Gentile," meaning "not a Jew." Byron has a poetical tale so called, but he has not given the giaour a name.

"The city won for Allah from the taour, The giaour from Oldham's face again may wirst."
- Byron: Giaour's race again may wirst.

Gib (g soft). The cut of his gib. (See Jum.)

To hung one's gib. To be angry, to pout. The lower lip of a horse is called its gib, and so is the beak of a male salmon.

Gib Cat. A tom-cat. The male cat used to be called Gilbert. Nurses say that Tibert or Tybalt is the French form of Gilbert, and hence Chaucer in his "Romer of the Rose," renders "Thi- bert la Cas" by "Gibbe, our Cat" (v. 6204). Generally used for a castrated cat. (See Tybalt.)

"I am as melancholy as a gib cat or a lugub- rous beery." Shakespeare: "Henry V," i. 2.

Giberish (g hard). Geber, the Arabian, was by far the greatest alche- mist of the eleventh century, and wrote several treatises on "the art of making gold" in the usual mystical jargon, be- cause the ecclesiastics would have put to death any one who had openly written on the subject. Friar Bacon, in 1282, furnishes a specimen of this giberish.

He is giving the prescription for making gunpowder, and says—

"Sez tamnu salut-etter
LURU MONE CAP URBE
Et salubrature."

The second line is merely an anagram of Carbonum pulvere ( pulverised charcoal).

"Gibberish," compare jabber, and gable.

Gibbet (g soft). A foot-pad, who "piqued himself on being the best-be- haved man on the road." (George For- gahur: Branc's Stratagem.)

To gibbet the bread (Lincolnshire). When bread turns ropy and is sup- posed to be bewitched, the good dame runs a stick through it and hangs it in the cupboard. It is gibbeted in terrified to other latches.

Gibelin (g hard). (See Guelfics.)

Gibeonite (4 syl., g hard). A slave's slave, a workman's labourer, a farmer's understrapper, or Jack-of-all-work. The Gibeonites were made "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to the Israelites. (Josh. ix. 27.)

"And titles must trudge, whoever giveth com- mand, A Gibeonite, that serve them all by turn."-Boonfield: Farmer's Boy.

Giblets (The Duke of). A very fat man. In Yorkshire a fat man is still nicknaimed "giblets."

Gibralter (g soft). A contraction of Gibel at Tari (Gib' al Tari), "mountain of Tari." This Tari ben Zeyad was an Arabian general who, under the orders of Mousa, landed at Culpe in 710, and utterly defeated Roderick, the Gothic King of Spain. Cape Tari'fa is named from the same general.

Gibraltar (g hard). A precipitous rock 700 feet above the sea, in Nauplia (Greece).

Gibraltar of the New World. Cape Diamond, in the province of Quebec.

Gif gait. Give and take; good turn for good turn.

"I have pledged my word for your safety, and you must give me yours to be privy in the matter—giff gaff, you know."-W. S. -S. "Bed- gunter," chap. xii.

Gift-horse. Don't look a gift-horse in the mouth. When a present is made, do not inquire too minutely into its in- trinsic value.

Latin: "Noli equi dentes inspicere donati." "Si quis det mammo ne quare in dentibus annos" (Monkish).

Italian: "A cavallau daio non guar- dar in bocca."
French: "A cheval donné il ne faut pas regarder aux dents."

Spanish: "A caball dato no le miren el diente."

Gig (g hard). A whipping top, made like a v.

"Then disputest like an infant, go whip thy gig."—Shakespeare: Love’s Labour’s Lost, v. i.

Gig-lamps. Spectacles. Gig-lamps are the "spectacles" of a gig. (See Verdan Green.)

Gig-mantry. Respectability. A word invented by Carlyle. A witness in the trial of John Thurtell said, "I always thought him [Thurtell] a respectable man." And being asked by the judge what he meant, replied, "He [Thurtell] kept a gig."

"A vellum of the blood, yet whose father had sold his inapproachables... in a word, temporarily discarded."—Carlyle: The Diamond Necklace, chap. v.

Giggle (g hard). Have you found a giggle’s nest? A question asked in Norfolk when anyone laughs immoderately and senselessly. The meaning is, "Have you found a nest of romping girls that you laugh so?" Giglet is still in common use in the West of England for a giddy, romping, Tom-lay girl, and in Salop a slighty person is called a "giggle." (See Gape’s Nest.)

Gil Bias (g soft). The hero of Le Sage’s novel of the same name. Timid, but audacious; well-disposed, but easily led astray; shrewd, but easily gulled by practising on his vanity; good-natured, but without moral principle. The tale, according to one account, is based on Matteo Aleman’s Spanish romance, called the Life of Onzam; others maintain that the original was the comic romance entitled Relaciones de la Vida del Escandalo de Obrinog.

Gildertines (g soft, g hard). A religious order founded in the twelfth century by St. Gilbert of Lincolnshire.

Gild the Pill (g). To do something to make a disagreeable task less offensive, as a pill is gilded to make it less offensive to the sight and taste. Children’s powders are hidden in jam, and authors are "dunned with faint praise."

Gilded Chamber (The). The House of Lords.

"Mr. Rowland Winn is now Lord St. Oswald, and after years spent in the Lower House he has retired to the calm of the gilded chamber."—Newspaper paragraph, June 20th, 1880.

Gilderoy (3 syl, g hard). A famous robber, who robbed Cardinal Richelieu and Oliver Cromwell. There was a Scotch robber of the same name in the reign of Queen Mary. Both were noted for their handsome persons, and both were hanged.

Gilderoy’s Kite. Higher than Gilderoy’s kite. To be hung higher than Gilderoy’s kite is to be punished more severely than the very worst criminal. The greater the crime, the higher the gallows, was at one time a practical legal axiom. Haman, it will be remembered, was hanged on a very high gallows. The gallows of Montrose were 30 feet high. The ballad says:

"Of Gilderoy see fraud they were
They bound him mickle strong,
Till Edward burrow they led him thair
And on a gallowes hong
They hong him high above the rest,
He was so tum a hoy..."

He was "hong above the rest" of the criminals because his crimes were deemed to be more heinous, so much he hung he looked like "a kite" in the clouds.

Gildippe (in Jerusalem Delivered). Wife of Edward, an English baron. She accompanied her husband to the Holy War, and performed prodigies of valour (book ix.). Both she and her husband were slain by Solyman (book xx).

Giles (1 syl, g soft). The "farmer’s boy" in Bloomfield’s poem so called.

Giles (St.). Patron saint of cripples. The tradition is that the king of France, hunting in the desert, accidentally wounded the hermit in the knee; and the hermit, that he might the better mortify the flesh, refusing to be cured, remained a cripple for life.

The symbol of this saint is a hind, in allusion to the "heaven-directed hind" which went daily to his cave near the mouth of the Rhone to give him milk. He is sometimes represented as an old man with an arrow in his knee and a hind by his side.

St. Giles’s parish. Generally situated in the outskirts of a city, and originally without the walls, cripples and beggars not being permitted to pass the gates.

Hopping or hobbling Giles. A lame person; so called from St. Giles, the tutelar saint of cripples. (See cripple-gate.)

Lame as St. Giles’, Cripple-gate. (See above.)

Giles Overreach (Sir). A New Way to Pay Old Debts, by Massinger. The "Academy figure" of this character was Sir Giles Mompesson, a notorious usurer, banished the kingdom for his misdeeds.

Giles of Antwerp (g soft). Giles Coignet, the painter (1530-1600).

Gill (g soft) or Jill. A generic name for a lass, a sweetheart. (A contraction of Gillian = Juliana, Julia.)

“Jack and Jill went up the hill . . .”

Nursery Rhymes.

“Every Jack has got his Jill (i.e. like his papa has his mummy).” —Burns.

Gill (Harry). A farmer struck with the curse of ever shivering with cold, because he would not allow old Goody Blake to keep some straw sticks which she had picked up to warm herself by.

“Ooh! what’s the matter? What’s the matter? What is it that makes young Harry Gill, That evermore his teeth they chatter, Chatter, chatter, chatter, still . . . . . .
No word to any man he utters;
A-head or up to young or old.
But ever to himself he mutters.
Poor Harry Gill is very cold.”

Wordsworth: Goody Blake and Harry Gill.

Gills (g hard). Wipe your gills (your mouth). The gills of fishes, like the mouth of man, are the organs of respiration.

Gillie (g hard). A servant or attendant; the man who leads a pony about when a child is riding. A gillie-wet-foot is a barefooted Highland lad.

“These gillie-wet-foots, as they were called, were destined to beat the bushes.” —Sir Walter Scott: Waverley, chap. xil.

Gillies’ Hill. In the battle of Bannockburn (1314) King Robert Bruce ordered all the servants, drivers of carts, and camp followers to go behind a hill. When the battle seemed to favour the Scotch, these servants, or gillies, desirous of sharing in the plunder, rushed from their concealment with such arms as they could lay hands on; and the English, thinking them to be a new army, fled in panic. The height in honour was ever after called The Gillies’ Hill. (Sir Walter Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, x.)

Gillyflower (g soft) is not the Julyflower, but the French gillyflower, from gilly (a gill), called by Chaucer “gillyfo.” The common stock, the wallflower, the rocket, the clove pink, and several other plants are so called. (Greek karophalton; Latin, caryophyllum, the clove gillyflower.)

Gipin (John), of Cowper’s famous ballad, is a caricature of Mr. Beyar, an eminent lineendarper at the end of Paternoster Row, where it joins Cheapside. He died 1791, at the age of 98. It was Lady Austin who told the adventure to our domestic poet, to divert him from his melancholy. The marriage adventure of Commodore Trumion in Pimperne Pickle is very similar to the wedding-day adventure of John Gilpin.

“John Gilpin was a citizen
Of credit and renown.
A trainband captain he was born
Of famous London town.”

Cowper: John Gilpin.

“Some insist that the “trainband captain” was one Jonathan Gilpin, who died at Bath in 1770, leaving his daughter a legacy of £20,000.

Gilt (g hard). To take the gilt off the gingerbread. To destroy the illusion. The reference is to gingerbread watches, men, and other gilded toys, sold at fairs. These catables were common even in the reign of Henry IV., but were then made of honey instead of treacle.

Gilt-edge Investments. A phrase introduced in the last quarter of the 19th century (when so many investments proved worthless), for investments in which no risks are incurred, such as debentures, preference shares, first mortgages, and shares in first-rate companies.

Giltspur Street (West Smithfield). The route taken by the gilt-spurs, or knights, on their way to Smithfield, where tournaments were held.

Gimlet Eye (g hard). A squint-eye; strictly speaking, “an eye that wanders obliquely.” jocously called a “piercer.” (Welsh, cymen, a movement round; cymulaw, to twist or move in a serpentine direction; Celtic, gummle.)

Gimmer (g soft), or Gimmer, a jointed hinge. In Somersetshire, gimmer. We have also ginned. A ginned is a double ring; hence gimmel-bit. (Shakespeare: Henry V., iv. 2.)

Gin Sling. A drink made of gin and water, sweetened and flavoured. “Sling” — Collins, the inventor, contracted into elins, and perverted into slings.

Ginneira (g soft). The young Italian bride who hid in a trunk with a spinglock. The lid fell upon her, and she was not discovered till the body had become a skeleton. (Rogers: Italy.)

“Be the cause what it might, from his offer she shrunk,
And time and fate, smitt herself up in a trunk.”

Lowell.

Gingerbread. The best used to be made at Grantham, and Grantham gingerbread was as much a location as Everton toffe, or tuffy as we used to call it in the first half of the nineteenth century.

To get the girt off the gingerbread. To appropriate all the fun or profit and leave the caput mortuum behind. In the first half of the nineteenth century gingerbread cakes were profusely decorated with gold-leaf or Dutch-leaf, which looked like gold.

Gingerbread (g soft). Brummagem wares, showy but worthless. The allusion is to the girt gingerbread toys sold at fairs.

Gingerbread Husbands. Gingerbread cakes fashioned like men and gilt, commonly sold at fairs up to the middle of the nineteenth century.

Gingerly. Cautiously, with faltering steps. The Scotch phrase, "gang that gate," and the Anglo-Saxon gangende (going), applied to an army looking out for ambuscades, would furnish the adverb gangedelic; Swedish, gingla, to go gently.

"Gingerly, as if treading upon eggs, Gudino began to ascend the well-known pass."—Scott: Old Mortality, chap. xxv.

Gingham. So called from Guingamp, a town in Brittany, where it was originally manufactured (Littre). A common playful equivalent of umbrella.

Ginnunga Gap. The abyss between Nifhheim (the region of fog) and Muspelheim (the region of heat). It existed before either land or sea, heaven or earth. (Scandinavian mythology.)

G'onia (g soft). A leader of the Anabaptists, once a servant of Comte d'Oberthal, but discharged from his service for theft. In the rebellion headed by the Anabaptists, Giona took the Count prisoner, but John of Leyden set him free again. Giona, with the rest of the conspirators, betrayed their prophet king as soon as the Emperor arrived with his army. They entered the banquet room to arrest him, but perished in the flaming palace. (Meyerbeer: Le Prophète, an opera.)

Giotto. Round an Giotto's O. An Italian proverb applied to a dull, stupid fellow. The Pope, wishing to obtain some art decorations, sent a messenger to obtain specimens of the chief artists of Italy. The messenger came to Giotto and delivered his message, whereupon the artist simply drew a circle with red paint. The messenger, in amazement, asked Giotto if that were all. Giotto replied, "Send it, and we shall see if his Holiness understands the hint." A specimen of genius about equal to a brick as a specimen of an edifice.

Giovan'ni (Don). A Spanish libertiné. (See Juan.) His valet, Leoporello, says his master had "in Italy 700 mistresses, in Germany 800, in Turkey and France 91, in Spain 1,003." When "the measure of his iniquity was full," the ghost of the commandant whom he had slain came with a legion of "foul fiends," and carried him off to a "dreadful gulf that opened to devour him." (Mozart: Don Giovanni, Libretto by Lorenzo da Ponte.)

Gipsy (g soft). Said to be a corruption of Egyptian, and so called because in 1418 a band of them appeared in Europe, commanded by a leader named Duke Michael of "Little Egypt." Other appellations are:

(2) Bohemians. So called by the French, because the first that ever arrived in their country came from Bohemia in 1427, and presented themselves before the gates of Paris. They were not allowed to enter the city, but were lodged at La Chapelle, St. Denis. The French nickname for gipsies is egaotx (unsociables).

(3) Cigarras. So called by the Portuguese, a corruption of Zinga'ni. (See Tchinga'ni.)

(4) Gitinos. So called by the Spaniards, a corruption of Zinga'ni. (See Tchinga'ni.)

(5) Hrietas (heathens). So called by the Dutch, because they are heathens.

(6) Pharaoh-neprk (Pharaoh's people). So called in Hungary, from the notion that they came from Egypt.

(7) Sinte. So called by themselves, because they assert that they came from Sind, i.e. Ind (Hindustan). (See Tchinga'ni.)

(8) Tatur. So called by the Danes and Swedes, from the notion that they came from Tartary.

(9) Tchinga'ni or Tchingani. So called by the Turks, from a tribe still existing at the mouth of the Indus (Tshin-cula, black Indian).

(10) Walacheians. So called by the Italians, from the notion that they came from Walachia.

(11) Zigou ner (wanderers). So called by the Germans.

(12) Zinciri or Zinga'ni. Said to be so called by the Turks, because in 1517 they were led by Zinga'neus to revolt from Sultan Selim; but more likely a mere variety of Tchingani (g. v.).

Girl

He has a large mouth but small girdle. Great expenses but small means. The girdle is the purse or purse-pocket. (See above.)

He has undone her girdle. Taken her for his wedded wife. The Roman bride wore a chaplet of flowers on her head, and a girdle of sheep’s wool about her waist. A part of the marriage ceremony was for the bridegroom to loose this girdle. (Vayghan: Golden Grove.)

The Persian regulation-girdle. In Persia a new sort of “Procrustes Bed” is adopted, according to Kamerer. One of the officers of the king is styled the “chief holder of the girdle,” and his business is to measure the ladies of the harem by a sort of regulation-girdle. If any lady has outgrown the standard, she is reduced, like a jockey, by spare diet; but, if she falls short thereof, she is fatted up, like a Strasbourg goose, to regulation size. (See PROCURER.)

To put a girdle round the earth. To travel or go round it. Puck says, “I’ll put a girdle round about the earth in forty minutes.” (Midsummer Night’s Dream, ii. 2.)

Girdle (Florimel’s). The prize of a grand tournament in which Sir Satyrane and several others took part. It was dropped by Florimel, picked up by Sir Satyrane, and employed by him to bind the monster sent in her pursuit; but it came again into the hands of the knight, who kept it in a golden casket. It was a “gorgeous girdle made by Vulcan for Venus, embossed with pearls and precious stones;” but its chief virtue was

“...it gave the virtue of chaste love, and wisdom true to all that it did bear; but whatever contrary hath proved, it is not the same about her middle west, but it would loose, or else snore.”

—King Arthur’s Drinking Horn, and the Court Mantle in Orlando Furioso, possessed similar virtues.

Girdle (St. Colman’s) would meet only round the chaste.

“...in Ireland it yet remains to be proved whether St. Colman’s girdle had not lost its virtue.” [The reference is to Charles S. Parnell—Nineteenth Century, Feb., 1891, p. 296.]

Girdle of Venus. (See CESTRUM.)

Gipsy (The). Anthony de Sola’rio, the painter and illuminator, II Zingaro (1382-1455).

Girald’s (g soft). The giantess; a statue of victory on the top of an old Moorish tower in Seville.

Gird. To gird with the sword. To raise to a peerage. It was the Saxon method of investiture to an earldom, continued after the Conquest. Thus, Richard I., “girded with the sword;” Hugh de Pudsey, the aged Bishop of Durham, making (as he said) “a young earl of an old prelate.”

Gird up the Loins (7o). To prepare for hard work or a journey. The Jews wore a girdle only when at work or on a journey. Even to the present day, Eastern people, who wear loose dresses, gird them about the loins.

“The loose tunic was an inconvenient walking dress; therefore, when persons went from home, they tied a girdle round it. (2 Kings iv. 2; ix. 1; Isaiah I. 27; Jeremiah 4, 17; John xxii. 7; Acts xii. 6.)—John: Archeologia Britannica (section 121).

Girdle (g hard). A good name is better than a golden girdle. A good name is better than money. It used to be customary to carry money in the girdle, and a girdle of gold meant a “purse of gold.” The French proverb, “Bonne renommee vaut mieux que creinte dorée,” refers rather to the custom of wearing girdles of gold tissue, forbidden, in 1420, to women of bad character.

Children under the girdle. Not yet born.

“All children under the girdle at the time of marriage are held to be legitimate.”—Notes and Queries.

If he be angry, he knows how to turn his girdle (Much Ado about Nothing, v. 1). If he is angry, let him prepare himself to fight, if he likes. Before wrestlers, in ancient times, engaged in combat, they turned the buckle of their girdle behind them. Thus, Sir Ralph Winwood writes to Secretary Cecil:

“I said, ‘What I made was not to make him angry.’ He replied, ‘If I were angry, I might turn the buckle of my girdle behind me.’”—Dec. 17, 1602.
Girondists (g soft). French. Girondists, moderate republicans in the first French Revolution. So called from the department of Giroude, which chose for the Legislative Assembly five men who greatly distinguished themselves for their oratory, and formed a political party. They were subsequently joined by Brissot, Condorcet, and the adherents of Roland. The party is called The Girondists. (1791-93.)

"The new assembly, called the Legislative Assembly, met October 1, 1791. The more moderate members formed the party called the Girondists."

Giroette (3 syl., g soft). A turncoat, a weathercock (French). The Dictionnaire des Girouettes contains the names of the most noted turncoats, with their political veering.

Gis (g soft) i.e. Jesus. A corruption of Jesus or J. H. S. Ophelia says "By Gis and by St. Charity." (Hamlet, iv. 5.)

Gitanos. (See Grex.)

Give and Take (policy). One of mutual forbearance and accommodation.

"His wife jogged along with him very contentedly with a give and take policy for many years."—Hugh Cowyard.

Give it Him (7b). To scold or thrash a person. As "I gave it him right and left." "I'll give it you when I catch you." An elliptical phrase, dare per annum. "Give it him well.

Give the Boys a Holiday. Anaxagoras, on his death-bed, being asked what honour should be conferred upon him, replied, "Give the boys a holiday."

Give the Devil his Due. Though bad, I allow, yet not so bad as you make him out. Do not lay more to the charge of a person than he deserves. The French say, "Il ne faut pas faire le diable plus noir qu'il n'est." The Italians have the same proverb, "Non bisognà fare il diablo più nero che non è.

"The devil is not so black as he is painted. Every black has its white, as well as every sweet its sour.

Gizzard. Don't fret your gizzard. Don't be so anxious; don't worry yourself. The Latin stomachus means temper, etc., as well as stomach or "gizzard." (French, gisier.)

Glasgow Arms.

That stuck in his gizzard. Annoyed him, was more than he could digest.

Gjallar. Heimdallr's horn, which he blows to give the gods notice when any one is approaching the bridge Bifrost (q.v.). (Scandinavian mythology.)

Glacia. The sloping mass on the outer edge of the covered way in fortification. Immediately without the "ditches" of the place fortified, there is a road of communication all round the fortress (about thirty feet wide), having on its exterior edge a covered mass of earth eight feet high, sloping off gently towards the open country. The road is technically called the covered way, and the sloping mass the glacia.

Gladsehaim [Home of joy]. The largest and most magnificent mansion of the Scandinavian Æsir. It contains twelve seats besides the throne of Alfather. The great hall of Gladsehaim was called "Valhalla." and the saint went to the Clyde, caught a salmon with the ring in its mouth, banded it to the queen, and was thus the means of restoring peace to the royal couple, and of reforming the repentant queen.

The queen’s name was Langoureth, the king’s name Rederech, and the Clyde was then called the Clud.

A similar legend is told of Dame Rebecca Berry, wife of Thomas Elton, of Stratford Bow, and relict of Sir John Berry (1696). Rebecca Berry is the heroine of the ballad called The Cruel Knight, and the story says that a knight passing by a cottage, heard the cries of a woman in labour, and knew by his occult science that the child was doomed to be his wife. He tried hard to elude his fate, and when the child was grown up, took her one day to the seaside, intending to drown her, but relented. At the same time he threw a ring into the sea, and commanded her never again to enter his presence till she brought him that ring. Rebecca, dressing a cod for dinner, found the ring in the fish, presented it to Sir John, and became his wife. The Berry arms show a fish, and on the dexter chief point a ring or annulet.

Glasgow Magistrate (4). A salt herring. When George IV. visited Glasgow some wag placed a salt herring on the iron guard of the carriage of a well-known magistrate who formed one of the delegation to receive him. I remember a similar joke played on a magistrate, because he said, during a time of great scarcity, he wondered why the poor did not eat salt herrings, which he himself found very appetising.

Glass is from the Celtic glas (bluish-green), the colour produced by the wood employed by the ancient Britons in lacquering their bodies. Pliny calls it glasium, and Caesar extenu.

Glass Breaker (4). A wine-bibber. To crack a bottle is to drink up its contents and throw away the empty bottle. A glass breaker is one who drinks what is in the glass, and flings the glass under the table. In the early part of the nineteenth century it was by no means unusual with toppers to break off the stand of their wineglass, so that they might not be able to set it down, but were compelled to drink it clean off, without heel-taps.

“Truly, ye’re nae glass-breaker: and neither am I, unless it be a screen wi’ the neighbours, or when I’m on a ramble.”—Sir W. Scott; Guy Mannering, chap. 45.

“We never were glass-breakers in this house, Mr. Lovel.”—Sir W. Scott; The Antiquary, chap. 13.

Glass-eye. A blind eye, not an eye made of glass, but the Danish glas-øie (wall-eye).

Glass Houses. Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones.

When, on the union of the two crowns, London was inundated with Scotchmen, Buckingham was a chief instigator of the movement against them, and parties used nightly to go about breaking their windows. In retaliation, a party of Scotchmen smashed the windows of the Duke’s mansion, which stood in St. Martin’s Fields, and had so many windows that it went by the name of the “Glass-house.” The court favourite appealed to the king, and the British Solomon replied, “Stenie, Steenie, those who live in glass houses should be careful how they fling stones.”

This was not an original remark of the English Solomon, but only the application of an existing proverb: “El que tiene tejados de vidrio, no tire piedras al de su vezino.” (Nunez de Guzman: Proverbion.) (See also Chaucer’s Troilus, ii.)

“Qui a sa maison de verre, Par to voiru de piHit pierre,”
Proverbes en Roure (1614).

Glass Slipper (of Cinderella). A curious blunder of the translator, who has mistaken vent (sable) for verre (glass). Sable was worn only by kings and princes, so the fairy gave royal slippers to her favourite. Hamlet says he shall discard his mourning and resume “his suit of sables” (iii. 2).

Glasse (Mrs. Hannah), a name immortalised by the reputed saying in a cookery book. “First catch your hare,” then cook it according to the directions given. This, like many other smart sayings, evidently grew. The word in the cookery-book is "cast" (i.e. flay). “Take your hare, and when it is cast” (or caudal), do so and so. (See CASE, CATCH YOUR HARE.)

“We’ll make you some sport with the fox ere we case him.”—Shakespeare: Alta’s Well, etc., iii. 6.

“Some of them knew me.
Else had they seen me like a coy.”
Beaumont and Fletcher: Love’s Pilgrimage, ii. 3.

First catch your hare (though not in Mrs. Glasse) is the East Anglian word scatch (flay), and might suggest the play of words. Mrs. Glass is the pseudonym which Dr. John Hill appended to his Cook's Oracle.

Glassite (A). A Sandemanian; a follower of John Glass (eighteenth century). Members of this Scotch sect are admitted by a "holy kiss," and abstain from all animal food which has not been well drained of blood. John Glass condemned all national establishments of religion, and maintained the Congregational system. Robert Sandeman was one of his disciples.

Glastonbury, in Arthurian legend, was where King Arthur was buried. Selden, in his Illustrations of Drayton, says the tomb was "betwixt two pillars," and he adds, "Henry II. gave command to Henry de Blois, the abbot, to make great search for the body, which was found in a wooden coffin some sixteen foot deep; and afterwards was found a stone on whose lower side was fixed a leaden cross with the name inscribed." The authority of Selden no doubt is very great, but it is too great a tax on our credulity to credit this statement.

Glaswegian. Belonging to Glasgow.

Glauber Salts. So called from Johann Rudolph Glauber, a German alchemist, who discovered it in 1658 in his researches after the philosopher's stone. It is the sulphate of soda.

Glaucus (of Boeotia). A fisherman who instructed Apollo in soothsaying. He jumped into the sea, and became a marine god. Milton alludes to him in his Comus (line 895):

"[By] old soothsaying Glaucus' spell."

Glaucus (Another). In Latin, Glaucus ailer. One who rules himself by horses. The tale is that Glaucus, son of Sisyphus, would not allow his horses to breed, and the goddess of Love so infuriated them that they killed him.

Glaucus' Swop (A). A one-sided bargain. Alluding to the exchange of armour between Glaucus and Diomede. As the armour of the Lycean was of gold, and that of the Greek of brass, it was like bartering precious stones for French paste. Moses, in Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield, made "a Glaucus' swop" with the spectacle-seller.

Glaymore or Claymore (2 syl.). The Scottish great sword. It used to be a large two-handed sword, but was subsequently applied to the broadsword with the basket-hilt. (Gaelic, claidhamh, a sword; more, great.)

Glazier. Is your father a glazier? Does he make windows, for you stand in my light and expect me to see through you?

Gleek. A game at cards, sometimes called clee k. Thus, in Epsom Wells, Dorothy says to Mrs. Biskett, "I'll make one at clee k; that's better than any two-handed game." Ben Jonson, in the Alchemist, speaks of gleek and primero as "the best games for the gallantest company."

Gleek is played by three persons. Every decoe and trio is thrown out of the pack. Twelve cards are then dealt to each player, and eight are left for stock, which is offered in rotation to the players for purchase. The trumps are called Tiddy, Tumbler, Tib, Tom, and Towser. Gleek is the German gleich (like), intimating the point on which the game turns, gleek being three cards all alike, as three aces, three kings, etc.

Gleichen (The Count de). A German knight married to a lady of his own country. He joined a crusade, and, being wounded, was attended so diligently by a Saracen princess that he married her also.

Gleipnir. The chain made by the fairies, by which the wolf Fenrir or Freyr was securely chained. It was extremely light, and made of such things as "the roots of stones, the noise made by the footfalls of a cat, the beards of women, the quill of birds, and such like articles."

Glencoe (2 syl.). The massacre of Glencoe. The Edinburgh authorities exorted the Jacobites to submit to William and Mary, and offered pardon to all who submitted on or before the 31st of December, 1691. Mac-Ian, chief of the Macleans of Glencoe, was unable to do so before the 6th of January, and his excuse was sent to the Council at Edinburgh. The Master of Stair (Sir John Dalrymple] resolved to make an example of Mac-Ian, and obtained the king's permission "to extirpate the set of thieves." Accordingly, on the 1st of February, 120 soldiers, led by a Captain Campbell, marched to Glencoe, told the clan they were come as friends, and lived peaceably among them for twelve days; but on the morning of the 13th, the glenmen, to the number of thirty-eight, were scandalously murdered, their huts set on fire, and their flocks and herds
Glendoveer, in Hindu mythology, is a kind of sylph, the most lovely of the good spirits. (See Southey's Curse of Kehama.)

Glendover (Owen). A Welsh chief, one of the most active and formidable enemies of Henry IV. He was descended from Llewellyn, the last of the Welsh princes. Sir Edmund Mortimer married one of his daughters, and the husband of Mortimer's sister was Earl Percy, generally called "Hotspur," who took Douglas prisoner at Hamilton Hill. Glendover, Hotspur, Douglas, and others conspired to dethrone Henry, but the coalition was ruined in the fatal battle of Shrewsbury. Shakespeare makes the Welsh nobleman a wizard of great diversity of talent, but especially conceited of the prodigies that "announced" his birth. (Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV.)

Gilm. (See DOSE THE GILM.)

Globe of Glass (Reynard's). To consult Reynard's globe of glass. To seek into futurity by magical or other devices. This globe of glass would reveal what was being done, no matter how far off, and would afford information on any subject that the person consulting it wished to know. The globe was set in a wooden frame which no worm would attack. Reynard said he had sent this invaluable treasure to her majesty the queen as a present; but it never came to hand, inasmuch as it had no existence except in the imagination of the fox. (H. von Alkmar: Reynard the Fox.)

Your gift was like the globe of glass of Master Reynard. Vox et preterea nihil. A great promise, but no performance. (See above.)

Worthy to be set in the frame of Reynard's globe of glass. Worthy of being imperishable; worthy of being preserved for ever.

Gloria. A cup of coffee with brandy in it instead of milk. Sweetened to taste.

Gloria in Excelsis. The latter portion of this doxology is ascribed to Telesphorus, A.D. 139. (See GLORY.)

Gloriana. (Queen Elizabeth considered as a sovereign.) Spenser says in his Faerie Queene that she kept an annual feast for twelve days, during which time adventurers appeared before her to undertake whatever task she chose to impose upon them. On one occasion twelve knights presented themselves before her, and their exploits form the scheme of Spenser's allegory. The poet intended to give a separate book to each knight, but only six and a half books remain.

Glorious John. John Dryden, the poet (1631-1701).

Glorious First of June. June 1st, 1791, when Lord Howe, who commanded the Channel fleet, gained a decisive victory over the French.

Glorious Uncertainty of the Law (The), 1796. The toast of Mr. Wilbraham at a dinner given to the judges and council in Glentworth's Hall. This dinner was given soon after Lord Mansfield had overruled several ancient legal decisions and had introduced many innovations in the practice.

Glory. Meaning speech or the tongue, so called by the Psalmist because speech is man's speciality. Other animals see, hear, smell, and feel quite as well and often better than man, but rational speech is man's glory, or that which distinguishes the race from other animals.

"I will sing and give praise even with my glory."—Psalm cxlv. 1.

"That my glory may sing praise to Thee, and not be silent."—Psalm xxx. 12.

"Awake up my glory, awake psaltery and harp."—Psalm liii. 8.

Glory Demon (The). War.

"Fresh troops had each year to be sent off to quit the name of the 'Glory Demon.'"—C. Thomson: Autobiography, 32.

Glory Hand. In folk lore, a dead man's hand, supposed to possess certain magical properties.

"De hand of glory is hand cut off from a dead man as he has been hanged for murder, and dried very nice in de smoke of juniper wood."—S. W. Nicol: The Antiquary (London, 1779).

Glory be to the Father, etc. The first verse of this doxology is said to be by St. Basil. During the Arian controversy it ran thus: "Glory be to the Father, by the Son, and in the Holy Ghost." (See GLORIA.)

Glossin (Lawyer) purchases Ellangowan estate, and is found by Counselor Picquell to be implicated in carrying off Henry Bertrand, the heir of the estate. Both Glossin and Dirk Hatterick, his accomplice, are sent to prison, and in the night the lawyer contrives to enter the smuggler's cell, when a quartel ensues, in which Hatteraick strangles him, and then hangs himself.” (Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering.)

Gloucester (2 syl). The ancient Britons called the town Caer Glo (bright city). The Romans Latinised Glo or Glove in Glo-vum, and added colonia (the Roman colony of Glo-vum). The Saxons restored the old British word Glo, and added easter, to signify it had been a Roman camp. Hence the word means “Glo, the camp city.” Geoffrey of Monmouth says, when Arviragus married Genuissa, daughter of Claudius Caesar, he induced the emperor to build a city on the spot where the nuptials were solemnised; this city was called Caer-Claud, a contraction of Caer-Claudi, corrupted into Caer-glu, converted by the Romans into Glo-caster, and by the Saxons into Glo-easter or Glove-caster. “Some,” continues the same “philologist,” “derive the name from the Duke Glovisus, a son of Claudius, born in Britain on the very spot.”

Glove. In the days of chivalry it was customary for knights to wear a lady’s glove on their helmets, and to defend it with their life.

“One wears on his headpiece his ladies glove, and another here on his sleeve the glove of his dear lady.”—Hall’s Chronic, Henry IV.

Glove. A bribe. (See Glove Money.)
Hand and glove. Sworn friends; on most intimate terms; close companions, like glove and hand.

“And prove and teach about what others prove, As if the world and they were hand and glove.”—Utopia.

He hit his glove. He resolved on mortal revenge. On the “Border,” to hit the glove was considered a pledge of deadly vengeance.

Sir Walter Scott: Lady of the Lost Mindful.

Here I throw down my glove. I challenge you. In allusion to an ancient custom of a challenger, throwing his glove or gauntlet at the feet of the person challenged, and hiding him to pick it up. If he did so the two fought, and the vanquisher was considered to be adjudged by God to be in the right. To take up the glove means, therefore, to accept the challenge.

“I will throw my glove to death itself, that there’s no uncertainty in thy heart.”—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, iv. 3.

To take up the glove. To accept the challenge made by casting a glove or gauntlet on the ground.

Right as my glove. The phrase, says Sir Walter Scott, comes from the custom of pledging a glove as the signal of irrefragable faith. (The Antiquary.)

Glove Money. A bribe, a perquisite; so called from the ancient custom of presenting a pair of gloves to a person who undertook a cause for you. Mrs. Croaker presented Sir Thomas More, the Lord Chancellor, with a pair of gloves lined with forty pounds in “angels,” as a “token.” Sir Thomas kept the gloves, but returned the lining. (See above.)

Gloves are not worn in the presence of royalty, because we are to stand unarmed, with the helmet off the head and gauntlets off the hands, to show we have no hostile intention. (See Salutations.)

Gloves used to be worn by the clergy to indicate that their hands are clean and not open to bribes. They are no longer officially worn by the parochial clergy.

Gloves given to a judge in a maiden assize. In an assize without a criminal, the sheriff presents the judge with a pair of white gloves. Chambers says, anciently judges were not allowed to wear gloves on the bench (Cyclopaedia). To give a judge a pair of gloves, therefore, symbolised that he need not come to the bench, but might wear gloves.

You once me a pair of gloves. A small present. The gift of a pair of gloves was at one time a perquisite of those who performed small services, such as pleading your cause, arbitrating your quarrel, or showing you some favour which could not be charged for. As the services became more important, the glove was lined with money, or made to contain some coin called glove money (q.c.). Relics of this ancient custom were common till the last quarter of a century in the presentation of gloves to those who attended weddings and funerals. There also existed at one time the claim of a pair of gloves by a lady who chose to salute a gentleman caught napping in her company. In The Fair Maid of Perth, by Sir Walter Scott, Catherine steals from her chamber on St. Valentine’s morn, and, catching Henry Smith asleep, gives him a kiss. The glove says to him:

“Come into the bower with me, my son, and I will furnish thee with a fitting theme. Thou knowest the maiden who ventures to kiss a sleeping man wins of him a pair of gloves.”—Chap. V.

In the next chapter Henry presents the gloves, and Catherine accepts them.
A round with gloves. A friendly contest; a fight with gloves.

"Will you point out how this is going to be a proper round with gloves?"—Watson: The Web of the Spider, chap. ix.

Glubdubdrib. The land of sorcerers and magicians visited by Gulliver in his Travels. (Swift.)

Gnomickist and Picciolinist. A foolish rivalry excited in Paris (1774-1780) between the admirers of Glück and those of Piccinni—the former a German musical composer, and the latter an Italian. Marie Antoinette was a Glückist, and consequently Young France favoured the rival claimant. In the streets, coffee-houses, private houses, and even schools, the merits of Glück and Piccinni were canvassed; and all Paris was ranged on one side or the other. This was, in fact, a contention between the relative merits of the German and Italian school of music. (See Bachuc.)

Glum. A girl, nine years old, and only forty feet high, who had charge of Gulliver in Brobdingnag. (Swift: Gulliver's Travels.)

"Soon as Glumdacclitch missed her pleasing care, she wept, and she took her hat."—Pope.

Glutton (The). Vitellius, the Roman emperor (15-69), reigned from January 4 to December 22, A.D. 69.

Gluttony. (See Apticus, etc.)

Gna'the. A vain, boastful parasite in the Emu'm of Terence (Greeks, gnathon, jaw, meaning "tongue-doughty").

Gnomes (1 syl.), according to the Rosicrucian system, are the elemental spirits of earth, and the guardians of mines and quarries. (Greek, gnome, knowledge, meaning the knowing ones, the wise ones.) (See Fairy, Salamanders.)

"The four elements are inhabited by spirits called sylphs, gnomes, nymphe, and salamanders. The gnomes, or demons of the earth, delight in mischief; but the sylphs, whose habitations are in air, are the best conditioned creatures imaginable."—Pope: Pref. Letter to the Rage of the Lock.

Go it. The knower, opposed to believers, various sects in the first ages of Christianity, who tried to accommodate Scripture to the speculations of Pythagoras, Plato, and other ancient philosophers. They taught that knowledge, rather than mere faith, is the true key of salvation. In the Gnostic creed, Christ is esteemed merely as an end, or divine attribute personified, like Mind, Truth, Logos, Church, etc., the whole of which forms made up this divine pleroma or fulness. Paul, in several of his epistles, speaks of this "Fulness (pleroma) of God." (Greek, Gnostics.) (See AGnostics.)

Go. (Anglo-Saxon, gān, ie gā, I go.)

Here's a go or Here's a pretty go. Here's a mess or awkward state of affairs.

It is no go. It is not workable. "Faire," in the French Revolution (it will go), is a similar phrase. (See GREAT Go, and LITTLE Go.)

Go along with You. In French, tirez de long, said to dogs, meaning scamper off, run away. Au long et au large, i.e. entirely, go off the whole length and breadth of the way from me to infinite space.

"To go along with some one," with the lower classes, means to take a walk with someone of the opposite sex, with a view of matrimony if both parties think fit.

Go-between (adj). An interposer; one who interposes between two parties.

Go-by. To give one the go-by. To pass without notice, to leave in the lurch.

Go it Blind. Don't stop to deliberate. In the game called "Poker," if a player chooses to "go it blind," he doubles the ante before looking at his cards. If the other players refuse to see his blind, he wins the ante.

Go it, Warwick! A street cry during the Peninsular War, meaning, "Go it, ye cripples!" The Warwickshire militia, stationed at Hull, were more than ordinarily licentious and disorderly.

Go it, you Cripples! Fight on, you simpletons: scold away, you silly or quarrelsome ones. A cripple is slang for a dullard or awkward person.
Go of Gin. A quartar. In the Queen's Head, Covent Garden, spirits used to be served in quarts ina, neat—water ad libitum. (Compare StIRRUP CUR.)

Go on all Fours. Perfect in all points. We say of a pun or riddle, "It does not go on all fours," it will not hold good in every way. Lord Macaulay says, "It is not easy to make a simile go on all fours." Sir Edward Coke says, "Nullum simile quatuor pedibus currit." The metaphor is taken from a horse, which is lame if only one of its legs is injured. All four must be sound in order that it may go.

Go Out (7b). To rise in rebellion: the Irish say, "To be up." To go out with the forces of Charles Edward. To be out with Roger More and Sir Phelim O'Neil, in 1641.

"I thought my best chance for payment was even to go out myself."—Sir W. Scott: Haweley, 36.

Go through Fire and Water to serve you. Do anything even at personal cost and inconvenience. The reference is to the ancient ordeals by fire and water. Those condemned to these ordeals might employ a substitute.

Go to! A curtained oath. "Go to the devil!" or some such phrase.

"Commune: I am abluer than you selt.
To make conditions.
Brute: Go to! You are not, Commune." Shakespeare: Julius Cæsar, i, 3.

Go to Banff, and bottle skate.
Go to Bath, and wet your head shaved.
Go to Bury, and get your breeches mended.
Go to Coventry. Make yourself scarce.
Go to Hackney. A kind of Almshouse or sanctuary in the reign of Henry VIII.
Go to Jericho. Out of the way. (See Jericho.)

And many other similar phrases.

Go to the Wall (7b). To be pushed on one side, laid on the shelf, passed by. Business men, and those in a hurry, leave the wall-side of a pavement to women, children, and loungers.

Go without Saying (7b). Cela va sans dire. To be a self-evident fact; well understood or indisputable.

Goat. Usually placed under seats in church stalls, etc., as a mark of dishonour and abhorrence, especially to ecclesiastics who are bound by the law of continence. The seven little goats. So the Pleiades are vulgarly called in Spain.

Goat and Compasses. A public-house sign in the Commonwealth; a corruption of "God en-compasses" [us]. 7 Some say it is the carpenters' arms—three goats and a chevron. The chevron being mistaken for a pair of compasses.

Goats. (Anglo-Saxon, gāt.)

The three goats. A public-house sign at Lincoln, is a corruption of The Three Goats, that is, drains or sluices, which at one time conducted the water of a large lake into the river Witham. The name of the inn is now the Black Goats.

Gobbler (4). A turkey-cock is so called from its cry.

Gob'be (Launcelot). A clown in Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice.

Gob'elin Tapestry. So called from Giles Gobelin, a French dyer in the reign of François I., who discovered the Gobelin scarlet. His house in the suburbs of St. Marcel, in Paris, is still called the Gobelins.

Goblin. A familiar demon. According to popular belief gobelins dwelt in private houses and chinks of trees. As a specimen of forced etymology, it may be mentioned that Elf and Goblin have been derived from Guelph and Ghibelline. (French, gobelin, a rubber-fiend; Armoric gobylin; German kobold, the demon of mines; Greek, kobalos; Russian, collofj; Welsh cobylin, a "knocker;" whence the woodpecker is called in Welsh "coblyn y cwt." (See FAIRY.)

Goblin Cave. In Celtic called "Coir anu Trùskiu" (core of the satyre), in Benvenue, Scotland.

"After looking on the skirts of Benvenue, we reach the core of the goblyn by a steep and narrow fluke of one hundred yards in length. It is a deep oval amphitheatre of at least six hundred yards' extent in its upper diameter, gradually narrowing towards the base, hemmed in all round by steep and towering rocks, and rendered impervious to the rays of the sun by a close cover of luxuriant trees. On the south and west it is bounded by the precipitous shoulder of Benvenue, to the height of at least 80 feet; towards the east the rock appears at some former period to have yumbled down, strewing the white course of its fall with immense fragments, which now serve only to give shelter to hares, wild cats, and badgers."—Dr. Graham.

Goblin. In Cardiganshire the miners attribute those strange noises heard in mines to spirits called "Knockers" (goblinis). (See below.)

God. Gothic, goth (god); German, got. (See ALLA, ADONIST, ELOHISTIC, etc.)

It was Hiero, Tyrant of Syracuse, who asked Simonides the poet, "What is God?" Simonides asked to have a day to consider the question. Being asked the same question the next day, he desired two more days for reflection. Every time he appeared before Hiero he doubled the length of time for the consideration of his answer. Hiero, greatly astonished, asked the philosopher why he did so, and Simonides made answer, "The longer I think on the subject, the farther I seem from making it out."

It was Voltaire who said, "Si Dieu n’existait pas, il faudrait l’inventer."

God and the saints. "Il vaut mieux s’adresser à Dieu qu’à ses saints." "Il vaut mieux se retirer au trou qu’aux branches." Better go to the master than to his steward or foreman.

God bless the Duke of Argyle. It is said that the Duke of Argyle erected a row of posts to mark his property, and these posts were used by the cattle to rub against. (Hotten: Slang Dictionary.)

God helps those who help themselves. In French, "Aide-toi, le ciel t’aidera." "A toi de tourner Dieu donne le fil" (You make the warp and God will make the woof).

God made the country, and man made the town. Cowper in The Task (The Sofa). Varro says in his De Re Rustica, "Divina Naturae agros dedit; Arm humana edificavit urbem." "God made the king." It is said by some that both the words and music of this anthem were composed by Dr. John Bull (1563-1622), organist at Antwerp cathedral, where the original MS. is still preserved. Others attribute them to Henry Carey, author of Salty in our Alley. The words, "Send him victorious," etc., look like a Jacobin song, and Sir John Sinclair tells us he saw that verse cut in an old glass tankard, the property of P. Murray Threipland, of Fingask Castle, whose predecessors were staunch Jacobites.

No doubt the words of the anthem have often been altered. The air and words were probably first suggested to John Bull by the Domine Sullam of the Catholic Church. In 1603 the lines, "Frustrate their knavish tricks," etc., were added in reference to Gunpowder Plot. In 1715 some Jacobin added the words, "Send him [the Pretender] victorious," etc. And in 1740 Henry Carey reset both words and the music of the Mercers’ Company on the birthday of George II.

God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb. Sterne (Maria, in the Sentimental Journey). In French, "A brebis tondue, Dieu lui mesure le vent;" "Dieu mesure le froid à la brebis tondue." "Dieu donne le froid selon la robe." Sheep are shorn when the cold north-east winds have given way to milder weather.

Full of the god—inspired, maniacal. (Latin, Dei plenus.)

Gods.

CARTHAGINIAN GODS. Urania and Moloch. The former was implored when rain was required.

"Ista non est Urania calis ultimarum pollutismus."—Terentius.

Moloch was the Latin Saturn, to whom human sacrifices were offered. Hence Saturn was said to devour his own children.

CHALDEANS. The seven gods of the Chaldeans. The gods of the seven planets called in the Latin language Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Apollo (i.e. the Sun), Mercury, Venus, and Diana [i.e. the Moon].

EGYPTIAN GODS. The two chief deities were Osiris and Isis (supposed to be sun and moon). Of inferior gods, storks, asps, cats, the hawk, and some 20,000 other things had their temples, or at least received religious honours. Thebes worshipped a ram, Memphis the ox [Apis], Babastis a cat, Monemphis a cow, the Mendesians a he-goat, the Hermopolitana a fish called "Latus," the Philomelians the hippopotamus, the Lyceopolitan the wolf. The ibis was devoted because it fed on serpents, the crocodile out of terror, the ichneumon because it fed on crocodiles’ eggs.

ETHIOPIANS. Their nine gods, Juno, Minerva, and Titania (the three chief); to which add Vulcan, Mars, Saturn, Hercules, Summus, and Venus. (See AESIR.)

"Lans Persium de Cumber. By the nine gods he swore. That the great house of Taranis should suffer wrong no more. By the nine gods he swore. And named a trysting day." Meaning: Taranis, name 1.

GAUL. The gods of the Gauls were Esus and Teutates (called in Latin Mars and Mercury). Lucan adds a third named Taranus (Jupiter). Cesar says they worshipped Mercury, Apollo, Mars, Jupiter, and Minerva. The last was the inventor of all the arts, and presided over roads and commerce.

Greek and Roman gods were divided into "Dii Majores" and "Dii Minores." The Dii Majores were twelve in number, thus summed by Ennius—

Juno, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Neptune, Minerva, Jupiter, Venus, and Venus. Their blood was ichor, their food was ambrosia, their drink nectar. They married and had children, lived on Olympus in Trinity, in brasure houses built by Vulcan, and wore golden shoes which enabled them to tread on air or water.

The twelve great deities, according to Ennius were (six male and six female):

Of these, Proserpine (Latin) and Perséphone (Greek) was the wife of Pluto, Cyllé was the wife of Saturn, and Rhoe of Kronos.

In Hesiod's time the number of gods was thirty thousand, and that none might be omitted the Greeks observed a feast called θεόκτισμα, or Feast of the Unknown Gods. We have an All Saints' day.

Tρίὴ γὰρ μίροι εἰσὶν ἐν τοῖς πολυβοτέροις Ἀθάνατοι Ζηνῖς, φίλαις μόρφων ἀθρώπων.

"Some thirty thousand gods on earth we find subjects of Zeus, and guardians of mankind."

Persian gods. The chief god was Mithra. Inferior to him were two gods Oromads and Tremanus. The former was supposed to be the author of all the evils of the earth.

Saxon gods. Odin or Woden (the father of the gods), to whom Wednesday is consecrated; Freia (the mother of the gods), to whom Fri-day is consecrated; Hertha (the earth); Tusco, to whom Tus-day is consecrated; Thor, to whom Thurs-day is consecrated.

Scandinavian gods. The supreme gods of the Scandinavians were the Mysterious Three, called Ηαώ (the mighty), the LIKE MIGHTY, and the THIRD PERSON, who sat on three thrones above the Rainbow. Then came the Φραλ, of which Odin was the chief, who lived in Asgard, on the heavenly hills, between the Earth and the Rainbow. Next came the Vanir, or genii of water, air, and clouds, of which Niord was chief.

Gods and goddesses. (See Deities, Fairies.)

Gods. Among the gods. In the uppermost gallery of a theatre, which is near the ceiling, generally painted to resemble the sky. The French call this celestial region "paradis."

Dread gods. The sepulchre of Jupiter is in Candia. Esculapius was killed with an arrow. The ashes of Venus are shown in Paphos. Hercules was burnt to death. (Ignatius.)

Triple gods. (See Trinity.)

God's Acre. A churchyard or cemetery.

I like that ancient Saxon phrase, which calls the burial ground god's acre."—Longfellow.

Gods' Secretaries (The). The three Parce. One dictates the decrees of the gods; another writes them down; and the third sees that they are carried out. (Martianus Capella. 5th century.)

God-child. One for whom a person stands sponsor in baptism, A godson or a goddaughter.

Godness Mothers (The). What the French call "bonnes dames" or "les dames blanches," the prototype of the fays; generally represented as nursing infants on their laps. Some of these statues made by the Gauls or Gallo-

Romans are called "Black Virgins."

Godfather. To stand godfather. To pay the reckoning, godfathers being generally chosen for the sake of the present they are expected to make the child at the christening or in their wills.

Godfathers. Jurymen, who are the sponsors of the criminal.

"In the confines we have two godfathers. Had I been judge, thou shouldst have had ten more to burden thee to the gallows, not to the foot."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, v. 1.

Godfrey. The Agamemnon of Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, chosen by God as chief of the Crusaders. He is represented as calm, circumspect, and prudent; a despier of "worldly empire, wealth, and fame."

Godfrey's Cordial. A patent medicine given to children troubled with colic. Gray says it was used by the lower orders to "prevent the crying of children in pain" when in want of proper nourishment. It consists of sassafras, opium in some form, brandy or rectified spirit, caraway seed, and treacle. There are seven or eight different preparations. Named after Thomas Godfrey of Hunston, in Hertfordshire, in the first quarter of the eighteenth century.

Godiva (Lady). Patroness of Coventry. In 1040, Leofric, Earl of Mercia and Lord of Coventry, imposed certain exactions on his tenants, which his lady besought him to remove. To escape her importunity, he said he would do so if she would ride naked through the town. Lady Godiva did so at his word, and the Earl faithfully kept his promise.

The legend asserts that every inhabitant of Coventry kept indoors at the time, but a certain tailor peeped through his window to see the lady pass. Some say he was struck blind, others that his eyes were put out by the indignant townsfolk, and some that he was put to death. Be this as it may, he has ever since been called "Peeping Tom of Coventry." Tennyson has a poem on the subject.

The privilege of cutting wood in the Herduoles, by the parishioners of St. Brivael's Castle, in Gloucestershire, is said to have been granted by the Earl of Hereford (lord of Dean Forest) on precisely the same terms as those accepted by Lady Godiva.

"Peeping Tom" is an interpolation not anterior to the reign of Charles II. If we may place any faith in the figure Smithfield Street, which represents him in a flowing wig and Stuart cravat.

Godless Florin (The). Also called "The Graceless Florin." In 1849 were issued florins in Great Britain, with no legend except "Victoria Regina." Both F.D. (Defender of the Faith) and D.G. (by God's Grace) were omitted for want of room. From the omission of "Fidel Defensor" they were called Godless florins, and from the omission of "Dei Gratia" they were called Graceless florins.

These florins (2s.) were issued by Shell, Master of the Mint, and as he was a Catholic, so great an outcry was made against them that they were called in the same year.

Godliness. Cleanliness next to godliness, "as Matthew Henry says." Whether Matthew Henry used the proverb as well known, or invented it, deponent sayeth not.

Godmer. A British giant, son of Albion, slain by Canuteus, one of the companions of Brute.

"Three monstrous stones... Which that huge son of hideous Albion... Great Goemer, threw in fierce contumelion... At bold Canuteus: but of him was slain.

Spenser: Faerie Queene, ii. 10.

Goêl. The avenger of blood, so called by the Jews.

Goem'ot or Goermagot. The giant who dominated over the western horn of England, slain by Corineus, one of the companions of Brute. (Geoffrey: Chronicles, i. 16.) (See Corinæus.)

Gog and Magog. The Emperor Diocletian had thirty-three infamous daughters, who murdered their husbands; and, being set adrift in a ship, reached Albion, where they fell in with a number of demons. The offspring of this unnatural alliance was a race of giants, afterwards exterminated by Brute and his companions, refugees from Troy. Gog and Magog, the last two of the giant race, were brought in chains to London, then called Troy-novant, and, being chained to the palace of Brute, which stood on the site of our Guildhall, did duty as porters. We cannot pledge ourselves to the truth of old Caxton's narrative; but we are quite certain that Gog and Magog had their offices at Guildhall in the reign of Henry V. The old giants were destroyed in the Great Fire, and the present ones, fourteen feet high, were carved in 1708 by Richard Saunders.

Children used to be told (as a very mild joke) that when these giants hear St. Paul's clock strike twelve, they descend from their pedestals and go into the Hall for dinner.

Goggles. A corruption of ocus, eyeshades. (Danish, og, an eye; Spanish, ojo; or from the Welsh, ogelw, to shelter.)

Go'mmag Log Hill (The). The higher of two hills, some three miles south-east of Cambridge. The legend is that Gogmagog was a huge giant who fell in love with the nymph Granta, but the saucy lady would have nothing to say to the big bulk, afterwards metamorphosed into the hill which bears his name. (Drayton: Polyolbion, xxi.)

Go'jam. A province of Abyssinia (Africa). Captain Speke traced it to Lake Victoria Nyamia, near the Mountains of the Moon (1861).

"The swelling Nile... From his two springs in Oujam's sunny realm... Pure-welling out..." - Thomson: *Summer, Golconda, in Hindustan, famous for its diamond mines.

Gold. By the ancient alchemists, gold, represented the sun, and silver the moon. In heraldry, gold is expressed by dots.

All he touches turns to gold. It is said of Midas that whatever he touched turned to gold. (See Rainbow.)

"In manu illius plumbum aurum tebatur."—Petronius.

Gold. All that glitters is not gold. (Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, ii. 7.)

"All thing which that clieneth as the gold Is sought gold."—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 12,960.

"Non tenes aurum totum quod splendens ut aurum. Nec pulchrum pannum quod libert esse homum."—Alcnius de Iuvena: Parabolae.

He has got the gold of Tolosa. His ill gains will never prosper. Capio, the Roman consul, in his march to Gallia Narbonensis, stole from Tolosa (Toulouse) the gold and silver consecrated by the Cimbrian Druids to their gods. When he encountered the Cimbrians both he and Mallius, his brother-consul, were defeated, and 112,000 of their men were left upon the field (b.c. 100).

The gold of Nibelungen, Brought ill-luck to every one who possessed it. (Icelandic Edda.) (See Fatal Gifts.)

Mannheim gold. A sort of pinchbeck, made of copper and zinc, invented at Mannheim, in Germany. Mosaic gold is "aurum hum'mum," a bisulphuret of tin used by the ancients in tesselating. (French, mosaique.)

Gold Purse of Spain. Andalusia is so called because it is the city from which Spain derives its chief wealth.

Golden. The Golden ("Auratus"). So Jean Dorat, one of the Pleiad poets of France, was called by a pun on his name. This pun may perhaps pass muster; not so the preposterous title given to him of "The French Pindar." (1507-1588.)

Golden-tongued (Greek, Chrysozegos). So St. Peter, Bishop of Ravenna, was called. (433-450.)

The golden section of a line. Its division into two such parts that the rectangle contained by the smaller segment and the whole line equals the square on the larger segment. (Euclid, ii. 11.)

Golden Age. The best age; as the golden age of innocence, the golden age of literature. Chronologers divide the time between Creation and the birth of Christ into ages; Heaidd describes five, and Lord Byron adds a sixth, "The Age of Bronze." (See Age, Augustan.)

i. The Golden Age of Ancient Nations:

(1) New Assyrian Empire. From the reign of Esar-haddon or Assur Adon (Assyria's prince), third son of Senmacherib, to the end of Sargon's reign (b.c. 691-605).

(2) Chaldean-Babylonian Empire. From the reign of Nabopolassar or Nebupul-Assur (Nebuchadnezzar II) of Belshazzar or Bel-sheba-Assur (Bel king-of Assyroa) (b.c. 606-538).

(3) China. The T'ang dynasty (626-684), and especially the reign of Tae-tsong (618-926).

(4) Egypt. The reigns of Sethos I. (b.c. 1386-1223).

or _______ _______ _______ _______ _______ _______ _______ _______ _______ (b.c. 634-594).

(6) Persia. The reigns of Khoiar I., and II. (531-628).

ii. The Golden Age of Modern Nations.

(1) England. The reign of Elizabeth (1558-1603).

(2) France. Part of the reigns of Louis XIV, and XV, (1640-1740).

(3) Germany. The reign of Charles V. (1519-1558).

(4) Portugal. From John I. to the close of Sebastian's reign (1383-1578). In 1580 the crown was seized by Felice II. of Spain.

(5) Prussia. The reign of Frederick the Great (1740-1786).

(6) Russia. The reign of Czar Peter the Great (1672-1725).

(7) Spain. The reign of Ferdinand and Isabella, when the crowns of Castile and Aragon were united (1474-1516).

(8) Sweden. From Gustavus Vasa to the close of the reign of Gustavus Adolphus (1523-1632).

Golden Apple. "What female heart can gold despise?" (Gray). In allusion to the fable of Atalanta, the swiftest of all mortals. She vowed to marry only that man who could outstrip her in a race. Milianion threw down three golden apples, and Atalanta, stopping to pick them up, lost the race.

Golden Ass. The romance of Apuleius, written in the second century, and called the golden because of its excellency. It contains the adventures of Lucian, a young man who, being accidentally metamorphosed into an ass while sojourning in Thessaly, fell into the hands of robbers, eunuchs, magistrates, and so on, by whom he was ill-treated; but ultimately he recovered his Golden Ball

Golden Bay. The Bay of Kieselarko is so called because the sands shine like gold or fire. (Hans Struys, 17th cent.)

Golden Bonds. Aurelian allowed the captive queen Zenobia to have a slave to hold up her golden tresses.

Golden Bowl is Broken (The). Death has supervened.

Golden Bull. An edict by the Emperor Charles IV., issued at the Diet of Nuremberg in 1350, for the purpose of fixing how the German emperors were to be elected. (See BULL.)

Golden Calf. We all worship the golden calf, i.e. money. The reference is to the golden calf made by Aaron when Moses was absent on Mount Sinai. (Exod. xxxii.) According to a common local tradition, Aaron's golden calf is buried in Rook's Hill, Lavan, near Chichester.

Golden Cave. Contained a cistern guarded by two giants and two centaurs; the waters of the cistern were good for quenching the fire of the cave; and when this fire was quenched the inhabitants of Scabullum would return to their native forms. (The Seven Champions, iii. 10.)

Golden Chain. "Faith is the golden chain to link the prudent sinner unto God" (Jeremy Taylor). The allusion is to a passage in Homer's Iliad (i. 19-30), where Zeus says, If a golden chain were let down from heaven, and all the gods and goddesses pulled at one end, they would not be able to pull him down to

Golden Fleece. Ino persuaded her husband, Athamas, that his son Phryxos was the cause of a famine which desolated the land, and the old dotard ordered him to be sacrificed to the angry gods. Phryxos being apprised of this order, made his escape over sea on a ram which had a golden fleece. When he arrived at Colchis, he sacrificed the ram to Zeus, and gave the fleece to King Aeëtes, who hung it on a sacred oak. It was afterwards stolen by Jason in his celebrated Argonautic expedition. (See ARG.)

Golden fleece of the north. The fur and peltry of Siberia is so called.

Golden Fountain. The property of a wealthy Jew of Jerusalem. "In twenty-four hours it would convert any metal into refined gold; and any kind of earth into excellent metal." (The Seven Champions of Christendom, ii. 4.)

Golden Girdle. Louis VIII. made an edict that no courteesans should be allowed to wear a golden girdle, under very severe penalty. Hence the proverb, Bonne renommée vaut mieux que riche dorée. (See GIRDLE.)

Golden Horn. The inlet of the Bosphorus on which Constantinople is situated. So called from its curved shape and great beauty.

Golden House. This was a palace erected by Nero in Rome. It was roofed with golden tiles, and the inside walls, which were profusely gilt, were embellished with mother-of-pearl and precious stones; the ceilings were inlaid with ivory and gold. The banquet-hall had a rotary motion, and its vaulted calling showered flowers and perfumes on the guests. Popes and princes used the materials for their palaces.

Golden Legend. [KILKENSBOG, MISS.]

Golden Legend. A collection of hagiology (lives of saints) made by Jaques de Voragine in the thirteenth century; valuable for the picture it gives of medieval manners, customs, and thought. Jortin says that the young students of religious houses, for the exercise of their talents, were set to accommodate the narratives of heathen writers to Christian saints. It was a collection of these “lives” that Voragine made, and thought deserving to be called “Legends worth their Weight in Gold.” Longfellow has a dramatic poem entitled The Golden Legend.

Golden Mean. Keep the golden mean. The wise saw of Cleobulo's, King of Rhodes (B.C. 630-550).

Instant alike from each, to neither lean,
But ever keep the happy Golden Mean.
- Rowe: The Golden Verses.

Golden-mouthed. Chrysostom; so called for his great eloquence (A.D. 347-407).

Golden Ointment. Eye salve. In allusion to the ancient practice of rubbing “alynas of the eye” with a gold ring to cure them.

I have a sty here, Chilax,
I have no gold to cure it.
- Beaumont and Fletcher: Mad Lovers.

Golden Opinions. “I have bought golden opinions of all sorts of people.” (Shakespeare: Macbeth, i. 7.)

Golden Palace. (See Golden House.)

Golden Rose. A cluster of roses and rosebuds growing on one thorny stem, all of the purest gold, chiselled with exquisite workmanship. In its cup, among its petals, the Pope, at every benediction he pronounced upon it, inserts a few particles of amber and musk. It is blessed on the fourth Sunday in Lent, and bestowed during the ecclesiastical year on the royal lady whose zeal for the Church has most shown itself by pious deeds or pious intentions. The prince who has best deserved of the Holy See has the blessed sword and cup (la stoevo e il beretto) sent him. If one merits the gift it is laid up in the Vatican. In the spring of 1808 the Pope gave the golden rose to Isabella of Spain, in reward of “her faith, justice, and charity,” and to “foretoken the protection of God to his well-beloved daughter, whose high virtues make her a shining light amongst women.” The Empress Eugénie of France also received it.

Golden Rule. In morals—Do unto others as you would be done by. Or Matt. vii. 12.

In arithmetic—The Rule of Three.

Golden Shoe (A). A pot of money. “The want of a golden shoe” is the want of ready cash. It seems to be a superlative of a “silver slipper,” or good luck generally, as he walks in silver slippers.

Golden Shower or Shower of gold. A bribe, money. The allusion is to the classic tale of Jupiter and Dan’næ. Acrisios, King of Argos, being told that his daughter’s son would put him to death, resolved that Dan’næ should never marry, and accordingly locked her up in a brazen tower. Jupiter, who was in love with the princess, foiled the king by changing himself into a shower of gold, under which guise he readily found access to the fair prisoner.

Golden Slipper (The), in Negro melodies, like “golden streets,” etc., symbolises the joys of the land of the lea; and to wear the golden slipper means to enter into the joys of Paradise.

The golden shoes or slippers of Paradise, according to Scandinavian mythology, enable the wearer to walk on air or water.

Golden State. California; so called from its gold “diggings.”

Golden Thigh. Pythagoras is said to have had a golden thigh, which he showed to Abaris, the Hyperborean priest, and exhibited in the Olympic games. Pelops, we are told, had an ivory shoulder. Naul had a silver hand (see Silver Hand), but this was artificial.

Golden Tooth. A Silesian child, in 1583, we are told, in his second set of teeth, cut “one great tooth of pure gold;” but Lilavius, chemist of Coburg, recommended that the tooth should be seen by a goldsmith; and the goldsmith pronounced it to be “an ordinary tooth cleverly covered with gold leaf.”

Golden Town (The). So Mainz or Mayence was called in Carolingian times, Golden Valley. The eastern portion of Limerick is so called, from its great natural fertility.

Golden Verses. So called because they are "good as gold." They are by some attributed to Epicurus, and to others to Empedocles, but always go by the name of Pythagoras, and seem quite in accordance with the excellent precepts of that philosopher. They are as follows:

Never suffer sleep to close your eyes or close your mind to the sun's rays.
Nor every act and thought, and word, from dawn to set of sun.
For wrong take shame, but grateful feel if just thy course hath been.
Such effort may be rewarded willward thy soul from sin.

E. C. B.

Goldy. The pet name given by Dr. Johnson to Oliver Goldsmith. Garrick said of him, "He wrote like an angel and talked like poor Pol". (Born Nov. 29, 1728; died April 4, 1774.)

Golgotha signifies a skull, and corresponds to the French word chânon. Probably it designated a bare hill or rising ground, having some fanciful resemblance to the form of a bald skull.

"Golgotha seems not entirely unconnected with the hill of Tiber, and the locality of which, mentioned in Jeremiah xxvi. 30, on the north-west of the city, I am inclined to fix the place where Jesus was crucified... on the mound which command the valley of Hinnom, above Berke-Manuth." - ROBERT: Life of Jesu, chap. xxv.

Golgota, in the University church, Cambridge, was the gallery in which the "heads of the houses" sat; so called because it was the place of skulls or heads. It has been more witty than truly said that Golgotha was the place of empty skulls.

Goliath. The Philistine giant, slain by the stripling David with a small stone hurled from a sling. (1 Sam. xvii. 23-51.) (See GIANTS.)

Golosch. It is said that Henry VI. wore half-boots laced at the side, and about the same time was introduced the shoe or clog called the "galago," or "goloje," meaning simply a covering: to which is attributed the origin of our word golosh. This cannot be correct, as Chaucer, who died twenty years before Henry VI. was born, uses the word. The word comes to us from the Spanish galocha (wooden shoes); German, galoshe.

"So were worthy to unbafe his galoche." Chaucer: Tale of Tale.

Go'marists. Opponents of Arminius. So called from Francis Gomar, their leader (1563-1641).

Gombeen Man. A tall man; a village usurer; a money-lender. The word is of Irish extraction.

"They suppose that the tenants can have no other supply of capital than from the gombeen man." - Eyment Hake: Free Trade in Capital, p. 337.

Gombo. Pigeon French, or French as it is spoken by the coloured population of Louisiana, the West Indies, Bourbon, and Mauritius. (Connected with jumbe.)

"Creole is almost pure French, not much more pronounced than in some parts of France; but Gombo is a mere phonetic burlesque of French, interlarded with African words and other words; it is neither African nor French, but probably belongs to the aboriginal language of the countries to which the slaves were brought from Africa." - The Nineteenth Century, October, 1881, p. 579.

Gondola. A Venetian boat.

"Venice, in her purple prime... when the famous law was passed making all gondolas black, that the nobility should not surpass the fortunes upon them." - Curtis: Pictorial Papers, p. 31.

Gone 'coon. (a.) (See 'COON.)

Gone to the Devil. (See under DEVIL.)

Gone Up. Put out of the way, hanged, or otherwise got rid of. In Denver (America) unruly citizens are summarily hung on a cotton tree, and when any question is asked about them the answer is briefly given, "Gone up" -- i.e., gone up the cotton tree, or suspended from one of its branches. (See New America, by W. Hepworth Dixon, i. 11.)

Gone'riil. One of Lear's three daughters. Having received her moiety of Lear's kingdom, the unnatural daughter first abridged the old man's retinue, then gave him to understand that his company was troublesome. (Shakespeare: King Lear.)

Gon'salon or gonfalon. An ensign or standard. A gonfalonier is a magistrate that has a gonfalon. (Italian, gonfalone; French, gonfalon; Saxon, gonfalone, war-flags.) Chaucer uses the word gonfalon; Milton prefers gonfalon. Thus he says:

"Ten thousand thousand ensigns high advanced, Standards and gonfalon, in white van and rear Stream in the air, and for distinction serve." (Paradise Lost, v. 590.)

Gonfanon. The consecrated banner of the Normans. When William invaded England, his gonfanon was presented to him by the Pope. It was made of purple silk, divided at the end like the banner attached to the "Cross of the Resurrection," When Harold was wounded in the eye, he was borne to the foot of this sacred standard, and the English rallied round him; but his death gave victory to the invaders. The high altar of Battle Abbey marked the spot where the gounfanon stood, but the only traces now left are a few stones, recently uncovered, to show the site of this memorable place.

Gonin. C'est un Maître Gonin. He is a sly dog. Maître Gonin was a famous clown in the sixteenth century. "Un tour de Maître Gonin" means a cunning or scurvy trick. (See All-borou.)

Gonnella's Horse. Gonnella, the domestic jester of the Duke of Ferrara, rode on a horse all skin and bone. The jests of Gonnell are in print.

"Hie horse was as lean as Gonnella's, which as (the Duke said) 'Osso atique poieso locus esse' (Pisanius.)—Cervantes: Don Quixote.

Gonzal'ez [Gon-calley]. Fernan Gonzales was a Spanish hero of the tenth century, whose life was twice saved by his wife Sancha, daughter of Garcias, King of Navarre. The adventures of Gonzal's have given birth to a host of ballads.

Gonville College (Cambridge). The same as Caius College, founded in 1348 by Edmond Gonville, son of Sir Nicholas Gonville, rector of Terrington, Norfolk. (See Caius College.)

Good. The Good.

Alfonso VIII. (or IX.) of Leon, "The Noble and Good." (1158-1214.)

Douglas (The good Sir James), Bruce's friend, died 1306.

Jean II. of France, le Bon. (1319, 1350-1364.)

Jean III., Duc de Bourgogne. (1286, 1312-1341.)

Jean of Brittany, "The Good and Wise." (1287, 1389-1442.)

Philippe III., Duc de Bourgogne. (1306, 1419-1467.)

Richard II., Duc de Normandie. (996-1026.)

Richard de Beauchamp, twelfth Earl of Warwick, Regent of France. (Died 1430.)

Good-bye. A contraction of God be with you. Similar to the French adieu, which is à Dieu (I commend you to God).

† Some object to the substitution of "God" in this phrase, reminding us of our common phrases good day, good night, good morning, good evening; “Good he with ye” would mean may you fare well, or good abide [with you].

Good-Cheap. The French bon marché, a good bargain. “Cheap” here means market or bargain. (Anglo-Saxon, ceap.)

Good Duke Humphrey. Humphrey Plantagenet, Duke of Gloucester, youngest son of Henry IV., said to have been murdered by Suffolk and Cardinal Beaufort. (Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., iii. 2.)

† Called “Good,” not for his philanthropy, but from his devotion to the Church. He was an out-and-out Catholic.

Good Folk (Scotch guid folk) are like the Shetland land-Trows, who inhabit the interior of green hills. (See TROWS.)

Good Form, Bad Form. Comme il faut, bon ton; mauvais ton, comme il ne faut pas. Form means fashion, like the Latin forma.

Good Friday. The anniversary of the Crucifixion. "Good" means holy. Probably good = God, as in the phrase “Good-bye” (q.v.).

Born on Good Friday. According to ancient superstition, those born on Christmas Day or Good Friday have the power of seeing and commanding spirits.

Good Graces (To get into one's). To be in favour with.

"Having continued to get into the good graces of the lady widow."—Dickens: Pickwick, chap. xiv.

Good Hater (A). I love a good hater. I like a man to be with me or against me, either to be hot or cold. Dr. Johnson called Bathurst the physician a "good hater," because he hated a fool, and he hated a rogue, and he hated a Whig; "he," said the Doctor, "was a very good hater."

Good Lady (The). The mistress of the house. "Your good lady," your wife. (See Goodman.)

† "My good woman" is a deprecatory address to an inferior; but "Is your good woman at home?" is quite respectful, meaning your wife (of the lower grade of society).

Good Neighbours. So the Scotch call the Norse drows.

Good Regent. James Stewart, Earl of Murray, appointed Regent of Scotland after the imprisonment of Queen Mary.

Good Samaritan. One who succours the distressed. The character is from our Lord's Parable of the man who fell among thieves (St. Luke x. 30-37).

Good Time. There is a good time coming. This has been for a long, long time a familiar saying in Scotland, and is introduced by Sir Walter Scott in his Rob Roy. Charles Mackay has written a song so called, set to music by Henry Russell.

Good Turn (To do a). To do a kindness to any one.

Good and All (For). Not tentatively, not in pretense, nor yet temporarily, but bond fide, really, and altogether. (See All.)

"The good woman never died after this, till she came to die for good and all."—L'Entraide: Fables.

Good as Gold. Thoroughly good.

Good for Anything. Ripe for any sort of work.

"After a man has had a year or two at this sort of work, he is good . . . for anything."—Holden's Hobbes under Arms, chap. xi.

Not good for anything. Utterly worthless; used up or worn down.

Good Wine needs no Bush. It was customary to hang out ivy, boughs of trees, flowers, etc., at public houses to notify to travellers that "good cheer" might be had within.

"Some ale-houses upon the road I saw, And some with ivies hanging they wine old draw."—Poor Robin's Jerramblations (1678).

Goods. I carry all my goods with me (omnia mea mecum porto). Said by Bins, one of the seven sages, when Trewie was besieged and the inhabitants were preparing for flight.

Goodfellow (Robin). Sometimes called Puck, son of Oberon, a domestic spirit, the constant attendant on the English fairy-court; full of tricks and fond of practical jokes.

"That shrewd and knowing sprite."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 1.

Goodluck's Close (Norfolk). A corruption of Guthlac's Close, so called from a chapel founded by Allen, son of Godfrey de Swaffham, in the reign of Henry II., and dedicated to St. Guthlac.

Goodman. A husband or master is the Saxon guma or guma (a man), which in the inflected cases becomes guman or goman. In St. Matt. xxiv. 43; "If the goodman of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched." Goodman and gommer, for the master and mistress of a house, are by no means uncommon.

The phrase is also used of the devil.

"There's no luck about the house When our goodman's awa."—Nicola.

Goodman, or St. Gutman. Patron saint of tailors, being himself of the same craft.

Goodman of Bal'lenestoch. The assumed name of James V. of Scotland when he made his disguised visits through the country districts around Edinburgh and Stirling, after the fashion of Haroun-al-Raschid, Louis XI., etc.

Goodman's Croft. A strip of ground or corner of a field formerly left untilled, in Scotland, in the belief that unless some such place were left, the spirit of evil would damage the crop.

"So the place is still being remembered the corner of a field being left for the goodman's croft."—Tyler: Primitive Church, ii. 356.

Goodman's Fields, Whitechapel. Fields belonging to a farmer named Goodman.

"At the which farm I myself in my youth have fetched many a halfpenny-worth of milk, and never had less than three ale-plints for a halfpenny in summer, nor less than one ale-plint in winter; always a hot from the fire . . . and strained. One Troup, and afterwards Goodman, were the farmers there, and had thirty or forty kine to the palm."—Stow.

Goodwin Sands consisted at one time of about 4,000 acres of low land fenced from the sea by a wall, belonging to Earl Goodwin or Godwin. William the Conqueror bestowed them on the abbey of St. Augustine, at Canterbury, and the abbot allowed the sea-wall to fall into a dilapidated state, so that the sea broke through in 1100 and inundated the whole. (See TENTKEDEN STEEPLE.)

Goodwood Races. So called from the park in which they are held. They begin the last Tuesday of July, and last four days; but the principal one is Thursday, called the "Cup Day." These races, being held in a private park, are very select and admirably conducted. Goodwood Park, the property of the Duke of Richmond, was purchased by Charles, the first Duke, of the Compton family, then resident in East Lavant, a village two miles north of Chichester.

Goody. A depreciative, meaning weakly moral and religious. In French, bon homme is used in a similar way.

"No doubt, if a Caesar or a Napoleon comes before some man of weak will . . . especially if he be a goodly man, (lie will quail."—C. Cook: Consolation, lecture iv. p. 40.
Goody Blake. A poor old woman who was detected by Harry Gill, the farmer, picking up sticks for a wee-bit fire to warm herself by. The farmer compelled her to leave them on the field, and Goody Blake invoked on him the curse that he might never more be warm. From that moment neither blazing fire nor accumulated clothing ever made Harry Gill warm again. Do what he would, "his teeth went chattering, chattering, still." (Wordsworth: Goody Blake and Harry Gill.)

Goody Two-Shoes. This tale first appeared in 1765. It was written for Newbery, as it is said, by Oliver Goldsmith.

Goody-goody. Very religious or moral, but with no strength of mind or independence of spirit.

Goose. A tailor's smoothing-iron; so called because its handle resembles the neck of a goose.

"Come in, tailor; here you may roast your goose."—Shakespeare; Macbeth, ii. 3.

Ferrara goose. Celebrated for the size of their livers. The French pâtre de foie gras, for which Strasbourg is so noted, is not a French invention, but a mere imitation of a well-known dish of classic times.

"I wish, gentlemen, it was one of the geese of Ferrara, so much celebrated among the ancients for the magnitude of their livers, one of which is said to have weighed upwards of two pounds, with this food, exquisite as it was, did Helvetius himself enjoin them."—Smollett; Peregrine Pickle.

Ways Goose. (See WAYS.)

"I'll cook your goose for you. I'll pay you out. Eric, King of Sweden, coming to a certain town with very few soldiers, the enemy, in mockery, hung out a goose for him to shoot at. Finding, however, that the king meant business, and that it would be no laughing matter for them, they sent heralds to ask him what he wanted. "To cook your goose for you," he facetiously replied.

"He killed the goose to get the eggs. He grasped at what was more than his due, and lost an excellent customer. The Greek fable says a countryman had a goose that laid golden eggs; thinking to make himself rich, he killed the goose to get the whole stock of eggs at once, but lost everything.

Goose and Gridiron. A public-house sign, properly the coat of arms of the Company of Musicians—viz. a swan with expanded wings, within a double treasur[e [the gridiron], counter, flor[y, argent. Perverted into a goose striking the bars of a gridiron with its foot, and called "The Swan and Harp," or "Goose and Gridiron."

This famous lodge of the Freemasons, of which Wren was Master (in London House Yard), was doomed in 1664.

Goose at Michaelmas. One legend says that St. Martin was tormented by a goose which he killed and ate. As he died from the repast, good Christians have ever since sacrificed the goose on the day of the saint.

The popular tradition is that Queen Elizabeth, on her way to Tilbury Fort (September 29th, 1588), dined at the ancient seat of Sir Neville Umfreyville, where, among other things, two fine geese were provided for dinner. The queen, having eaten heartily, called for a bumper of Burgundy, and gave as a toast, "Destruction to the Spanish Armada!" Scarcely had she spoken when a messenger announced the destruction of the fleet by a storm. The queen demanded a second bumper, and said, "Henceforth shall a goose commemorate this great victory." This tale is marred by the awkward circumstance that the thanksgiving sermon for the victory was preached at St. Paul's on the 20th August, and the fleet was dispersed by the winds in July. Gascogne, who died 1577, refers to the custom of goose-eating at Michaelmas as common.

"At Christmas a capon, at Michaelmas a goose. And somewhat else at New Year's tide, for fease the lesse flew home."

"At Michaelmas time stubble-geese are in perfection, and tenants formerly presented their landlords with one to keep in their good graces.

Although geese were served at table in Michaelmas time, before the destruction of the Armada, still they commemorate that event. So there were doubting rainbows before the Flood, yet God made the rainbow the token of His promise not to send another Flood upon the world.

Gooseberry. Fox Talbot says this is St. John's berry, being ripe about St. John's Day. [This must be John the Baptist, at the end of August, not John the Evangelist, at the beginning of May.] Hence, he says, it is called in Holland Jansbeeren. Jans' boeren, he continues, has been corrupted into Gansbeeren, and Gans is the German for goose. This is very ingenious, but goose (furze) offers a simpler derivation. Gooseberry (the prickly berry) would be like the German stachel-bere (the "prickly berry"), and krause-bere (the rough gooseberry), from krause (to scratch). Krausebeere, Gorse-berry, Gooseberry. In Scotland it is called grouser. (See Bear's garlic.)

To play gooseberry is to go with two lovers for appearance's sake. The person who "plays propriety" is expected to hear, see, and say nothing. (See Gooseberry Picker.)

He played up old gooseberry with me. He took great liberties with my property, and greatly abused it; in fact, he made gooseberry fool of it. (See below.)

Gooseberry Fool. A corruption of gooseberry fool, milled, mashed, pressed. The French have foncé de pommes; foncé de raisins; foncé de groseilles, our "gooseberry fool."

Gooseberry fool is a compound made of gooseberries scalded and pounded with cream.

Gooseberry Picker. One who has all the toil and trouble of picking a troublesome fruit for the delectation of others. (See Tapiserie.)

Goosebridge. Go to Goosebridge.

"Rule a wife and have a wife." Boccacio (ix. 9) tells us that a man who had married a shrew asked Solomon what he should do to make her more submissive; and the wise king answered, "Go to Goosebridge." Returning home, deeply perplexed, he came to a bridge where a muleteer was trying to induce a mule to pass over it. The mule resisted, but the stronger will of the muleteer at length prevailed. The man asked the name of the bridge, and was told it was "Goosebridge." Petruchio tamed Katharine by the power of a stronger will.

Goose Dubbs, of Glasgow. A sort of Sevan Dials or Scottish Allestis. The Scotch use dubbs for a filthy puddle. (Welsh, dub, mortar; Irish, dub, plaster.)

"The Goose-dubs o' Glasgow: O sir, wad a huddle o' houses, the green middens o' bath liquid and solid matter, smokin' wi' dead cats and solid shoon." —Nestor Auriolianus.

Goose Gibb's. A half-witted lad, who first "kept the turkeys, and was afterwards advanced to the more important office of minding the cows." (Sir Walter Scott: Old Mortality.)

Gopher-wood ("go"), of which the ark was made.

It was soracin, says the Religious Tract Society. It was hardwood, says the Arabian commentators. It was unrushed, davened over with slime, says Lawson. It was cedar, says the Targum of Onkelos. It was cypress, says Fuller, and yew is not unlike gopher. It was hardwood, says Rockart. It was cedal or gholwood, says White. It was gallbrad, says Catullus. It was pine, says Arrianus, Munster, Persic, Taylor, etc. It was weeckwood, says Goddes.

Gordian Knot. A great difficulty. Gordius, a peasant, being chosen king of Phrygia, dedicated his waggon to Jupiter, and fastened the yoke to a beam with a rope of bark so ingeniously that no one could untie it. Alexander was told that whoever untied the knot would reign over the whole East. "Well then," said the conqueror, "it is thus I perform the task," and, so saying, he cut the knot in twain with his sword.

To cut the knot is to evade a difficulty, or get out of it in a summary manner.

"Sure praise the Macedonian got For leaving rudely cut the Gordian knot."—Walter: To the King.

"Turn him to any name of policy,
The Gordian knot of it he will unbend, Familiar as his mother."—Shakespeare: Henry V. 1. 1.

Gordon Riots. Riots in 1780, headed by Lord George Gordon, to compel the House of Commons to repeal the bill passed in 1778 for the relief of Roman Catholics. Gordon was undoubtedly of unsound mind, and he died in 1793, a proselyte to Judaism. Dickens has given a very vivid description of the Gordon riots in Barnaby Rudge.

Gorgibus. An honest, simple-minded burgess, brought into all sorts of troubles by the love of finery and the gingerbread gentility of his niece and his daughter. (Molière: Les Précieuses Ridicules.)
Gorgon. Anything unusually hideous. There were three Gorgons, with serpents on their heads instead of hair; Medusa was the chief of the three, and the only one that was mortal; but so hideous was her face that whoever set eyes on it was instantly turned into stone. She was slain by Perseus, and her head placed on the shield of Minerva.

“Lest Gorgon rising from the infernal lakes
With horns armed, and curls of hissing snakes,
Should fix me, stiffened at the monstrous sight,
A story image in eternal night.”

Odyssey, xi.

“What was that nasty-headed Gorgon shield
That wise Minerva wore, unconquered virgin,
Wherewith she freazed her foes to congealed stone?
But rigid looks of chaste austerity,
And noble grace, that dashed brute violence
With sudden adoration and blank awe.”

Milton: Comus, 438-463.

Gorham Controversy. This arose out of the refusal of the bishop of Exeter to institute the Rev. Cornelius Gorham to the vicarage of Brampford Speke, “because he held unsound views on the doctrine of baptism.” Mr. Gorham maintained that “spiritual regeneration is not conferred on children by baptism.” After two years’ controversy, the Privy Council decided in favour of Mr. Gorham (1851).

Gorlois, Duke of Cornwall, husband of Igraine, who was the mother of King Arthur by an adulterous connection with Uther, pendragon of the Britons.

Goatling. A term applied to a silly fellow, a simpleton.

“Surprised at all they meet, the goatling pair,
With awkward gait, stretched neck, and silly stare,
Discover house cathedrals.”

Owen: Progress of Error, 370-91.

Goatlings. The catkins of nut-trees, pines, etc. Halliwell says they are so called from their yellow colour and fluffy texture.

Gospel. A panacea; a scheme to bring about some promised reform; a beau ideal. Of course the theological word is the Anglo-Saxon gespeal, i.e. God and spel (a story), a translation of the Greek evangelion, the good story.

“Mr. Carnegie’s gospel is the very thing for the transition period from social brotherhood to social Christianity.”—Nineteenth Century (March, 1891, p. 380).

Gospel according to ... The chief teaching of [so-and-so]. “The Gospel according to Mammon” is the making and collecting of money. “The Gospel according to Sir Perkin Mac Sycophant,” is bowing and cringing to those who are in a position to lend you a helping hand.

Gospel of Nicodemus (The). Sometimes called “The Acts of Pilate” (Acts Pilati), was the main source of the “Mysteries” and “Miracle Plays” of the Middle Ages; and although now deemed apocryphal, seems for many ages to have been accepted as genuine.

Gospel of Wealth (The). The hypothesis that wealth is the great end and aim of man, the one thing needful.

Gospellers. Followers of Wycliffe, called the “Gospel Doctor”; any one who believes that the New Testament has in part, at least, superseded the Old. Hot Gospellers. A nickname applied to the Puritans after the Restoration.

Gossamer. According to legend, this delicate thread is the ravelling of the Virgin Mary’s winding-sheet, which fell to earth on her ascension to heaven. It is said to be God’s seam, i.e. God’s thread. Philologically it is the Latin gossypinus, cotton.

Gossip. A tattler; a sponsor at baptism, a corruption of goss, which is God’s, a kinsman in the Lord. (Sib, gesib, Anglo-Saxon, kinsman, whence siwan, he is our sib, still used.)

“Tis not a maid, for she hath had gossips [sponsors for her child]; yet ’tis a maid, for she is her master’s servant, and servis for wages.”—Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona, iii. 1.

Gossip. A father confessor, of a good, easy, jovial frame.

“Here, Andrew, carry this to my gossip, jolly father Boniface, the monk of St. Martin’s.”—Sir Walter Scott: Quentin Durward.

Gossipia. The cotton-plant personified.

“The nymph Gossipia bears the velvet seed, And warms with racy smiles the watery rod.”

Burrow: Lute of the Plants, canoni.

Got the Mitton. Jilted; got his dismissal. The word is from the Latin mitto, to dismiss.

“There is a young lady I have set my heart on; though whether she is going to give me her, or give me the mitten, I can’t quite satisfy.”—Samuel: Human Nature, p. 92.

Gotch. A large stone jug with a handle (Norfolk). Fetch the gotch, moy—i.e. fetch the great water-jug, lassie.

“A gotch of milk I’ve been to fill.”

Bloomfield: Richard and Kate.

Goth. Icelandic, got (a horseman); whence Woden—i.e. Gothen.

“The Goths were divided by the Daleper into East Goths (Ostrogoths), and West Goths (Visigoths), and were the most cultured of the German peoples.”—Baring-Gould: Story of Germany, p. 37.
Gotham, Wiser Men of Gotham—fools. Many tales of folly have been fathered on the Gothamites, one of which is their joining hands round a thornbush to shut in a cuckoo. The "bush" is still shown to visitors.

It is said that King John intended to make a progress through this town with the view of purchasing a castle and grounds. The townsman had no desire to be saddled with this expense, and therefore when the royal messengers appeared, wherever they went they saw the people occupied in some idiotic pursuit. The king being told of it, abandoned his intention, and the "wise men" of the village cunningly remarked, "We ween there are more fools pass through Gotham than remain in it." Andrew Boyle, a native of Gotham, wrote The Merry Tales of the Wise Men of Gotham, founded on a commission signed by Henry VIII. to the magistrates of that town to prevent poaching.

N.B. All nations have fixed upon some locality as their limbus of fools; thus we have Phrygian as the fools' home of Asia Minor, Aldètra of the Thracians, Bou'itia of the Greeks, Nazareth of the ancient Jews, Swabia of the modern Germans, and so on. (See COOGESHALL.)

Gothamites (3 syl.). American cockneys. New York is called satirically Gotham.

"Such things as would strike ... a stranger in our beloved Gotham, and place to which our regular Gothamites (American cockneys) are wont to repair."—Frances* Magazine: Sketches of American Society.

Gothic Architecture has nothing to do with the Goths, but is a term of contempt bestowed by the architects of the Renaissance period on medieeval architecture, which they termed Gothic or clumsy, fit for barbarians.

"St. Louis ... built the Ste. Chapelle of Paris, ... the most precious piece of Gothic in Northern Europe."—Ruskin: Fors Clavigera, Vol. 1.

Gout or Gowk. In the Teutonic the word ganeh means fool; whence the Anglo-Saxon gauk, a cuckoo, and the Scotch yoke or yawk.

Hunting the gauk [fool], is making one an April fool. (See APRIL.)

A gowk storm is a term applied to a storm consisting of several days of tempestuous weather, believed by the peasantry to take place periodically about the beginning of April, at the time that the gowk or cuckoo visits this country.

"That being done, he hoped that this was but a gowk-storm."—Sir G. Mackenzie: Memoirs, p. 72.

Gourd. Used in the Middle Ages for corks (Orlando Furioso, x. 106); used also for a cup or bottle. (French, gouarde; Latin, cucurbita.)

Jonah's gourd [kikiren], the Palma Christi, called in Egypt kiki. Niebuhr speaks of a specimen which he himself saw near a rivulet, which in October "roost eight feet in five months' time." And Volney says, "Wherever plants have water the rapidity of their growth is prodigious. In Cairo," he adds, "there is a species of gourd which in twenty-four hours will send out shoots four inches long."—Travel, vol. i. p. 71.)

Gourds. Dice with a secret cavity. Those loaded with lead were called Fullahns (q.r.).

"Gourds and Fullahns holds, And high and low beguile the rich and poor."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, 1.3.

Gourmand and Gourmet (French). The gourmand is one whose chief pleasure is eating; but a gourmet is a connoisseur of food and wines. In England the difference is this: a gourmand regards quantity more than quality, a gourmet quality more than quantity. (Welsh, gwr, excess; gwrn, fulness; gourn, too much; gornant; etc. (See APICUS.)

"In former times [in France] gourmand meant a judge of eating, and gourmet a judge of wine; gourmet is now universally understood to refer to eating, and not to drinking."—Manson: French and English, part v. chap. iv. p. 340.

Gourmand's Prayer (The). "O Philoxenos, Philoxenos, why were you not Prometheus?" Prometheus was the mythological creator of man, and Philoxenos was a great epicure, whose great and constant wish was to have the neck of a crane, that he might enjoy the taste of his food longer before it was swallowed into his stomach. (As iotesc: Ethics, iii. 10.)

Gourre (1 syl.). A debauched woman. The citizens of Paris bestowed the name on Isabella of Bavaria.

"We have here ... a man ... who in his second wife espoused La Grande Gourre"—R分期: Pantagruel, iii. 21.

Gout, from the French goutte, a drop, because it was once thought to proceed from a "drop of acid matter in the joints."

Goutte de Sang. The Adonis flower or pheasant's eye, said to be stained by the blood of Adonis, who was gored by a boar.

"O fuie, si chere & Cytherée eO vase, si chere, et, en amasement, Du man d'Adonis colorée."

Gowen. St. Gowen's Bell. (See INCHCAPE.)

Government Men. Convicts.

"He had always been a hard-working man... good at most things... and, like a lot more of the government men, as the convicts were called, had saved some money."—Boldrewood. Robbery under Arms, chap. 1.

Gowan. A daisy; a perennial plant or flower. The ewe-gowan is the common daisy, apparently denominated from the ewe, as being frequently in pastures fed on by sheep.

"Some hit waifs' love story, enough to mak
The plinks an' the ewe-gowan blush to the very livi."—Brownie of Boddelick, l. 218.

Gower, called by Chaucer "The moral Gower."

"O moral Gower, this book I direct
To thee, and to the philosophic stree,
To vauchant there need is to correct
Of your benignties and zeales good."—Chaucer.

Gowk. (See GOUK.)

Gowk-thipple (Maister). A pulpit-drumming "chosen vessel" in Scott's Waverley.

Gowlee (Indian). A "cow-herd." One of the Hindu castes is so called.

Gown. Gown and town two. A scrimmage between the students of different colleges, on one side, and the townsmen, on the other. These feuds go back to the reign of King John, when 3,000 students left Oxford for Reading, owing to a quarrel with the men of the town. What little now remains of this ancient tenure is confined, as far as the town is concerned, to the bargees and their "tails."

Gownman. A student at one of the universities; so called because he wears an academical gown.

Grail. (See GRAIL.)

Grab. To clutch or seize. I grabbed it; he grabbed him, i.e. the bullfinch caught him. (Swedish, grabba, to grasp; Danish, griber; our grip, gripe, grope, grapple.)

A land grabber. A very common expression in Ireland during the last two decades of the nineteenth century, to signify one who takes the farm or land of an evicted tenant.

Grace. The sister Graces. The Romans said there were three sister Graces, bosom friends of the Muses. They are represented as embracing each other, to show that where one is the other is welcome. Their names are Aglaea, Thalia, and Euphrosyne.

Grace's Card or Grace-card. The six of hearts is so called in Kilkenny. At the Revolution in 1688, one of the family of Grace, of Courtstown, in Ireland, equipped at his own expense a regiment of foot and troop of horse, in the service of King James. William of Orange promised him high honours if he would join the new party, but the indignant baron wrote on a card, "Tell your master I despise his offer." The card was the six of hearts, and hence the name.

* It was a common practice till quite modern times to utilise playing-cards for directions, orders, and addresses.

Grace Cup or Loving Cup. The larger tankard passed round the table after grace. It is still seen at the Lord Mayor's feasts, at college, and occasionally in private banquets.

* The proper way of drinking the cup observed at the Lord Mayor's banquet or City companies is to have a silver bowl with two handles and a napkin. Two persons stand up, one to drink and the other to defend the drinker. Having taken his draught, he wipes the cup with the napkin and passes it to his "defender" when the next person rises to defend the new drinker. And so on to the end.

Grace Darling, daughter of William Darling, lighthouse-keeper on Longstone, one of the Farne Islands. On the morning of the 7th September, 1838, Grace and her father saved nine of the crew of the Forfuirshire steamer, wrecked among the Farne Isles, opposite Bamborough Castle (1815-1842). Wordsworth has a poem on the subject.

The Grace Darling of America. Ida Lewis (afterwards Mrs. W. H. Wilson, of Black Rock, Connecticut). Her father kept the Limerock lighthouse in Newport harbour. At the age of eighteen she saved four young men whose boat had upset in the harbour. A little later she saved the life of a drunken sailor whose boat had sunk. In 1867 she rescued three men; and in 1868 a small boy who had clung to the mast of a sailboat from midnight till morning. In 1869 she and her brother Hosea rescued two sailors whose boat had capsized in a squall. Soon after this she married, and her career at the lighthouse ended. (Born 1841.)
Grace Days or Days of Grace. The three days over and above the time stated in a commercial bill. Thus, if a bill is drawn on the 20th June, and is payable in one month, it ought to be due on the 20th of July, but three days of grace are to be added, bringing the date to the 23rd of July.

Gracechurch (London) is Gracechurch, or Grass-church, the church built on the site of the old grass-market. Grass at one time included all sorts of herbs.

Graceless Florin. The first issue of the English florins, so called because the letters D.G. (“by God’s grace”) were omitted for want of room. It happened that Richard Llor Shell, the master of the Mint, was a Catholic, and a scandal was raised that the omission was made on religious grounds. The florins were called in and re-cast. (See Godless Florin.)

Mr. Shell was appointed by the Whig ministry Master of the Mint in 1846; he issued the florin in 1849; it issued in 1850, and died at Florence in 1851, aged nearly 57.

Gracio'sa. A princess beloved by Perchot, who thwarted the malicious schemes of Grognon, her stepmother. (A fairy tale.)

Gracio'so. The interlocutor in the Spanish drame romantique. He thrusts himself forward on all occasions, ever and anon directing his gibes to the audience.

Gradasasso. A bully; so called from Gradasso, King of Sericans, called by Ariosto “the bravest of the Pagan knights.” He went against Charlemagne with 100,000 vassals in his train, all “discrowned kings,” who never addressed him but on their knees. (Orlando Furioso and Orlando Innamorato.)

Gradely. A north of England term meaning thoroughly; regularly; as behave yourself gradely. Gradually fine day.

Sammy ‘ll settle him gradely. Mr. H. Burnet: That Lass o’ Lawrie’s, chap it.

Grad grind (Thomas). A man who measures everything with rule and compass, allows nothing for the weakness of human nature, and deals with men and women as a mathematician with his figures. He shows that sumnum jus is suprema injuria. (Dickens: Hard Times.)

"The gradgrinds undervalue and disparage it."—Church Review.

Grames (The). A class of free-booters, who inhabited the debatable land, and were transported to Ireland at the beginning of the seventeenth century.

Graham. A charlatan who gave indecent and blasphemous addresses in the “Great Apollo Room.” Adelphi. He sometimes made meconism a medium of pandering to the prurient taste of his audience.

Graham's Dyke. The Roman wall between the friths of the Clyde and Forth, so called from the first person who leaped over it after the Romans left Britain.

"This wall defended the Britons for a time, but the Scots and Picts assembled themselves in great numbers, and climbed over it... A man named Graham is said to have been the first soldier who got over, and the common people still call the remains of the wall 'Graham's Dyke.'—Sir Walter Scott: Tales of a Grandfather.

Grail (The Holy). In French, Sau Grand. This must not be confused with the sau-gras or sang-real, for the two are totally distinct. The “Grail” is either the paten or dish which held the paschal lamb eaten by Christ and His apostles at the last supper, or the cup which He said contained the blood of the New Testament. Joseph of Arimathen, according to legend, preserved this cup, and received into it some of the blood of Jesus at the crucifixion. He brought it to England, but it disappeared. The quest of the Holy Grail is the fertile source of the adventures of the Knights of the Round Table. In some of the tales it is evidently the cup, in others it is the paten or dish (French, graal; the sacramental cup). Sir Galahad discovered it and died; but each of the 150 knights of King Arthur caught sight of it; but, unless pure of heart and holy in conduct, the grail, though seen, suddenly disappeared. (See GRAAL and GALAHAD.)

Grain. A knife in grain. A knife, though a rich man, or mundane. Grain means scarlet (Latin, granum, the coccus, or scarlet dye).

"A military vest of purple flowered
Letter than Moriscan (Thesalian), or the grain
Of Sarra [Try] worn by kings and heroes old
In time of trust."—Paradise Lost, v. 241-244.

Rogue in grain. A punning application of the above phrase to millers.
To go against the grain. Against one's inclination. The allusion is to wood, which cannot be easily planed the wrong way of the grain.
Gramercy

With a grain of salt. Latin, "Cum grano salis," with great reservation. The French phrase has another meaning—thus, "Il me mangerait avec un grain de sel" means, he could double up such a little whisper-snarper as easily as one could swallow a grain of salt. In the Latin phrase cum does not mean "with" or "together with," but it adverbialises the noun, as cum fide, faithfully, cum silento, silently, cum laetitia, joyfully, cum grano, minutely ("cum grano salis," in the minute manner that one takes salt).

Gramercy. Thank you much (the French grand merci). Thus Shakespeare, "Be it so, Titus, and gramercy too" (Titus Andronicus, i. 2). Again, "Gramercies, Tranio, well dost thou advise" (Taming of the Shrew, i. 1). When Gobbo says to Bassanio, "God bless your worship!" he replies, "Gramercy. Wouldst thou aught with me?" (Merchant of Venice, ii. 2.)

Grammar. Zenod'otos invented the terms singular, plural, and dual. The scholars of Alexandria and of the rival academy of Pergamum were the first to distinguish language into parts of speech, and to give technical terms to the various functions of words.

The first Greek grammar was by Dionysios Thrax, and it is still extant. He was a pupil of Aristarchos. Julius Caesar was the inventor of the term ablative case.

English grammar is the most philosophical ever devised; and if the first and third personal pronouns, the relative pronoun, the 3rd person singular of the present indicative of verbs, and the verb "to be" could be reformed, it would be as near perfection as possible.

It was Kaiser Sigismund who stumbled into a wrong gender, and when told of it replied, "Ego sum Imperator Romanorum, et supra grammaticam" (1520, 1548-1572).

Grammarians. Prince of Grammarians, Apollonios of Alexandria, called by Friscian (grammatico*rum* principis) (second century B.C.).

Grammont. The Count de Grammont’s short memory. When the Count left England he was followed by the brothers of La Belle Hamilton, who, with drawn swords, asked him if he had not forgotten something. "True, true," said the Count; "I promised to marry your sister," and instantly went back to repair the lapse by making the young lady Countess of Grammont.

Granary of Europe. So Sicily used to be called.

Granby. The Marquis of Granby. A public-house sign in honour of John Manners, Marquis of Granby, a popular English general (1721-1770).

_The Times_ says the old marquis owes his sign-board notoriety "partly to his personal bravery and partly to the baldness of his head. He still presides over eighteen public-houses in London alone."

Old Weller, in Pickwick, married the hostess of the "Marquis of Granby" at Dorking.

Grand (French).
- Le Grand Cornelle. Corneille, the French dramatist (1606-1684).
- La Grande Mademoiselle. The Duchesse de Montpensier, daughter of Gaston, Duc d’Orleans, and cousin of Louis XIV.
- Le Grand Monarque. Louis XIV., also called "The Baboon" (1638, 1645-1715).

Grandee. In Spain, a nobleman of the highest rank, who has the privilege of remaining covered in the king’s presence.

Grand Alliance. Signed May 12th, 1689, between England, Germany, and the States General, subsequently also by Spain and Savoy, to prevent the union of France and Spain.

Grand Lama. The object of worship in Thibet and Mongolia. The word lama in the Tangutnese dialect means "mother of souls." It is the representative of the Shigemooni, the highest god.

Grand E*passion* (The). Love.

"This is scarcely sufficient ... to supply the element ... indispensable to the existence of a grand passion."—Nineteenth Century (Peters, 1871, p. 20).

Grandson (Sir Charles). The union of a Christian and a gentleman. Richardson’s novel so called. Sir Walter Scott calls Sir Charles "the faultless monster that the world ne’er saw." Robert Nelson, reputed author of the Whole Duty of Man, was the prototype.

Grandison Cromwell Lafayette. Grandison Cromwell was the witty nickname given by Mirabeau to Lafayette, meaning thereby that he had all the ambition of a Cromwell in his heart, but wanted to appear before men as a Sir Charles Grandison.

Grandmother. My grandmother's review, the British Review. Lord Byron said, in a sort of jest, "I bribed my grandmother's review." The editor of the British called him to account, and this gave the poet a fine opportunity of pointing the battery of his satire against the periodical. (Don Juan.)

Grane (1 syl.). To strangle, throttle ( Anglo-Saxon, gryn).

Grange. Properly the granum (granary) or farm of a monastery, where the corn was kept in store. In Lincolnshire and other northern counties any large farm is so called.

Mariana, of the Moated Grange, is the title of a poem by Tennyson, suggested by the character of Mariana in Shakespeare's Measure for Measure.

Houses attached to monasteries where rent was paid in grain were also called granges.

"Till that return, the Court I will exchange
For some poor cottage, or some country grange."

Drayton: Lady Gertrude to Earl of Surrey.

Grangerise. Having obtained a copy of the poet's works, he proceeded at once to Grangerise them. Grangerisation is the addition of all sorts of things directly and indirectly bearing on the book in question, illustrating it, connected with it or its author, or even the author's family and correspondents. It includes autograph letters, caricatures, prints, broadsides, biographical sketches, anecdotes, press notices, parallel passages, and any other sort of matter which can be got together as an olla podrida for the matter in hand. The word is from the Rev. J. Granger (1710-1776). Pronounce Granger-ise. (See BOWDLERISE.) There are also Grangerist, Grangerism, Grangerisation, etc.

Grangouler (4 syl.). King of Utopia, who married in "the vine" of his old age, Gargamelie, daug. of the king of the Parpaulins, and became the father of Gargantua, the giant. He is described as a man in his dotage, whose delight was to draw scratches on the hearth with a burnt stick while watching the broiling of his chestnuts. When told of the invasion of Picrochol, King of Lerné, he exclaimed, "Alas! alas! do I dream? Can it be true?" and began calling on all the saints of the calendar. He then sent to expostulate with Picrochote, and, seeing this would not do, tried what bribes by way of reparation would effect. In the meantime he sent to Paris for his son, who soon came to his rescue, utterly defeated Picrochote, and put his army to full rout. Some say he is meant for Louis XII., but this is most improbable, not only because there is very little resemblance between the two, but because he was king of Utopia, some considerable distance from Paris. Motteux thinks the academy figure of this old Pram was John d'Albrecht, King of Navarre. He certainly was no true Catholic, for he says in chap. xlv. they called him a heretic for declaiming against the saints. (Rabelais: Gargantua, i. 3.)

Grani (2 syl.). Siegfried's horse, whose swiftness exceeded that of the winds. (See HORSE.)

Granite City (The). Aberdeen.

Granite Redoubt (The). The grenadiers of the Constalar Guard were so called at the battle of Marengo in 1809, because when the French had given way they formed into a square, stood like flints against the Austrians, and stopped all further advance.

Granite State (The). New Hampshire is so called, because the mountain parts are chiefly granite.

Grantorto. A giant who withheld the heretofarce of Irenna (Ireland). He is: vant for the genius of the Irish rebellion of 1580, slain by Sir Artégal. (Spenser: Fairey Queene, v.) (See GIANTS.)

Grapes. The grapes are sour. You dispurchase it because it is beyond your reach. The allusion is to the well-known fable of the fox, which tried in vain to get at some grapes, but when he found they were beyond his reach went away saying, "I see they are sour."

_Wild grapes._ What has been translated "wild grapes" (Isaias v. 2-4) the Arabs call "wolf-grapes." It is the fruit of the deadly nightshade, which is black and shining. This plant is very common in the vineyards of Palestine.

Grass. Gone to grass. Dead. The allusion is to the grass which grows over the dead. Also, "Gone to rusticate," the allusion being to a horse which it sent to grass when unfit for work.

_Not to let the grass grow under one's feet._ To be very active and energetic.

Captain Cuttle held on at a great pace, and allowed no grass to grow under his feet. —Dickens: Dombey and Son.
Grass Widow

To give grass: "To confess yourself vanquished.
To be knocked down in a pugilistic encounter is to "go to grass;" to have the sack is also to go to grass, as a cow which is no longer fit for milking is sent to pasture.

A grass-hand is a composer who fills a temporary vacancy.

Grass Widow was anciently an unmarried woman who has had a child, but now the word is used for a wife temporarily parted from her husband. The word means a grass widow, a widow by courtesy. (In French, grève de grâce; in Latin, vidua de gratia; a woman divorced or separated from her husband by a dispensation of the Pope, and not by death; hence, a woman temporarily separated from her husband.)

"Grave-widow" (grass-widow) is a term for one who becomes a widow by grace or favour, not by necessity, as by death. The term originated in the earlier ages of European civilization, when divorces were granted (only) by authority of the Catholic Church.—Indianapolis News (1870).

7. The subjoined explanation of the term may be added in a book of "Phrase and Fable."

During the gold mania in California a man would not unfrequently put his wife and children to board with some family while he went to the "diggin's." This he called "putting his wife to grass," as we put a horse to grass when not wanted or unfit for work.

Grasshopper, as the sign of a grocer, is the crest of Sir Thomas Gresham, the merchant grocer. The Royal Gresham Exchange used to be profusely decorated with grasshoppers, and the brass on the eastern part of the present edifice is the one which escaped the fires of 1666 and 1838.

There is a tale that Sir Thomas was a foundling, and that a woman, attracted by the chirping of a grasshopper, discovered the outcast and brought him up. Except as a tale, this solution of the combination is worthless. Grææ = grass (Anglo-Saxon, gres), and no doubt grasshopper is an heraldic rebus on the name. Pans and rebuses were at one time common enough in heraldry, and often very far-fetched.

Grasshopper (The). A compound of seven animals. (Anglo-Saxon, gres-hoppa.)

"It has the head of a horse, the neck of an ox, the wings of a dragon, the feet of a camel, the tail of a serpent, the horns of a stag, and the body of a scorpion."—Cotgrave: Oriental Tales (The Four Tetrads).

Grassmarket. At one time the place of execution in Edinburgh.

"I like name o' your sermons that end in a psalm at the Grassmarket."—Sir Walter Scott: Old Mortality, chap. xiv.

Grassum or Gersemi. A fine in money paid by a lessee either on taking possession of his lease or on renewing it. (Anglo-Saxon, græsum, a treasure.)

Gratiano. Brother of the Venetian senator, Brabantio. (Shakespeare: Othello.)

Also a character in The Merchant of Venice, who "talks an infinite deal of nothing, more than any man in all Venice." He is one of Bassanio's friends, and when the latter marries Portia, Gratiano marries Nerissa, Portia's maid.

Grave. To carry away the meal from the grave. The Greeks and Persians used to make feasts at certain seasons (when the dead were supposed to return to their graves), and leave the fragments of their banquets on the tombs (Eleemosyne apoteli pro t刷卡s).

With one foot in the grave. At the very verge of death. The expression was used by Julian, who said he would "learn something even if he had one foot in the grave." The parallel Greek phrase is, "With one foot in the ferry-boat," meaning Charon's.

Grave. Solemn, sedate, and serious in look and manner. This is the Latin gravis, grave; but "grave," a place of interment, is the Anglo-Saxon greof, a pit; verb, graafan, to dig.

More grave than wise. "Tertius e caelo credidit Cato."

Grave-diggers (Hamlet). "If the water come to the man . . ." The legal case referred to by Shakespeare occurred in the fifth year of Queen Elizabeth's reign, called Hales v. Petit, stated at length in Notes and Queries, vol. viii. p. 123 (first series).

Grave Maurice. A public-house sign. The head of the [Graf Moritz], Prince of Orange, and Captain-General of the United Provinces (1607-1626); (Hotten: Book of Signs).

Grave Searchers. Monkir and Nakir, so called by the Mahometans. (Ockley, vol. ii.) (See Monkir.)

Grave as a Judge. Sedate and serious in look and manner.

Grave as an Owl. Having an aspect of solemnity and wisdom.
Gravelled. I'm regularly gravelled. Non-plussed, like a ship run aground and unable to move.

"When you were gravelled for lack of matter."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, v. 1.

Gray. The authors of Audubon Gray were lady Anne Lindsay, afterwards Lady Barnard (1750-1823).

Gray Cloak. An alderman above the chair; so called because his proper costume is a cloak furred with gray anise. (Hutton: New View of London, intro.)

Gray Man's Path. A singular fissure in the greanstone precipice near Ballycastle, in Ireland.

Gray's Inn (London) was the inn or mansion of the Lords Gray.

Grayham's. (See Graham's Dyke.)

Greystone. The sword of Kol, fatal to the owner. It passed to several hands, but always brought ill-luck. (Irishman's Edda.) (See Fatal Gifts; Swords.)

Greast (Sun). Properly divided, it is sang-real, the real blood of Christ, or the wine used in the last supper, which Christ said was "His blood of the New Testament, shed for the remission of sin." According to tradition, a part of this wine-blood was preserved by Joseph of Arimathea, in the cup called the Saint Graal. When Merlin made the Round Table, he left a place for the Holy Graal. (Latin, Sun[us] Idol[is].) (See Graal.)

Grease One's Fist or Palm (Th.).

To give a biree.

"Grease my fist with a toester or two, and we shall find it in your pennyworth."—Quaintes: The Person Writ, p. 94.

"T'you must do at first.
C I understand you.
Grease him the fist."

Greasy Sunday. Domineum carnevale. —i.e. Quinquagesima Sunday. (See Du Cange, vol. iii. p. 190, col. 2.)

Burns, a sauger, son of a ploughman. UBBIXON, a cowherd. CURVATES, a common soldier. Clare, a ploughman, son of a farm labourer. CLAUDE LORRAINE, a painter. COLEMBUR, son of a weaver. COOK (Captain), son of a husbandman. CROMWELL, son of a brewer. CUSHING (Allen), a stonemason, son of a peasant. Davenport, a weaver, son of a butcher. DERMOTHEUS, son of a cutler. DICKENS, a newspaper reporter; father of the same. EDSON (Lord), a coal-dealer. FAIRBAY (Michael), a bookbinder. FORDSBO (James), the astronomer, son of a day-labourer. FRANKLIN, a journeyman printer, son of a tailor-clandleur. HARGREAVES, the machinist, a poor weaver. HOGG, a shepherd, son of a Scotch peasant. HOMER, a farmer's son (said to have begg*S bread. HUACK, son of a manumitted slave. HOWARD (John), a grocer's apprentice, son of a tradesman. KEAN (Edward), son of a stage-carpetm in a minor theatre. JENKIN (Ben), a bricklayer. LATIMER, Bishop of Worcester, son of a small farmer. LUCAS, a sculptor, son of a poor tradesman. MONE (General), a volunteer. OPIK (John), son of a poor carpenter in Cornwall. PAINE (Thomas), a stay-maker, son of a Quaker. PEECH (Richard), son of a parish clerk in Norfolk. RICHARDSON, a bookseller and printer, son of a journer. SHAKESPEARE, son of a wool-stapler. STEPHENSON (George), son of a fireman at a colliery. VIRGIL, son of a porter. WATT (James), improver of the steam engine, son of a blacksmith. WASHINGTON, a farmer. WOLSKY, son of a butcher. etc. And hundreds more.

Great Men (Wives of). (See under Wives.)

Great Mogul. The title of the chief of the Mogul Empire, which came to an end in 1806.

Great Mother. The earth. When Junius Brutus and the sons of Tarquin asked the Delphic Oracle who was to succeed Superbus on the throne of Rome, they received for answer, "He who shall first kiss his mother." While the two princes hastened home to fulfil what they thought was meant, Brutus fell to the earth, and exclaimed, "Thus dies I thee, O earth, the great mother of us all."

Great Perhaps (The). So Rabelais (1485-1553) described a future state.

Great Scott or Scott! A mitigated form of oath. The initial letter of the German Gott is changed into Sc.

"Great Scott!... Bog pardon..." ejaculated Silas Leotard.—A. C. Hawes: Baron Scudamore, book iv, chap. xix.

Great Sea (The). So the Mediterranean Sea was called by the ancient Greeks and Romans.

Great Unknown (The). Sir Walter Scott, who published the Waverley Novels anonymously. (1771-1832.)

Great Unwashed (The). The artisan class. Burke first used the compound, but Sir Walter Scott popularised it.

Great Wits Jump. Think alike; tally. Thus Shakespeare says, "It jumps with my humour." (1 Henry IV., iv. 2.)

Great Wits to Madness nearly are Allied. (Popr.) Seneca says, "Nulla magnum ingeniun absque mixtura demumae est."

Greatest. The greatest happiness of the greatest number. Jeremy Bentham's political axiom. (Liberty of the People.) (1821.)

Greatest Heart (Mr.). The guide of Christians and her family to the Celestial City. ( Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, ii.)

Graeves (Sir Lanercost). A sort of Don Quixote, who, in the reign of George II., wandered over England to redress wrongs, discourage moral evils not recognisable by law, degrade immodesty, punish ingratitude, and reform society. His Sancho Panza was an old sea captain. (Smollet: Adventures of Sir Lanercost Graeves.)

Grobenski Cossacks. So called from the word groben (a comb). This title was conferred upon them by Czar Ivan I., because, in his campaign against the Tartars of the Caucasus, they scalped a mountain fortified with sharp spurs, sloping down from its summit, and projecting horizontally; like a comb. (Daneau: Russia.)

Grocian Bend (The). An affectation in walking assumed by English ladies in 1875. The silliness spread to America and other countries which affect passing oddities of fashion.

Grocian Coffee-house, in Devereux Court, the oldest in London, was originally opened by Pasqua, a Greek slave, brought to England in 1652 by Daniel Greekian

Edwards, a Turkey merchant. This Greek was the first to teach the method of roasting coffee, to introduce the drink into the island, and to call himself a "coffee-man."

Greekian Stairs. A corruption of gresing stairs. Greasings (steps) still survives in the architectural word grec, and in the compound word de-grec. There is still on the hill at Lincoln a flight of stone steps called "Greekian stairs."

"Paul stood on the grecian [i.e. stairs]."

Greedy (Justice). In A New Way to Pay Old Debts, by Massinger.

Greegres. Charms. (African superstition.)

A gree-gree man. One who sells charms.

Greek (The). Manuel Alvarez (el Griego), the Spanish sculptor (1727-1797).

All Greek to me. Quite unintelligible; an unknown tongue or language. Casca says, "For mine own part, it was all Greek to me." (Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, i. 2.) "C'est du grec pour moi."

Last of the Greeks. Philip of Megapoli's, whose great object was to infuse into the Acheans a military spirit, and establish their independence (n.c. 292-183).

To play the Greek (Latin, grecari). To indulge in one's cup. The Greeks have always been considered a luxurious race, fond of creature-comforts. Thus Ciceron, in his oration against "Verres," says: "Discantabatur; juxta sermon inter con et invitatia, ut Graeco mora bibereetur: hos perspexerat, posuerat majestas potestas; celebraverunt omnium servum ne letitiam curировать." The law in Greek banquet was E puth e apthi (Quaff, or be off!). (Cut in, or cut off!). In Troilus and Cressida Shakespeare makes Pan darsus, panthan Helen for her love to Troilus, say, "I think Helen loves him better than Paris;" to which Cressida, whose wit is to parry and pervert, replies, "Then she's a merry Greek indeed," inasmuch that she was a "woman of pleasure." (Troilus and Cressida, i. 2.)

Un Gree (French). A cheat. Towards the close of the reign of Louis XIV., a knight of Greek origin, named Apollo, was caught in the very act of cheating at play, even in the palace of the grand monarque. He was sent to the galleys, and the nation which gave him birth became from that time a byword-for swindler and blackleg.

Un potage à la Grecque. Insipid soup; Spartan broth.

When Greek joins Greek, then is the tug of war. When two men or armies of undoubted courage fight, the contest will be very severe. The line is from a verse in the drama of Alexander the Great, slightly altered, and the reference is to the obstinate resistance of the Greek cities to Philip and Alexander, the Macedonian kings.

When Greeks joined Greeks, then was the tug of war. Nathaniel Lee.

In French the word "Grec" sometimes means widow, as—

II eut Grec en cela. He has great talent that way.

II n'est pas grand Grec. He is no great conjurer.

Greek Calends. Never. To defer anything to the Greek Calends is to defer it sine die. There were no calends in the Greek months. The Romans used to pay rents, taxes, bills, etc., on the calends, and to defer paying them to the "Greek Calends," was virtually to repudiate them. (See NEVER.)

"Will you speak of your merry pranks done in my presence, whose great historical poems, in twenty books, with notes in proportion, has been postposed ad Grecas Calendar?"—Sir W. Scott: The Betrayer (Introduction).

Greek Church includes the church within the Ottoman Empire subject to the patriarch of Constantinople, the church in the kingdom of Greece, and the Russo-Greek Church. The Roman and Greek Churches formally separated in 1054. The Greek Church dissents from the doctrine that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son (Filioque), rejects the Papal claim to supremacy, and administers the eucharist in both kinds to the laity; but the two churches agree in their belief of seven sacraments, transubstantiation, the adoration of the Host, confession, absolution, penance, prayers for the dead, etc.

Greek Commentator. Fernand Nune de Guzman, the great promoter of Greek literature in Spain. (1470-1553.)

Greek Cross. Same shape as St. George's cross (+). The Latin cross has the upright one-third longer than the cross-beam (+).

St. George's Cross is seen on our banners, where the crosses of St. Andrew and St. Patrick are combined with it. (See UNION JACK.)
Green Fire. A composition of nitre, sulphur, and naphtha. Tow steeped in the mixture was hurled in a blazing state through tubes, or tied to arrows. The invention is ascribed to Callini’cos, or Heliopolis, A.D. 668.

A very similar projectile was used by the Federals in the great American contest, especially at the siege of Charleston.

Green Gift (A). A treacherous gift. The reference is to the Wooden Horse said to be a gift or offering to the gods for a safe return from Troy, but in reality a ruse for the destruction of the city. (See Fatal Gifts.)

"Timus Damoc et dona ferentes," Virgil: Aenid, ii. 42.

Greek Life. A sound mind in a sound body. "Vincere anima in corpore sano."

"This healthy life, which was the Greek life, came from keeping the body in good time."—Vestry Telegraph.

Greek Trust. No trust at all. "Greek fides" was with the Romans no faith at all. A Greek, in English slang, means a cheat or sharper, and Greek bonds are sadly in character with Greek fides.

Greeks in the New Testament mean Hellenists, or naturalised Jews in foreign countries; those not naturalised were called Aramean Jews in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Palestine.

"I will praise God that our family has ever remained Aramean; not one among us has ever wandered to the Hellenists."—Elzad the Pilgrim, chap. ii.

Green. Young, fresh, as green cheese, i.e. cream cheese, which is eaten fresh; green goose, a young or midsummer goose.

"If you would fat green geese, shut them up when they are about a month old."—Nortimer: Husbandry.

Immature in age or judgment, inexperienced, young.

"The text is old, the orator too green."—Shakespeare: Venus and Adonis, 330.

Simple, raw, easily imposed upon; a greenhorn (q.v.).

"Here so jolly green," said Charley."—Dickens: Oliver Twist, chap. 13.

Green. The imperial green of France was the old Marovin’gian colour restored, and the golden bees are the ornaments found on the tomb of Childeric, the father of Clovis, in 653. The imperial colour of the Astecs was green; the national banner of Ireland is green; the field of many American flags is green, as their Union Jack, and the flags of the admiral, vice-admiral, rear-admiral, and commodore; and that of the Chinese militia is green.

Green is held unlucky to particular clans and counties of Scotland. The Caithness men look on it as fatal, because their hands were clad in green at the battle of Flodden. It is disliked by all who bear the name of Ogilvy, and is especially unlucky to the Graham clan. One day, an aged man of that name was thrown from his horse in a fox chase, and he accounted for the accident from his having a green lash to his riding whip. (See Kendal Green.)

"For its symbolism, etc., see under Colours.

N.B. There are 106 different shades of green. (See Kendal Green.)

Green Bag. What’s in the green bag? What charge is about to be preferred against me? The allusion is to the "Green Bag Inquiry" (q.v.).

Green Bird (The)."—Green Bird told everything a person wished to know, and talked like an oracle. (Countess D’Aubigny: Fair Star and Prince Chery.)

Green Cloth. The Board of Green Cloth. A board connected with the royal household, having power to correct offenders within the verge of the palace and two hundred yards beyond the gates. A warrant from the board must be obtained before a servant of the palace can be arrested for debt. So called "because the committee sit with the steward of the household at a board covered with a green cloth in the counting-house, as recorders and witnesses to the truth." It existed in the reign of Henry I., and probably at a still earlier period.

Green Dogs. Any extinct race, like that of the Dodo. Brederode said to Count Louis: "I would the whole race of bishops and cardinals was extinct, like that of green dogs." (Motley: Dutch Republic, part ii. 5.)

Green Dragoons (The). The 13th Dragoons (whose regimental facings were green). Now called the 13th Hussars, and the regimental facings have been white since 1861.

Green Glasses. To look through green glasses. To feel jealous of one; to be envious of another’s success.

"If we had an average of theatrical talent, we had also our quantum of stage jealousies; for who looks through his green glasses more peevishly than an actor when his brother Thespian brings down the house with applause."—C. Thompson: Autobiography, p. 197.

Green Gown (4). A tousel in the new-mown hay. To “give one a green gown” sometimes means to go beyond the bounds of innocent playfulness.

Had any dared to give her [Narcissa] a green gown,
The fair had petrified him with a frown.
Pure as the snow was she, and cold as ice.”
Peter Pindar: Old Simon.

Green Hands (a nautical phrase). Inferior sailors, also called boys. A crew is divided into (1) Able seamen; (2) Ordinary seamen; and (3) Green hands or boys. The term “boys” has no reference to age, but merely skill and knowledge in seamanship. Here “green” means not ripe, not mature.

Green Horse (The). The 5th Dragoon Guards; so called because they are a horse regiment, and have green for their regimental facings. Now called “The Princess Charlotte of Wales’s Dragoon Guards.”

Tarleton’s green horse. That is, the horse of General Tarleton covered with green ribbons and housings, the electioneering colours of the member for Liverpool, which he represented in 1790, 1796, 1802, 1807. His Christian name was Bannual.

Green Howards (The). The 19th Foot, named from the Hon. Charles Howard, colonel from 1738 to 1748, Green was the colour of their regimental facings, now white, and the regiment is called “The Princess of Wales’s Own.”

Green Isle, or The Emerald Isle. Ireland; so called from the brilliant green hue of its grass.

Green Knight (The). A Pagan, who demanded Fexon in marriage; but, overcome by Orson, resigned his claim. (Valentine and Orson.)

Green Labour. The lowest-paid labour in the tailoring trade. Such garments are sold to African gold-diggers and agricultural labourers. Soap and shoddy do more for these garments than cotton or cloth. (See Greener.)

Green Linnets. The 39th Foot, so called from the colour of their facings. Now the Dorsetshire, and the facings are white.

Green Man. This public-house sign represents the gamekeeper, who used at one time to be dressed in green.

But the Green Man ’shall I pass by unmolested,
Which minc own James upon his sign-post green?
His sign, his image—for by once was seen
A squire’s attendant, clad in toser’s green.”
Crabbe: Borough.

Green Room (The). The common waiting-room in a theatre for the performers; so called because at one time the walls were coloured green to relieve the eyes affected by the glare of the stage lights.

Green Sea. The Persian Gulf; so called from a remarkable strip of water of a green colour along the Arabian coast.

Between 1690 and 1742 the 2nd Life Guards were facetiously called “The Green Sea” from their sea-green facings, in compliment to Queen Catherine, whose favourite colour it was. The facings of this regiment are now blue.

Green Thursday. Maundy Thursday, the great day of absolution in the Lutheran Church. (German, Grün-donnerstag; in Latin, dies viridium, Luke xxiii. 31.)

Green Tree. If they do these things in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry? (Luke xxiii. 31.) If the righteous can find no justice in man, what must not the unrighteous expect? If innocent men are condemned to death, what hope can the guilty have? If green wood burns so readily, dry wood would burn more freely still.

Green Wax. Esbreats delivered to a sheriff out of the Exchequer, under the seal of the court, which is impressed upon green wax, to be levied? (Henry IV. c. 3). (Wharton : Law Lexicon.)

Green as Grass. Applied to those easily gull’d, and quite unacquainted with the ways of the world. “Verdant Greens.”

Green Bag Inquiry. Certain papers of a seditious character packed in a green bag during the Regency. The contents were laid before Parliament, and the committee advised the suspension of the Habens Corpus Act (1817).

Green Baint Road. (Gentlemen of the). Whist players. “Gentlemen of the Green Cloth Road,” billiard players. (See Blest Houses, chap. xxvi. par. 1.) Probably the idea of sharpeners is included, as “Gentlemen of the Road” means highwaymen.

Green-Eyed Jealousy or Green-eyed Monster. Expressions used by Greenlander. A native of Greenland. facetiously applied to a greenhorn, that is, one from the verdant country called the land of green ones.

Greenlandman's Galley. The lowest type of profanity and vulgarity.

"In my seafaring days the Greenland sailors were notorious for daring and their disrespect of speech, prefixing or ending every sentence with an oath, or some indecent expression. Even in those days (the first quarter of the nineteenth century) a 'Greenlandman's galley' was proverbially the lowest in the scale of vulgarity."—C. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 118.

Too low for even a Greenlandman's galley. One whose ideas of decency were degraded below even that of a Greenland crew.

Greenwich is the Saxon Grenwic (green village), formerly called (Greenwic, and in old Latin authors "Grenovium viridic.") Some think it is a compound of green-rive (the sun city).

Greenwich Barbers. Retailers of sand; so called because the inhabitants of Greenwich "shave the pits" in the neighbourhood to supply London with sand.

Gregarine (3 syl.). In 1867 the women of Europe and America, from the thrones to the maidservants, adopted the fashion of wearing a pad made of false hair behind their head, utterly destroying its natural proportions. The microscope showed that the hair employed for these "uglies" abounded in a pedunculous insect called a gregarine (or little herding animal), from the Latin greges (a herd). The nests on the filaments of hair resemble those of spiders and silkworms, and the "object" used to form one of the exhibits in microscopic shows.

Gregorian Calendar. One which shows the new and full moon, with the time of Easter and the movable feasts depending thereon. The reformed calendar of the Church of Rome introduced by Pope Gregory XIII. in 1582, corrected the error of the civil year, according to the Julian calendar.

Gregorian Chant. So called because it was introduced into the church service by Gregory the Great (600).

Gregorian Epoch. The epoch or day on which the Gregorian calendar commenced—March, 1582.

Gregorian Telescope. The first form of the reflecting telescope, invented.
by James Gregory, professor of mathematics in the university of St. Andrews. (1683.)

Gregorian Tree. The gallows; so named from three successive hangmen—Gregory, sen., Gregory, jun., and Gregory Brandon. Sir William Segar, Garter Knight of Arms, granted a cost of arms to Gregory Brandon. (See Hangmen.)

"This trembles under the black rod, and he who fear his fate from the Gregorian tree."—Mercurialis Prognosticon (1611).

Gregorian Water or Grororian Water. Holy water; so called because Gregory I. was a most strenuous recommender of it.

"In case they should happen to encounter with devils, by virtue of the Gregoriane water, they might make them disappear."—Rabelais: Gargantua, book i. 43.

Gregorian Year. The civil year, according to the correction introduced by Pope Gregory XIII, in 1582. The equinox which occurred on the 25th of March, in the time of Julius Caesar, fell on the 11th of March in the year 1582. This was because the Julian calculation of 365½ days to a year was 11 min. 10 sec. too much. Gregory suppressed ten days, so as to make the equinox fall on the 21st of March, as it did at the Council of Nice, and, by some simple arrangements, prevented the recurrence in future of a similar error.

Gregories (3 syl.). Hangmen. (See Gregorian Tree.)

Gregory (4). A school-feast, so called from being held on St. Gregory's Day (March 12th). On this day the pupils at one time brought the master all sorts of eatables, and of course it was a due non, and the master shut his eyes to all sorts of licences. Gregories were not limited to any one country, but were common to all Europe.

Gregory (St.). The last Pope who has been canonised. Usually represented with the tiara, pastoral staff, his book of homilies, and a dove. The last is his peculiar attribute.

Gregory Knights or St. Gregory's Knights. Harmless blusterers. In Hungary the pupils at their Gregories played at soldiers, marched through the town with flying colours, some on pony back and some on foot; as they went they clattered their toy swords, but of course hurt no one.

Grenade (2 syl.). An explosive shell, weighing from two to six pounds, to be thrown by the hand.

Grenadier (3 syl.). Originally a soldier employed to throw hand-grenades.

Grenadier Guards. The first regiment of Foot Guards. Noted for their size and height.

Grendel. A superhuman monster slain by Beowulf, in the Anglo-Saxon romance of that title. (See Turner's abridgment.)

Gresham and the Grasshopper. (See Grasshopper.)

Gresham and the Pearl. When Queen Elizabeth visited the Exchange, Sir Thomas Gresham, it is said, pledged her health in a cup of wine containing a precious stone crushed to atoms, and worth £15,000. If this tale is true, it was an exceedingly foolish imitation of Cleopatra (q. v.).

"Here fifteen thousand pounds at one clap goes instead of water; Gresham drinks the pearl into his queen and mistress. Pledge it, lords."—Rippond: If You know Not Me I know Nobody.

To dine or sup with Sir Thomas Gresham. (See under Dine.)

Greta Hall. The poet of Greta Hall. Southey, who lived at Greta Hall, in the Vale of Keswick. (1774-1843.)

Gretchen. A pet German diminutive of Margaret.

Grethel (Gurner). The hypothetical narrator of the Nursery Tales edited by the brothers Grimm.

Gretina Green Marriages. Runaway matches. In Scotland, all that is required of contracting parties is a mutual declaration before witnesses of their willingness to marry, so that elopers reaching the parish of Gretna, or village of Springfield, could get legally married without either licence, banns, or priest. The declaration was generally made to a blacksmith.

Cruble has a metrical tale called Gertina Green, in which young Belwood elopes with Clara, the daughter of Dr. Sidinore, and gets married; but Belwood was a "screw," and Clara a silly, extravagant hussey, so they soon hated each other and parted. (Tales of the Hall, book xv.)

Grève (1 syl.). Place de Grève. The Tyburn of ancient Paris. The present Hôtel de Ville occupies part of the site. The word grève means the strand of a river or the shore of the sea, and is so called from gravel (gravel or sand). The Place de Grève was on the bank of the Seine.

"Who has ever been in Paris must needs know the Grève. The fatal retreat of the unfortunate brave. Where honour and justice most oddly contribute to ease Hero's pains by a harter or edder."—Prior: The Thirst and the Conquerer.

Grey Friars. Franciscan friars, so called from their grey habit. Black friars are Dominicans, and white friars Carmelites.

Grey Hen (A). A stone bottle for holding liquor. Large and small pewter pots mixed together are called "hen and chickens."

"A dirty leather wallet lay near the sleeper, ... also a grey hen which had contained some sort of strong liquor."—Miss Robinson: White-Francis, chap. viii.

Grey Mare. The Grey Mare is the better horse. The woman is paramount. It is said that a man wished to buy a horse, but his wife took a fancy to a grey mare, and so peremptorily insisted that the grey mare was the better horse, that the man was obliged to yield the point.

*Macaulay says: "I suspect the proverb originated in the preference generally given to the grey mares of Flanders over the finest coach-horses of England."

The French say, when the woman is paramount, "c'est le mariage d'opposée" ("Tis a hawk's marriage), because the female hawk is both larger and stronger than the male bird.

"As long as we have cats, or hands, or truth, We'll look or write, or talk you all to death."—Yule, or she becomes will gain her course. And the grey mare will prove the better horse.

Prior: A Dialogue to Mrs. Hankey's Lucius.

Grey Wethers. These are huge boulders, either embedded or not, very common in the "Valley of Stones" near Avebury, Wilts. When split or broken up they are called sarsens or sarscens.

Grey-coat Parson (A). An impropriator; a tenant who farms the tithes.

Grey from Grief. Ludovico Sforza became grey in a single night.

*Charles I. grew grey while he was on his trial.

Marie Antoinette grew grey from grief during her imprisonment. (See GRAY.)

Grey Goose Wing (The). "The grey goose wing was the death of him," the arrow which is winged with grey goose feathers.

Grey Mare's Tail. A cataract that is made by the stream which issues from Lochkene, in Scotland, so called from its appearance.

Grey Washer by the Ford (The). An Irish wraith which seems to be washing clothes in a river, but when the "doomed man" approaches she holds up what she seemed to be washing, and it is the phantom of himself with his death wounds from which he is about to suffer. (Hon. Emily Lawlett: Essex in Ireland, p. 245-6.)

Greybeard (A). An earthen pot for holding spirits; a large stone jar. Also an old man. (cf. Bellarmine.)

"We will give a cup of distilled waters unto the next pilgrim that comes over; and ye may keep for the purpose the grunds of the host greybeard."—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap. ix.

Greycoats. Russian soldiers of the line, who wear grey coats.

"You might think of him thus calm and collected charging his rifle for one more shot at the astonishing greycoats."—Bossu and Orcy: By Celia's Labour, chap. vii.

Greyhound. "A greyhound should be heded like a snake. And neked like a Drake: Foted like a Kat, Tayled like a Rat; Sydled like a Teme, Chyned like a Bone."—(Dame Berner.)

"Syded like a teme," probably means both sides alike; a plough-team being meant.

Greyhound. A public-house sign, in honour of Henry VII., whose badge it was.

Greys. The Scotch Greys. The 2nd (Royal North British) Dragoons, so called because they are mounted on grey horses.

Gridiron. Emblematic of St. Laurence, because in his martyrdom he was broiled to death on a gridiron. In allusion thereto the church of St. Laurence Jewry, near Guildhall, has a gilt gridiron for a vane. The gridiron is also an attribute of St. Faith, who was martyred like St. Laurence; and St. Vincent, who was partially roasted on a gridiron covered with spikes, A.D. 268. (See ESCULAR.)

It is said that St. Laurence uttered the following doggerel during his martyrdom:

"This side equably roasted, turn me, tyrant, etc., And see if raw or roasted I make the better meat."

Grief. To come to grief. To be runned; to fail in business. As lots of money is the fulness of joy, so the want of it is the grief of griefs. The Americans call the dollar "almighty."

Grievance-monger. One who is always taking up or talking about his own or his party's grievances, public or private.
Griffen Horse (The) belonged to Atlantes, the magician, but was made use of by Bogetro, Astolpho, and others. It flew through the air at the bidding of the rider, and landed him where he listed. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.)

Griffen. A cadet newly arrived in India, half English and half Indian.

Griffins, the residue of a contract feast, taken away by the contractor, half the buyer's and half the seller's.

Griffon, Griffen, or Griffen. Offspring of the lion and eagle. Its legs and all from the shoulder to the head are like an eagle, the rest of the body is that of a lion. This creature was sacred to the sun, and kept guard over hidden treasures. Sir Thomas Browne says the Griffen is emblematical of watchfulness, courage, perseverance, and rapidity of execution (Tulgar Errors, iii. 2). (See Armismplans.)

Grig. Merry as a grig. A grig is the sand-eel, and a cricket. There was also a class of vagabond dancers and tumblers who visited alm-houses so called. Hence Levi Solomon, alias Cockleput, who lived in Sweet Apple Court, being asked in his examination how he obtained his living, replied that "He went a-grigg"ing." Many think the expression should be merry as a Greek, and have Shakespeare to back them: "Then she's a merry Greek;" and again, "Cressid amongst the merry Greeks" (Troilus and Cressida, i. 2; iv. 4). Patrick Gordon also says, "No people in the world are so jovial and merry, so given to singing and dancing, as the Greeks."

Grim (Giant), in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, part ii. He was one who tried to stop pilgrims on their way to the Celestial City, but was slain by Mr. Greatheart. (See Giants.)

Grima'ce (2 syl.). Cotgrave says this word is from Grima'cier, who was a celebrated carver of fantastic heads in Gothic architecture. This may be so, but our word comes direct from the French grimace; grimacer, one who makes wry faces.

Grimalkin or Graymalkin (French, gris malink). Shakespeare makes the Witch in Macbeth say, "I come, Graymalkin," Malkin being the name of a foul fiend. The cat, supposed to be a witch and the companion of witches, is called by the same name.

Grimes (Peter). This son of a steady fisherman was a drunkard and a thief.

He had a boy whom he killed by ill-usage. Two others he made away with, but was not convicted for want of evidence. As no one would live with him, he dwelt alone, became mad, and was lodged in the parish poor-house, confessed his crime in his delirium, and died. (Crabb'e: Borough; letter xxii.)

Grimm's Law. A law discovered by Jacob L. Grimm, the German philologist, to show how the mute consonants interchange as corresponding words occur in different branches of the Aryan family of languages. Thus, what is $v$ in Greek, Latin, or Sanskrit becomes $f$ in Gothic, and $b$ or $f$ in the Old High German: what is $t$ in Greek, Latin, or Sanskrit becomes $th$ in Gothic, and $d$ in Old High German; etc. Thus changing $v$ into $f$, and $t$ into $th$, "pater" becomes "father."

Grimsby (Lincolnshire). Grim was a fisherman who rescued from a drifting boat an infant named Habloc, whom he adopted and brought up. This infant turned out to be the son of the king of Denmark, and when the boy was restored to his royal sire Grim was laden with gifts. He now returned to Lincolnshire and built the town which he called after his own name. The ancient seal of the town contains the names of Gryme and Habloc. This is the foundation of the medieval tales about Verlock the Dane.

Grim's Dyke or Devil's Dyke (Anglo-Saxon, grima, a goblin or demon).

Grimwig. A choleric old gentleman fond of contradiction, generally ending with the words "or I'll eat my head." He is the friend of Brownlow. (Dickens: Oliver Twist.)

Grin and Bear It (You must), or You must grin and bear it, for resistance is hopeless. You may make up a face, if you like, but you cannot help yourself.

Grind. To work up for an examination: to grind up the subjects set, and to grind into the memory the necessary cram. The allusion is to a mill, and the analogy evident.

To grind one down. To reduce the price asked; to lower wages. A knife, etc., is gradually reduced by grinding.

To take a grind is to take a constitutional walk: to cram into the smallest space the greatest amount of physical exercise. This is the physical grind. The literary grind is a turn at hard study.
To take a grinder is to insult another by applying the left thumb to the nose and revolving the right hand round it, as if working a hand-organ or coffee-mill. This insulting retort is given when someone has tried to practise on your credulity, or to impose on your good faith.

Grinders. The double teeth which grind the food put into the mouth. The Preacher speaks of old age as the time when "the grinders cease because they are few" (Ecc. xii. 3). (See Almond Tree.)

Grisaille. A style of painting in gray tints, resembling solid bodies in relief, such as ornaments of cornices, etc.

Grise. A step. (See Greek Stairs.)

Griselda or Griselda. The model of enduring patience and conjugal obedience. She was the daughter of Janicola, a poor charcoal-burner, but became the wife of Walter, Marquis of Saluzzo. The marquis put her humility and obedience to three severe trials, but she submitted to them all without a murmur: (1) Her infant daughter was taken from her, and secretly conveyed to the Queen of Paivio to bring up, while Griselda was made to believe that it had been murdered. (2) Four years later she had a son, who was also taken from her, and sent to be brought up with her sister. When the little girl was twelve years old, the marquis told Griselda he intended to divorce her and marry another; so she was stripped of all her fine clothes and sent back to her father's cottage. On the "wedding day" the much-abused Griselda was sent for to receive "her rival" and prepare her for the ceremony. When her lord saw in her no spark of jealousy, he told her the "bride" was her own daughter. The moral of the tale is: If Griselda submitted without a murmur to these trials of her husband, how much more ought we to submit without repining to the trials sent us by God.

This tale is the last of Boccaccio's Decamerone; it was rendered by Petrarch into a Latin romance entitled De Obediencia et Fide Urbana Mythologia, and forms The Clerks Tale in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. Miss Edgeworth has a novel entitled The Modern Griselda.

Grist. All grist that comes to my mill. All is appropriated that comes to me: all is made use of that comes in my way. Grist is all that quantity of corn which is to be ground or crushed at one time. The phrase means, all that is brought—good, bad, and indifferent corn, with all refuse and waste—is put into the mill and ground together. (See Emolument.)

To bring grist to the mill. To supply customers or furnish supplies.

Grizel or Grizella. Octavia, wife of Marc Antony and sister of Augustus Caesar, is called the "patient Grizel" of Roman story. (See Grisilda.)

"For patience she will prove a second Grizel." Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, ii. 1.

Groaning Cake. A cake prepared for those who called at the house of a woman in confinement "to see the baby."

Groaning Chair. The chair used by women after confinement when they received visitors.

Groaning Malt. A strong ale brewed for the gossips who attend at the birth of a child, and for those who come to offer to a husband congratulations at the auspicious event. A cheese, called the Ken-no, or "groaning cheese," was also made for the occasion. (See Ken-no.)

"Meg Merrilies descended to the kitchen to secure her share of the groaning malt."—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. iii.

Great. From John o' Groats's house to the Land's End. From Dau to Beresheba, from one end of Great Britain to the other. John o' Groats was a Dutchman, who settled in the most northerly point of Scotland in the reign of James IV, and immortalised himself by the way he settled a dispute respecting precedence. (See John O' Groats.)

Blood without groats is nothing (north of England), meaning "family without fortune is worthless." The allusion is to black-pudding, which consists chiefly of blood and groats formed into a sausage.

Not worth a great. Of no value. A great is a silver fourpence. The Dutch had a coin called a grote, a contraction of grote-schwarz (great schware), so called because it was equal in value to five little schware. So the coin of Edward III. was the grout or great silver penny, equal to four penny pieces. The modern grout was first issued in 1835, and were withdrawn from circulation in 1887. (French, gros; great.) Groats are no longer in circulation.

"He that spends a great a day idly, spends idly above six pounds a year."—Franklin: necessary Hints, p. 131.
Grog.  Rum and water, cold without.  Admiral Vernon was called Old Grog by his sailors because he was accustomed to walk the deck in rough weather in a grogram cloak.  As he was the first to serve water in the rum on board ship, the mixture went by the name of grog.  Six-water grog is one part rum to six parts of water.  Grog, in common parlance, is any mixture of spirits and water, either hot or cold.

Grog Blossoms.  Blothes on the face that are produced by over-indulgence of grog.

Gro'gram.  A coarse kind of taffety, stiffened with gum.  A corruption of the French gros-grain.

Groined Ceiling.  One in which the arches are divided or intersected.  (Swedish, grena, to divide.)

Grommet, Gromet, Grumet, or Grummet.  A younger on board ship.  In Smith's Sea Grammar we are told that "younkers are the young men whose duty it is to take in the topsails, or top the yard for furling the sails or slinging the yards, ..." "Seilers," he says, "are the elder men." Gromet is the Flemish grom (a boy), with the diminutive.  It appears in bride-groom, etc.  Also a ring of rope made by laying a single strand.  (Dana: Newman's Manual, p. 96.) Also a powder-wad.

Grosgar Hill, in South Wales, has been rendered famous by Dyer's poem called Grosgar Hill.

Groom of the Stole.  Keeper of the stole or state-robe.  His duty, originally, was to invest the king in his state-robe, but he had also to hand him his shirt when he dressed.  The office, when a queen regius, is termed Mistress of the Robes, but Queen Anne had her "Groom of the Stole." (Greek, stol, a garment.) (See BRIDEGROOM.)

Gross.  (See Advowson.)

Grosted or Robert Groestede, Bishop of Lincoln, in the reign of Henry III., the author of some two hundred works.  He was accused of dealings in the black arts, and the Pope ordered a letter to be written to the King of England, enjoining him to disinter the bones of the too-wise bishop and burn them to powder.  (Died 1253.)

"None a deeper knowledge boast, Since Hodge, Bacon, and Bob Grosted..." —Batter: Haudbras, II. 3.

Grottes'que (2 syl.) means in "Grotto style," Classical ornaments so called were found in the 13th century in grottoes, that is, excavations made in the baths of Titus and in other Roman buildings.  These ornaments abound in fanciful combinations, and hence anything outré is termed grotesque.

Grotta del Cane (Naples).  The Day's Cane, so called from the practice of sending dogs into it to show visitors how the carbonic acid gas near the floor of the cave kills them.

Grotto.  Pray remember the grotto.  July 25 new style, and August 5 old style, is the day dedicated to St. James the Greater; and the correct thing to do in days of yore was to stick a shell in your hat or coat, and pay a visit on that day to the shrine of St. James of Compostella.  Shell grottoes with an image of the saint were erected for the behoof of those who could not afford such pilgrimage, and the keeper of it reminded the passer-by to remember it was St. James's Day, and not to forget their offering to the saint.

Grotto of Ephesus (The).  The test of chastity.  E. Bulwer-Lytton, in his Tales of Moltus (iii.), tells us that near the statue of Diana is a grotto, and if, when a woman enters it, she is not chaste, discordant sounds are heard and the woman is never seen more; if, however, musical sounds are heard, the woman is a pure virgin and comes forth from the grotto unharmed.

Ground.  (Anglo-Saxon, grund.)

It would put me down to the ground.  Wholly and entirely.

To break ground.  To be the first to commence a project, etc.; to take the first step in an undertaking.

To gain ground.  To make progress; to be improving one's position or prospects of success.

To hold one's ground.  To maintain one's authority; not to budge from one's position; to retain one's popularity.

To lose ground.  To become less popular or less successful; to be drifting away from the object aimed at.

To stand one's ground.  Not to yield or give way; to stick to one's colours; to have the courage of one's opinion.

Ground Arms (Tz).  To pile or stack military arms, such as guns, on the ground (in drill).
Groundlings. Those who stood in the pit, which was the ground in ancient theatres.

"To split the ears of the groundlings."
Shakespeare: Hamlet, ii. 2.

Grove. The "grove" for which the Jewish women wove hangings, and which the Jews were commanded to cut down and burn, was the wooden Ashera, a sort of idol symbolising the generative power of Nature.

Growlers and Crawlers. The four-wheeled cabs; called "growlers" from the surly and discontented manners of their drivers, and "crawlers" from their slow pace.

"Taken as a whole, the average drivers of hansom cabs... are most intelligent men, sober, honest, and hardworking. They have little in common with the obtrusive, surly, booted drivers of the "growlers" and "crawlers."—Nineteenth Century, March, 1868, p. 473

Grub Street. Since 1830 called Milton Street, near Moorfields, London, once famous for literary hack and inferior literary productions. The word is the Gothic gruban (to dig), whence Saxon grub (a grave) and groop (a ditch). (See Jumeind, t. 38, etc.)

Gruel. To give him his gruel. To kill him. The allusion is to the very common practice in France, in the sixteenth century, of giving poisoned possets—an art brought to perfection by Catherine de Medicis and her Italian advisers.

Grumbo. A giant in the tale of Tom Thumb. A raven picked up Tom, thinking him to be a grain of corn, and dropped him on the flat roof of the giant's castle. Old Grumbo came to walk on the roof terrace, and Tom crept up his sleeve. The giant, annoyed, shook his sleeve, and Tom fell into the sea, where a fish swallowed him; and the fish, having been caught and brought to Arthur's table, was the means of introducing Tom to the British king, by whom he was knighted. (Nursery Tale: Tom Thumb.)

Grundy. What will Mrs. Grundy say? What will our rivals or neighbours say? The phrase is from Tom Morton's Speed the Plough. In the first scene Mrs. Asfield shows herself very jealous of neighbour Grundy, and farmer Asfield says to her, "Be quiet, wull ye? Always ding, dinging Dame Grundy into my ears. What will Mrs. Grundy say? What will Mrs. Grundy think? . . ."

Grunt. The sacred book of the Sikhs.

Gruyère. A town in Switzerland which gives its name to a kind of cheese made there.

Gryll. Let Gryll be Gryll, and keep his hogish mind. Don't attempt to wash a blackamoor white; the leopard will never change his spots. Gryll is from the Greek Gryll (the grunting of a hog). When Sir Guyon disenchanted the forms in the Bower of Bliss some were exceedingly angry, and one in particular, named Gryll, who had been metamorphosed by Acra'sia into a hog, abused him most roundly. "Come," says the palmer to Sir Guyon, "Let Gryll be Gryll, and have his hogish mind. But let us hence depart while weather serves, and wind."

Spenmor: Faerie Queen, book ii. 12.

Gryphon (in Orlando Furioso), son of Olivero and Sigismunda, brother of Aquilant, in love with Origilla, who plays him false. He was called White from his armour, and his brother Black. He overthrew the eight champions of Damascus in the tournament given to celebrate the king's wedding-day. While asleep Marta' no steals his armour, and goes to the King Norandi'no to receive the meed of high deeds. In the meantime Gryphon awakes, finds his armour gone, is obliged to put on Marta'no's, and, being mistaken for the coward, is hooted and hustled by the crowd. He lays about him stoutly, and kills many. The king comes up, finds out the mistake, and offers his hand, which Gryphon, like a true knight, receives. He joined the army of Charlemagne.

Gryphons. (See Griffon.)

Guadilla. The squire of Durandart. Mourning the fall of his master at Roncesvalles, he was turned into the river which bears the same name. (Don Quixote, ii. 23.)

Guaff. Victor Emmanuel was so called from his nose.

Guano is the Peruvian word hua'no (dung), and consists of the droppings of sea-fowls.

Guarantee. An engagement on the part of a third person to see an agreement fulfilled.

Guard. To be off one's guard. To be careless or heedless.

A guardroom is the place where military offenders are detained; and a guardship is a ship stationed in a port or harbour for its defence.

Guards of the Pole. The two stars β and γ in the Great Bear. Shakespeare, Guarinos (Admiral). One of Charlemagne's paladins, taken captive at the battle of Ronceveaux. He fell to the lot of Marloès, a Moslem, who offered him his daughter in marriage if he would become a disciple of Mahomet. Guarinos refused, and was cast into a dungeon, where he lay captive for seven years. A joust was then held, and Admiral Guarinos was allowed to try his hand at a target. He knelt before the Moor, stabbed him to the heart, and then vaulted on his grey horse Trevozondé, and escaped to France.

Gubbins. Anabaptists near Brent, in Devonshire. They had no ecclesiastical order or authority, "but lived in holes, like swine; had all things in common; and multiplied without marriage. Their language was vulgar Devonian... They lived by pilfering sheep; were fed as horses held together like bees; and revenged every wrong. One of the society was always elected chief, and called King of the Gubbins." (Fuller.)

N.B. Their name is from gubbings, the offal of fish (Devonshire).

Gudjons. Gaping for gudjons. Looking out for things extremely improbable. As a gudjon is a bait to deceive fish, it means a lie, a deception.

To swallow a gudjon. To be bumptozened with a most palatable lie, as silly fish are caught by gudjons. (French, gudjon, whence the phrase faire avaler le gudjon, to humbug.)

"Make fools believe in their nonsense.

Of things before they are in being.

To swallow gudjons etc. they are injured.

And count their chickens as they be hatched."—Bosler: Hudibras, ii.

Gudrun. A model of heroic fortitude and pious resignation. She was a princess betrothed to Herwig, but the King of Norway carried her off captive. As she would not marry him, he put her to all sorts of menial work, such as washing the dirty linen. One day her brother and lover appeared on the scene, and at the end she married Herwig, pardoned the "naughty" king, and all went merry as a marriage bell. (A North-Norwegian poem.)

Gudula (2 syl.) or St. Gudula, patron saint of Brussels, was daughter of Count Wilger, died 172. She is represented with a lantern, from a tradition that she was one day going to the church of St. Morghell with a lantern, which went out, but the holy virgin lighted it again with her prayers.

St. Gudula in Christian art is represented carrying a lantern which a demon tries to put out. The legend is a repetition of that of St. Geneviève, as Brussels is Paris in miniature.

Gu'obre's or Ghebers. [Fire-Worshippers]. Followers of the ancient Persian religion, reformed by Zoroaster. Called in Persian gahb, in the Talmud Cheber, and by Origen Kabir, a corruption of the Arabic Kifr (a non-Mahometan or infidel), a term bestowed upon them by their Arabian conquerors.

Guilder Rose is the Rose de Gue- drey, i.e. of the ancient province of Guelder or Guelderland, in Holland.

But Smith, in his English Playa, says it is a corruption of Elder Rose, that is, the Rose Elder, the tree being considered a species of Elder, and hence called the "Water Elder."

Guelphs (3 syl.), son of Actius IV., Marquis d'Este and of Cunigunda, a German, King of Carinthia. He led an army of 5,000 men from Germany, but two-thirds were slain by the Persians. He was noted for his broad shoulders and ample chest. Guelpho was Rinaldo's uncle, and next in command to Godfrey. (Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, iii.)

Guelphs and Gibellines. Two great parties whose conflicts make up the history of Italy and Germany in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries. Guelph is the Italian form of Welf, and Gibelline of Wahlungen, and the origin of these two words is this: At the battle of Weinsburg, in Sunbüll (1140), Conrad, Duke of Franconia, rallied his followers with the war-cry He Wahlungen (his family estate), while Henry the Lion, Duke of Saxony, used the cry of He Welfe (the family name). The Ghibellines supported in Italy the side of the German emperors; the Guelphs opposed it, and supported the cause of the Pope.

Guendolen (3 syl.). A fairy whose mother was a human being. One day King Arthur wandered into the valley of St. John, when a fairy palace rose to view, and a train of ladies conducted him to their queen. King Arthur and Guendolen fell in love with each other, and the fruit of their illicit love was a daughter named Gyneth. After the lapse of three months Arthur left Guen-dolen, and the deserted fair one offered him a parting cup. As Arthur raised the cup a drop of the contents fell on his horse, and so burnt it that the horse leaped twenty feet high, and then ran in mad career up the hills till it was exhausted. Arthur dashed the cup on the ground, the contents burnt up everything they touched, the fairy palace vanished, and Guen’dolen was never more seen. This tale is told by Sir Walter Scott in The Bridal of Triermain. It is called Lyulph’s Tale, from canto i. 10 to canto ii. 26. (See GYNEE.)

"Her mother was of human birth, Her sire a tenant of the earth, In days of old deemed to provoke Her lover’s wiles and beauty’s pride."

Guedolona, daughter of Corin’ceu and wife of Locrin, son of Brute, the legendary king of Britain. She was divorced, and Locrin married Estraldis, by whom he already had a daughter named Sabri’na. Guedolona, greatly indignant, got together a large army, and near the river Stour a battle was fought, in which Locrin was slain. Guedolona now assumed the government, and one of her first acts was to throw both Estraldis and Sabri’na into the river Severn. (Geoffrey: Brit. Hist., ii. chaps. 4, 5.)

Guedever. (See GUErVErER.)

Guerilla, improperly Guerilla war, means a petty war, a partisan conflict; and the parties are called Guerillas or Guerilla chiefs. Spanish, guerra, war. The word is applied to the armed bands of peasants who carry on irregular war on their own account, especially at such times as their government is contending with invading armies.

"The town was wholly without defenders, and the guerillas murdered people and destroyed property without hindrance." [Lamb. United States, chap. xiv. p. 637.]

Guerino Meschin’no [the Wretched]. An Italian romance, half chivalric and half spiritual, first printed in Padua in 1473. Guerin was the son of Milton, King of Alba’nia. On the day of his birth his father was dethroned, and the child was rescued by a Greek slave, and called Meschino. When he grew up he fell in love with the Princess Elize’na, sister of the Greek Emperor, at Constantinople.

Guest. The Ungrateful Guest was the brand fixed by Philip of Macedon on a Macedonian soldier who had been kindly entertained by a villager, and, being asked by the king what he could give him, requested the farm and cottage of his entertainer.

Gueux. Les Gueux. The ragamuffins. A nickname assumed by the first revolutionists of Holland in 1665. It arose thus: When the Duchess of Parma made inquiry about them of Count Berlaymont, he told her they were "the scum and scoffsouring of the people" (les gueux). This being made public, the party took the name in defiance, and from that moment dressed like beggars, substituted a fox’s tail in lieu of a feather, and a wooden platter instead of a bough. They met at a public-house which had for its sign a cock crowing these words, Vive le Gueux par tout le monde! (See Motley: Dutch Republic, ii. 6.)

The word gueux was, of course, not invented by Berlaymont, but only applied by him to the deputation referred to. In Spain, long before, those who opposed the Inquisition were so called.

N.B. The revolutionists of Guine assumed the name of Entre’s; those of Normandy Barefoot; those of Beausie and Soulouque Wooden-pattern; and in the French Revolution the most violent were termed Sans-culottes.

Guguer. A spear made by the dwarf Etri and given to Odin. It never failed to hit and slay in battle. (The Edda.)

Gul. Le Gui (French). The mistletoe or Druid’s plant.

Guide’s. The elder son of Cymbeline, a legendary king of Britain during the reign of Augustus Cesar. Both Guiderius and his brother Arviragus were stolen in infancy by Belarius, a banished nobleman, out of revenge, and were brought up by him in a cave. When grown to man’s estate, the Romans invaded Britain, and the two young men so distinguished themselves that they were introduced to the king, and Belarius related their history. Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Guiderius succeeded his father, and was slain by Hamo. (Shakespeare: Cymbeline.)

Guides (pron. yherd). Contraction of gendarmes. A corps of French cavalry which carries the gendarm, a standard borne by light horse-soldiers, broad at one end and nearly pointed at the other. The corps des Guides was organised in 1796 by Napoleon as a personal body-guard; in 1848 several squadrons were created, but Napoleon III. made the corps a part of the Imperial Guard. Great care must be taken not to confound the Guides with the Gardes, as they are totally distinct terms.

Guido, surnamed the Savage (in Orlando Furioso), son of Constantia and Amon, therefore younger brother of Rualdo. He was also Astolpho’s kinsman. Being wrecked on the coast of the Amazons, he was doomed to fight their ten male champions. He slew them all, and was then compelled to marry ten of the Amazons. He made his escape with Aleria, his favourite wife, and joined the army of Charlemagne.

Guido Franciscini. A reduced nobleman, who tried to repair his fortune by marrying Pomphilia, the putative child of Pietro and Violante. When the marriage was consummated and the money secure, Guido ill-treated Pietro and Violante; whereupon Violante, at confession, asserted that Pomphilia was not her child, but one she had brought up, the offspring of a Roman wanton, and she applied to the law-courts to recover her money. When Guido heard this he was furious, and so ill-treated his wife that she ran away under the protection of a young canon. Guido pursued the fugitives, overtook them, and had them arrested; whereupon the canon was suspended for three years, and Pomphilia sent to a convent. Here her health gave way, and as the birth of a child was expected, she was permitted to leave the convent and live with her putative parents. Guido went to the house, murdered all three, and was executed. (Brownlow: The Knig and the Book.)

Guil.;dall. The hall of the city guilds. Here are the Court of Common Council, the Court of Aldermen, the Chamberlain’s Court, the police court presided over by an alderman, etc. The ancient guilds were friendly trade societies, in which each member paid a certain fee, called a guild, from the Saxon gildan (to pay). There was a separate guild for each craft of importance.

Gullotin (3 syl.). So named from Joseph Ignace Guillotin, a French physician, who proposed its adoption to prevent unnecessary pain (1738-1814).

It was facetiously called “Mlle. Guillotin” or “Guillotin’s daughter.” It was introduced April 25th, 1792, and is still used in France. A previous instrument invented by Dr. Antoine Louis was called a Louisette (3 syl.).

The MAIDEN (g.v.), introduced into Scotland (1566) by the Regent Morton, when the laird of Penicuick was to be beheaded, was a similar instrument discontinued in 1881.

“IT was but this very day that the daughter of M. de Guillotin was recognised by him before the National Assembly; and it should properly be called ‘Mademoiselle Guillotin.’” — Dumas: The Countess de Chermont, chap. xvii.

Guinea. Sir Robert Holmes, in 1666, captured in Schelling Bay 169 Dutch sail, containing bullion and gold-dust from Cape Coast Castle in Guinea. This rich prize was coined into gold pieces, stumped with an elephant, and called Guinea to memorise the valuable capture. (See Dryden: Annus Mirabilis.)

Guinea-piece = 3 l. was first coined in 1699, and discontinued in 1817. The sovereign coined by Henry VII. in 1500 was displaced by the guinea, but received in 1661, soon after which it displaced the guinea. Of course, 20s. is a better decimal coin than 21s.

Guinea-dropper. A cheat. The term is about equal to thimble-rig, and alludes to an ancient cheating dodge of dropping counterfeit guineas.

Guinea Fowl. So called because it was brought to us from the coast of Guinea, where it is very common.

“Notwithstanding their harsh cry ... I like the Guinea-fowl. They are excellent layers, and the hens are most ornamental dovers of insects.” — R. Mitchell: My Farm of Edgewood, chap. iv., p. 162.

Guinea-ben. A courtesan who is won by money.

“Ere ... I would drown myself for the love of a Guinea-ben, I would change my humanity with a balloon.” — Shakespeare: Othello, 1. 3.

Guinesepig (Stock Exchange term). A gentleman of sufficient name to form a baut who allows himself to be put on a directors’ list for the guinea and lunch provided for the board. (See FLOATERS.)

Guinesepig (A). A midshipman. A guineaspig is neither a pig nor a native of Guinea; so a middy is neither a sailor nor an officer.

“He had a letter from the captain of the Indiaman, offering you a berth on board as guineaspig, or midshipman.” — Captain Marryat: Poor Jack, chap. xxxi.

? A special jurymen who is paid a guinea a case; also a military officer.

assiminated to some special duty, for which he receives a guinea a day, are sometimes so called.

Guineapig (A), in the Anglican Church, is a clergyman without cure, who takes occasional duty for a guinea a sermon, besides his travelling expenses (second class) and his board, if required.

Guine'ever, or rather Guanhumara (4 syl.). Daughter of Leodogranse of Cam'leyard, the most beautiful of women, and wife of King Arthur. She entertained a guilty passion for Sir Lanemolot of the Lake, one of the knights of the Round Table, but during the absence of King Arthur in his expedition against Leo, King of the Romans, she "married" Modred, her husband's nephew, whom he had left in charge of the kingdom. Soon as Arthur heard thereof, he hunted back, Guinever fled from York and took the veil in the nunneries of Julius the Martyr, and Modred set his forces in array at Cam'lli, in Cornwall. Here a desperate battle was fought, in which Modred was slain and Arthur mortally wounded. Guinever is generally called the "grey-eyed;" she was buried at Meigle, in Strathmore, and her name has become the synonym of a wanton or adulteress. (Geoffrey : Brit. Hist., x. 13.)

"That was a woman when Queen Guinever of Britain was a little wench." Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, iv. 1.

Guine'over (3 syl.), Tennyson's Idyll represents her as loving Sir Lanemolot, but one day, when they were bidding farewell, Modred tracked them, and brought his creatures to the base- ment of the tower for testimony." Sir Lanemolot hurled the fellow to the ground and got to horse, and the queen fled to a nunnerly at Almesbury. (See Guine'er.)

Guineolot. The boast of Wato or We'do, the father of Weland and son of Vikkur, in which he crossed over the nine-el deep, called Grumansud, with his son upon his shoulders. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Guis'an'do. The Bulls of Ginzando. Five monster statues of antiquity, to mark the scene of Caesar's victory over the younger Pompey.

Guise's Motto: "A charni son tour," on the standards of the Duc de Guise, who put himself at the head of the Catholic League in the sixteenth century, meant, "My turn will come."

Guitar (Greek, kithara; Latin, cithara; Italian, chitarra; French, guitare. The Greek kithar is the Hindu chd-tar (six-strings).

Guitar. The best players on this instrument have been Guilla'mi, Sor, Zocchi, Stoll, and Horetzky.

Gules [red]. An heraldic term. The most honourable heraldic color, signifying value, justice, and veneration. Hence it was given to kings and princes. The royal livery of England is gules or scarlet. In heraldry expressed by per- pendicular parallel lines. (Persian, ghul, rose; French, gilee, the mouth and throat, or the red colour thereof; Latin, guila, the throat.)

"With man's blood paint the ground, guile, gules." Shakespeare: Troian of Aithus, iv. 3.

"And throw warm guiles on Madam's fair breast." Keats: Eve of St. Agnes.

Gules of August (The). The 1st of August (from Latin, guila, the throat), the entrance into, or first day of that month. (Wharton: Law Lexicon, p. 332.)

7 August 1 is Lammas Day, a quarter-day in Scotland, and half-quarter-day in England.

"Hec day est dies Martis, qui quondam Bacche expelam proximo expetit."-Vol. i. p. 86 col. 1.

Gulf. A man that goes in for honour at Cambridge—i.e., a mathematical degree—is sometimes too bad to be classed with the lowest of the three classes, and yet has shown sufficient merit to pass. When the list is made out a line is drawn after the classes, and one or two names are appended. These names are in the gulf, and those so honoured are gulfed. In the good old times these men were not qualified to stand for the classical tripos.

"The ranks of our confraternity are supplied by youths whom, at the very best, useful knowledge have raised from the very depths of black to the comparative pinnacle of the 'Gulf.'"—Saturday Review.

A great gulf fixed. An impassable separation or divergence. From the parable of Dives and Lazarus, in the third Gospel. (Luke xvi. 26.)

Gulf Stream. The stream which issues from the Gulf of Mexico, and extends over a range of 3,000 miles, raising the temperature of the water through which it passes, and of the lands against which it flows. It washes the shores of the British Isles, and runs up the coast of Norway.

"It is found that the amount of heat transferred by the Gulf Stream from equatorial regions into the North Atlantic ... amounts to no less than one-fifth part of the entire heat possessed by the North Atlantic."—E. U. Croll: Climate and Time, chap. 1, p. 12.

Gulistan [garden of roses]. The famous recueil of moral sentences by Saadi, the poet of Shiraz, who died 1291. (Persian, guhit, a rose, and tun, a region.)

Gull (rhymes with dul.) A dupe, one easily cheated. (See Brian.)

"The most notorious gawk and gull That ever invention played on."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, v. 1.

Gulliver (Lemuel). The hero of the famous Travels into Several Remote Nations of the World, by Lemuel Gulliver, first a Surgeon, and then a Captain of several Ships, i.e. to Lilliput, Brobdingnag, Laputa, and the Houyhnhnms (Whin-nims), written by Dr. Swift, Dean of St. Patrick's, Ireland.

Gulnare (2 syl.), afterwards called Kaled, queen of the harem, and fairest of all the slaves of Seyd [Sen]. She was rescued from the flaming palace by Lord Conrad, the corsair, and when the corsair was imprisoned released him and murdered the Sultan. The two escaped to the Pirate's Isle; but when Conrad found that Medora, his betrothed, was dead, he and Gulnare left the island secretly, and none of the pirates ever knew where they went to. The rest of the tale of Gulnare is under the new name, Kaled (q.v.). (Byron: The Corsair.)

Gummed (1 syl.). He feels like gummed velvet or gummed taffeta. Velvet and taffeta were sometimes stiffened with gum to make them "sit better," but, being very stiff, they frizzed out quickly.

Gumption. Wit to turn things to account, capacity. In Yorkshire we hear the phrase, "I canna gum it" (understand it, make it out), and gumption is the capacity of under-tanding, etc. (Irish, ginn, sense, cuteness.)

"Though he was dazed with the splendour of the place, yet he had gomuch English not to let us his hold."—Dulick and London Magazine, 1823 (Hughleigh).

Gumption. A nostrum much in request by painters in search of the supposed "lost medium" of the old masters, and to which their unapproachable excellence is ascribed. The medium is made of gum mastic and linseed-oil.

Gun. (Welsh gun, a gun.)

CANNONS AND RIFLES.

Enfield rifle. Invented by Pritchett at the Enfield factory, adopted in the English army 1852, and converted into Snider breech-loaders in 1866.

Galing gun. A machine gun with parallel barrels about a central axis, each having its own lock. Capable of being loaded and of discharging 1,000 shots a minute by turning a crank. Named from the inventor, Dr. R. J. Gatling.

Krupp gun. A cannon of ingot steel, made at Krupp's works, at Essen, in Prussia.

Lancaster gun. A cannon having a slightly elliptical twisted bore, and a conoid (2 syl.) projectile. Named from the inventor.

Minié rifle. Invented in 1849, and adopted in the English army in 1851. Named after Claude Minié, a French officer. (1810-1879.)

Whitworth gun. An English rifled firearm of hexagonal bore, and very rapid twist. Constructed in 1857. Its competitive trial with the Armstrong gun in 1864. Named after Sir Joseph Whitworth, the inventor (1803-1887).

Woodworth infant (The). A British 35-ton rifled muzzle-loading cannon, having a steel tube hooped with wrought-iron coils. Constructed in 1870. (See Brown Bess, Mitreallkuse, etc.)

Gun. A breech-loading gun. A gun loaded at the breech, which is then closed by a screw or wedge-block.

Evening or sunset gun. A gun fired at sunset, or about 9 o'clock p.m.

Gun Cotton. A highly explosive compound, prepared by saturating cotton with nitric and sulphuric acids.

Gun Money. Money issued in Ireland by James II., made of old brass cannons.

Gun Room. A room in the afterpart of a lower gun-deck for the accommodation of junior officers.

Gun Phrases.

It's a great gun. A man of note.

Son of a gun. A jovial fellow.

Sure as a gun. Quite certain. It is as certain to happen as a gun to go off if the trigger is pulled.
Guns. To blow great guns. To be very boisterous and windy. Noisy and boisterous as the reports of great guns. To run away from their own guns. To eat their own words; desert what is laid down as a principle. The allusion is obvious.

"The Government could not, of course run away from their guns."—Nineteenth Century, Feb., 1868, p. 182.

Gunga [pronounce Gun-ja]. The goddess of the Ganges. Bishop Heber calls the river by this name.

Gunner. Kissing the gunner's daughter. Being flogged on board ship. At one time boys in the Royal Navy who were to be flogged were first tied to the breech of a cannon.

Gunpowder Plot. The project of a few Roman Catholics to destroy James I. with the Lords and Commons assembled in the Houses of Parliament, on the 5th of November, 1605. It was to be done by means of gunpowder when the king went in person to open Parliament. Robert Catesby originated the plot, and Guy Fawkes undertook to fire the gunpowder. (See Dynamite Saturday.)

Gunter's Chain, for land surveying, is so named from Edmund Gunter, its inventor (1581-1626). It is sixty-six feet long, and divided into one hundred links. As ten square chains make an acre, it follows that an acre contains 100,000 square links.

According to Gunter. According to measurement by Gunter's chain.

 Günther. King of Burgundy and brother of Kriemhild. He resolved to wed Brunhild, the martial queen of Issand, who had made a vow that none should win her who could not surpass her in three trials of skill and strength. The first was hurling a spear, the second throwing a stone, and the third was jumping. The spear could scarcely be lifted by three men. The queen hurled it towards Günther, when Siegfried, in his invisible cloak, reversed it. hurled it back again, and the queen was knocked down. The stone took twelve braving champions to carry, but Brunhild lifted it on her shoulder, flung it twelve fathoms, and jumped beyond it. Again the unseen Siegfried came to his friend's rescue, flung the stone still farther, and, as he leaped, bore Günther with him. The queen, overmastered, exclaimed to her subjects, "I am no more your mistress; you are Günther's liegemen now." (Lied, vii.). After the marriage the masculine maid behaved so obstreperously that Günther had again to avail himself of his friend's aid. Siegfried entered the chamber in his cloud-cloak, and wrestled with the bride till all her strength was gone; then he drew a ring from her finger, and took away her girile. After which he left her, and she became a submissive wife. Günther, with unpardonable ingratitude, was privy to the murder of his friend and brother-in-law, and was himself slain in the dungeon of Etzel's palace by his sister Kriemhild. In history this Burgundian king is called Gun'tacher. (The Nibelungen-Lied.)

Gurgolia. (See GARGOUILLE.)

Gurnum (2 sy/.). The Celtic Cor-burus. While the world lasts it is fastened at the mouth of a vast cave; but at the end of the world it will be let loose, when it will attack Tyr, the war-god, and kill him.

Gurney Light. (See BUDE.)

Guthlac (St.), of Crowland, Lincolnshire, is represented in Christian art as a hermit punishing demons with a scourge, or consoling by angels while demons torment him.

Guthrum. Silver of Guthrum, or silver of Guthrum's Lane. Fine silver was at one time so called, because the chief gold and silver smiths of London resided there in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. The hall of the Goldsmiths' Company is still in the same locality. (Riley: Monuments Gilding.)

Guttapercha. The juice of the percha-tree (Isouendra percha) of the family called Napalace. The percha trees grow to a great height, and abound in all the Malacca Islands. The juice is obtained by cutting the bark. Guttapercha was brought over by Dr. William Montgomerie in 1813, but articles made of this resin were known in Europsome time before. (Latin, gutta, a drop.)

Gutter. Out of the gutter. Of low birth; of the street-Arab class one of the submerged.

Gutter Children. Street Arabs.

Gutter Lane (London). A corruption of Guthurun Lane, from a Mr. Guthurun, Goderoune, or Guthrum, who, as Stow informs us, "possessed the chief property therein." (See Guthrum.)

All goes down Gutter Lane. He spends everything on his stomach. The play is between Gutter Lane, London, and guttur (the throat), preserved in our word gutural (a throat letter).

Guy. The Guiser or Guinaid was the ancient Scotch mummer, who played before Yule; hence our words guiar, disguise, guy, etc.

Guy (Thomas). Miser and philanthropist. He amassed an immense fortune in 1720 by speculations in the South Sea Stock, and gave £298,292 to found and endow Guy's Hospital.

Guy Fawkes, or Guido Fawkes, went under the name of John Johnstone, the servant of Mr. Percy.

Guy, Earl of Warwick. An Anglo-Danish hero of wonderful puissance. He was in love with fair Phelis or Felice, who refused to listen to his suit till he had distinguished himself by knightly deeds. First, he rescued the daughter of the Emperor of Germany "from many a valiant knight;" then he went to Greece to fight against the Saracens, and slew the doughty Coldun, Elmaya King of Tyre, and the soldier himself. Then he returned to England and wedded Phelis; but in forty days he returned to the Holy Land, where he redeemed Earl Jonas out of prison, slew the giant Amurant, and many others. He again returned to England, and slew at Winchester, in single combat, Colbronde or Colbran, the Danish giant, and thus redeemed England from Danish tribute. At Windsor he slew a boar of "passing might and strength." On Dunsmore Heath he slew the "Duncow of Dunsmore, a monstrous wyld and cruel beast." In Northumberland he slew a dragon "black as any cole," with lion's jaws, wings, and a hide which no sword could pierce. Having achieved all this, he became a hermit in Warwick, and hewed himself a cave a mile from the town. Daily he went to his own castle, where he was not known, and begged bread of his own wife Phelis. On his death-bed he sent Phelis a ring, by which she recognised her lord, and went to close his dying eyes. (890-938.) His combat with Colbran is very elaborately told by Drayton (1563-1621) in his Polyglottion.

"I am not Sampson, nor Sir Guy, nor Colbran, to how them down before me."—Shakespeare; Henry VIII., 1. 3.

Guy-ropes. Guide, or guiding-ropes, to steady heavy goods while a-hoisting. (Spanish and Portuguese guiar, from guiar, to guide.)

Guyon (Sir). The impersonation of Temperance or Self-government. He destroyed the witch Acra'sis, and her bower, called the "Bower of Bliss." His companion was Prudence. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book ii.)

The word Guyon is the Spanish guiar (to guide), and the word temperance is the Latin tem'pero (to guide).

Gwynn (Nell). An actress, and one of the courtesans of Charles II. of England (died 1687). Sir Walter Scott speaks of her twice in Tiered of the Peak; in chap. xi. he speaks of "the smart humour of Mrs. Nelly;" and in chap. xi. Lord Chaffinch says of "Mrs. Nelly, wit she has; let her keep herself warm with it in worse company, for the cant of strollers is not language for a prince's chamber."

Gygges' Ring rendered the wearer invisible. Gyges, the Lydian, is the person to whom Candaulus showed his wife naked. According to Plato, Gyges descended into a chasm of the earth, where he found a brazen horse; opening the sides of the animal, he found the carcass of a man, from whose finger he drew off a brazen ring which rendered him invisible, and by means of this ring he entered into the king's chamber and murdered him.

"Why, dost thou think that you had Gyges' ring?" (Shakespeare. Beaumont and Fletcher: Poor Maid of the Inn, 1. 1."

The wealth of Gyges. Gyges was a Lydian king, who married Nyssia, the young widow of Candaulus, and reigned thirty-eight years. He amassed such wealth that his name became proverbial. (Reigned B.C. 710-678.)

Gymnastics. Athletic games. The word is from gymna'snum, a public place set apart in Greece for athletic sports, the actors in which were naked. (Greek, gymnios, naked.)

Gymnosophists. A sect of Indian philosophers who went about with naked feet and almost without clothing. They lived in woods, subsisted on roots, and never married. They believed in the transmigration of souls. Strabo divides them into Brahmins and Samans. (Greek, gymnios, naked; soph hum, sages.)

Gyneth. Natural daughter of Guendolen and King Arthur. Arthur swore to Guendolen that if she brought forth a boy, he should be his heir, and if a girl, he would give her in marriage to the bravest knight of his kingdom. One
Pentecost a beautiful damsel presented herself to King Arthur, and claimed the promise made to Guendolen. Accordingly, a tournament was proclaimed, and the warder given to Gyneth. The king prayed her to drop the warder before the combat turned to earnest warfare, but Gyneth haughtily refused, and twenty knights of the Round Table fell in the tournament, amongst whom was young Vanoc, son of Merlin. Immediately Vanoc fell, the form of Merlin rose, put a stop to the fight, and caused Gyneth to fall into a trance in the Valley of St. John, from which she was never to awake till some knight came forward for her hand as brave as those which were slain in the tourney. Five hundred years passed away before the spell was broken, and then De Vaux undertook the adventure of breaking it. He overcame four temptations—fear, avarice, pleasure, and ambition—when Gyneth awoke, the enchantment was dissolved, and Gyneth became the bride of the bold warrior. (Sir Walter Scott: Bridal of Triermain, chap. ii.)

Gyp. A college servant, whose office is that of a gentleman’s valet, waiting on two or more collegians at the University of Cambridge. He differs from a bed-maker, inasmuch as he does not make beds: but he runs on errands, waits at table, makes men for morning chapel, brushes their clothes, and so on. His perquisites are innumerable, and he is called a gyp (cultur, Greek) because he preys upon his employer like a vulture. At Oxford they are called scouts.

Gyp swan. (See Gyrfalcon.)

Gyrfalcon, Gerfalcon, or Seafalcon. A native of Iceland and Norway. Highest in the list of hawks for falconry. “Tiy,” or “Ger,” is, I think, the Dutch geer, a vulture. It is called the “vulture-falcon” because, like the vulture, its beak is not toothed. The common etymology from hieros, sacred, “because the Egyptians held the hawk to be sacred,” is utterly worthless. Besides Ger-falconers, we have Ger-angles, Lammer-geiers, etc. (See Hawk.)

Gyromancy. A kind of divination performed by walking round in a circle or ring.

Gytrash. A north-of-England spirit, which, in the form of horse, mule, or large dog, haunts solitary ways, and sometimes comes upon belated travellers.

"I remembered certain of Beavis’s tales, wherein there were a people called a gytrash."—Charlotte Bronte: Jane Eyre, ch.

H. This letter represents a style or hedge. It is called in Hebrew rath or chat (a hedge).

H.B. (Mr. Doyle, father of Mr. Richard Doyle, connected with Punch). This political caricaturist died 1868.

H.M.S. His or Her Majesty’s service or ship, as H.M.S. Wellington.

H. U. Hard up.

Habeas Corpus. The “Habeas Corpus Act” was passed in the reign of Charles II., and defined a provision of similar character in Magna Charta, to which also it added certain details. The Act provides: (1) That any man taken to prison can insist that the person who charges him with crime shall bring him bodily before a judge, and state the why and wherefore of his detention. As soon as this is done, the judge is to decide whether or not the accused is to be admitted to bail. [No one, therefore, can be imprisoned on mere suspicion, and no one can be left in prison any indefinite time at the caprice of the powers that be. Imprisonment, in fact, must be either for punishment after conviction, or for safe custody till the time of trial.]

(2) It provides that every person accused of crime shall have the question of his guilt decided by a jury of twelve men, and not by a Government agent or nominee.

(3) No prisoner can be tried a second time on the same charge.

(4) Every prisoner may insist on being examined within twenty days of his arrest, and tried by jury the next session.

(5) No defendant is to be sent to prison beyond the seas, either within or without the British dominions.

The exact meaning of the words Habeas Corpus is this: “You are to produce the body.” That is, You, the accused, are to bring before the judge the body of the accused, that he may be tried and receive the award of the court, and you (the accused) are to abide by the award of the judge.

Suspension of Habeas Corpus. When the Habeas Corpus Act is suspended, the Crown can imprison persons on suspicion, without giving any reason for so doing; the person so arrested cannot insist on being brought before a judge to decide whether or not he can be admitted to bail; it is not needful to try the prisoner.
Haberdsaker, from habertas, a cloth the width of which was settled by Magna Carta. A "habertas-er" is the seller of habertas-erie.

"To match this salt there was another,
As busy and perverse a brother,
An haberdasher of small wares
In politics and state affairs."

Butler: Hudibras, iii. 2.

Habit is Second Nature. The wise saw of Diogènes, the cynic. (n.c. 412-323.)

Shakespeare: "Use almost can change the stamp of nature." (Hamlet, iii. 4.)

French: "L'habitude est une seconde nature."

Latin: "Usus est optimus magister." (Columella.)

Italian: "L'abito è una seconda natura."

Habsburg is a contraction of Habichts-burg (Hawk's Tower); so called from the castle on the right bank of the Aar, built in the eleventh century by Werner, Bishop of Strasburg, whose nephew (Werner II.) was the first to assume the title of "Count of Habsburg." His great-grandson, Albrecht II., assumed the title of "Landgraf of Sundgau." His grandson, Albrecht IV., in the thirteenth century, laid the foundation of the greatness of the House of Habsburg, of which the imperial family of Austria are the representatives.

Hackell's Colt. A vast stone near Stanton Drew, in Somersetshire; so called from a tradition that it was a colt thrown by Sir John Hautville. In Wiltshire three huge stones near Kenet are called the Devil's ratio.

Hackney Horses. Not thoroughbred, but nearly so. They make the best roadsters, haulers, and carriage horses; their action is showy, and their pace good. A first-class roadster will trot a mile in 24 minutes. Some American trotters will even exceed this record. The best hackneys are produced from thorough-bred sires mated with half-bred mares. (French, hancheux; the Romance word hanche the Latin equus; Spanish, hacmén.

"In ordinary parlance, a hackney, hackney-horse, or hack, means a horse "hacked out" for hire. These horses are sometimes vicious private horses sold for "hacks," or worn-out coach-horses, and cheap animals, with broken wind, broken knees, or some other defects.

"The knights are well harnessed, and the common people and others on light hackneys and geldygneys."—Prosemer.

Hackum (Captain). A thick-headed bully of Alsace, impudent but cowardly. He was once a sergeant in Flanders, but ran from his colours, and took refuge in Alsace, where he was dubbed captain.

(Shadwell: Squire of Alsace.)

Haco I. His sword was called Quern-Biter [foot-breadth]. (See Sword.)

Haddock. According to tradition, it was a haddock in whose mouth St. Peter found the flatter (or piece of money), and the two marks on the fish's neck are said to be the impressions of the apostle's finger and thumb. It is a pity that the person who invented this pretty story forgot that salt-water haddock cannot live in the fresh water of the Lake Gennesaret. (St. John Dory and Christian Traditions.)

"O superstitious flatter, Peter's fish, How canst thou dare to make so greedy dish?"—Metello: Diologues (1630).

Hadés (2 syl.). The places of the departed spirit till the resurrection. It may be either Paradise or "Tartarus."

"It is a great pity that it has been translated "hell" nine or ten times in the common version of the New Testament, as "hell" in theology means the inferno. The Hebrew שֵׁבֶל is about equal to the Greek χαίδης, that is, a private, and ideis, in loc.

Hādith (a legend). The traditions about the prophet Mahomet's sayings and doings. This compilation forms a supplement to the Koran, as the Talmud to the Jewish Scriptures. Like the Jewish Gemara, the Hadith was not allowed originally to be committed to writing, but the danger of the traditions being perverted or forgotten led to their being placed on record.

Hadj. The pilgrimage to Ka'bah (temple of Mecca), which every Mahometan feels bound to make once at least before death. Those who neglect to do so "might as well die Jews or Christians." These pilgrimages are made by caravans well supplied with water, and escorted by 1,400 armed men for defence against brigands. (Hebrew, haj, the festival of Jewish pilgrimages to Jerusalem.)

"The green turban of the Musulman distinguishes the devout hadj who has bent to Mecca."—Stephen: Egypt, vol. i. chap. xii. p. 344.
Hadjii. A pilgrim, a Mahometan who has made the Hadji or pilgrimage to the Prophet's tomb at Mecca. Every Hadji is entitled to wear a green turban.

Hammony. Milton, in his Comus, says harmony is of "sovereign use' against all enchantments, mildew, blast, or damp." Coleridge says the word is hauna-oinos (blood-wine), and refers to the blood of Jesus Christ, which destroys all evil. The leaf, says Milton, "had prickles on it," but "it bore a bright golden flower." The prickles are the crown of thorns, the flower the fruits of salvation.

This interpretation is so in accordance with the spirit of Milton, that it is far preferable to the suggestions that the plant arg'mony or alyssum was intended, for why should Milton have changed the name? (Greek, hauna, blood.) (See Comus, 636-68.)

Dioscorides ascribes similar powers to the herb alyssum, which, as he says, "keepeth man and beast from enchantments and witching."

Hemes. A range of mountains separating Thrace and Moesia, called by the classic writers Cold Hemes. (Greek, cheimon, winter; Latin, hiems; Sanskrit, hima.)

"O'er high Pireas thence her course she bore,
O'er fair Eunuch's ever-pleasing shore.
O'er Hanes' hills with snowy eternal crown'd,
Nor once her flying foot approached the ground"

Pope. Homer's Iliad, iv.

Hafed. A Gheber or Fire-worshipper, in love with Hinda, the Arabian emir's daughter, whom he first saw when he entered the palace under the hope of being able to slay her father, the tyrant usurper of Persia. He was the leader of a band sworn to free their country or die, and his name was a terror to the Arab, who looked upon him as superhuman. His rendezvous was betrayed by a traitor comrade, but when the Moslem army came to take him he threw himself into the sacred fire, and was burnt to death. (Thomas Moore.)

Hafs. The great Persian lyricist, called the "Persian Anacreon" (fourteenth century). His odes are called ghalvals, and are both sweet and graceful. The word hafiz (retainer) is a degree given to those who know by heart the Koran and Hadith (traditions).

Hag. A witch or sorceress. (Anglo-Saxon, Hagettes, a witch or hag.)

"How now, you secret, black, and midnight hags!

Hagan of Trony or Hao of Norway, son of Allrian, liegeman of Gunther, King of Burgundy. Gunther invited Siegfried to a hunt of wild beasts, but while the king of Netherland stooped to drink from a brook, Hagan stabbed him between the shoulders, the only vulnerable point in his whole body. He then deposited the dead body at the door of Kriemhild's chamber, that she might stumble on it when she went to matins, and suppose that he had been murdered by assassins. When Kriemhild sent to Worms for the "Nibelung Hoard," Hagan seized it, and buried it secretly somewhere beneath the Rhine, intending himself to enjoy it. Kriemhild, with a view of vengeance, married Etzel, King of the Huns, and after the lapse of seven years, invited the king of Burgundy, with Hagan and many others, to the court of her husband, but the invitation was a mere snare. A terrible broil was stirred up in the banquet hall which ended in the slaughter of all the Burgundians but two (Gunther and Hagan), who were taken prisoners and given to Kriemhild, who cut off both their heads. Hagan lost an eye when he fell upon Walter of Spain. He was dining on the chine of a wild boar when Walter pelted him with the bones, one of which struck him in the eye. Hagan's person is thus described in the great German epic:

"Well-grown and well-companied was that renowned guest;
Long were his legs and swarthy, and broad and broad his chest;
His hair, that once was pale, with grey was dashed of late;
Most terrible his person, and boldly was his gait."

The Nibelungen-Lied, stanza 1789.

Hagarones (3 syl.). The Moors are so called, being the supposed descendants of Hagar, Abraham's bondwoman.

"San Deo ... hath often been seen conquering ... the Hagarones squadrons."—Canterbury Tales: Don Quichote, part ii, book iv. a.

Hagi. (See Hadji.)

Hag-knots. Tangles in the manes of wild ponies, supposed to be used by witches for stirrups. The term is common in the New Forest. Seamen use the word hag's-teeth to express those parts of a matting, etc., which spoil its general uniformity.

Hagring. The Fata Morgana. (Scandinavian.)
Hair (n.) A ditch serving the purpose of a hedge without breaking the prospect. (Anglo-Saxon, hakh, a hole.)

Hahnemann (Samuel). A German physician, who set forth in his Organon of Medicine the system which he called "homeopathy"—the principles of which are these: (1) that diseases are cured by medicines which would produce the disease in healthy bodies; (2) that medicines are to be simple and not compounded; (3) that doses are to be exceedingly minute. (1755-1843.)

Haidee (2 syl.) A beautiful Greek girl, who found Don Juan when he was cast ashore, and restored him to animation. "Her hair was auburn, and her eyes were black as death." Her mother, a Moorish woman from Fez, was dead, and her father, Lambro, a rich Greek pirate, was living on one of the Cyclades. She and Juan fell in love with each other during the absence of Lambro from the island. On his return Juan was arrested, placed in a gallohit, and sent from the island. Haidee went mad, and, after a lingering illness, died. (Byron: Don Juan, cantos ii. iii. iv.)

Hail. Health, an exclamation of welcome, like the Latin Salve (Anglo-Saxon, hail) health; but hail = frozen rain is the Anglo-Saxon hogl.)

"All hail, Macbeth! Hail to thee, Thane of Glamis."

Shakespeare: Macbeth, 1, 3.

Hail. To call to.

To hail a ship or an omnibus. To call to those on board.

Hail-fellow-well-met (4). One on easy, familiar terms. (See JOCKEY.)

"Hail fellow well met; all dirty and wet.

Find out, if you can, who's master, who's man."

So oft: My Lady's Lamentation.

Hair. One single tuft is left on the shaven crown of a Mussulman, for Mahomet to grasp hold of when drawing the deceased to Paradise.

"And each scalp had a single long tuft of hair." Byron: Age of Chivalry.

The scalp-lock of the North American Indians, left on the otherwise bald head, is for a conquering enemy to seize when he tears off the scalp.

Hair (Absalom's) (2 Sam. xiv. 26). Absalom used to cut his hair once a year, and the clippings "weighed 200 shekels after the king's weight," i.e. 100 oz. avoirdupois. It would be a fine head of hair which weighed five ounces, but the mere clippings of Absalom's hair weighed 48,500 grains (more than 100 oz.). Paul says (1 Cor. xi. 14), "Doth not even nature itself teach you, that if a man have long hair, it is a shame unto him?"

Mrs. Astley, the actress, could stand upright and cover her feet with her flaxen hair.

Hair, hairs. (Anglo-Saxon, har.) The greatest events are often drawn by hairs. Events of great pith and moment are often brought about by causes of apparently no importance.

Sir John Hawkins's History of Music, a work of sixteen years' labour, was plunged into long oblivion by a pun.

The magnificent discovery of gravitation by Newton is ascribed to the fall of an apple from a tree under which he was musing.

The door Diamond, upsetting a lamp, destroyed the papers of Sir Isaac Newton, which had been the oil of his life. (see page 230.)

A spark from a candle falling on a cotton floor was the cause of the Great Fire of London.

A bullial ch unmother a file-a-chambre undermined the colossal power of Albania.

A post of the French king was the death of William the Conqueror.

The destruction of Athens was brought about by a jest on Sulla. Some witty Athenian, striding with his pimpley face, called him a "mulberry pudding."

Rome was saved from capture by the cutting of some sacred grove.

Bacon, in his Sketches of Orison, says that Napoleon's love for war was planted in his boyhood by the present of a small brass cannon.

The life of Napoleon was saved on a ship called "Infernal Machine." because General Haudevill Josephine a minute or two to arrange her shawl after the manner of Bag plant women.

The famous "B Hochleuchte Plot" miscarried from the nearest accident. The house in which Charles II. was staying happened to catch fire, and the king was obliged to leave for Newmarket, a little sooner than he had intended.

Lafitte, the great buccaneer, was a punter, and he always ascended his horse in life to his jacking up a pun in the streets of Paris.

A seneque from Frederick II., reflecting not on politics, but on the poetry of a French minister, plunged France into the Seven Years' War.

The invention of glass is ascribed to some Phoenician merchants lighting a fire on the sands of the seashore.

The three hairs. When Reynard wanted to get talked about, he told Miss Magpie, under the promise of secrecy, that "the lion king had given him three hairs from the fifth leg of the amnor-tholoc-phorus, . . . a beast that lives on the other side of the river Cyllinx; it has five legs, and on the fifth leg there are three hairs, and whoever has these three hairs will be young and beautiful for ever." They had effect only on the fair sex, and could be given only to the lady whom the donor married. (Ner. B. B. Lytton: Pilgrims of the Rhone, xii.)

To a hair or To the turn of a hair. To a nicety. A hairbreadth is the forty-eighth part of an inch.

To comb one's hair the wrong way. To cross or vex one by running counter to one's prejudices, opinions, or habits.
Hair-brained. (See AIR-BRAINED.)

Hair-breadth. Escape. A very narrow escape from some evil. In measurement the forty-eighth part of an inch is called a "hair-breadth."

"Wherein I spoke of most disastrous chances.
Of moving accidents by flood and field
Of hair-breadth escape in imminent deadly breach"
Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Hair Eels. These filiform worms belong to the species Cordulis aquatica, found in stagnant pools. Their resemblance to wriggling hairs has given rise to the not uncommon belief that a hair, if left in water for nine days, will turn into an eel.

Hair-Splitting. Cavilling about very minute differences. (See HAIR-BREADTH.)

"Nothing is more fatal to eloquence than attention to fine hair-splitting distinctions."

Hair Stano (Celtic) means boundary stone; a monolith sometimes, but erroneously, termed a Druidical stone. (Scotland.)

Hair by Hair. Hair by hair you will pull out the horse's tail. Plutarch says that Sextoarius, in order to teach his soldiers that perseverance and wit are better than brute force, had two horses brought before them, and set two men to pull out their tails. One of the men was a burly Hercules, who tugged and tugged, but all to no purpose; the other was a sharp, weasel-faced tailor, who pulled one hair at a time, amidst roars of laughter, and soon left the tail quite bare.

Hair devoted to Proserpine. Till a lock of hair is devoted to Proserpine, she refuses to release the soul from the dying body. When Dido mounted the funeral pile, she lingered in suffering till Juno sent Iris to cut off a lock of her hair. Thanatos did the same for Aeschylus, when she gave her life for her husband. And in all sacrifices a forelock was first cut off from the head of the victim as an offering to the black queen.

"Hunc ego mihi
Sacram jussa ferro, quae in corpore sola
Sic art, et diversa crimen sectat:
... argus in ventum venit rectus.
Virgil: Aeneid, iv, 823.

Hair of a Dissembling Colour. Red hair is so-called, from the notion that Judas had red hair.

"Browne. His very hair is of the dissembling colour [red].
Cuba. Somewhat browner than Judas's."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, iii. 4.

Hair of the Dog that Bit You (A). Similia similibus curantur. In Scotland it is a popular belief that a few hairs of the dog that hit you applied to the wound will prevent evil consequences. Applied to drinks, it means, if overnight you have indulged too freely, take a glass of the same wine next morning to soothe the nerves. "If this dog do you bite, soon as out of your bed, take a hair of the tail in the morning."

"Take the hair, it's well written,
Of the dog by which you're bitten;
Work off one wine by his brother
And one balm with another...
Cook with cook, and strife with strife;
Business with business, wife with wife,"
Athenaeus (quoted in Aristotle).

"There was a man, and he was wise,
Who fell into a troubled bush
And scratched out both his eyes:
And when his eyes were out, he then
Jumped into the bramble-bush" And plucked them in again."

Hair stand on End. Indicative of intense mental distress and astonishment. Dr. Andrews, of Beresford chapel, Walworth, who attended Probert under sentence of death, says: "When the executioner put the cords on his wrists, his hair, though long and lanky, of a weak iron-grey, rose gradually and stood perfectly upright, and so remained for some time, and then fell gradually down again."

"Fear came upon me and trembling, ... [and] the hair of my flesh stood up."—Job xi. 14, 15.

Hake. We lose in hake, but gain in herring. Lose one way, but gain in another. Herrings are persecuted by the hakes, which are therefore driven away from a herring fishery.

Hal. A familiar contraction of Harry (for Henry). Similarly, Hal is a contraction of Dorothy; Mad. of Mary, etc.
"The substitution of $f$ for Ms as the initial letter of proper names is seen in such examples as Polly for Molly, Pegg for Martha, Peggy for Margery (i.e. Margaret), etc. (See Elizabeth.)

Halacha [n. r.]. The Jewish oral law. (See GEMARA, MESINA.)

"The halacha ... had even greater authority than the Scriptures of the Old Testament, since it explained and applied them."—Edersheim: Life of Jesus the Messiah, vol. i, book i, chap. i.

Halberjests or Haubergets. A coarse thick cloth used for the habiti of monks. Thomson says it is the German
In the reign of Henry VIII. had the king's head in profile, but those in the reign of Henry VII. had the king's head with the full face. (See King John, I. 1; and 2 Henry IV., iii. 1.)

"Thou half-faced Great! You thick-checkedAnti-fac'd"

Half-seas Over. Almost up with one. Now applied to a person almost dead drunk. The phrase seems to be a corruption of the Dutch op-zee zober, "over-sea beer," a strong, heady beverage introduced into Holland from England (Gifford). "Up-zee Freeze" is Frieseland beer. The Dutch, half seconds's over, more than half-sick. (C. K. Steerman.)

"I am half-seas over to death"

Dryden.

"I do not like the dulness of your eye
It hath a heavy cast, 'tis unripe Dutch."

Halfpenny. I am come back again, like a bad halfpenny. A facetious way of saying "More free than welcome." As a bad half-penny is returned to its owner, so have I returned to you, and you cannot get rid of me.

Halgaver. Summoned before the mayor of Halgaver. The mayor of Halgaver is an imaginary person, and the threat is given to those who have committed no offence against the laws, but are simply untidy and slovenly. Halgaver is a moor in Cornwall, near Bodmin, famous for an annual carnival held there in the middle of July. Charles II. was so pleased with the diversions when he passed through the place on his way to Scilly that he became a member of the "self-constituted" corporation. The mayor of Garratt (q.v.) is a similar "magnate."

Halifax. That is, holy fax or holy hair. Its previous name was Horton. The story is that a certain clerk of Horton, being jilted, murdered his quondam sweetheart by cutting off her head, which he hung in a yew tree. The head was looked on with reverence, and came to be regarded as a holy relic. In time it rotted away, leaving little filaments or veins spreading out between the bark and body of the tree like fine threads. These filaments were regarded as the fax or hair of the murdered maiden. (See Hull, Third II.'s.)

Halifax (in Nova Scotia). So called by the Hon. Edward Cornwallis, the governor, in compliment to his patron, the Earl of Halifax (1749).
Halifax Law. By this law, whoever commits theft in the liberty of Halifax is to be executed on the Halifax gibbet, a kind of guillotine.

At Halifax the law so sharpe doth deal,
That whoe's more than thirteene pence doth steal,
They have a lyn that woundres quick and well,
 Sends thieve all headless into heaven or hell. —
Taylor’s Water Poet: Works, ii. (1650).

Hall Mark. The mark on gold or silver articles after they have been assayed. Every article in gold is compared with a given standard of pure gold. This standard is supposed to be divided into twenty-four parts called carats; gold equal to the standard is said to be twenty-four carats fine. Manufactured articles are never made of pure gold, but the quantity of alloy used is restricted. Thus sovereigns and wedding-rings contain two parts of alloy to every twenty-two parts of gold, and are said to be twenty-two carats fine. The best gold watch-cases contain six parts of silver or copper to eighteen of gold, and are therefore eighteen carats fine. Other gold watch cases and gold articles may contain nine, twelve, or fifteen parts of alloy, and only fifteen, twelve, or nine of gold. The Mint price of standard gold is £3 17s. 10d. per ounce, or £4 14s. 6d. per pound.

Standard silver consists of thirty-seven parts of pure silver and three of copper. The Mint price is 5s. 6d. an ounce, but silver to be melted or manufactured into "plate" varies in value according to the silver market. To-day (Oct. 20th, 1894) it is 23½d. per ounce.

Suppose the article to be marked is taken to the assay office for the hall mark. It will receive a leper's head for London; an anchor for Birmingham; three wheat sheaves or a dagger for Chester; a castle with two wings for Exeter; five lions and a cross for York; a crown for Sheffield; three castles for Newcastle-on-Tyne; a thistle or castle and lion for Edinburgh; a tree and a salmon with a ring in the mouth for Glasgow; a harp or Hibernia for Dublin, etc. The specific mark shows at once where the article was assayed.

Besides the hall mark, there is also the standard mark, which for England is a lion passant; for Edinburgh a thistle; for Glasgow a lion rampant; and for Ireland a crowned harp. If the article stamped contains less pure metal than the standard coin of the realm, the number of carats is marked on it, as eighteen, fifteen, twelve, or nine carats fine.

Besides the hall mark, the standard mark, and the figure, there is a letter called the date mark. Only twenty letters are used, beginning with A, omitting J, and ending with V; one year they are in Roman characters, another year in Italian, another in Gothic, another in Old English; sometimes they are all capitals, sometimes all small letters; so, by seeing the letter and referring to a table, the exact year of the mark can be discovered.

Lastly, the head of the reigning sovereign completes the marks.

Hall' Sunday. The Sunday preceding Shrove Tuesday; the next day is called Hall' Monday, and Shrove Tuesday eve is called Hall' Night. The Tuesday is also called Pancake Day, and the day preceding Callop Monday, from the special foods popularly prepared for these days. All three were days of merrymaking. Hall' or Halle is a contraction of Hallow or Halloge, meaning holy or festival.

Hall of Odin. The rocks, such as Halleberg and Hanneberg, from which the Hyperboreans, when tired of life, used to cast themselves into the sea; so called because they were the vestibule of the Scandinavian Elysium.

Hallam's Greek. Byron, in his English Bards, etc., speaks of "classic Hallam, much renowned for Greek," referring to "Hallam's severe critique on Payne Knight's Taste, in which were some Greek verses most mercilessly lashed. The verses, however, turned out to be a quotation from Pindar."

It appears that Dr. Allen, not Hallam, was the luckless critic. (See Crabb Robinson: Diary, i. 277.)

Hallel. There were two series of psalms so called. Jahn tells us in the Feast of Tabernacles the series consisted of Psalms cxii. to cxviii. both included. (Archeologica Biblica, p. 410). Psalm cxxxvi. was called the Great Hallel. And sometimes the songs of degrees sung standing on the fifteen steps of the inner court seem to be so called (i.e. cxx. to cxxvii. both included).

"Along this [path] Jesus advanced, preceded and followed by multitudes with loud cries of rejoicing, as at the Feast of Tabernacles, when the Great Hallel was duly sung in their recessions." —Fisk: Life of Christ, vol. ii. chap. 50, p. 367.

In the following quotation the Songs of Degrees are called the Great Hallel.

"Ridet [the Pilgrim, chap. 12]."
Hallelujah is the Hebrew halel-ju-Jah, "Praise ye Jehovah."

Hallelujah Lass (A.). A young woman who wanders about with what is called "The Salvation Army."

Hallelujah Victory. A victory gained by some newly-baptised Bretons, led by Germa'uus, Bishop of Auxerre (A.D. 429). The conquerors commenced the battle with loud shouts of "Hallelujah!"

Halloo when out of the Wood, or Never halloo till you are out of the wood. Never think you are safe from the attacks of robbers till you are out of the forest. "Call no man happy till he is dead." "Many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip."

Hallowe'en (October 31st), according to Scotch superstition, is the time when witches, devils, fairies, and other imp's of earth and air hold annual holiday. (See Hallowe'en, a poem by Robert Burns.)

Halfer. A Bridport dagger (q.r.). St. Johnstone's tippet.

Halter, or rather Halster. A rope for the neck or halter, as a horse's halter. (Anglo-Saxon, halh, the neck; but there is also the word balster, halter.)

"A true silver knife is not on live man fishing, no more false, Many a truer man than he has banged up by the halter neck."

Ham. In Laplandic mythology, the guardian spirits of Mount Niem'i.

"From this height [Stu'mm, in Lapland] we had opportunity several times to see those vapours rising from the lake, which the people of the country call Halmi, and which they deem to be the guardian spirits of the mountains." - M. de Hantzen.

Ham and Heyd. Storm demons or weather-sprites. (Scandinavian mythology.)

"Though valor never should be scorched,
Yet now the storm rules wide;
By now again to live returned
Till wager Ham and Heyd.

Ham'dryads. Nymphs of trees supposed to live in forest-trees, and die when the tree dies. (Greek, kame, together with dros, a forest-tree.)

"The nymphs of forest-trees were called "Melids," or "Hamamelids."

Hameh. In Arabian mythology, a bird formed from the blood near the brains of a murdered man. This bird cries "Iskoonee!" (Give me drink!); meaning drink of the murderer's blood; and this it cries incessantly till the death is avenged, when it flies away.

Hamet. The Old Hamet Benenguéi. The hypothetical Moorish chronicler from whom Cervantes professes to derive his adventures of Don Quixote.

"Of the two had cassocks I am worth ... I would have given on the latter of them as fresh as even Old Hamet offered his ... to have stood by." - Mme.

Hamilton. The rest of Mr. Patrick Hamilton has infected as many as it did blow upon, i.e., Patrick Hamilton was burnt to death by Cardinal Beaton, and the horror of the deed contributed not a little to the Reformation. As the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church, so the smoke or reek of Hamilton's fire diffused the principles for which he suffered (1504-1528).

"Lather, at the stake, said: 'We shall this day burn up such a candle in England as shall never be put out.'"

Hamlet. A daft person (Icelandic, umdóll), one who is irresolute, and can do nothing fully. Shakespeare's play is based on the Danish story of Amleth, recorded in Saxo-Grammaticus.

Hammel (Scotch). A cattle-shed, a noved. (Hame = home, with a diminutive affix. Anglo-Saxon, ham, home. Compare hamlet.)

Hammer. (Anglo-Saxon, hamar.)

(1) Pierre d'Ailly, Le Marieau des Hirviquéa, president of the council that condemned John Huss. (1350-1425.)

(2) Judas Asmonæus, surnamed Mac-cabæus, "the hammer," (b.c. 166-186.)

(3) St. Augustine is called by Hake-well "That renowned pillar of truth and hammer of heresies." (b.c. 395-430.)

(4) John Faber, surnamed Malleus
Hrevél’d'run, from the title of one of his works. (1470-1541.)

(5) St. Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers, Malleus Arianus'run. (560-597.)

(6) Charles Martel. (980-741.)

"On prenent qu'un hui dona le surnam de Marte, parce quil vivait assez commune avec un nartem les Sarrauins, qui, sous la conduite d'Ai-draine, avait envahi la Francia." - Douay:
Dictionnaire Ecclésiastique, etc.

Hammer.

PHRASES AND PROVERBS.
Gone to the hammer. Applied to goods sent to a sale by auction; the auctioneer giving a rap with a small hammer when a lot is sold, to intimate that there is an end to the bidding.

They live hammer and tongs. Are always quarrelling. They beat each other like hammers, and are as "cross as the tongs."

"Both parties went at it hammer and tongs: and int one another anywhere and with anything."—James Pown.

To sell under the hammer. To sell by auction. (See above.)

Hammer of the Scotch. Edward I. On his tomb in Westminster Abbey is the inscription "Edwardus longus Rectorum Mellius hoc est" (Here is long Edward, the hammer of the Scots).

Hammercloth. The cloth that covers the coach-box, in which hammer, nails, bolts, &c., used to be carried in case of accident. Another etymology is from the Teutonic hammer (a skin), skin being used for the purpose. A third suggestion is that the word hammer is a corruption of "hammock," the seat in which the cloth covers being formed of straps or webbing stretched between two crutches like a sailor's hammock. Still another conjecture is that the word is a corruption of "hamper cloth;" the hamper being used for sundry articles required, and forming the coachman's box. The word box seems to favour this suggestion.

Hampton Court Conference. A conference held at Hampton Court in January, 1604, to settle the disputes between the Church party and the Puritans. It lasted three days, and its result was a few slight alterations in the Book of Common Prayer.

Hamshackle. To hamshackle a horse is to tie his head to one of his fore-legs.

Hamstring. To disable by severing the tendons of the ham.

Han. Sons of Hehn. The Chinese are so called from Han the founder of the twenty-sixth dynasty, with which modern history commences. (290-229.)

Hanap. A costly goblet used at one time on state occasions. Sometimes the cup used by our Lord at the Last Supper is so called. (Old High German, hanap, a cup.)

He had, indeed, four silver hanaps of his own, which had been left him by his grandmother. —Sir W. Scott: Quentin Durward, Chap X. p. 71.

Hanaper. Exchequer. "Hanaper office," an office where all writs relating to the public were formerly kept in a hanper (in hanaper'd). Hanaper is a cover for a hanap.

Hand. A measure of length = four inches. Horses are measured up the fore leg to the shoulder, and are called 14, 15, 16 (as it may be), hands high.

i. Hand (A). A symbol of fortitude in Egypt, of fidelity in Rome. Two hands symbolise concord; and a hand laid on the head of a person indicates the right of property. Thus if a person laid claim to a slave, he laid his hand upon him in the presence of the pretor. (Aulius Gellius, XX. 19.) By a closed hand Zeno represented dialectics, and by an open hand eloquence.

ii. Hand. (The final word.)

Bear a Hand. Come and help. Bend to your work immediately.

Cap in Hand. Suppliantly, humbly; as, "To come cap in hand."

Dead Man's Hand. It is said that carrying a dead man's hand will produce a dead sleep. Another superstition is that a lighted candle placed in the hand of a dead man gives no light to anyone but him who carries the hand. Hence burglars, even to the present day in some parts of Ireland, employ this method of concealment.

Empty Hand. An empty hand is no law for a hank. You must not expect to receive anything without giving a return. The Germans say, Werdachor do fiihrt. The Latin proverb is Dux, so er accepire, or Pauco hanc, adpetit.

Heavy Hand, as "To rule with a heavy hand," severely, with oppression.

Old Hand (1o). One experienced.

Poor Hand (J). An unskilful one.

He is but a poor hand at it, i.e. he is not skilful at the work.

Red Hand, or bloody hand, in coat Armour is generally connected with some traditional tale of blood, and the badge was never to be expunged till the bearer had passed, by way of penance, seven years in a cave, without companionship, without shaving, and without uttering a single word.

In Aston church, near Birmingham, is a coat-armorial of the Holts, the "bloody hand," of which is thus accounted for:—It is said that Sir Thomas Holt, some two hundred years ago, murdered his cook in a cellar with a spit, and, when pardoned for the offence, the king enjoined him, by way of penalty, to wear ever after a "bloody hand" in his family coat.

In the church of Stoke d'Abernon, Surrey, there is a red hand upon a monument, the legend of which is, that a gentleman shooting with a friend was so mortified at meeting with no game that he swore he would shoot the first live thing he met. A miller was the victim of this rash vow, and the "bloody hand" was placed in his family coat to keep a perpetual memorial of the crime.

Similar legends are told of the red hand in Wateringbury church, Kent, of the red hand on a table in the hall of Church-Gresley, in Derbyshire; and of many others.

The open red hand, forming part of the arms of the province of Ulster, commemorates the daring of O'Neill, a bold adventurer, who vowed to be first to touch the shore of Ireland. Finding the boat in which he was rowed outstripped by others, he cut off his hand and flung it to the shore, to touch it before those in advance could land.

The open red hand in the armorial coat of baronets arose thus:—James I. in 1611 created two hundred baronets on the payment of £1,000 each, ostensibly "for the amelioration of Ulster," and from this connection with Ulster they were allowed to place on their coat armour the "open red hand," up to that time borne by the O'Neills. The O'Neills whose estates were made forfeit by King James was surnamed Lamb-dyng Eirin (red-hand of Erin).

Right Hand. He is my right hand.

In French, " cet mon bras est, my best man.

Second-hand. (See Second.)

Upper Hand. To get the upper hand.

To obtain the mastery.

Young Hand. A young and inexperienced workman.

Hand. (Phrases beginning with "To."

Come to Hand. To arrive to have been delivered.

To come to one's hand. It is easy to do.

Get One's Hand in. To become familiar with the work in hand.

Have a Hand in the Matter. To have a finger in the pie. In French, "Mettre la main à quelque chose."

Kiss the Hand (Job xxxi. 27). To worship false gods. Cicero (In Verres, lib. iv. 43), speaks of a statue of Hercules, the chin and lips of which were considerably worn by the kisses of his worshippers. Hosea (xiii. 2) says, "Let the man that sacrifice kiss the calves." (See Adorns.)

"I have left me seven thousand in Israel... which have not bowed unto Baal, and... which have not kissed (their hand to him)."—1 Kings vii. 18.

LEND A HAND. To help. In French, "Frieze moy la main."

Live from Hand to Mouth. To live without any provision for the morrow.

Take in Hand. To undertake to do something; to take the charge of.

iv. Hand (preceded by a preposition).

Beforehand. Sooner, before it happened.

Behindhand. Not in time, not up to date.

By the Hand of God. "Aedel dicistin."

From Hand to Hand. From one person to another.

In Hand. Under control, in possession; under progress, as "Avoir la main a l'oeuvre."

"Keep him well in hand."

"I have some in hand, and more in expectation."

"I have a new book or picture in hand."

A bird in the hand. (See Bird.)

Off Hand. At once; without stopping.

Off one's hands. No longer under one's responsibilities; able to maintain oneself.

Out of Hand. At once, over.

"We will proclaim you out of hand."—Shakespeare; 2 Henry VI. i. 3. 7.

And, were these awards were one out of hand, we would, then, back unto the Holy Land!—Shakespeare; 2 Henry IV. ii. 19.

With a High Hand. Impensively, arrogantly. In French, "Faire quelque chose main la main.""v. Hand. (Miscellaneous articles.)

Laying On of Hands. The laying on of a bishop's hands in confirmation or ordination.

Putting the Hand Under the Thigh. An ancient ceremony used in swearing.

And Abraham sent unto his elder servant... "I pray thee that the hand under my thigh..."

Genesis xxiv. 2, 5.

Handy. Persons employed in a factory. We say so many head of cattle:
Hands

horse-dealers count noses. Races are won by the nose, and factory work by the hand, but cattle have the place of honour.

Hand-s. It is believed on all hands. It is generally (or universally) believed.

Change. To change hands. To pass from a possessor to someone else.

Clean. He has clean hands. In French, "Il a les mains nettes." That is, he is incorruptible, or he has never taken a bribe.

Full. My hands are full. I am fully occupied; I have as much work to do as I can manage. A "handful" has the plural "handfuls," as "two handfuls," same as "two barrow-loads," "two cart-loads," etc.

Good. I have it from very good hands. I have received my information on good authority.

Lay. To lay hands on. To apprehend; to lay hold of. (See No. v.)

Shake. To shake hands. To salute by giving a hand received into your own a shake.

To strike hands (Prov. xvii. 18). To make a contract, to become surety for another. (See also Prov. vii. 1 and xxii. 26.) The English custom of shaking hands in confirmation of a bargain has been common to all nations and all ages. In feudal times the vassal put his hands in the hands of his overlord on taking the oath of fidelity and homage.

Shop "Hands," etc. Men and women employed in a shop.

Take off. To take off one's hands. To relieve one of something troublesome, as "Will no one take this [task] off my hands?"

Wash. To wash one's hands of a thing. In French, "Se laver les mains d'une chose" or "Je n'en lave pas." I will have nothing to do with it; I will abandon it entirely. The allusion is to Pilate's washing his hands at the trial of Jesus.

When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person; see ye to it."-Matt. xxviii. 24.

Hand-book. Speelman says that King Alfred used to carry in his bosom memorandum leaves, in which he made observations, and took so much pleasure therein that he called it his hand-book, because it was always in his hand.

Hand-gallop. A slow and easy gallop, in which the horse is kept well in hand.

Hand-paper. A particular sort of paper well known in the Record Office, and so called from its watermark, which goes back to the fifteenth century.

Hand-post (A). A direction-post to direct travellers the way to different places.

Hand round (B). To pass from one person to another in a regular series.

Hand and Glove (They are). Inseparable companions, of like tastes and like affections. They fit each other like hand and glove.

Hand and Seal. When writing was limited to a few clerks, documents were authenticated by the impression of the hand dipped in ink, and then the seal was duly appended. As dipping the hand in ink was dirty, the impression of the thumb was substituted. We are informed that "scores of old English and French deeds still exist in which such signatures appear." Subsequently the name was written, and this writing was called "the hand."

Hand in Hand. In a familiar or kindly manner, as when persons go hand in hand.

Hand of Cards. The whole deal of cards given to a single player. The cards which he holds in his hand.

A mint in heaven would grace to see such hand
Cut up by one who will not understand.

Hand of Justice. The allusion is to the sceptre or baton anciently used by kings, which had an ivory hand at the top of it.

Hand over Hand. To go or come up hand over hand, is to travel with great rapidity, as climbing a rope or a ladder, or as one vessel overtakes another.

Sailors in hauling a rope put one hand
Hand the Sail, i.e. furl it.

Hand Down to Posterity (70). To leave for future generations.

Handfasting. A sort of marriage. A fair was at one time held in Dumfriesshire, at which a young man was allowed to pick out a female companion to live with him. They lived together for twelve months, and if they both liked the arrangement they were man and wife. This was called handfasting or hand-fasting.

This sort of contract was common among the Romans and Jews, and is not unusual in the East even now.

"Knowest thou not that rite, holy man?" said Avenel. ". . . then I will tell thee. We hardenmen . . . take our wives for a year and a day; that space gone by, each may choose another mate, or, at their pleasure, (they) may call the priest to marry them for life, and thus we call handfasting." — Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap. xxv.

Handicap. A game at cards not unlike loo, but with this difference—the winner of one trick has to put in a double stake, the winner of two tricks a triple stake, and so on. Thus: if six persons are playing, and the general stake is 1s., and A gains three tricks, he gains 6s., and has to "hand i the cap" or pool 3s. for the next deal. Suppose A gains two tricks and B one, then A gains 4s. and B 2s., and A has to stake 3s. and B 2s. for the next deal.

"To the Mitre Tavern in Wood street, a house of the greatest note in London. Here some of us fell to handicap, a sport I never knew before, which was very good." — Pepys, His Diary, Sept. 19th, 1666.

Handicap, in racing, is the adjudging of various weights to horses differing in age, power, or speed, in order to place them all, as far as possible, on an equality. If two unequal players challenge each other at chess, the superior gives up a piece, and this is his handicap. So called from the ancient game referred to by Pepys. (See SWEEP-STAKES, PLATE-RAKE, etc.)

The Winner's Handicap. The winning horses of previous races being pitted together in a race royal are first handicapped according to their respective merits: the horse that has won three races has to carry a greater weight than the horse that has won only two, and this latter more than its competitor who is winner of a single race only.

Handkerchief. "The committee were at a loss to know whom next to throw the handkerchief to" (The Times). The meaning is that the committee did not know whom they were to ask next to make a speech for them; and the allusion is to the game called in Norfolk "Stir up the dumplings," and by girls "Kiss in the ring."

Handkerchief and Sword. With handkerchief in one hand and sword in the other. Pretending to be sorry at a calamity, but prepared to make capital out of it.

"Abit' George . . . mentions in [a letter] that 'Mary Terrace stands with the handkerchief in one hand, weeping for the loss of Poland, but with the sword in the other hand, ready to cut Poland in sections, and take her share.' — Carlyle: The Diamond Necklace, chap. iv.

Hand. He has a handle to his name. Some title, as "lord," "sir," "doctor." The French say Monsieur sans queue, a man without a tail (handle to his name).

"To give a handle to . . . . To give grounds for suspicion; as, "He certainly gave a handle to the rumour."

"He gave a handle to his enemies, and threw stumbling-blocks in the way of his friends." — Havelock: Spirit of the Age (James Macintosh), p. 136.

Handsome = liberal. To do the thing that is handsome; to act handsomely; to do handsomely towards one.

Handwriting on the Wall (The). An announcement of some coming calamity. The allusion is to the handwriting on Belshazzar's palace-wall announcing the loss of his kingdom. (Dan. v. 5-11.)

Handycuffs. Cuffs or blows given by the hand. "Fisticuffs" is now more common.

Hang Back (70). To hesitate to proceed.

Hang Fire (70). To fail in an expected result. The allusion is to a gun or pistol which fails to go off.

Hang On (70). To cling to; to persevere; to be dependent on.

Hang Out. Where do you hang out? Where are you living, or lodging? The allusion is to the custom, now restricted to public-houses, but once very general, of hanging before one's shop a sign indicating the nature of the business carried on within. Druggists often still place coloured bottles in their windows, and some tobacconists place near their shop door the statue of a Scotchman. (See Dickens: Pickwick Papers, chap. xxx.)

Hangman Look (4). A guilty, shameseared look.

"Look a little broker, man, and not so hangdog-like."—Dickens.

Hang by a Thread (76). To be in a very precarious position. The allusion is to the sword of Damocles. (See DAMOCLES' SWORD.)

Hang in the Bell Ropes (76). To be asked at church, and then defer the marriage so that the bells hang fire.

Hanged or Strangled. Examples from the ancient classic writers:

1. Archilocus, King of Lydia, endeavoured to raise a new tribute from his subjects and was hanged by them amidst popular, who threw the dead body into the river Pactolus.

2. Antia, wife of King Latinus, promised her daughter Launi to King Turnus; when, however, she was given in marriage to Turnus, Antia hanged herself that she might not see the hand stranger. (Virgil: Aeneid.)

3. Arachne, the most skillful of needlewomen, hanged herself because she was outdone in a trial of skill by Minerva. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, vi. fab. 1.)

4. Ardotis, mother of Ulysses, hanged herself in despair on receiving false news of her son's death.

5. Bosporus, a Spaniard by birth, was strangled by the Emperor Priscus for assuming the imperial purple in Gaul. (A. D. 291.)

6. Iphica, a beautiful youth of Salamis of mean birth, hanged himself because his addresses were rejected by Amara of a girl of Salamis of similar rank in life. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, xiv. 306, etc.)

7. Latona, wife of (See Antia, above.)

8. Lucius, father of Nearchus, who betrayed his enemies and gave her in marriage to a wealthier man. Archilocus so smote them by his satires that both father and daughter hanged themselves. (See above.)

9. Nekyia, Queen of Thrace, the accepted of Demophoon, who stopped on her coast on his return from Troy. Demophoon was called away to Athens, and promised to return; but, failing so to do, Phylis hanged herself.

Hanged, Drawn, and Quartered. (See Drawn.)

Hanger (1). Properly the fringed loop or strap hung to the girdle by which the dagger was suspended, but applied by a common figure of speech to the sword or dagger itself.

"Men's swords in hangars hang fast by their side."—J. Taylor (1859).

Hanging. "Hanging and writing go by destiny. "If a man is doomed to be hanged, he will never be drowned." And "marriges are made in heaven," we are told.

"If marriage and hanging go by destiny, why not whipping too? What use can one cure the fits of lovers when they lose their wits? Love is a boy, by poets styled.

"Chop some brains and spoil the child."—Butler: Hudibras, part ii. cant. i. 839-844.

Hanging Gale (Th). The custom of taking six months' grace in the payment of rent which prevailed in Ireland.

"We went to collect the rents due the 25th March, but which, owing to the custom which prevails in Ireland known as 'the hanging gale,' are never demanded till the 25th September."—The Times, November, 1866.

Hanging Gardens of Babylon. Four acres of garden raised on a base supported by pillars, and towering in terraces one above another 300 feet in height. At a distance they looked like a vast pyramid covered with trees. This mound was constructed by Nebuchadnezzar to gratify his wife Amytis, who felt weary of the flat plains of Babylon, and longed for something to remind her of her native Median hills. One of the "seven wonders of the world."

Hangman's Acre, Gains, and Gain's Alley (London), in the liberty of St. Catherine, Strype says it is a corruption of "Hammes and Guynes," so called because refugees from those places were allowed to lodge there in the reign of Queen Mary after the loss of Calais. (See also Stow: History, vol. ii.; list of streets.)

Hangman's Wages. 134d. The fee given to the executioner at Tyburn, with 14d. for the rope. This was the value of a Scotch merk, and therefore points to the reign of James, who decreed that "the coin of silver called the mark-piece shall be current within the kingdom at the value of 134¾." Noblemen who were to be executed were expected to give the executioner from £7 to £10 for cutting off their head. For half of thirteen-pence hangman wages I would have cleared all the town carp. You should have been rid of all the stages and my gallows men."

"The Hangman's Last Will and Testament."

"The present price (1894) is about £40. Calcraft's charge was £33 14s., plus assistant £5 5s., other fees £1 1s., to which he added "expenses for erecting the scaffold.""

Hangmen and Executioners.

1. Bell is the earliest hangman whose name survives (about 1500).

2. Jack Sutherlund is said to cut off the head of Essex in 1601.

3. Derrick who cut off the head of Essex in 1601.

4. Gregory Father and son, mentioned by Sir Walter Scott (1647).

5. Gregory Brandon (about 1640)

6. Richard Brandon, his son, who executed Charles I.

7. Squire Dye, mentioned by Hudibras (part in c. 2).

Hankey Pankey, jugglery; fraud.

Hanoverian Shield. T is escutcheon used to be added to the arms of England; it was placed in the centre of the shield to show that the House of Hanover came to the crown by election, and not by conquest. Conquerors strike out arms of a conquered country, and place their own in lieu.

Hans von Rippach [ri:p-pak]. Jack of Rippach, a Monsieur Nong-tong-pas — i.e. someone asked for who does not exist. A gay German spark calls at a house and asks for Herr Hans von Rippach. Rippach is a village near Leipzig.

Hansards. The printed records of Bills before Parliament, the reports of committees, parliamentary debates, and some of the national events. Till the business was made into a company the reports commanded a good respect, but in 1892 the company was wound up. Luke Hansard, the founder of the business, came from Norwich, and was born in 1732.

* Other parliamentary business was printed by other firms.

Hanse Towns. The maritime cities of Germany, which belonged to the Hanseatic League (q.v.).

"The Hanse towns of Lübeck, Bremen, and Hamburg were commonwealths even now (1527)."
—Freeman: General Sketch, chapt. v, p. 174.

Hanseatic League. The first trade union; it was established in the twelfth century by certain cities of Northern Germany for their mutual prosperity and protection. The diet which used to be held every three years was called the Hansa, and the members of it Hansards. The league in its prosperity comprised eighty-five towns; it declined rapidly in the Thirty Years' War; in 1699 only six cities were represented; and the last three members of the league (Hamburg, Lübeck, and Bremen) joined the German Customs Unions' in 1889. (German, am-see, on the sea; and the league was originally called the Am-see-staten, free cities on the sea.)

Hansel. A gift or bribe, the first money received in a day. Hence Hansel Monday, the first Monday of the year. To "hansel our swords" is to use them for the first time. In Norfolk we hear of hanselling a coat — i.e. wearing it for the first time. Lemon tells us that superstitious people will spit on the first money taken at market for luck, and Misson says, "Je le baises en le recevant, crachant dessus, et le mettent dans une poche apart." (Travels in England, p. 192.)

Hansol Monday. The Monday after New-Year's Day, when "hansels," or free gifts, were given in Scotland to servants and children. Our boxing-day is the first weekday after Christmas Day. (Anglo-Saxon, hansel/en; hand and sel, to give.)

Hansom (4). A light two-wheeled cab, in which the driver sits behind the vehicle, and communicates with the passenger through a trap-door in the roof. Invented by Aloysius Hansom of York (1803-1882). Hansom was by trade an architect at Birmingham and at Hinckley in Leicestershire.

Hapmouch (2 syl.). The giant flycatcher. He invented the art of drying and smoking neats' tongues. (Duchat: Ouvres de Rabelais.)

Happy Arabia. A mistranslation of the Latin Arabus felix, which means simply on the right hand — i.e. to the right hand of Al-Shan (Syria). It was Ptolemy who was the author of the threefold division Arabia Petraea, misnamed "Stony Arabia," but really so called from its chief city Petra: Arabia Felix (or Yemen), the south-west coast; and as for Arabia deserta (meaning the interior) probably he referred to Nefzyz.

Happy Expression (4). A well-turned phrase; a word or phrase peculiarly apt. The French also say "Un heureuse expression," and "Son expression heureuse.""%

Happy-go-lucky (4). One indifferent to his interests; one who looks to good luck to befriend him.

Happy Valley, in Dr. Johnson's tale of Rasselas, is placed in the kingdom of Amhara, and was inaccessible except in one spot through a cave in a rock. It was a Garden of Paradise where resided the princes of Abyssinia.

Happy as a Clam at High Tide.
The clam is a bivalve mollusc, dug from its bed of sand only at low tide; at high tide it is quite safe from molestation. (See Close as a Clam.)

Happy as a King. This idea of happiness is wealth, position, freedom, and luxurious living; but Richard II. says a king is "Woe's slave" (iii. 2).

"On the happiness of kings, see Shakespeare: Henry V., iv. 1.

Happy the People whose Annals are Tiresome. (Montgomery.) Of course, wars, rebellions, troubles, make up the most exciting parts of history.

Hapsburg. (See HABSBURG.)

Har. The first person of the Scandinavian Trinity, which consists of Har (the Mighty), the Loke, and the Third Person. This Trinity is called "The Mysterious Three," and they sit on three thrones above the Rainbow. The next in order are the Æsir (g.v.), of which Odin, the chief, lives in Asgard, on the heavenly hills between Earth and the Rainbow. The third order is the Vanir (see VAN) - the gods of the ocean, air, and clouds - of which Van Njord is the chief. Har has already passed his ninth incarnation; in his tenth he will take the forms first of a peacock, and then of a horse, when all the followers of Mahomet will be destroyed.

Har, in Indian mythology, is the second person of the Trinity.

Ha'ram or Ha'rem, means in Arabic forbidden, or not to be violated; a name given by Mahometans to those apartments which are appropriated exclusively to the female members of a family.

Harapha, a descendant of Og and Anak, a giant of Gath, who went to mock Samson in prison, but durst not venture within his reach. The word means the giant. (Milton: Samson Agonistes.)

Har'inger. One who looks out for lodgings, etc.: a courier; hence, a forerunner, a messenger. (Anglo-Saxon, here, an army; berygn, to lodge.)

"I'll be myself the harbingcr, and make you full The hearing of my wife with your approach." Shakespeare: Macbeth, i, 4.

Harcourt's Round Table. A private conference in the house of Sir William Harcourt, January 14, 1887, with the view of reuniting, if possible, the Liberal party, broken up by Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy.

The phrase "Round Table" is an American, meaning what the French call a circle, or club meeting held at each other's houses.

Hard By. Near. Hard means close, pressed close together; hence firm or solid, in close proximity to.

"Hard by a sheltering wood" — David Malo: Eoiron and Emma.

Hard Lines. Hard words; "rather rough treatment," "exactitude. Lines mean lot or allotment (measured out by a line measure), as, "The lines have fallen to me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage," i.e., my allotment is excellent. Hard lines = an unfavourable allotment (or task).

"That was hard lines upon me, after I had given up everything." — Elia.

Hard Up. Short of money. "N'avoit pas de guilin."

"Up" often = out, as, "used up," "worn out," "done up," etc. "Hard up" = nearly out of cash. In these, and all similar examples, "Up" is the Old English ofer, over: Latin, supra; Greek, 'pov.

Hard as Nails. Stern, hard-hearted, unsympathetic: able to stand hard blows like nails. Religious bigotry, strait-lacedness, rigid puritanical pharisaism, make men and women "hard as nails."

"I know I'm as hard as nails already; I don't want to get more so." — Minn Lyell: Donorun, ch. xvi.

Hard as a Stone. "hard as iron," "hard as brawn," "hard as ice," "hard as adamant," etc. (See SIMILES.)

Hard as the Nether Millstone. Unfeeling, obdurate. The lower or "nether" of the two millstones is firmly fixed and very hard; the upper stone revolves round it on a shaft, and the corn, running down a tube inserted in the upper stone, is ground by the motion of the upper stone round the lower one. Of course, the upper wheel is made to revolve by some power acting on it, as wind, water, or some other mechanical force.
Hardouin (2 syl.). Een Hardouin would not object. Said in apology of an historical or chronological incident introduced into a treatise against which some captious persons take exception. Jean Hardouin, the learned Jesuit, was librarian to Louis le Grand. He was so fastidious that he doubted the truth of all received history, denied the authenticity of the Aeneid of Virgil, the Odes of Horace, etc.; placed no faith in medals and coins, regarded all councils before that of Trent as chimereal, and looked on Descartes, Malebranche, Pascal, and all Jansenists as infidels. (1646-1720).

"Even Peter Harbouah would not enter his private against such a collection."—D. A. Clarke: Essay.

Hardy (Letitia). Heroine of the Belle's Stratagem, by Mrs. Cowley. She is a young lady of fortune destined to marry Doricort. She first assumes the air of a raw country hoyden and disgusts the fastidious man of fashion: then she appears at a masquerade and wins him. The marriage is performed at midnight, and Doricort does not know that the masquerader and hoyden are the same Miss Hardy till after the ceremony is over.

Hardy (The), i.e. brave or daring, hence the phrase, "hards runner am I." (1) William Douglas, defender of Berwick (died 1302). (2) Philippe III. of France, le Hardi (1243, 1270-1285). (3) Philippe III., Dué de Bourgogne, le Hardi (1312, 1303-1382).

Hare. It is unlucky for a hare to cross your path, because witches were said to transform themselves into hares.

"Nor did we meet, with nimble feet,
Four little four-footed ones.
Thus certain seen some dreamy,
Of fortune bad to keep us."
—Klmara: Trip to Hardi, 11.

"In the Flemish Village and Hettland, we are told, "if a fisherman on his way to the boats happens to meet a woman, parson, or hare, he will turn back, being convinced that he will have no luck that day."

Antipathy to hare. Tycho Bruhe (2 syl.) would faint at the sight of a hare; the Duc d'Epernon at the sight of a leveret; Marshal de Brézé at sight of a rabbit; and Henri III., the Duke of Schomberg, and the chamberlain of the emperor Ferdinand, at the sight of a cat. (See Antipathy.)

First catch your hare. (See Catch.)

Hold with the hare and run with the hounds. To play a double and deceitful game, to be a traitor in the camp. To run with the hounds as if intent to catch the hare, but all the while being the secret friend of poor Wat. In the American war these double-dealers were called Copperheads (q.v.).

Mad as a March hare. Hares are unusually shy and wild in March, which is their rutting season.

* Erasmus says "Mad as a marsh hare," and adds, "hares are wilder in marshes from the absence of hedges and cover." (Aphorisms, p. 206: 1542.)

Melancholy as a hare (Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., i. 2). According to medieval quackery, the flesh of hare was supposed to generate melancholy; and all foods imparted their own speciality.

The quaking hare, in Dryden's Hind and Panther, means the Quakers.

"Among the numerous kind, the quaking hare Professed neutrality, but would not swear." Part 1, 177, 36.

Hare-brained, or Hair-brained. Mad as a March hare, giddy, foolhardy. "Let's leave this town; for they [the English] are hare-brained savages. And hunger will enforce them to be more cruel."—Shakespeare: Henry IV., i. 2.

Hare-foot. Swift of foot as a hare.

The surname given to the Harold I., youngest son of Canute (1035-1040).

To kiss the hare's foot. To be too late for anything, to be a day after the fair. The hare has gone by, and left its footprint for you to salute. A similar phrase is To kiss the post.

Hare-lip. A cleft lip; so called from its resemblance to the upper lip of a hare. It was said to be the mischievous set of an elf or malicious fairy.

"This is the foot [dut] Phibberbeck, He bows at curfew, and walks till the first cock He . . . squats the eye and makes the hare-lip."
—Shakespeare: King Lear, In. 4.

Hare-stone—Hour-stone. Boundary stone in the parish of Skurred (Cornwall), with a heap of stones round it. It is thought that these stones were set up for a similar purpose as the column set up by Laban (Genesis xxxi., 51, 52). "Behold this heap, and behold this pillar," said Laban to Jacob, "which I have cast between me and thee. This heap be witness, and this pillar be witness, that I will not pass over this heap to thee, and that thou shalt not pass over this heap unto me, for harm." (Anglo-Saxon, hara, or horn stan.) (See Harold's Stones.)

Hare and the Tortoise (The). Everyone knows the fable of the race between the hare and the tortoise, won by the latter; and the moral, "Slow and Hares shift their Sex. It was once thought that hares are sexless, or that they change their sex every year.

"Lepores omnes utraque sexum latent."--Monstr.

"Snakes that cast their skins for new:
Cameleons that alter hue.
Hares that yearly sex change -
"Fletcher Faithful Shepherd, in 1.

Har'foot Mutton. A ragout made with hashed mutton and turnips. In old French har'foot, har'goyt, and har'gole are found meaning a "morsel," a "piece."

"Et le chevalier tant monta, Détaille et délaisse."

Chambers: Les Tournois, p. 126.

Harlequin. [Happy despatch.] A method of enforcing suicide by disembowelling among Japanese officials when government considered them worthy of death.

Hark Back (To). To return to the subject. "Revenus à vos moutons" (q.v.). A call to the dogs in fox-hunting, when they have overrun the scent.

"Hark [dogs] come back"; so "Hark for'ards!" "Hark away!" etc.

Harlequin means a species of drama in two parts, the introduction and the harlequinade, acted in dumb show. The prototype is the Roman atellina, but our Christmas pantomime or harlequinade is essentially a British entertainment, first introduced by Mr. Weaver, a dancing-master of Shrewsbury, in 1702. (See below.)

"What manner we are of old to love,
The same harlequin is now,
The former was buffoon afore
The latter be a fine old horse."

Scott: The Puppet Show

The Roman mime did not in all correspond with our harlequinade. The Roman numis is described as having a shorn head, a sooty face, flat unshod feet, and a patched parti-coloured cloak.

Harlequin, in the British pantomime, is a sprite supposed to be invisible to all eyes but those of his faithful Columbine. His office is to dance through the world and frustrate all the knavish tricks of the Clown, who is supposed to be in love with Columbine. In Armoric, Harlequin means "a juggler," and Harlequin metamorphoses everything he touches with his magic wand.

* The prince of Harlequins was John Rich (1681-1761).

Harlot. So Charles Quint was called by François I. of France.

Harlot is said to be derived from Harlotta, the mother of William the Conqueror, but it is more likely to be a corruption of harlot (a little hirpling), "hore" being the past participle of hyren (to hire). It was once applied to males as well as females. Hence Chaucer speaks of "a sturdy harlot . . . that was her hostes man." The word "harlot" is another form of it.

"He was gentle harlot, and a kinde:
A better brow to see man no wiser finde."

Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, proo. sec.

"The harlot kng is quite beyond men's arm."

Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, ii. 3.

* Proverbial names for a harlot are Aholibah and Aholah (Ezek. xxiii. 4), probably symbolic characters: Petrowna (of Russia), and Messalina (of Rome).

Harlowe (Charissa). The heroine of Richardson's novel of that name. In order to avoid a marriage urged upon her by her parents, she casts herself on the protection of a lover, who grossly abuses the confidence thus reposed in him. He subsequently proposes to marry her, but Charissa rejects the offer, and retires from the world to cover her shame and die.

Harm. Harm set, harm get. Those who lay traps for others get caught themselves. Haman was hanged on his own gallows. Our Lord says, "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword." (Matt. xxvi. 52.)

Harmless as a Dove. (Matt. x. 16.)

Harmonia's Necklace. An unlucky possession, something that brings evil to all who possess it. Harmonia was the daughter of Mars and Venus. On the day of her marriage with King Cadmos, she received a necklace which proved fatal to all who possessed it.

* The collar given by Alphesibae (or Arsinoe) to her husband Alcmenus was a like fatal gift. So were the collar and veil of Eriphyle, wife of Amphiaratos, and the Trojan horse. (See Fatal Gifts.)

Harmonia's Robe. On the marriage of Harmonia, Vulcan, to avenge the infidelity of her mother, made the bride a present of a robe dyed in all sorts of crimes, which infused wickedness and impiety into all her offspring. Both Harmonia and Cadmos, after having suffered many misfortunes, and seen their children a sorrow to them, were changed into serpents. (Pausanias, 9, 10.) (See Nessus.)

* Medea, in a fit of jealousy, sent Creusa a wedding robe, which burnt her to death. (Europides: Medea.)

Harness. To die in harness. To continue in one's work or occupation till triangle was chosen may have been in allusion to St. Patrick's explanation of the Trinity, or more likely to signify that he was king of England, Ireland, and France. Henry VIII. was the first to assume the harp positive as the Irish device, and James I. to place it in the third quarter of the royal achievement of Great Britain.
Harpocrates

To harp ever on the same string. To be for ever teasing one about the same subject. There is a Latin proverb, Eadem cantilenam rerum. I once heard a man with a clarionet play the first half of "In my cottage near a wood" for more than an hour, without change. It was in a crowded street, and the annoyance became unbearable that he collected a t to move on.

Harp (4 syl.). A miser. Harpa- name of the miser in Molière's called L'Arbre.

H'roe (4 syl.). The cutlass with which Mercury killed Argus; and with which Perseus subsequently cut off the head of Medusa.

Harps (2 syl.). Vultures with the head and breasts of a woman, very fierce and leathsome, living in an atmosphere of filth and stench, and contaminating everything which they came near. Homer mentions but one harpy. He'siod gives two, and later writers three. The names indicate that these monsters were personifications of whirlwinds and storms. Their names were Ocypleta (royal), Celo'no (blackness), and Aril'o (storm). (Greek harpyai, verb harpeazo, to seize: Latin harpya, See Vulpil: Exeunt, iii. 219, etc.)

He is a regular harpy. One who wants to appropriate everything: one who sponges on another without mercy.

"I will . . . do you any kindness rather than hold three words conference with this harpy." Shakespeare: Much Ado About Nothing, ii. 4.

Harpocrates (1 syl.). The Greek form of the Egyptian god Har-pi-kuriti (Horus the Child), made by the Greeks and Romans the god of silence. This arose from a pure misconception. It is an Egyptian god, and was represented with its "finger on its mouth," to indicate youth, but the Greeks thought it was a symbol of silence.

"I assure my mistress she might make herself perfectly easy on that score (his mentioning a certain matter to anyone), for I was the Harpocrates of trusty valets."—Gul Blas, iv. 2 (1715).

Har'sian. A haggard old beldame. So called from the French haridelle, a worn-out jade of a horse.

Har'rier (3 syl.). A dog for hare-hunting, whence the name.

Harrington. A farthing. So called from Lord Harrington, to whom James I. granted a patent for making them of brass. Drunken Barnaby says—

"Thence to Harrington be it spoken,
For name-sake I gave a token
To a banger that did crave it."

Drunken Barnaby's Journal.

"I will not hate a Harrington of the sum,"
Ben Jonson: The Devil is an Ape, n. 1.

Harris. Mrs. Harris. An hypothetical lady, to whom Sarah Gamp referred for the corroboration of all her statements, and the bank on which she might draw to any extent for self-praise. (Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit.) (See BROCkS OF SHEFFiELD.)

"Not Mrs. Harris in the immortal narrative was more quoted and more fearing."—Laid Lytton.

Harry (7vo) = to harass. Facetiously said to be derived from Harry VIII. of England, who no doubt played up old Harry with church property. Of course, the real derivation is the Anglo-Saxon herian, to plunder, from harw (2 syl.), an army.

Harry. Old Harry. Old Scratch. To harry (Saxon) is to tear in pieces, whence our harrow. There is an ancient proverb entitled The Harrowing of Hell. I do not think it is a corruption of "Old Hairy," although the Hebrew Serim (haI\''yoi ones) is translated devils in Lev. xvii. 7, and no doubt alludes to the he-goat, an object of worship with the Egyptians. Moses says the children of Israel are no longer to sacrifice to devils (serim), as they did in Egypt. There is a Scandinavian Hari = Beal or Bel.

Harry Soph. A student at Cambridge who has "declared" for Law or Physic, and wears a full-sleeve gown. The word is a corruption of the Greek Heri-sophos (more than a Soph or common second-year student). (Cambridge Calendar.)

The tale goes that at the destruction of the monasteries, in the reign of Henry VIII., certain students waited to see how matters would turn out before they committed themselves by taking a clerical degree, and that these men were hence called Sophistae Henriciani, or "Henry Sophisters."

Hart. In Christian art, the emblem of solitude and purity of life. It was the attribute of St. Hubert, St. Julian, and St. Eustace. It was also the type of piety and religious aspiration. (Psalm xlii. 1.) (See HIND.)

The White Hart, or hind, with a golden chain, in public-house signs, is the badge of Richard II., which was worn by all his courtiers and adherents. It was adapted from his mother, whose cognizance was a white hind.

Hart Royal. A male red deer, when the crown of the antler has made its appearance, and the creature has been hunted by a king.

Hart of Grease (A.). A hunter's phrase for a fat venison; a stag full of the pasture, called by Jaques "a fat and greasy citizen." (As You Like It, i. 1.) (See Heart of Peace.)

"It is a hart of grease, too, in full season, with three inches of fat on the haunch."—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap. xvi.

Harts. There are four harts in the tree Yggdrasil, an eagle and a squirrel; and a serpent gnaws its root.

Hartnet. The daughter of Ruknaw (the ape's wife) in the tale of Reynard the Fox. The word in old German means hard or strong strife.

Harum Scarum. A hare-brained person who scares quiet folk. Some derive it from the French chameur de Haro (hoo and cry), as if the madcap was one against whom the hoo-and-cry is raised: but probably it is simply a jingle word having allusion to the "madness of a March hare," and the "scaring" of honest folks from their proprieties.

Haruspex (pl. harusp'ices). Persons who interpreted the will of the gods by inspecting the entrails of animals offered in sacrifice (old Latin, harus'go, a victim: specio, I inspect). Cato said, "I wonder how one haruspex can keep from laughing when he sees another."

Harvest Goose. A corruption of Arryst Gou (a stubble goose). (See WAZZ-GoosE.)

"A young wife and an arryst gos, Moche see it [clatter] with beth."—Reliquiæ Antiquæ, ii. 118.
Harvest Moon. The full moon nearest the autumnal equinox. The peculiarity of this moon is that it rises for several days nearly at sunset, and about the same time.

Hash (A). A mess, a muddle; as, "a pretty hash he made of it." A hash is a mess, and a mess is a muddle.

I'll soon settle his hash for him. I will soon smash him up; ruin his schemes; "give him his gruel"; "cook his goose"; "put my finger in his pie"; "make mice - meat of him." (See COOKING.)

Hassan. Caliph of the Ottoman empire; noted for his hospitality and splendour. His palace was daily thronged with guests, and in his seraglio was a beautiful young slave named Leila (2 syl.), who had formed an unfortunate attachment to a Christian called the Giaour. Leila is put to death by an emir, and Hassan is slain by the Giaour near Mount Parnassus. (Byron: The Giaour.)

At Hassan. The Arabian emir of Persia, father of Hinda, in Moore's Fire-Worshippers. He was victorious at the battle of Cadesia, and thus became master of Persia.

Hassan-Ben-Sabah. The Old Man of the Mountain, founder of the sect of the Assassins. In Byrom ’s Fiebera are two letters by this sheik.

Hassock. A dose or footstool made of hey (sedge or rushes).

"Hassocks should be gotten in the guns, and laid at the foot of the eddies . . . where need required." Campbell. Infidels, p. 372.

"The knees and hassock are well suited to divorce." Quaker.

Hat. How Lord Kingsale acquired the right of wearing his hat in the royal presence is this: King John and Philip II. of France agreed to settle a dispute respecting the duchy of Normandy by single combat. John de Courcy, Earl of Ulster, was the English champion, and no sooner put in his appearance than the French champion put spurs to his horse and fled. The king asked the earl what reward should be given him, and he replied, "Titles and lands I want not, of these I have enough; but in remembrance of this day I beg the boon, for myself and successors, to remain covered in the presence of your highness and all future sovereigns of the realm."

Lord Forester, it is said, possessed the same right, which was confirmed by Henry VIII.

* The Somerset Herald wholly denies the right in regard to Lord Kingsale; and probably that of Lord Forester is without foundation. (See Notes and Queries, Dec. 19th, 1885, p. 504.)

On the other hand, the privilege seems at one time to have been not unusual, for Motley informs us that "all the Spanish grandees had the privilege of being covered in the presence of the reigning monarch. Hence, when the Duke of Alva presented himself before Margaret, Duchess of Parma, she bade him to be covered." (Dutch Republic.)

A cockle hat. A pilgrim’s hat. So called from the custom of putting cockle-shells upon their hats, to indicate their intention or performance of a pilgrimage.

"How should I your true love know / From another one / By his cockle-hat and staff, / And his sandal shoe." Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 5.

A BROWN HAT. Never wear a brown hat in Friesland. When at Rome do as Rome does. If people have a very strong prejudice, do not run counter to it. Friesland is a province of the Netherlands, where the inhabitants cut their hair short, and cover the head first with a knitted cap, then a high silk skull-cap, and metal turban, and lastly a huge flaring bonnet. Four or five dresses always constitute the ordinary head gear. A traveller once passed through the province with a common brown chimney-hat or wide-awake, but was hustled by the workmen, jeered at by the women, pelted by the boys, and sneered at by the magnates as a regular guy. If you would pass quietly through this “enlightened” province never wear them a brown hat.

A STEEPL-CROWNED HAT. You are only fit to wear a steep-crowned hat. To be burnt as a heretic. The victims of the Antes-du-Fé of the “Holy” Inquisition were always decorated with such a head-gear.

A white hat. A white hat used to be emblematical of radical prodigies, because Orator Hunt, the great demagogue, used to wear one during the Wellington and Peel administration.

The street arabs of Nottinghamshire used to accost a person wearing a white hat with the question, "Who stole the donkey?" and a companion used to answer, "Him wi’ the white hat on."

Pass round the hat. Gather subscriptions into a hat.

To eat one’s hat. "Hattes are made of eggs, veal, dates, saffron, salt, and so forth." (Robina Napier: Book of Cookery.)
The Scotch have the word hattiti-kit or hatted-kit, a dish made chiefly of sour cream, new milk, or butter-milk.

To hang up one's hat in a house. To make oneself at home: to become master of a house. Visitors, making a call, carry their hats in their hands.

Hat Money. A small gratuity given to the master of a ship, by passengers, for his care and trouble, originally collected in a hat at the end of a good voyage.

Hats and Caps. Two political factions of Sweden in the eighteenth century, the former favourite to France, and the latter to Russia. Carlyle says the latter were called caps, meaning nightcaps, because they were averse to action and war; but the fact is that the French partisans wore a French chapeau as their badge, and the Russian partisans wore a Russian cap.

Hatchet. Put on the hatchet. Figuratively, shut the door. (Anglo-Saxon, here, a gate. Compare haya, a lar or bolt.)

Under hatchet. Dead and buried. The hatchets of a ship are the coverings over the hatchways (or openings in the deck of a vessel) to allow of cargo, etc., being easily discharged.

"And though his soul has gone aloft, His body's under hatchets."

Hatchet. (Greek axia, Latin ascia, Italian accetta, French hachette, our hatchet and axe.)

To bury the hatchet. (See Bury.)

To throw the hatchet. To tell falsehoods. In allusion to an ancient game, hatchets were thrown at a mark, like quoits. It means the same as drawing the long-bow (q.v.).

Hatchway (Lieutenant Jack). A retired naval officer, the companion of Commodore Trumion, in Smollett's Peregrine Pickle.

Hatef (the deadly). One of Mahomet's swords, consecrated to the Jews when they were exiled from Medina. (See Swords.)

Hattemists. An ecclesiastical sect in Holland; so called from Pontin von Hattem, of Zealand (seventeenth century). They denied the expiatory sacrifice of Christ, and the corruption of human nature.

Hatteraak (Dirk). Also called "Jans Janson." A Dutch smuggler imprisoned with lawyer Glossin for kidnapping Henry Bertrand. During the night Glossin contrived to enter the smuggler's cell, when a quarrel ensued. Hatteraak strangled Glossin, and then hanged himself. (Sir Walter Scott: Guy Mannering.)

Hatto. Archbishop of Mainz, according to tradition, was devoured by mice. The story says that in 970 there was a great famine in Germany, and Hatto, that there might be better store for the rich, assembled the poor in a barn, and burnt them to death, saying, "They are like mice, only good to devour the corn." By and by an army of mice came against the archbishop, and the abbot, to escape the plague, removed to a tower on the Rhine, but hither came the mouse-army by hundreds and thousands, and ate the bishop up. The tower is still called Mouse-tower. Southey has a ballad on the subject, but makes the invaders an army of rats. (See Mouse Tower; Pied Piper.)

"And in at the windows, and in at the door, And through the walls by thousands they pour, And down through the ceiling, and up through the floor. From the right and the left, from behind and before, From within and without, from above and below, And all at once to the bishop they go. They have devoured their teeth against the stones. And now they are picking the bishop's bones; They gnawed the flesh from every limb. For they were sent to do judgment on him."

Southey: Bishop Hatto.

A very similar legend is told of Count Graaf, a wicked and powerful chief, who raised a tower in the midst of the Rhine for the purpose of exacting tolls. If any boat or barge attempted to evade the exaction, the warders of the tower shot the crew with cross-bows. Amongst other ways of making himself rich was buying up corn. One year a sad famine prevailed, and the count made a harvest of the distress; but an army of rats, pressed by hunger, invaded his tower, and falling on the old baron, worried him to death, and then devoured him. (Legends of the Rhine.)

Widerolf, bishop of Stralsburg (1197), was devoured by mice in the seventeenth year of his episcopate, because he suppressed the convent of Seltsen, on the Rhine.

Bishop Adolph of Cologne was devoured by mice or rats in 1112.

Frei herr von Güttengen collected the poor in a great barn, and burnt them to death; and being invaded by rats and mice, ran to his castle of Güttengen. The vermin, however, pursued him and ate him clean to the bones, after which his castle sank to the bottom of the lake, "where it may still be seen."
Hatton

A similar tale is recorded in the chronicles of William of Mulsburg, book ii. p. 313 (Bone's edition).

Mice or rats. Giraldus Cambrensis says: The larger sort of mice are called vati. (Itinerary, book xi. 2.) On the other hand, many rats are called mice, as muscul Alpina, the mus Ludens, the mus aquatia, the mus Phareanûs, etc.

Hatton. The dancing chancellor. Sir Christopher Hatton was brought up to the law, but became a courtier, and attracted the attention of Queen Elizabeth by his very graceful dancing at a masque. The queen took him into favour, and soon made him both chancellor and knight of the garter. (He died in 1591.)

"His husky beard, and showstrings green,
His high-crowned hat and satin doublet,
Moved the sweet heart of England's queen.
Though Pope and Ramill could not trouble it."

Hatton Garden (London). The residence of Sir Christopher Hatton, the dancing chancellor. (See above.)

Haul over the coals. Take to task. Jamieson thinks it refers to the ordeal by fire, a suggestion which is favoured by the French corresponding phrase, mettre sur la sellette (to put on the culprit's stool).

Haußmannisation. The pulling down and building up anew of streets and cities, as Baron Haussmann remodelled Paris. In 1863 he had saddled Paris with a debt of about twenty-eight millions.

Hautboy (pron. Ha'bout). A strawberry; so called either from the haut bois (high woods) of Bohemia when it was imported, or from its haut-boys (long-stalk). The latter is the more probable, and furnishes the etymology of the musical instrument also, which has a long mouth-reed.

Hauté Claire. The sword of Oliver the Dane. (See Sword.)

Hautville Colt, at Stanton Drew, in the manor of Keynsham. The tradition is that this colt was thrown there by the champion giant, Sir John Hautville, from Mary's Knolle Hill, about a mile off, the place of his abode. The stone on the top of the hill, once thirty tons' weight, is said to have been the clearing of the giant's spade.

* The same is said of the Gog'magog of Cambridge.

Have a Care! "Prenez garde!" Shakespeare has the expression "Have mind upon your health!" (Julius Caesar, iv. 3.)

Have a Mind for it (7b). To desire to possess it; to wish for it. Mind = desire, intention, is by no means uncommon: "I mind to tell him plainly what I think." (2 Henry iv., act iv. 1.) "I shortly mind to leave you." (2 Henry iv., act iv. 1.)

Have at You. To be about to aim a blow at another; to attack another.

"Have at thee with a downright blow." Shakespeare.

Have it Out (7b). To settle the dispute by blows or arguments.

Havelok (3 syl.), the orphan son of Birkabœn, King of Denmark, was exposed at sea through the treachery of his guardians, and the raft drifted to the coast of Lincolnshire. Here a fisherman named Trim found the young Prince, and brought him up as his own son. In time it so happened that an English princess stood in the way of certain ambitious nobles, who resolved to degrade her by uniting her to a peasant, and selected the young foundling for the purpose; but Havelok, having learnt the story of his birth, obtained the aid of the king his father to recover his wife's possessions, and became in due time King of Denmark and part of England. ("Havelok the Dane, by the Trouvres.

Haver-Cakes. (Oaten cakes (Scandinavian, hafir; German, hofra; Latin, avina, oats).

Haverill (3 syl.). A simpleton, April fool. (French, poisson d'Avril; Icelandic, gyfr, foolish talk; Scotch, haver, to talk nonsense.)

Haverling (Essex). The legend says that while Edward the Confessor was dwelling in this locality, an old pilgrim asked alms, and the king replied, "I have no money, but I have a ring," and, drawing it from his fore-finger, gave it to the beggar. Some time after, certain English pilgrims in Jewry met the same man, who drew the ring from his finger and said, "Give this to your king, and say within six months he shall die." The request was complied with, and the prediction fulfilled. The shrine of Edward the Confessor in Westminster Abbey gives colour to this legend.

Haversack, Strictly speaking is a bag to carry oats in. (See Haver-Cakes.)
Havock (France). A contraction of Le havre de notre dame de grace.

Hawk.

(1) Different parts of a hawk:

Arms. The legs from the thigh to the foot.
Barb. The upper and crooked part of the tail.
Benn. The long feathers of the wings.
Gip. The under part of the tail.
Feathers plummed. Feathers full grown and complete.
Feathers unplummed. Feathers not yet full grown.
Flaps. The next to the longest feathers or principals.
Glut. The slimy substance in the pancake.
Gorge. The crop or crop.
Hapures. The spots on the feathers.
Mailes. The breast feathers.
Nar. The two little holes on the top of the beak.
Pannet. The pipe next to the fundament.
Penet. The toes behind the toes.
Petty single. The toes.
Pommel. The claws.
Principal feathers. The two longest.
Saille. The mews.
Near or near. The yellow part under the eye.
Tram. The tail.

(2) Different sorts of hawk:

Gerfalcon. A Terrell of a tile color is for a kite.
Falcon gentle and Terrell male. For a prince.
Falcons of the rock. For a duke.
Peregrine. For an earl.
Battled hawk. For a earon.
Sure and a Secret. For a knight.
Lances and Lancett. For a squire.
Merlyne. For a lady.
Hody. For a young man.
Godswon. For a common.
Terrell. For a poor man.
Sparrowhawk. For a priest.
Mortyke. For a holy-water jerk.
Kesterel. For a knave or servant.

The "Sore-hawk" is a hawk of the first year; so called from the French, ser or sarpe, blomish-yellow.

The "spur" or "sparrow" hawk is a small, ignoble hawk (Saxon, spure; Goth, spur; our spur, spire, spur, spire, spur, spire, sparrow, sparrow, etc.; Latin, sparsus; all referring to maintenance).

(3) The dress of a hawk:

Bec. The hood or biddle, buttoned to a hawk's legs. The hood itself is called a hawksbell.
Crease. A piece of thread or string fastened to the neck in distinguishing a hawk.
Hoof. A cover for the head, to keep the hawk in the dark. A ruffer hood is a wide one, open below. To hood is to put on the hood. To unhood is to take it off. To unstrake is to remove the strings so that the hood may be in readiness to be pulled off.

Leath. The leather thong for holding the hawk.

(4) Terms used in falconry:

Casting. Something given to a hawk to cleanse her gorge.
Catching. Tending.
Covering. When young hawks, in obedience to their elders, quiver and shake their wings.
Crabrono. Fighting with each other when they stand too near.
Hack. The place where a hawk's meat is laid.
Imping. Placing a feather in a hawk's wing.
Inkle or Ink. The breast and neck of a bird that a hawk preyed on.
Internasting. The time of changing the coat.
Laur. A figure of a fowl made of leather and feathers.
Make. An old stanch hawk that sets an example to young ones.
Mantling. Stretching first one wing and then the other over the legs.
Men. The place where hawks are when mantling.
Mating. The doing of hawks.
Pefor poll. What a hawk leaves of her prey.
Perch. The dead body of a fowl killed by a hawk.
Percy. The resting-place of a hawk when off the falconry whip.
Pennats. Small feathers given to a hawk to make her cast.
Quarrey. The term or some that a hawk flies at.
Rough. Fowl given to a hawk to bring down her staunch.
Shay set. Martyr.
Towing. Ties hung a hawk a leg or wing of a fowl to pull at.

* The peregrine when full grown is called a blue-hawk.

The hawk was the avatar of Ra or Horus, the sun-god of the Egyptians.

See Birds (protected by superstitions.)

Hawk and Handaw. I know a hawk from a handaw. Handaw is a corruption of hermshaw (a heron). I know a hawk from a heron, the bird of prey from the game flown at. The proverb means, I know one thing from another. (See Hamlet, ii. 2.)

Hawk nor Buzzard (Neither). Of doubtful social position—too good for the kitchen, and not good enough for the family. Private governesses and pauperised gentlefolk often hold this unhappy position. They are not hawks to be fended and petted—the "tasselled gentlemen" of the days of falconry—nor yet buzzards—a dull kind of falcon synonymous with dunce or plebeian. In French, "N'ëtre ni chien ni poussin," "Neither flesh, fowl, nor good red herring."

Hawker's News or "Piper's News." News known to all the world. "Le secret de polichinelle." (German höker, a biggler or hawkker.)

Hawkubites (3 syl.). Street bullies in the reign of Queen Anne. It was their delight to molest and ill-treat the old watchmen, women, children, and feeble old men who chanced to be in the streets after sunset. The succession of these London pests after the Restoration was in the following order: The Muns, the Titiré Tis, the Hector, the Scourers, the Nickers, then the Hawkubites (1711-1714), and then the Mohocks—most dreaded of all. (Hawkubite is the name of an Indian tribe of savages.)

"From Mohock and from Hawkbite,
Good Lord deliver me,
Who wander through the streets at night,
Committing cruelty.
They slash our heads with bloody knives,
And on our daughters fall.
And, if they murder not our wives,
We have good luck withal."

Hawse-hole. He has crept through the hawse-hole; or He has come in at the hawse-hole. That is, he entered the service in the lowest grade; he rose from the ranks. A naval phrase. The hawse-hole of a ship is that through which the cable of the anchor runs.

Hawthorn, in floristry, means "Good Hope," because it shows the winter is over and spring is at hand. The Athenian girls used to crown themselves with hawthorn flowers at weddings, and the marriage-torch was made of hawthorn. The Romans considered it a charm against sorcery, and placed leaves of it on the cradles of new-born infants.

The hawthorn was chosen by Henry VII. for his device, because the crown of Richard III. was discovered in a hawthorn bush at Bosworth.

Hay, Hagh, or Haugh. A royal park in "which no man comnons"; rich pasture-land; as Bilhaug (Billa-haugh), Bestwood- or Bestwood-hay, Lindeby-hay, Welley-hay or Wel-hay. These five hayes were "special reserves" of game for royalty alone.

A bottle of hay. (See Bottle.)

Between hay and grass. Too late for one and too soon for the other.

Neither hay nor grass. That hobbin-de-hay state when a youth is neither boy nor man.

Make hay while the sun shines.

Strike while the iron is hot.

Take time by the forelock.

One to-day is worth two to-morrrows. (Franklin.)

Hayston (Frank). The laird of Bucklaw, afterwards laird of Girmington. (See Walter Scott: Bride of Lammermoor.)

Hayward. A keeper of the cattle or common herd of a village or parish. The word hay means "hedge," and this herdsman was so called because he had "ward" of the "hedges" also. (Anglo-Saxon, hege, hay; hege, a hedge.)

Hazel. (See Divining Rod.)

Hazel-nut. (Anglo-Saxon, hæselhnut, from hæsel, a hat or cap, the cap-nut or the nut enclosed in a cap.)

Head. (Latin, caput; Saxon, heafod, Scotch, heafet; contracted into head.)

Better be the head of an ass than the tail of a horse. Better be foremost amongst commoners than the lowest of the aristocracy; better be the head of the yeomanry than the tail of the gentry. The Italians say, "E meglio esser testa di lercio che coda di stincone.”

He has a head on his shoulders. He is up to snuff (g.v.); he is a clever fellow, with brains in his head.

He has quite lost his head. He is in a quandary or quite confused.

I can make neither head nor tail of it. I cannot understand it at all. A gambling phrase.

Mep with heads beneath the shoulders. (See Caba.)

Men without heads. (See Blemmyes.)

The man’s head. Deranged; delirious; extremely excited. Here "head" means intelligence, understanding, etc. His intelligence or understanding has gone away.

To bundle one out head and heels. "Sans cérémonie," altogether. The allusion is to a custom at one time far too frequent in cottages, for a whole family to sleep together in one bed head to heels or prudemandé, as it was termed in Cornwall; to bundle the whole lot out of bed was to turn them out head and heels.

To head off. To intercept.

To hit the mark on the head. You have guessed aright; you have done the right thing. The allusion is obvious. The French say, “Vous avez frappé au but” (You have hit the mark); the Italians have the phrase, “Havete dato in brocca” (You have hit the pitcher), alluding to a game where a pitcher stood in the place of Aunt Sally (g.v.). The Latin, “Réo au telgus” (You have touched the thing with a needle), refers to the custom of probing sores.

To keep one’s head above water. To avoid bankruptcy. The allusion is to a person immersed in water; so long as his head is above water his life remains, but bad swimmers find it hard to keep their heads above water.

To lose one’s head. To be confused and muddle-minded.

To make head. To get on.
Head Shaved. Get your. You are a dotard. Go and get your head shaved like other lunatics. (See Batts.)

"Then think that monarchs never can sit ill, Get my head shaved, poor fool, or think so still." — Peter Pindar: Ode Upon Ode.

Head and Ears. Over head and ears [in debt, in love, etc.], completely; entirely. The allusion is to a person immersed in water. The French phrase is "Avoir des dettes par-dessus la tête."

Head and Shoulders. A phrase of sundry shades of meaning. Thus "head and shoulders taller" means considerably tall: to turn one out head and shoulders means to drive one out forcibly and without ceremony.

Head of Cattle. Cattle are counted by the head; manufacturing labourers by hands, as "How many hands do you employ?" horses by the nose (See Nose); guests at dinner by the over, as "Covers for ten," etc. (See Numbers, HAND.)

Head over Heels. To turn. To place the hands upon the ground and throw the legs upwards so as to describe half a circle.

Heads or Tails. Guess whether the coin tossed up will come down with head-side uppermost or not. The side not bearing the head has various devices, sometimes Britannia, sometimes George and the Dragon, sometimes a harp, sometimes the royal arms, sometimes an inscription, etc. These devices are all included in the word tail, meaning opposite to the head. The ancient Romans used to play this game, but said, "Heads or ships,"

"Cann pauci deparant in subforest fastinatos, captus aut inveniantum testa superius excipiant." — Marcellus Saturnus, t. 7.

Neither head nor tail. Nothing consistent. "I can make neither head nor tail of what you say," i.e. I cannot bolt the matter to the brain.

Heads I Win, Tails you Lose. In tossing up a coin, with such an arrangement, the person who makes the bargain must of necessity win, and the person who accepts it must inevitably lose.

Heady, wilful; affecting the head, as "The wine or beer is heady." (German, heftig, ardent, strong, self-willed.)

Healing Gold. Gold given to a king for "healing" the king's evil, which was done by a touch.

Health. Your health. The story is that Vortigern was invited to dine at the house of Henigist, when Bowena, the host's daughter, brought a cup of wine which she presented to their royal guest, saying, "Was hallo! blaford cynnyng" (Your health, lord king). (See Wassail.)

William of Malmesbury says the custom took its rise from the death of young King Edward the Martyr, who was traitorously stabbed in the back while drinking a cup of wine presented to him by his mother Elfrida.

Drinking healths. The Romans adopted a curious fashion of drinking the health of their lady-loves, and that was to drink a bumper to each letter of her name. Huidibras satirises this custom, which he calls "spelling names with beer-glasses" (part ii. chap. 1).

"Nos in sex syllabis, septem Justinae bians, Quinque Lucias, quinque quatem, tanta tribua," — Martial, i. 72.

Three cups to Ann, four to Kate be given,
To Susan five, six Rachel, Broken seven.

E. G. B.

Heap. Struck all of a heap. To be struck with astonishment. "Eire ahur," the idea is that of confusion, having the wits bundled together in a heap.

Hear. To hear as a hog in harvest. In at one ear and out at the other; hear without paying attention. Giles Firmian says, "If you call hogs out of the harvest stubble, they will just lift up their heads to listen, and fall to their shank again." (Real Christian, 1670.)

Hearse (1 syll.) means simply a harrow. Those harrows used in Roman Catholic churches (or frames with spikes) for holding candles are called in France brousses. These frames at a later period were covered with a canopy, and lastly were mounted on wheels.

Heart. A variety of the word care. (Latin, cura; the heart; Greek, kard; Sanskrit, hrdaya; Anglo-Saxon, heart.)

Heart (in Christian art), the attribute of St. Thereza.

The flaming heart (in Christian art), the symbol of charity. An attribute of St. Augustine, denoting the fervency of his devotion. The heart of the Saviour is frequently so represented.

Heart.

Phrases, Proverbs, etc.

A bloody heart. Since the time of Good Lord James the Douglasses have carried upon their shields a bloody heart with a crown upon it, in memory of the expedition of Lord James to Spain with the Heart of King Robert Bruce. King Robert commissioned his friend to carry his heart to the Holy Land, and Lord James had it enclosed in a silver casket, which he wore round his neck. On his way to the Holy Land, he stopped to aid Alphonso of Castile against Osmyr the Moor, and was slain. Sir Simon Lockhard of Lee was commissioned to carry the heart back to Scotland. (Tales of a Grandfather, xi.)

After my own heart. Just what I like; in accordance with my liking or wish; the heart being the supposed seat of the affections.

"Be of good heart. Cheer up. In Latin, "Fac, bono animo vis:" the heart being the seat of moral courage.

Set your heart at rest. Be quite easy about the matter. In French, "Mettez votre cœur à l'aise." The heart is the supposed organ of the sensibilities (including the affections, etc.).

To break one's heart. To waste away or die of disappointment. "Broken-hearted," hopelessly distressed. In French, "Cela me fend le cœur." The heart is the organ of life.

To learn by heart. To learn memoriter; to commit to memory. In French, "Par cœur" or "Apprendre par cœur." (See Learn.)

To set one's heart upon. Earnestly to desire it. "Je l'aime de tout mon cœur:" the heart being the supposed seat of the affections.

Take heart. Be of good courage. Moral courage at one time was supposed to reside in the heart, physical courage in the stomach, wisdom in the head, affection in the reins or kidneys, melancholy in the bile, spirit in the blood, etc. In French, "Prendre courage."

To take to heart. To feel deeply pained [at something which has occurred]. In Latin, "Perversit nihil animus;" "iniqua animo ferre." In French, "Pren'dre une affaire à cœur." The heart being the supposed seat of the affections.

To wear one's heart upon one's sleeve. To expose one's secret intentions to general notice; the reference being to the custom of tying your lady's favour to your sleeve, and thus exposing the secret of the heart. Lago says, "When my outward action shows my secret heart, I will wear my heart upon my sleeve, as one does a lady's favour, for daws [p. downs, pigeons] to peck at."

Dows = fools, or simpletons to laugh at or quiz. (Othello, i. 1.)

With all my heart. "De tout mon cœur;" most willing. The heart, as the seat of the affections and sensibilities, is also the seat of the will.

Heart-breaker (A). A flirt. Also a particular kind of curl. Called in French Accroche-coeur. At one time loose ringslet worn over the shoulders were called heart-breakers. At another time a curl worn over the temples was called an Accroche-coeur, crise coeur.

Heart-trending. Very pathetic. "Qui déchire le cœur:" the heart as the seat of the affections.

Heart-whole. Not in love; the affections not given to another.

"I am love. ... I give you my word I am heart-whole." - Mrs. W. Scott: Redgauntlet (letter 10).

Heart and Soul. With my whole heart and soul. With all the energy and enthusiasm of which I am capable. In French, "N'y porter de tout son cœur." Mark xii. 33 says, "Love [God] with all thy heart [affection], all thy soul [or glow of spiritual life], all thy strength [or physical powers], and all thy understanding [that is, let thy love be also a reasonable service, and not mere enthusiasm]."

Heart in his Boots. His heart fell into his bow or sunk into his boots. In Latin, "Car illi in genua derelit." In French, "Arra la pour au centro." The two last phrases are very expressive: Fear makes the knees shake, and it gives one a stomach-ache; but the English phrase, if it means anything, must mean that it induces the person to run away.

Heart in his Mouth. His heart was in his mouth. That choking feeling in the throat which arises from fear, conscious guilt, shyness, etc.

"The young lover tried to look at his own... but his heart was in his mouth." - MoreThackeray: Mrs. Dymond, p. 136.

Heart of Grace (To take). To pluck up courage; not to be disheartened or down-hearted. This expression is based on the promise, "My grace is sufficient for thee" (2 Cor. xii. 9): by this grace St. Paul says, "When I am weak then am I strong." Take grace into your heart, rely on God's grace for strength, with grace in your heart your feeble knees will be strengthened. (See Heart of Grace.)
Heaven

Heart of Heart of Hearts (In one's). In one's inmost conviction. The heart is often referred to as a second self. Shakespeare speaks of the "neck of the heart" (Merchant of Venice, i. 7); "the middle of the heart" (Cymbeline, i. 7). The heart of the heart is to the same effect.

Heart of Midlothian. The old jail, the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, taken down in 1817. Sir Walter Scott has a novel so called.

Heart's Ease. The viola tricolor. It has a host of fairy names; as, the "Butterfly flower," "Kiss me quick," a "Kiss behind the garden gate," "Love in idleness," "Pansey," "Three faces under one hood," the "Variegated violet," "Herba Trinitatis." The quotation annexed will explain the popular tradition of the flower:—

"Yet marked I where the bolt of Cupid fell:
It fell upon a little western flower,
Before milk-white, now purple with love's wound.
And madcaps call it love-in-idleness. . . .
The juice of it on sleeping eyelids laid
We may make a man or woman madly dast
Upon the next live creature that it sees."
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, II. i.

Hearth Money. (See Chimney Money.)

Heat. One course in a race; activity, action.

"Fasted Zeval, you saw, set out with a spirited race.
But the last heat Plain Dealing won the race."
Bryden.

Heathen. A dweller on a heath or common. Christian doctrines would not reach these remote people till long after they had been accepted in towns, and even villages. (Anglo-Saxon, heathen, heath. (See pagan.)

Heaven. (Anglo-Saxon, heaven, from heaven, elevated, vaulted.)

The Three Heavens. (According to the Jewish system.) The word heaven in the Bible denotes (1) the air; thus we read of "the firmament of heaven," "the firmament of heaven," and "the clouds of heaven"; (2) the starry firmament, as, "Let there be lights in the firmament of heaven" (Gen. i. 14); (3) the palace of Jehovah; thus we read that "heaven is My throne" (Isa. lxvi. 1, and Matt. v. 31).

* Loosely, the word is used in Scripture sometimes simply to express a great height. "The cities are walled up to heaven" (Deut. i. 28). So the builders on Shinar designed to raise a tower whose top should "reach unto heaven" (Gen. xi. 4).

The Five Heavens. (According to the Ptolemaic system.) (1) The planetary heaven; (2) the sphere of the fixed stars; (3) the crystalline, which vibrates; (4) the primum mobile, which communicates motion to the lower spheres; (5) the empyrean or seat of deity and angels. (See above.)

"Sometimes she deemed that Mars had found above Left his fifth heaven, the powers of men to prove."
Hoole: Orlando Furioso, book xiii.

The Seven Heavens. (According to the Mahometan system.)

The first heaven, says Mahomet, is of pure silver, and here the stars are hung out like lamps on golden chains. Each star has an angel for warmer. In this heaven "the prophet" found Adam and Eve.

The second heaven, says Mahomet, is of polished steel and dazzling splendour. Here "the prophet" found Noah.

The third heaven, says Mahomet, is studded with precious stones too brilliant for the eye of man. Here Az'rael, the angel of death, is stationed, and is for ever writing in a large book or blotting words out. The former are the names of persons born, the latter those of the newly dead. (See below, Heaven of heavens.)

The fourth heaven, he says, is of the finest silver. Here dwells the Angel of Tears, whose height is "500 days' journey," and he sheds ceaseless tears for the sins of man.

The fifth heaven is of purest gold, and here dwells the Avenging Angel, who presides over elemental fire. Here "the prophet" met Aaron. (See below.)

The sixth heaven is composed of Hassania, a sort of carbuncle. Here dwells the Guardian Angel of heaven and earth, half-snow and half-fire. It was here that Mahomet saw Moses, who went with envy.

The seventh heaven, says the same veritable authority, is formed of divine light beyond the power of tongue to describe. Each inhabitant is bigger than the whole earth, and has 70,000 heads, each head 70,000 mouths, each mouth 70,000 tongues, and each tongue speaks 70,000 languages, all for ever employed in chanting the praises of the Most High. Here he met Abraham. (See below.)

To be in the seventh heaven. Supreme happiness. The Cabalists maintained that there are seven heavens, each rising in happiness above the other, the seventh being the abode of God and the highest class of angels. (See above.)

The Nine Heavens. The term heaven was used ancienly to denote the orb or sphere in which a celestial body was supposed to move, hence the number of heavens varied. According to one system, the first heaven was that of the Moon, the second that of Venus, the third that of Mercury, the fourth that of the Sun, the fifth that of Mars, the sixth that of Jupiter, the seventh that of Saturn, the eighth that of the "fix" or firmament, and the ninth that of the Crystaline. (See Nine Spheres.)

Heaven (in modern phraseology) means: (1) a great but indefinite height, (2) the sky or the vault of the clouds, (3) the special abode of God, (4) the place of supreme felicity, (5) supposed residence of the celestial gods, etc.

The heaven of heavens. A Hebrewism to express the highest of the heavens, the special residence of Jehovah. Similar superlatives are "the Lord of lords," "the God of gods," "the Song of songs." (Compare our Very very much, etc.)

"Behold the heaven and the heaven of heavens is the Lord's." - Deut x. 14.

Animals admitted into heaven. (See under Paradise.)

Heavies (The), means the heavy cavalry, which consists of men of greater build and height than Lancers and Hussars. (See Light Troops.)

Heavy Man (The), in theatrical parlance, means an actor who plays foil to the hero, such as the king in Hamlet, the mayor in the provost: four a another; "heavy man's" part as foil to Othello; the "tiger" in the Titre of Leave Man is another part for the "heavy man." Such parts preserve a degree of importance, but never rise into passion.

Heavy-armed Artillery (The). The garrison artillery. The "light-armed artillery" are Royal Horse Artillery.

He'se (2 syl.). Goddess of youth, and cup-bearer to the celestial gods. She had the power of restoring the aged to youth and beauty. (Greek mythology.)

Hecate (3 syl.). The partisans of the vile demagogue, Jacques Réné Hebert, chief of the Cordeliers, a revolutionary club which boasted of such names as Anacharis Clota, Ronsin, Vincent, and Momoro, in the great French Revolution.

Heb'ron, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, in the first part stands for Holland, but in the second part for Scotland. Heb'ronite (3 syl.), a native of Holland or Scotland.

Hecate (3 syl. in Greek, 2 in Eng.). A triple deity, called Phæbë or the Moon in heaven, Diana on the earth, and Hecate or Proserpine in hell. She is described as having three heads—one of a horse, one of a dog, and one of a lion. Her offerings consisted of dogs, honey, and black lambs. She was sometimes called "Tri'sia," because offerings were presented to her at cross-roads. Shakespeare refers to the triple character of this goddess:

"And we fancies that do run
By the triple Hecate's stream."

Midsummer Night's Dream, v. 2.

Hecate, daughter of Persē the Titan, is a very different person to the "Triple Hecate," who, according to Hesiod, was daughter of Zeus and a benevolent goddess. Hecate, daughter of Persē, was a magician, poisoned her father, raised a temple to Diana in which she immolated strangers, and was mother of Medea and Cirē. She presided over magic and enchantments, taught sorcery and witchcraft. She is represented with a lighted torch and a sword, and is attended by two black dogs.

"Shakespeare, in his Macbeth, alludes to both these Hecates. Thus in act ii. 1 he speaks of "pale Hecate," i.e. the mother of Medēa and Cirē, godness of magicians, whom they invoked, and to whom they made offerings.

"Now ... in earth witchcraft celebrates Pale Hecate's offerings."

But in act iii, 2 he speaks of "black Hecate," meaning night, and says before the night is over and day dawns, there

"Shall it be done
A deed of dreadful note," i.e. the murder of Duncan.

N.B. Without doubt, sometimes these two Hecates are confounded.

Hecatomb. It is said that Pythagoras offered up 100 oxen to the gods when he discovered that the square of the hypotenuse of a right-angled triangle equals both the squares of the other two sides. This is the 47th of book i. of "Euclid," called the dulcarnum (q.v.). But Pythagoras never sacrificed animals, and would not suffer his disciples to do so.

Hector. Eldest son of Priam, the noblest and most magnanimous of all the chieftains in Homer's Iliad (a Greek epic). After holding out for ten years, he was slain by Achilles, who lashed him to his chariot, and dragged the dead body in triumph thrice round the walls of Troy. The Iliad concludes with the funeral obsequies of Hector and Patroclus.

The Hector of Germany, Joachim II., Elector of Brandenburg (1514-1571).

You wear Hector's cloak. You are paid off for trying to deceive another. You are paid in your own coin. When Thomas Percy, Earl of Northumberland, in 1569, was routed, he hid himself in the House of Hector Armstrong, of Harlaw. This villain betrayed him for the reward offered, but never after did anything go well with him: he went down, down, down, till at last he died a beggar in rags on the roadside.

Hector (A). A leader; so called from the son of Priam and generalissimo of the Trojans.

Hector (To). To swagger, or play the bully. It is hard to conceive how the brave, modest, noble-minded patriot came to be made the synonym of a braggart and blusterer like Ajax.

Hectors. Street bullies and brawlers who delighted in being as rude as possible, especially to women. Robbery was not their object, but simply to get talked about. (See Hawkriibes.)

Heocuba. Second wife of Priam, and mother of nineteen children. When Troy was taken by the Greeks she fell to the lot of Ulysses. She was afterwards metamorphosed into a dog, and threw herself into the sea. The place where she perished was afterwards called the Dog's grave (cynos- sophistication). (Homer: Iliad, etc.)

(To Heocuba. To the point or main incident. The story of Heocuba has furnished a host of Greek tragedies.

Hedge (1 syl.). To hedge, in betting, is to defend oneself from loss by cross-bets. As a hedge is a defence, so cross-betting is hedging. (E. Hunt: The Town, ix.)

"He [Shadolphin] began to think... that he had betted too deep... and that it was time to hedge."

Hedge Lane (London) includes that whole line of streets (Dorset, Whitchurch, Prince's, and Wardour) stretching from Pall Mall East to Oxford Street.

Hedge Priest. A poor or vagabond parson. The use of hedge for vagabond, or very inferior, is common; as hedge-mustard, hedge-writer (a Grubb street author), hedge-marriage (a clandestine one), etc. Shakespeare uses the phrase, "hedge-born swain" as the very opposite of "gentle blood." (I Henry VI., iv. 1.)

Hedge School (A). A school kept in the open air, near a hedge. At one time common in Ireland.

"These irregular or 'hedge schools' are tolerated only in villages wherein no regular schools exist within a convenient distance."—Barrow: Journal of Education, December, 1882, p. 374.

Hedonism. The doctrine of Aristippus, that pleasure or happiness is the chief good and chief end of man (Greek, hedone, pleasure).

Heel, Heels. (Anglo-Saxon hel.)

Achilles' heel. (See under Achilles.)

I showed him a fair pair of heels. I ran away and outran them.

"Two of them saw me when I went out of door, and chased me, but I showed them a fair pair of heels."

*Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. xxiv.

Out at heels. In a sad plight, in decayed circumstances, like a beggar whose stockings are worn out at the heels.

' A good man's fortune may grow out at heels."

*Shakespeare: King Lear, ii. 2.

To show a light pair of heels. To abscond.

To take to one's heels. To run off.

"In pedes nos conjiciendo."

Heel-tap. Bumpers all round, and no heel-taps—i.e., the bumpers are to be drained to the bottom of the glass. Also, one of the thicknesses of the heel of a shoe.

Heenan. In Heenan style. "By apostolic blows and knocks." Heenan, the Benicia boy of North America, disputed for the champion's belt against Sayers, the British champion. His body and muscles were the admiration of the ring.

Heep (Vighall). An abject toady, malignant as he is base; always boasting of his 'amble birth,' 'amble position,' 'amble abode,' and 'amble calling.' (Dickens: David Copperfield.)

Hegemony (g hard). The hegemony of nations. The leadership. (Greek, hegemonia, from ago, to lead.)
Heliope. The epoch of the flight of Mahomet from Meccah, when he was expelled by the magistrates, July 16th, 622. Mahometans date from this event. (Arabic, hajira, departure.)

Heimdal (2 syl.). In Scandinavian mythology, son of the Nine Virgins, all sisters. He is called the god with the golden tooth or with golden teeth. Heimdall was not an Aes (g. r.), but a Van (g. r.), who lived in the celestial fort Himinsbiorg under the farther extremity of the bridge Bifrost (g. r.), and kept the keys of heaven. He is the watchman or sentinel of Asgard (g. r.), asleep less than a bird, sees even in sleep, can hear the grass grow, and even the wool on a lamb's back. Heimdall, at the end of the world, will wake the gods with his trumpet, when the sons of Muspell will go against them, with Loki, the wolf Fenrir, and the great serpent Jormungand.

Heimdall's Horn. The sound of this horn went through all the world.

Heimdal. The learned humbugs in the court of King Dinu'be of Hissburg. (Grumm's Gods.)

HelMs-KUngis (The). A prose legend found in the Snorra Edda.

Heir-apparent. The person who will succeed as heir if he survives. At the death of his predecessor the heir-apparent becomes heir-at-law.

Heir-presumptive. One who will be heir if no one is born having a prior claim. Thus the Princess Royal was heir-presumptive till the Prince of Wales was born; and if the Prince of Wales had been king before any family had been born to him, his brother, Prince Alfred, would have been heir-presumptive.

Hel or Hela (in Scandinavian mythology), queen of the dead, goddess of the ninth earth or nether world. She dwelt beneath the roots of the sacred ash (sogdvrand), and was the daughter of Loki. The All-father sent her into Helheim, where she was given dominion over nine worlds, and to one or other of these nine worlds she sends all who die of sickness or old age. Her dwelling is Elvid'hir (dark clouds), her dish Hunger (hunger), her knife Sult (starvation), her servants Ganglisti (lusty-feet), her bed Kor (neckness), and her bed-curtains Ulikian'dabol (splendid misery). Half her body was blue.

"Down the yawning steep he rode
That led to Hel's dreary abode.
Grax : Beowulf of Odin.

Hel Kompli. A mantle of invisibility belonging to the dwarf-king Lauria. (German, hehlen, to conceal.) (The Mellenbuch.)

Heldenbuech (Book of Heroes). A German compilation of all the romances pertaining to Diderick and his champions, by Wolfgang von Eschenbach.

Helen. The type of female beauty, more especially in those who have reached womanhood. Daughter of Zeus and Leda, and wife of Menelaus, King of Sparta.

"She moves a goddess and she looks a queen."
Pope: Homer's Iliad, III.

The Helen of Spain. Cava or Florinda, daughter of Count Julian. (See Cava.)

St. Helen's fire (Feu d'Hélène); also called Feu St. Helena (St. Helena's or St. Elmo's fire); and by the Italians the fires of St. Peter and St. Nicholas.

Meteoric fires seen occasionally on the masts of ships, etc. If the flame is single, foul weather is said to be at hand; but it two or more flames appear, the weather will improve. (See Castor.)

Helen of One's Troy (The). The ambition of one's life; the subject for which we would live and die. The allusion, of course, is to that Helen who eloped with Paris, and thus brought about the siege and destruction of Troy.

"For which men all the life they have enjoy Still light, as for the Helen of their Troy."
Lord Byron: Parnassus of Human Learning.

Hel'ena. The type of a lovely woman, patient and hopeful, strong in feeling, and sustained through trials by her enduring and heroic faith. (Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well.)

Hel'ena (St.). Mother of Constantine the Great. She is represented in royal robes, wearing an imperial crown, because she was empress. Sometimes she carries in her hand a model of the Holy Sepulchre, an edifice raised by her in the East; sometimes she bears a large cross, typical of her alleged discovery of that upon which the Saviour was crucified; sometimes she also bears the three nails by which He was affixed to the cross.

Hel'enos. The prophet, the only son of Priam that survived the fall of Troy. He fell to the share of Pyrrhos when the captives were awarded; and because he saved the life of the young Grecian was allowed to marry Andromache, his brother Hector's widow. (Virgil: Aeneid.)

Hel'icon. The Muses' Mount. It is part of the Parnassus, a mountain range in Greece.
Hell

Hellen's harmonious stream is the stream which flowed from Hellen to the fountains of the Muses, called Aganippe and Hip pocrene (3 syl.).

Heligomount (Holy-mouth). The name given by the Anglo-Saxons to December, in allusion to Christmas Day.

Heliological, the City of the Sun, a Greek form of (1) Baalbek, in Syria; and (2) On, in ancient Egypt, noted for its temple of Actis, called Beth Shemesh or Temple of the Sun, in Jer. xiil. 13.

Helios. The Greek Sun-god, who rode to his palace in Colchis every night in a golden boat furnished with wings.

Helieostat. An instrument by which the rays of the sun can be flashed to great distances. Used in signalling.

Heliotrope (4 syl.). Apollo loved Clytie, but forsook her for his sister Leucothoe. On discovering this, Clytie pined away; and Apollo changed her at death to a flower, which, always turning towards the sun, is called heliotrope. (Greek, "turn to sun.")

According to the poets, heliotrope renders the bearer invisible. Boccaccio calls it a stone, but Sollus says it is the herb. "Ut herba equdem nominis mixtis et precatantibusbus legitimis conservata, eum, a quoque gestabint, sublychata visibus obruarios." (Georgic, xi.)

"Ho hope had they of crevera where to hide, Or heliotrope to charm them out of view."

"The other stone is heliotrope, which renders those who have it invisible." — Boccaccio. The Decameron, Novetn. Eighth Day.

Hell. According to Mohammedan faith, there are seven hells—

(1) Jahannam, for wicked Mohammedans, all of whom will be sooner or later taken to paradise.

(2) The Planer (Lutha), for Christians.

(3) The Sanabia (Inflamn), for Jews.

(4) The Blaser (Shit), for Schiias.

(5) The Sarcher (Shah), for Muslims.

(6) The Baroner (Shah), for idolaters; and

(7) The Abyss (Shitsah), for hypocrites.

Hell or Ark. of the Jewish Cabalists, divided into seven lodges, one under another (Joseph ben Abraham Gikatilla)—

(1) Gebernarm
(2) The Gates of Death
(3) The Shadows of Death
(4) The Pit of Corruption
(5) The Mire of Ual
(6) Aliaddon
(7) Sheol

In the Buddhist system there are 136 places of punishment after death, where the dead are sent according to their degree of demerit. (See Ephemem.)

Hell. This word occurs eighteen times in the New Testament. In nine instances the Greek word is Hadés; in eight instances it is Gehenna; and in one it is Tartarus.

Hades: Matt. xi. 23, xvi. 18; Luke xvi. 23; Acts ii. 31; I Cor. xv. 55; Rev. i. 18, vi. 8, xx. 13, 14. (See Hades.)

Gehenna: Matt. v. 22, 29, x. 28, xiii. 15, xvii. 9, xxiii. 15, 33; James iii. 6. (See Gehenna.)

Tartarus: 2 Peter ii. 4. (See Tartaros.)

Descended into hell (Creed) means the place of the dead. (Anglo-Saxon, hirao, to cover or conceal, like the Greek "Hadés," the abode of the dead, from the verb a-eido, not to see. In both cases it means "the unseen world" or "the world concealed from sight." The god of this nether world was called "Hades" by the Greeks, and "Hel" or "Hella" by the Scandinavians. In some counties of England to cover in with a roof is "to hell the building," and thatchers or tilers are termed "helliers."

Lead apex o hell. (See Apex.)

Hell (Rivers of). Classic authors tell us that the Inferno is encompassed by five rivers: Acheron, Cocytus, Styx, Phlegon, and Lethe. Acheron from the Greek achro-ons, grief-bowing; Cocytus, from the Greek kokkon, to weep, supposed to be a flood of tears; Styx, from the Greek styxos, to loathe; Phlegon, from the Greek phlego, to burn; and Lethe, from the Greek lethe, oblivion.

Five hateful rivers bound Inferno round, grief comes the first, and then the Flood of tears. Next loathsome Styx, then liquid flame appears, and Lethe comes last, or blank oblivion. — E.C. B.

Hell Broth. A magical mixture prepared for evil purposes. The witches in Macbeth made it. (See act iv. 1.)
Hell Gate. A dangerous passage between Great Barn Island and Long Island, North America. The Dutch settlers of New York called it Hoell-gat (whirling-gut) corrupted into Hell-gate. Flood Rock, its most dangerous reef, has been blown up by U.S. engineers.

Hell Gates, according to Milton, are nine-fold—three of brass, three of iron, and three of adamant; the keepers are Sin and Death. This allegory is one of the most celebrated passages of Paradise Lost. (See book ii. 643-670.)

Hell Kettles. Cavities three miles long, at Oxen-le-Field, Durham. A. B. C communicate with each other, diameter, about 38 yards. The diameter of D, a separate cave, is about 28 yards.

A is 19 feet 6 inches in depth.
B is 14 feet in depth.
C is 17 feet in depth.
D is 5 feet 6 inches in depth.

(See Notes and Queries, August 21, 1873.)

Hell Shoon. In Icelandic mythology, indispensable for the journey to Valhalla as the obolus for crossing the Styx.

Hell or Connaught (Te). This phrase, usually attributed to Cromwell, and common to the whole of Ireland, rose thus: When the settlers designed for Ireland asked the officers of James I., where they were to go, they were answered "to Hell or Connaught," go where you like or where you may, but don't bother me about the matter.

Hellenodææ. Umpires of the public games in Greece. They might chastise with a stick anyone who created a disturbance. Lichas, a Spartan nobleman, was so punished by them.

Helle'nes (3 syl.). "This word had in Palestine three several meanings: Sometimes it designated the pagans; sometimes the Jews, speaking Greek, and dwelling among the pagans; and sometimes proselytes of the gate, that is, men of pagan origin converted to Judaism, but not circumcised." (John vii. 35, xii. 20; Acts xiv. 1, xvi. 4, xviii. 4, xxi. 28.)

(Roman: Life of Jesus, xvi.)

N.B. The present Greeks call themselves "Helle'nes," and the king is termed "King of the Helle'nes." The ancient Greeks called their country "Hellas;" it was the Romans who misnamed it "Greece."

"The first and truest Hellas, the mother-land of all Hellenes, was the land which we call Greece, with the islands round about it. There alone the whole land was Greek, and none but Hellenes lived in it."—Perryman: General Sketch, chap. ii. p. 21

Helle'niae. The common dialect of the Greek writers after the age of Alexander. It was based on the Attic.

Hellenis'tic. The dialect of the Greek language used by the Jews. It was full of Oriental idioms and metaphors.

Hell'enists. Those Jews who used the Greek or Helle'niae language. (All these four words are derived from Hellenas, in Thessaly, the cradle of the race.)

Hellespont (3 syl.), now called the Dardanelles, means the "sea of Helle's." and was so called because Hellas, the sister of Phryxus, was drowned there. She was fleeing with her brother through the air to Colchis on the golden ram to escape from Ino, her mother-in-law, who most cruelly oppressed her, but turning giddy, she fell into the sea.

Helmet, in heraldry, resting on the chief of the shield, and bearing the crest, indicates rank.

Gold, with six bars, or with the visor raised (in full face) for royalty;
Steel, with gold bars, varying in number (in profile) for a nobleman;
Steel, without bars, and with visor open (in profile) for a knight or baronet;
Steel, with visor closed (in profile), for a squire or gentleman.

"The pointed helmet in the bas-reliefs from the earliest palace of Nimrod appears to have been the most ancient... Several were discovered in the ruins. They were iron, and the rings which ornamented the lower part... were made with copper."—Layard: Nineveh and its Remains, vol. ii. part ii. chap. iv. p. 352.

Helmets. Some of Saragossa were most in repute in the days of chivalry.

Close helmet. The complete head-piece, having in front two movable parts, which could be lifted up or let down at pleasure.

Visor. One of the movable parts; it was to look through.

Bever, or drinking-piece. One of the movable parts, which was lifted up when the wearer ate or drank. It comes from the Italian verb bever (to drink).

Murium. A low iron cap, worn only by infantry.

Mahoulet's helmet. Mahomet wore a double helmet; the exterior one was called al mulawshah (the wretched gardener).

The helmet of Perseus (2 syl.) rendered the wearer invisible. This was the "helmet of Hadès," which, with the winged sandals and magic wallet, he took from certain nymphs who held them in possession; but after he had slain Medusa he restored them again, and presented the Gorgon's head to Athena [Minerva], who placed it in the middle of heregis.
Henricans 598

Helon, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the Earl of Feverham.

Helot. A slave in ancient Sparta. Hence, a slave or serf.

Help. (American.) A hired servant.

Helter-skelter. Higgledy-piggledy; in hurry and confusion. The Latin hilariter-celeriter comes tolerably near the meaning of post-haste, as Shakespeare uses the expression (2 Henry IV., v. 3):—

"Sir John, I am thy Pistol and thy friend,
And helter-skelter have I rode to thee,
And tidings do I bring."

Helve'tia, Switzerland. So called from the Helvetii, a powerful Celtic people who dwelt thereabouts.

"See from the ashes of Helvetia's fate
The whitened skull of old servile Gaul.

Holmes.

Hemp. To have some hemp in your pocket. To have luck on your side in the most adverse circumstances. The phrase is French (Avoir de la corde-dependu dans sa poche), referring to the popular notion that hemp brings good luck.

Hempe (1 syl.). When hemp is spun England is done. Lord Bacon says he heard the prophecy when he was a child, and he interpreted it thus: Hempe is composed of the initial letters of Henry, Edward, Mary, Philip, and Elizabeth. At the close of the last reign "England was done," for the sovereign no longer styled himself "King of England," but "King of Great Britain and Ireland." (See Notarica.)

Hempen Cudle. A hangman's rope.

"Ye shall have a hempen cudle then, and the help of a hatchet."—Shakespeare: 2 Hen. IV., iv. 7.

Hempen Collar (4). The hangman's rope. In French: "La cravate de chèvre."

Hempen Fever. Death on the gallows, the rope being made of hemp.

Hempen Widow. The widow of a man who has been hanged. (See above.)

"Of a hempen widow the kid forlorn."—Shakespeare: Jack Sheppard.

Hemus or Hemus. A chain of mountains in Thrace. According to mythology, Hemos, son of Bo'reas, was changed into a mountain for aspiring to divine honours.

Hens-picked. A man who submits to be snubbed by his wife.

Hen and Chickens (in Christian art), emblematical of God's providence. (See St. Matthew xxii. 37.)

A whistling maid and crowing hen is neither fit for God nor men. A whistling maid means a witch, who whistles like the Lapland witches to call up the winds; they were supposed to be in league with the devil. The crowing of a hen was supposed to forbode a death. The usual interpretation is that masculine qualities in females are undesirable.

Hen with one Chick. As fussy as a hen with one chick. Over-anxious about small matters; over-particular and fussy. A hen with one chick is for ever clutching it, and never leaves it in independence a single moment.

Henochman. Henchboy. The Anglo-Saxon hine is a servant or page; or perhaps henges-man, a horse-man; henges or hengst, a horse.

"I do but beg a little chanceling boy
To be my henchman."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 1.

Hengist and Horsa. German, hengst (a stallion), and Horsa is connected with our Anglo-Saxon word hors (horse). If the names of two brothers, probably they were given them from the devices borne on their arms.

According to tradition, they landed in Pegwell Bay, Kent.

Henna. The Persian ladies tinge the tips of their fingers with henna to make them a reddish-yellow.

"The leaf of the henna-plant resembles that of the myrtle. The blossom has a powerful fragrance; it grows like a feather along 6 inches long, forming a cluster of small yellow flowers."—Hake: Nine Tribes, Abyssinian, chap. i., p. 3.

Henneberg (Countess). One day a beggar woman asked alms of the Countess, who twitted the beggar for carrying twins. The woman, furious with passion, cursed the Countess with the assurance that she should become the mother of 365 children. The tradition is that the Countess had this number all at one parturition. All the boys were named John and all the girls Elizabeth. The story says they all died on the day of their birth, and were buried at Hague.

Hen'ricans or Heinricians. A religious sect: so called from Henri'cua, its founder, an Italian monk, who, in the twelfth century, undertook to reform the vices of the clergy. He rejected infant baptism, festivals, and ceremonies. Henricus was imprisoned by Pope Eugenius III. in 1149.

Henriette (3 syl.), in the French language, means "a perfect woman." The character is from Molière's Feuillante.

Henry (Poor), a touching tale in poetry by Hartmann von der Aur [Our], one of the minnesingers (12th century). Henry, prince of Hoheneck, in Bavaria, being struck with leprosy, was told that he never would be healed till a spotless maiden volunteered to die on his behalf. Prince Henry, never expecting to meet with such a victim, sold most of his possessions, and went to live in the cottage of a small tenant farmer. Here Elsie, the farmer's daughter, waited on him; and, hearing the condition of his cure, offered herself, and went to Salerno to complete the sacrifice. Prince Henry accompanied her, was cured, and married Elsie, who thus became Lady Alícia, wife of Prince Henry of Hoheneck.

Henry Grace de Dieu. The largest ship built by Henry VIII. It carried 72 guns, 700 men, and was 1,000 tons burthen. (See Great Harry.)

Heptætos. The Greek Vulcan.

Heptarchy. (Greek for seven governments). The Saxon Heptarchy is the division of England into seven parts, each of which had a separate ruler: as Kent, Sussex, Wessex, Essex, East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumbria.

He's. The Greek Juno, the wife of Zeus. (The word means "chosen one", hence.)

Hericelës (1 syl.). The descendants of Heracles (Latin, Hercules).

Heralds. (Anglo-Saxon here (2 syl.), an army, and velour, a governor or official. The coat of arms represents the knight himself from whom the bearer is descended. The shield represents his body, and the helmet his head. The flourish is his mantle. The motto is the ground or moral pretension on which he stands. The supporters are the pages, designated by the emblems of bears, lions, and so on.

Herald's College consists of three kings-of-arms, six heralds, and four pursuivants. The head of the college is called the Earl Marshal of England.

The three kings-of-arms are Garter (blue), Clarenceaux and Norroy (purple). The six heralds are styled Somerset, Richmond, Lancaster, Windsor, Chester, and York.

The four pursuivants are Rouge Dragon, Blue Mantle, Portcullis, and Rouge Croix. Garter King-of-Arms is so called from his special duty to attend at the solemnities of election, investiture, and installation of Knights of the Garter. Clarenceaux King-of-Arms is so called from the Duke of Clarence, brother of Edward IV. His duty is to marshal and dispose the funerals of knights on the south side of the Trent. Norroy King-of-Arms has similar jurisdiction to Clarenceaux, only on the north side of the Trent.

"There is a supplementary herald, called 1 Bath King-of-Arms who has no seat in the college. His duty is to attend at the election of a knight of the Bath.

¶ In Scotland the heraldic college consists of Lyon King-of-Arms, six heralds, and five pursuivants.

¶ In Ireland it consists of Ulster King-of-Arms, two heralds, and two pursuivants.

Heraldic Colours. (See Jewels.)

Herb. Many herbs are used for curative purposes simply because of their form or marks: thus, wood-sorrel, being shaped like a heart, is used as a cordial; liver-wort for the liver; the eulaliun, which has yellow juice, for the jaundice; herb-dragon, which is speckled like a dragon, to counteract the poison of serpents, etc.

Herb of Grace. Rue is so called because of its use in exorcism, and hence the Roman Catholics sprinkle holy water with a bunch of rue. It was for centuries supposed to prevent contagion. Rue is the German raude; Greek, róf; Latin, ruta, meaning the "preserver," being a preservative of health (Greek, róf, to preserve). Ophelia calls it the "Herb of Grace o' Sundays."

Herb Trinity. The botanical name is Vinca tricolor. The word tricolor explains why it is called the Herb Trinity. It also explains the pet name of "Three-faces-under-a-hood;" but the very markings of the pansy resemble the name. (See Heart's Ease and Pansy.)

Herba Sacra. The "divine weed," vervain, said by the old Romans to cure the bites of all rabid animals, to arrest
Hercules Secundus

The progress of venom, to cure the plague, to avert sorcery and witchcraft, to reconcile enemies, etc. So highly esteemed was it that feasts called Verbenalia were annually held in its honour. Heracles wore a wreath of vervain when they declared war; and the Druids held vervain in similar veneration.

"Lift your boughs of vervain blue,
Dipt in cold September dew;
And dash the moisture, chaste and clear,
O'er the ground, and through the air.
Now the place is purified and pure."
Mason.

Hercules (3 syl.), in astronomy, a large northern constellation.

"Those stars in the neighbourhood of Hercules are mostly found to be approaching the earth, and those which lie in the opposite direction to be receding from it." — Neuromb: Popular Astronomy, part iv, chap. i, p. 92.

Hercules (3 syl.). A Grecian hero, possessed of the utmost amount of physical strength and vigour that the human frame is capable of. He is represented as brawny, muscular, short-necked, and of huge proportions. The Pythian told him if he would serve Eurystheus for twelve years he should become immortal; accordingly he bound himself to the Argive king, who imposed upon him twelve tasks of great difficulty and danger:

1. To slay the Nemean lion.
2. To kill the Lernean Hydra.
3. To catch and retain the Arcadian stag.
4. To destroy the Erymanthian boar.
5. To cleanse the stables of King Argus.
6. To destroy the cannibal birds of the Lake Sympodia.
7. To take captive the Cretan bull.
8. To catch the horses of the Thracian Diomedès.
9. To get possession of the girdle of Hippolytē, Queen of the Amazons.
10. To get captive the oxen of the monster Gerión.
11. To get possession of the apples of the Hesperides.
12. To bring up from the infernal regions the three-headed dog Cerberos.

The Nemean lion first he killed, then Lernean hydra slew:
The Arcadian stag and monster boar before Eurystheus drew:
Cleanse Argus' stables, and made the birds of Sympodia flee:
The Cretan bull, and Thracian horses, first seized
And then set free:
Took prince of the Amazons' belt, brought Gerión's girdle from Cades:
Fetched apples from the Hesperides and Cerberos from Hades.

The Attic Hercules. Theseus (2 syl.), who went about like Hercules, his great contemporary, destroying robbers and achieving wondrous exploits.

The Egyptian Hercules. (Flourished B.C. 1500.)

The Farnese Hercules. A celebrated work of art, copied by Glykon from an original by Lysippus. It exhibits the hero, exhausted by toil, leaning upon his club; his left hand rests upon his back, and grasps one of the apples of the Hesperides. A copy of this famous statue stands in the gardens of the Tuileries, Paris; but Glykon's statue is in the Farnese Palace at Rome. A beautiful description of this statue is given by Thomson (Liberty, iv.),

The Jewish Hercules. Samson. (Died B.C. 1113.)

Hercules' Choice. Immortality the reward of toil in preference to pleasure. Xenophon tells us when Hercules was a youth he was accosted by two women——Virtue and Pleasure—and asked to choose between them. Pleasure promised him all carnal delights, but Virtue promised immortality. Hercules gave his hand to the latter, and, after a life of toil, was received amongst the gods.

Hercules' Club. A stick of unusual size and formidable appearance.

Hercules' Horse. Arion, given him by Adrastus. It had the power of speech, and its feet on the right side were those of a man. (See Horse.)

Hercules' Labour or The Labour of an Hercules. Very great toil. Hercules was appointed by Eurystheus (3 syl.) to perform twelve labours requiring enormous strength or dexterity.

"It was more than the labour of an Hercules could effect to make any tolerable way through your town." — Cumbler: The West Indian.

Hercules' Pillars. Calpe and Abýla, one at Gibraltar and one at Ceuta, torn asunder by Hercules that the waters of the Atlantic and the Mediterranean Sea might communicate with each other. Macrobius ascribes these pillars to Theseus (the Egyptian Hercules), and Lucan follows the same tradition.

* I will follow you even to the pillar of Hercules. To the end of the world. The ancients supposed that these rocks marked the utmost limits of the habitable globe. (See above, Hercules' Pillars.)

Hercules Secundus. Commodus, the Roman Emperor, gave himself this title. He was a gigantic idiot, of whom it is said that he killed 100 lions in the amphitheatre, and gave none of them more than he blow. He also overthrew 1,000 gladiators. (161, 180-192.)

Hercules of Music (The). Christopher Gluck (1714-1787).

Herculean Knot. A smoky complication on the rod or caduceus of Mercury, adopted by the Grecian brides as the fastening of their woolen girdles, which only the bridgroom was allowed to untie when the bride retired for the night. As he did so he invoked Juno to render his marriage as fecund as that of Hercules, whose numerous wives all had families, amongst them being the fifty daughters of Theseius, each of whom conceived in one night. (See Knot.)

Hereford (3 syl.). (Anglo-Saxon, herc-ford, army ford.)

Herefordshire Kindness. A good turn rendered for a good turn received. Latin proverbs, "Fringulus refulit," "Manus manum lavat." Fuller says the people of Herefordshire "drink back to him who drinks to them."

Heretic means "one who chooses," and heresy means simply "a choice." A heretic is one who chooses his own creed, and does not adopt the creed authorized by the national church. (Greek, hairēs, choice.)

Heretics of the First Century were: the Simonians (so calle' from Simon Magnus), Cerinthians (Corinthus), Ebionites (Ebi'oua), and Nicolaitans (Nicholas, deacon of Antioch).

Second Century: The Basilidians (Basil'iades), Corcondians (Carpo'cra'tes), Valentinians (Valent'i'nius), Gnostics (Knowings Ones), Nicærans, Millenarian, Caristians (Cain), Sethians (Seth), Quarto-decimans (who kept Easter on the fourteenth day of the first month), Cer'donians (Cerdon), Marc'ianus (Mar'cian), Montanists (Mont'anius), Tattianiists (Tat' tian), Alogians (who denied the "Word"), Artemis'tes (Arc'tis'tes), and Angelics (who worshipped angels).

Tatianists belong to the third or fourth century. The Tatian of the second century was a Platonic philosopher who wrote Diacryses in good Greek; Tatian the heretic lived in the third or fourth century, and wrote very bad Greek. The two men were widely different in every respect, and the authority of the heretic for "four gospels" is of no worth.

Third Century: The Patri-panians, Arabari, Aparian, Noranius, Origenists (followers of Origen), Melchizedeckians (who believed Melchisedec was the Messiah), Sabellians (from Sabell'ius), and Manicheans (followers of Mani).

Fourth Century: The Arians (from Arius), Colluthians (Colluth'us), Macedonians, Agnetes, Apollinarisians (Apoll'ina'rius), Timotheans (Timothy, the apostle), Collyriusians (who offered cakes to the Virgin Mary), Seleucians (Seleuc' ius), Priscillianians (Priscillian), Anthropomorphites (who ascribed to God a human form), Jovitians (Jovinian), Marc- lians, and Bonosians (Bono'sus).

Fifth Century: The Pelagians (Pe-lag'ius), Nestorians (Nes'tor'ius), Eutychians (Eu'tych'us), Theopnochites (who said all the three persons of the Trinity suffered on the cross).

Sixth Century: The Presbyterian, Incarnophiliasts (who maintained that the body of Christ was incorruptible), the new Aquitars (who maintained that Christ did not know when the day of judgment would take place), and the Monothelites (who maintained that Christ had but one will).

Herlot. A right of the lord of a manor to the best jewel, beast, or chattel of a deceased esquire tenant. The word is compounded of the Saxon her ('army, grant'), because originally it was military furniture, such as armour, arms, and horses paid to the lord of the fee. (Tanner, c. 89.)

Herm. Busts of the god Hermē, affixed to a quadrangular stone pillar, diminishing towards the base, and between five and six feet in height. They were set up to mark the boundaries of lands, at the junction of roads, at the corners of streets, and so on. The Romans used them also for garden decorations. In later times the block was more or less chiselled into legs and arms.

Hermaphroditus (4 syl.). A human body having both sexes: a vehicle combining the structure of a wagon and cart: a flower containing both the male and female organs of reproduction. The word is derived from the fable of Hermaphro'di'tus, son of Hermēs and Aph' ro'di'tes. The nymph Sal'macis became enamoured of him, and prayed that she might be so closely united that "the twin might become one flesh." Her prayer being heard, the nymph and boy became one body. (Ovid: Metamo'rphoses, iv. 347.)

The Romans believed that there were human beings combining in one body both sexes. The Jewish Talmud contains several references to them. An old French law allowed them great latitude. The English law recognises them. The ancient Athenians commanded that they should be put to death. The Hindus and Chinese enact that every hermaphrodite should choose one sex and keep to it. According to fable, all persons who bathed in the fountain Salmacis, in Caria, became hermaphrodites.

Some think by comparing Gen. i. 27 with Gen. i. 20-24 that Adam at first combined in himself both sexes.

The wife of the constable of Northumberland, who was converted to Christianity by Cunstance, whose bidding she restored sight to a blind Briton. (Chaucer: Man of Law's Tale.)

Hermes or Ermengyl. A Saxon deity, worshipped in Westphalia. Charlemagne broke the idol, and converted its temple into a Christian church. The statue stood on a column, holding a standard in one hand, and a balance in the other. On its breast was the figure of a bear, and on its shield a lion. Probably it was a war-god.

Hermes (2 syl.). The Greek Mercury; either the god or the metal.

"So when we see the liquid metal fall Which chemists by the name of Hermes call."—Rudolf Agricola, book i.iii.

Milton (Paradise Lost, iii. 603) calls quicksilver "Volatile Hermes."

Hermetic Art. The art or science of alchemy; so called from the Chaldean philosopher, Hermes Trismegistus, its hypothetical founder.

Hermetic Books. Egyptian books written under the dictation of Thoth (the Egyptian Hermes), the scribe of the gods. Iamblichus gives their number as 20,000, but Manetho raises it to 36,523. These books state that the world was made out of fluid; that the soul is the union of light and life; that nothing is destructible; that the soul transmigrates; and that suffering is the result of motion.

Hermetic Philosophy. A system which acknowledges only three chemical principles—viz. salt, sulphur, and mercury—from which it explains every phenomenon of nature. (Sir Hermes.)

Hermetic Powder. The sympathetic powder, supposed to possess a healing influence from a distance. The medieval philosophers were very fond of calling books, drugs, etc., connected with alchemy and astrology by the term hermetic, out of compliment to Hermes.

Hero. Daughter of Leona'to, governor of Mess'i'a. Her attachment to Trismegistus. (Sir Kenelm Digby: Discourse Concerning the Cure of Wounds by Sympathy.)

"For by his side a pouch he wore Replete with strange hermetic powder. That wounds nine miles point-blank would solders."

Buder: Hudibras, i. 2.

Hermetically Sealed. Closed securely. Thus we say, "My lips are hermetically sealed," meaning so as not to utter a word of what has been imparted. The French say close-fitting doors and windows "shut hermetically."

When chemists want to preserve anything from the air, they heat the neck of the vessel till it is soft, and then twist it till the aperture is closed up. This is called sealing the vessel hermetically, or like a chemist. (From Hermes, called Trismegistus, or thrice-great, the supposed inventor of chemistry.)

Hermia. Daughter of Egnus, who betrothed her to Demetrius; but she refused to marry him, as she was in love with Lysander. (Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream.)

Hermione (4 syl.). Wife of Leonidas, King of Silicia. Being suspected of infidelity, she was thrown into jail, swooned, and was reported to be dead. She was kept concealed till her infant Per'dita was of marriageable age, when Leonidas discovered his mistake, and was reconciled to his wife. (Shakespeare: Winter's Tale.)

Hermite (The English). Roger Crab. He subsisted at the expense of three farthings a week, or 3s. 3d. per annum. His food consisted of bran, herbs, roots, dock-leaves, mallows, and grass. Crab died in 1680.

Hermite. Peter the Hermite. Preacher of the first crusade. (1050-1115.)

Hermite (2 syl.). Tristrem l'Hermite or Sir Tristan l'Ermit. Provost-marshal of Louis XI. He was the main instrument in carrying into effect the nefarious schemes of his wily master, who used to call him his gossip. (1405-1493.) Sir Walter Scott introduces him in Anne of Carstein, and again in Quentin Durward.

Hermuth or Hormod (2 syl.). The deity, who, with Bragi, receives and welcomes to Valhalla all heroes who fall in battle. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Hero.
Beatrice is very beautiful, and she serves as a foil to show off the more brilliant qualities of her cousin. (Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing.)

Hero and Leander. The tale is that Hero, a priestess of Venus, fell in love with Leander, who swam across the Hellespont every night to visit her. One night he was drowned, and heart-broken Hero drowned herself in the same sea.

Hero Children. Children of whom legend relates, that being deserted by their parents, they were suckled by wild beasts, brought up by herders, and became national heroes.

Heroes scratched off Church-doors. Militia officers were so called by Sheridan. The Militia Act enjoined that a list of all persons between eighteen and forty-five years of age must be affixed to the church door of the parish in which they reside three days before the day of election. It was one of the worst features of the American Constitution that it was not the place of election. Commission officers who had served four years in the militia being exempt, their names were scratched off.

Hero's Age. That age of a nation which comes between the purely mythical period and the historic. This is the age when the sons of the gods take unto themselves the daughters of men, and the offspring partake of the twofold character.

Heroic Medicines. Those which either kill or cure.

Heroic Size. In sculpture denotes a stature superior to ordinary life, but not colossal.

Heroic Verse. That verse in which epic poetry is generally written. In Greek and Latin it is hexameter verse, in English it is tetrasyllabic iambic verse, either in rhymes or not; in Italian it is the ottava rima. So called because it is employed to celebrate heroic exploits.

Herod. A child-killer; from Herod the Great, who ordered the massacre of the babes in Bethlehem. (Matt. ii. 16.) To out-herod Herod. To out-do in wickedness, violence, or rauh, the worst of tyrants. Herod, who destroyed the babes of Bethlehem, was made (in the ancient mysteries) a raving, roaring tyrant; the extravagance of his rant being the measure of his bloody-mindedness. (See Pilate.)

"Oh, it offends me to the soul to hear a profanation, pernicious fellow bear a passion to matters, to very race, to split the ears of the groundlings ... it out-herodes Herod."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, iii. 2

Herald's Death (Acts xii. 23). The following died of a similar disease (phthisis): L. Sylla; Pherecydes the Syrian (the preceptor of Pythagoras); the Greek poet Alcemon, and Philip II. of Spain.

Phthisis is an affection of the skin in which parasites are engendered so numerously as to cover the whole surface of the body. The vermin lay their eggs in the skin and multiply most rapidly.

Hero-crests. The Uzbek Tartars wear a plume of white heron feathers in their turbans.

Herostratus or Krostratos. An Ephesian who set fire to the temple of Ephesus in order that his name might be perpetuated. The Ephesians made it a penalty to mention the name, but this law defeated its object (B.C. 356).

Herring. Dead as a shotten herrying. The shotten herrying is one that has shot off or ejected its spawn. This fish dies the very moment it quits the water, from want of air. Indeed, all the herring tribe die very soon after they are taken from their native element. (See Battle.)

"By sea do herring in no dead so as I will kill him."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2.

Neither barrel the better herrying. Much of a muchness; not a pin to choose between you; six of one and half a dozen of the other. The herrings of both barrels are so much alike that there is no choice whatever. In Spanish: "Quel mais que mes moins, toila la luna es pelas."

Two fellows being like Thracian, and neither better herrying, accused either other, the king Philippus ... sitting in judgment upon them ... condemned both the one and the other with lambschentheem,"—Cassius. Apotheosis.

Herring-bone. (In building). Courses of stone laid angularly, thus: <><>. Also applied to strutting placed between thin joints to increase their strength. Also a peculiar stitch in needlework, chiefly used in working flannel.

Herring-pond (The). The British Channel; the Atlantic, which separates America from the British Isles; the sea between Australasia and the United Kingdom, are all so called.

"He'll plague you now be's come over the herring-pond."—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. xxiv.
Hertford. (Anglo-Saxon, heart-ford), the heart's ford). The arms of the city are "a hart couchant in water."

Hertford, invoked by Thomson in his Spring, was Frances Thynne, who married Algernon Seymour, Earl of Hertford, afterwards Duke of Somerset.

Hertha. Mother earth. Worshipped by all the Scandinavian tribes with orgies and mysterious rites, celebrated in the dark. Her veiled statue was transported from district to district by cows which no hand but the priest's was allowed to touch. Tacitus calls this goddess Cybèle.

Hesione (4 syl). Daughter of Laomédon, King of Troy, exposed to a sea-monster, but rescued by Hercules. (See Andromeda.)

Hesperia. Italy was so called by the Greeks, because it was to them the "Western Land;" and afterwards the Romans, for a similar reason, transferred the name to Spain.

Hesperides (4 syl). Three sisters who guarded the golden apples which Hera (Juno) received as a marriage gift. They were assisted by the dragon Ladon. Many English poets call the place where these golden apples grew the "garden of the Hesperides." Shakespeare: "Love's Labour's Lost," iv. 3 speaks of climbing trees in the Hesperides." (See Comus, lines 402-406.)

Hesperus. The evening star.

"Here twice in morn and occidental damp, Maids, Hesperus hath quenched his steep lamp."—Shakespeare: "As You Like It." II. 1.

Hesychasts. (pron. He-sik-keasts). The "Quietists" of the East in the fourteenth century. They placed perfection in contemplation. (Greek, hesechia, quiet.) (See Gibbon, Roman Empire, iv.) Milton well expresses their belief in his Comus:—

"'Till off converse with heavenly inhabitants,
Begin to cast a beam on the outward shape,
And turn it by degrees to the soul's essence,
Till all be made immortal." (470-471.)

Heterism. (3 syls). Prostitution.

The Greek hetaira (a concubine). According to Plato, "Mere trix speciosa nomine ven admirans denotante," (Plut. et Athen.)

Hetman. The chief of the Cossacks of the Don used to be so called. He was elected by the people, and the mode of choice was thus: The voters threw their fur caps at the candidate they voted for, and he who had the largest number of caps at his feet was the successful candidate. The last Hetman was Count Plottoff (1812-1814).

A general or commander-in-chief. (German, hauptmann, chief man.)

"After the peace, all Europe hailed their hetman, Plottoff, as the hero of the war."—J. S. Hume, "War Reminiscences," chap. xi. p. 146.

Hec-monats or Heg-months. Haymouth, the Anglo-Saxon name for July.

Hewson. Old Hewson the cobbler. Colonel John Hewson, who (as Hume says) "rose from the profession of a cobbler to a high rank in Cromwell's army."

Hexameron (The). The six days of creation; any six days taken as one continuous period.

"Every winged bird was produced on the fourth day of the Hexameron."—W. E. Gladden: "A Seleventh Century," January, 1886.

Hexameter and Pentameter. An alternate metre; often called elegiac verse. Hexameter as described below. Pentameter verse is divided into two parts, each of which ends with an extra long syllable. The former half consists of two metres, dactyls or spondees; the latter half must be two dactyls. The following is a rhythmic specimen in English:

Would you be happy an hour, done well; for a day, read a wedding;
If for a week, run a house; if for a month,
Well a spouse;
Would you be happy six months, buy a horse;
If for twelve, start a carriage;
Happens long as you live, only contentment can give.

E. C. B.

This metre might be introduced, and would suit epigrams and short poems.

Hexameter Verse. A line of poetry consisting of six measures, the fifth being a dactyl and the sixth either a spondee or a trochee. The other four may be either dactyls or spondees. Homer's two epic poems and Virgil's Eneid are written in hexameters. The latter begins thus:

Arms and the man I sing, who driven from Troy by ill fortune
First into Italy came; as far as the shores of Latium.

Roxana was harassed by land, much tossed on the perpetual ocean,
All by the force of the god, and relentless anger of Juno.

E. C. B.

Or rhyming with the Latin,
"Arms illeque came Troje qui primus ab ore bat.
Arms and the man I sing who first from the Phrygian shore is.

Italy Pete profugae, Lavinia venti, &c.

Tossed to the land of Lavinia, although Lavinia's queen didn't mean it."—E. C. B.
Hesperia. A book containing the text of the Bible in Hebrew and Greek, with four translations, viz. the Septuagint, with those of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus. The whole is printed in six columns on the page. This was the work of Origen, who also added marginal notes.

Next. When bale is next, boot is next. When things come to the worst they must soon mend. Bade means misery, hurt, misfortune; next is highest, as next is highest; boot means help, profit.

High-born. Of aristocratic birth; "P'una haute naissance;" "Summo loco natus."

Hiber'nia. A variety of Iarna (Ireland). Pliny says the Irish mothers feed their babes with swords instead of spoons.

"While in Hibernia the labouring swain, Shall pass the plough o'er skulls of warriors slain, And turn up bones and broken spurs, Amazed, he'll show his fellows of the plain The roses of victorious years, And tell how swift the arms that kingdom did regain." Hughes: *House of Nossan.

Hie Ja'ecta. Tombstones, so called from the first two words of their inscriptions: "Here lies . . ."

"By the cold His Jaceta of the dead." Tenyson: *Rigils of the King (Vexille).

Hick'at'hrift (Tom or Jack). A poor labourer in the time of the Conquest, of such enormous strength that, armed with an axletree and cartwheel only, he killed a giant who dwelt in a marsh at Tilney, Norfolk. He was knighted and made governor of Thanet. He is sometimes called Hickory.

Hick'ory. Old Hickory. General Andrew Jackson. Parton says he was first called "Tough," from his pedestrian powers: then "Tough as hickory;" and lastly, "Old Hickory."

Hidal'go. The title in Spain of the lower nobility. (According to Bishop St. Vincent, the word is compounded of hip del Tiata, son of a Goth; but more probably it is hip and dulgo. Hig - child or son, and dulgo - respect, as in the phrase, "Fueras mucho dulgo," to receive with great respect. In Portuguese it is Fidalgo.

Hide of Land (A). No fixed number of "acres," but such a quantity as was valued at a stated gold or tax. A hide of good arable land was smaller than a hide of inferior quality.

Hieroclean Legacy. The legacy of jokes. Hierocles, in the fifth Christian century, was the first person who hunted up and compiled jokes. After a life-long labour he mustered together as many as twenty-eight, which he has left to the world as his legacy.

Higgledy-piggledy. In great confusion; at sixes and sevens. A higgler is a pedlar whose wares are all huddled together. Higgledy means, after the fashion of a higgler's basket; and piggledy is a nicoret word suggested by litter; as, a pig's litter.
High Church. Those who believe the Church [of England] the only true Church; that its baptism is regeneration; and that its priests have the delegated power of absolution (on confession and promise of repentance).

High Days = festivals. On high days and holidays. Here "high" = grand or great; as, "un grand jour."

High Pals'tin or Hifaluten. Tall talk. (Dutch, vertotten, high-flown, stilted.)

The genius of hifaluten, as the Americans call it. . . . has received many mortal wounds lately from the hands of satirists. . . . A quizzical Jenkins lately described the dress of a New York belle by stating that she wore an exquisite hifaluten on her head, while her train was composed of transparent foil-de-rol, and her Petticoat of crambambulli fenced with Brussels three-jot of A No. 1."—Hoghton: Introduction to Josh Billings.

High Hand. With a high hand. Arrogantly. To carry things with a high hand in French would be: "Fit aux choses haut la main."

High Heels and Low Heels. The High and Low Church party. The names of two factions in Swift's tales of Lilliput. (Gulliver's Travels.)

High Horse. To be on the high horse or To ride the high horse. To be overbearing and arrogant. (For explanation see Horse, "To get upon your high horse.")

High Jinks. He is at high jinks. The present use of the phrase expresses the idea of uproarious fun and jollity. "The frolicsome company had begun to practice this conceit and now forgotten pantomime of High Jinks. The game was played in several different places. Most frequently the dice were thrown by the company; and those upon whom he lot fell were obliged to assume and maintain for a time a certain fictitious character, or to repeat a certain number of familiar verses in a particular order. If they departed from the characters assigned . . . they incurred forfeits, which were compensated for by swallowing an additional bungar."—Sir W. Scott: Tur Matteriny, xxxvi.

High Life. People of high life. The upper ten, the "haut monde."

High Places, in Scripture language, means elevated spots where sacrifices were offered. Idolatrous worship was much carried on in high places. Some were evidently artificial mounds, for the faithful are frequently ordered to remove or destroy them. Hezekiah removed the high places (2 Kings xviii. 4), so did Asa (2 Chronicles xiv. 3), Jehoshaphat (2 Chronicles xvii. 6), Josiah, and others. On the other hand, Jehoram and Ahaz made high places for idolatrous worship.

High Ropes. To be on the high ropes. To be very grand and mighty in demeanour.

High Seas. All the sea which is not the property of a particular country. The sea three miles out belongs to the adjacent coast, and is called mere clastum. High-seas, like high-ways, means for the public use. In both cases the word high means "chief," "principal." (Latin, altum, "the main sea;" altus, "high."

High Tea. (A). The meal called tea served with cold meats, vegetables, and pastry, in substitution of dinner. "A well-laid-up table [at High Tea] in London may have cold roast beef at the top of the table, a cold Yorkshire pie at the bottom, a mighty ham in the middle. The side dishes will comprise assorted pickled salmon, pickled chicken (in the season), managnes and potatos, etc. etc. Rivers of tea, coffee, and ale, with dry and buttered toast, sally-lunn, sauces, muffins, and crumpets, jams and marmalade."—The Daily Telegraph, May 4th, 1863.

High Words. Angry words.

Highgate has its name from a gate set up there about 400 years ago, to receive tolls for the bishop of London, when the old miry road from Gray's Inn Lane to Barnet was turned through the bishop's park. The village being in a high or elevated situation explains the first part of the name.

Sworn at Highgate. A custom anciently prevailed at the public-houses in Highgate to administer a ludicrous oath to all travellers who stopped there. The party was sworn on a pair of horns fastened to a stick—

(1) Never to kiss the maid when he can kiss the mistress.

(2) Never to eat brown bread when he can get white.

(3) Never to drink small beer when he can get strong—unless he prefers it.

Highland Ball. Fists and cuffs; to escape the constable by knocking him down with the aid of a companion.

The mute eloquence of the miry road smith, which was vested in their clenched fists, was prepared to give highland ball for their address (Edie Ochiltree).—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary. chap. xlix.

Highland Mary. A name immortalised by Burns, generally thought to be Mary Campbell, but more probably Mary Morison. In 1792 we have three songs to Mary: "Will ye go to the Indies, my Mary?" "Highland Mary" ("Ye banks and braes of bonnie Doon"), and "To Mary in Heaven" ("Thou lingering star," etc.). These were all written some time after the consummation of his marriage with Jean Armour.
Himiltrude

(1788), from the recollection of "one of the most interesting passages of his youthful days." Four months after he had sent to Mr. Thomson the song called "Highland Mary" he sent that entitled "Mary Morison," which he calls "one of his juvenile works." Thus all the four songs refer to some youthful passion, and three of them at least were sent in letters addressed to Mr. Thomson, so that little doubt can exist that the Mary of all the four is one and the same person, called by the author Mary Morison.

"Now brightly and I breathe the staurc,
A weary slave from sun to sun,
Could it the rich reward secure
The lovely Mary Morison."

Highlands of Scotland (The) include all the country on the northern side of a line drawn from the Moray Frith to the river Clyde, or (which is about the same thing) from Nairn to Glasgow.

Highlanders of Athica. The operative class, who had their dwellings on the hills (Duercis).

Highness. The Khedive of Egypt is styled "Your Highness," or "His Highness;"

The children of kings and queens, "Your Royal Highness," or "His Royal Highness;"

The children of emperors, "Your Imperial Highness," or "His Imperial Highness."

Till the reign of Henry VIII. the kings of England were styled "Your Highness," "Your Grace," "Your Excellent Grace," etc., or "His . . . ." etc.

Highwaymen. The four most celebrated are:-

Claude Durand, who died 1670.

James Whity, who died 1691, at the age of 34.

Jonathan Wild, of Wolverhampton (1682-1725).

Jack Sheppard, of Spitalfields (1701-1724).

Hill Terin, in the Law Courts, begins on Plough Monday (q.r.) and ends the Wednesday before Easter. It is so called in honour of St. Hilary, whose day is January 14.

Hildebrand (Meister). The Nestor of German romance. Like Mauris among the heroes of Charlemagne, he was a magician as well as champion.

A Hildebrand. One resembling Pope Gregory VII., noted for subjugating the power of the German emperors; and specially detested by the early reformers for his ultra-pontifical views.

Hildesbrod (Duke). President of the Alsatian club. (Sir W. Scott: Fortunes of Nigel.)

Hildesheim. A monk of Hildesheim doubting how with God thousand years could be as one day, listened to the singing of a bird in a wood, as he thought for three minutes, but found the time had been three hundred years. Longfellow has borrowed this tale and introduced it in his Golden Legend. (See Felix.)

Hill (Sir John), M.D., botanist (1716-1775). He wrote some fables, which called forth from Garrick the following couplet:

"For physic and fables equal there scarce is,
His fables are physic, his physic a fable.""Hill-folk. The Cameronian Scotch Covenanters, who met clandestinely among the hills. Sometimes the Covenanters generally are so called. Sir W. Scott used the words as a synonym of Camerons.

Hill-people or Hill-folk. A class of beings in Scandinavian tradition between the elves and the human race. They are supposed to dwell in caves and small hills, and are bent on receiving the benefits of man's redemption.

Hill Tribes. The barbarous tribes dwelling in remote parts of the Deccan or plateau of Central India.

Hills. Prayers were offered on the tops of high hills, and temples built on "high places," from the notion that the gods could better hear prayers on such places, as they were nearer heaven. As Lucian says, ἐν τοῖς ἑλείνοις ἀκτίσισιν οἴμαι τούς δάκρυς. And Tacitus says, "moxime colo approquique, proximum mortaliun a Deo misquam propius audire." It will be remembered that Balak (Numbers xxii, xxiv.) took Balaam to the top of Peor and other high places when Balaam wished to consult God. We often read of "hills on every high hill." (Ezek. vi. 13.)

"The Greek gods dwell on Mount Olympus.

Himiltrude (3 syl.). Wife of Charlemagne, who surpassed all other women in nobleness of mind.

"Her neck was raised with a delicate rose, like that of a Roman mason in former ages. Her feet were bountiful, her temples with gold and purple bands. Her dress was looped up with jewelled clasps. Her coronet and her purple robes gave her an air of surpassing majesty."—Gregor. Magnan., vii.
Hinde, daughter of Al Hassan, the Arabian ameer of Persia. Her lover, Hafed, was a scholler or Fire-worshipper, the sworn enemy of Al Hassan and all his race. Al Hassan sent her away for safety, but she was taken captive by Hafed’s party, and when her lover (betrayed to Al Hassan) burnt himself to death in the sacred fire, Hinda cut herself headlong into the sea. (T. Moore: The Fire-Worshippers.)

Hinder is to hold one behind; whereas pre-ent is to go before (Anglo-Saxon hinder, behind, verb hinderan).

Hindustan. The country of the Hindus. (Hind [Persic] and Suid [Sanskrit] means “black,” and tin - territory is very common, as Afghanistan, Beloochistan, Parosistan, Francistan, Koordistan [the country of the Koords], Kohistan [the high-country], Kafristan [the infidel country], etc.)

Hindustan Regiment. The 76th; so called because it first distinguished itself in Hindustan. It is also called the Seven and Sixpennies, from its number. Now the 2nd battalion of the West Riding, the 1st being the old No. 33.

Hinselmann. The most famous house-spirit or kobold of German legend. He lived four years in the old castle of Hudemühlen, where he had a room set apart for him. At the end of the fourth year (1588) he went away of his own accord, and never again returned.

Hip (76). A hip means a hyp-o-chondriac. To hip means to make melancholy; to fret; to make one dismal or gloomy with forebodings. Hipped means melancholy, in low spirits.

For one short moment let us cease
To mourn the loss of many ships-
Forget how tax and rates increase,
And all that now the nation hips.

Said: The Dagon! Ballads (A Set-off).

Hip and Thigh. To smite hip and thigh. To slay with great carnage. A Hebrew phrase. (German, Arv und beim.)

Perhaps there may be some reference to the superstition about the os sacrum (q.r.).

And he smite them hip and thigh with great slaughter,-”Judges xx."

Hip! Hip! Hurrah! Hip is said to be a notarica, composed of the initial letters of Hierosolyma Ext Per’dita. Henri van Lnn says, in Notes and Queries, that whenever the German knights headed a Jow-hunt in the Middle Ages, they ran shouting “Hip! Hip! Hurrah!” as much as to say “Jerusalem is destroyed.” (See Notarica.)

Timbs derives Hurrah from the Sclavonic hu-ray (to Paradise), so that Hip! hip’ hurrah! would mean “Jerusalem is lost to the infidel, and we are on the road to Paradise.” These etymons may be taken for what they are worth. The word hurrah! is a German exclamation also.

“Now, infidel, I have thee on the hip” (Merchant of Venice); and again, “I’ll have our Michael Cassio on the hip” (Othello), to have the whip hand of one.

The term is derived from wrestlers, who seize the adversary by the hip and throw him.

“In fine he doth apply one special draft,
Which was to get the pizen on the hip
And having caught him right, he doth him lift
By nimble sleight; and in such wise doth trap,
That down he throw him.” Sir J. Harrington.

Hipp - switches. Coarse willow withes. A hopper is a coarse osier used in basket-making; and an osier field is a hopper-holt.

Hippo. Bishop of Hippo. A title by which St. Augustine is sometimes designated. (334-430.)

Hippocampus (4 syl). A seahorse, having the head and fore-quarters of a Hippocrates. A cordial made of Lisbon and Canary wines, bruised spices, and sugar; so called from the strainer through which it is passed, called by apothecaries Hippocrates' sreeve. Hippocrates in the Middle Ages was called "Typhocas" or "Hippocras." Thus:

"Well knew he the old Esculapians,
And Deitescures, and ecc Hifus,
Old Typhocas, Ha3y, and Galen.
Chancer: Canterbury Tales (Prologue, 431).

Hippocrates' An School. A school of medicine, so called from Hippocrates.
(See Dogmatic.)

Hippocrates' Sleeve. A woollen bag of a square piece of flannel, having the opposite corners joined, so as to make it triangular. Used by chemists for straining syrups, decoctions, etc.

Hippocrene (3 syl.) The fountain of the Muses, produced by a stroke of the hoof of Poignasos (Greek, hippoc, horse; krene, fountain).

Hippogriff. The winged horse, whose father was a griffin and mother a filly (Greek, hippos, a horse, and gryphos, a griffin). A symbol of love. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, iv. 18, 19.)

"So saying, he caught him up, and without wing
Of hippogriff, bore through the air sublime,
Over the wilderness and over the plain.
Milton: Paradise Regained, iv. 541-5.

(See Siren.)

Hippolyta. Queen of the Amazons, and daughter of Mars. Shakespeare has introduced the character in his Midsummer Night's Dream, where he betroths her to Theseus, Duke of Athens. In classic fable it is her sister Antiope who married Theseus, although some writers justify Shakespeare's account. Hippolyta was famous for a girdle given by her father, and it was one of the twelve labours of Hercules to possess himself of this prize.

Hippolytos. Son of Theseus (2 syl.), King of Athens. He was dragged to death by wild horses, and restored to life by Esculapius.

Hippolytus, the cardinal to whom Ariosto dedicated his Orlando Furioso.

Hippomones (4 syl.). A Grecian prince, who ran a race with Atalanta for her hand in marriage. He had three golden apples, which he dropped one by one, and which the lady stopped to pick up. By this delay she lost the race.

Hippothadees. The theologian consulted by Panurge (2 syl.) on the all-important question, "S'il doit se marier?" (Rabelais: Pantagruel, book iii.)

Hired Grief. Mutes and other undertakers' employees at funerals. The Under-sheriff Layton, in his will, desired that he might be "buried without hired grief" (1885).

Hiren. A trumpet. From Peete's play, The Turkish Mahomet and Hyren the Fair Greek. (See 2 Henry IV., ii. 4.)

Hispania. Spain. So called from the Latin word Span (a rabbit), on account of the vast number of rabbits which the Carthaginians found in the peninsula. Others derive it from the Basque Erupa (a border).

Historious. The nom de plume in the Times of Sir W. Vernen Harcourt, now (1890) Chancellor of the Exchequer.

History. Our oldest historian is the Venerable Bede, who wrote in Latin an Ecclesiastical History of very great merit (672-735). Of secular historians, William of Poitiers, who wrote in Latin The Gest of Dдов or Deeds of William, Duke of Normandy and King of the English (1029-1088). His contemporary was Ingulfus, who wrote a history of Croyland Abbey (1030-1109). The oldest prose work in Early English is Sir John Mandeville's account of his Eastern travels in 1356.

The Father of History. Herodotus, the Greek historian (B.C. 484-406). So called by Cicero.

Father of Historic Painting. Polignotto of Thamos (Flourished B.C. 363-335).

History of Croyland Abbey, by Ingulfus, and its continuation to 1118 by Peter of Blois, were proved to be literary impositions by Sir P. Palgrave in the Quarterly Review, vol. xxiv., No. 67.

Histrionic is from the Etruscan word histere (a dancer), histrionicos (ballet-dancers). Hence, histrion in Latin means a stage-player, and our word histrionic, pertaining to the drama. History is quite another word, being the Greek historias, a judge, allied to historiai, to know.

Hit. A great hit. A piece of good luck. From the game hit and miss, or the game of backgammon, where "twe hits equal a gammon."
Hit it Off (76). To describe a thing tersely and epigrammatically; to make a sketch truthfully and quickly. The French say, "La peinture voit saisit la ressemblance en un clin d’œil."

To hit it off together. To agree together, or suit each other.

Hit the Nail on the Head (76). (See HEAD.)

Hitch. There is some hitch. Some impediment. A horse is said to have a hitch in its gait when he is lame. (Welsh, hecan, to halt or limp.)

To hitch. To get on smoothly; to fit in consistently as: "You and I hitch on well together."

These two accounts do not hitch in with each other. A lame horse goes about jumping, and to jump together is to be in accord. So the two meanings apparently contradictory hitch together. Compare prevent, meaning to aid and to resist.

Hivites (2 syl.). The students of St. Bee’s College, Cumberland. (Bee-hives.)

Hoang. The ancient title of the Chinese kings, meaning "sovereign lord." (See King.)

Hooar (37, Fleet Street, London). The golden bottle over the fanlight is said to contain the half-crown with which James Hoare started in business.

Hearstone. A landmark. A stone marking out the boundary of an estate.

Hoeax. (See CANON.)

Hob of a grate. From the Anglo-Saxon verb hohban (to hold). The chimney-corner, where at one time a settle stood on each side, was also called "the hob."

Hob and Nob together. To drink as cronies, to clink glasses, to drink tête-à-tête. In the old English houses there was a hob at each corner of the hearth for heating the beer, or holding what one wished to keep hot. This was from the verb hobban (to hold). The little round table set at the elbow was called a nob; hence to hob-nob was to drink roughly and cosily in the chimney-corner, with the beer lobbed, and a little knobtable set in the snugger. (See HOn NoB.)

Hob’bena.
The English Hob’bena. John Crome, the elder (of Norwich), whose last words were, "O Hob’bena, Hob’bena, how I do love thee!"

The Scotch Hob’bena. P. Nasmyth, a Scotch landscape painter (born 1831).

Hob’biddance (4 syl.). The prince of dullness, and one of the five fiends that possessed "poor Tom." (Shakespeare: King Lear, iv. 1.)

Hobbinol. The shepherd (Gabriel Harvey, the poet, 1545-1630) who relates a song in praise of Eliza, queen of shepherds (Queen Elizabeth). (Spenser: Shepherd’s Calendar.)

Hob’bism. The principles of Thomas Hobbes, author of Leviathan (1588-1670). He taught that religion is a mere engine of state, and that man acts wholly on a consideration of self; even his benevolence acts springing from the pleasure he experiences in doing acts of kindness. A follower of Hobbes is called a Hob’bist.

Hobbler or Chappy. Jean de Munng, the poet, who wrote the sequel to the Romane of the Rose (1260-1290).

Tyrtaeus, the Greek elegiac poet, was called Hobbler because he introduced the alternate pentameter verse, which is one foot short of the old heroic metre.

Hobby. A favourite pursuit. The hobby is a falcon trained to fly at pigeons and partridges. As hawks were universal pets in the days of falconry, and hawking the favourite pursuit, it is quite evident how the word hobby got its present meaning. Hobby-horse is a corruption of Hobby-hunter (hawk-tossing), or throwing off the hawk from the wrist. Hobby is applied to a little pet riding-horse by the same natural transposition as a news for hawks is now a place for horses. (French, hobervan, a hawk, a hobby.)

Hobby-horse. A child’s plaything, so called from the hobby-horse of the ancient morris-dance; a light frame of wicker-work, appropriately draped, in which someone was placed, who performed ridiculous gambols.

"The hobby-horse doth lette prance, Mind Martin and the Morris dance."

Hob’edy-hog, sometimes written Hob’led-hog and Hob’dy-hog, between a man and a boy; neither hay nor grass. Tusser says the third age of seven years (15 to 21) is to be kept "under Sir Hobhard de Hoy."

Hobgoblin. Puck or Robin Goodfellow. Keightley thinks it a corruption of Hob-Goblin — i.e., the goblin Robin, just as Hodge is the nickname of Hobinol, which seems to agree with the subjoined quotation:

"Those that Hobgoblin call you, and sweet Puck,
You do their work, and they shall have good luck."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, u. 1.

Hob is certainly sometimes used for a sprite or fairy, as a hob-lanter—i.e., an anguish or fairy-lantern, but this may mean a "Puck-lanter" or "Robin Goodfellow-lantern."

Hobinol. (See Hobbinol.)

Hoblers or Novellers. Men who keep a light bag that they may give instant information of threatened invasion, or ugly customers at sea. (Old French, hofer, to move up and down; our hobby, i.e., in medieval times hobblers were like the German landlers. Their duties were to reconnoitre, to carry intelligence, to harass stragglers, to act as spies, to intercept convoys, and to pursue fugitives. Spelman derives the word from hobby.

"Sentinels who kept watch at beacons in the Isle of Wight, and ran to the governor when they saw any inflammation to communicate, were called hobblers."—Mo. Luard. (1882.)

Hobnail. When the London sheriff is sworn in, the tenants of a manor in Shropshire are directed to come forth and do service, whereas the senior alderman below the chair steps forward and chops a stick, in token that the tenants of this county supplied their feudal lord with fuel.

The owners of a forge in St. Clements are then called forth to do suit and service, when an officer of the court produces six horse-shoes and sixty-one hobnails, which he used to count before the curia baron till that office was abolished in 1857.

Hob Nob. A corruption of hab nab, meaning "have or not have," hence hit or miss, at random; and, secondarily, give or take, whence also an open defiance. A similar construction is willy nilly. (Anglo-Saxon, habbon, to have; naban, not to have.)

"The curates in their Vice that habbon or pablon [hit or miss] at random." Hobbinol: History of Ireland.

As writes of the weather habbonen hit random, and as the toy [fancy], takes him, discovers the year with fool and fail." Quick Astrologer (1673).

"He is a devil in private ways . . . but no hit is his word, give 't or take 't."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

"Not of Jack Straw, with his rebellious crew,
That set king, realm, and laws at bash or hab [defiance]."—Sir J. Harrington: Epigrams, iv.

Hob's Pound. To be in Hob's pound is to be under difficulties, in great embarrassment. Hob is a clownish rustic, and hoberd is a fool or ue'er-do-well.

To be in Hob's pound is to be in the pound of a hob or hoberd—i.e., paying for one's folly.

Hobson's Choice. This or none. Tobie Hobson was a currier and innkeeper at Cambridge, who erected the handsome conduit there, and settled "seven years" of pasture ground towards its maintenance. "He kept a stable of forty good cattle, always ready and fit for travelling; but when a man came for a horse he was led into the stable, where there was great choice, but was obliged to take the horse which stood nearest to the stable-door; so that every customer was alike well served, according to his chance, and every horse ridden with the same justice." (Spectator, No. 509.)

Milton wrote two quibbling epitaphs upon this eccentric character.

"Why is the greatest of free communities reduced to Hobson's choice?"—The Times.

Hock. So called from Hockheim, on the Maine, where the best is supposed to be made. It used to be called hockamore (9 syl.):

"As unit to bottle as old hockamore."—Montem.

Hock Cart. The high cart, the last cart-load of harvest.

"The harvest swains and wenchers wound.
For joy, to see the hock-cart rowed."—Hervey: Epigrams, p. 114.

Hock-day or Hock Tuesday. The day when the English surprised and slew the Danes, who had annoyed them for 250 years. This Tuesday was long held as a festival in England, and landlords received an annual tribute called Hock-money, for allowing their tenants and servants to commemorate Hock-day, which was the second Tuesday after Easter-day. (See Kemble, chap. xxxix.)

Hock-tide was the time of paying church dues. "Hoke Monday was for the men, and Hock Tuesday for the women on both days, the men and women alternating, with great merriment, obstructed the pan, road with ropes, and pulled passengers to them, from whom they exacted money to be laid out in plough uses."—Brand: Antiquities (Hoke day), vol. i. p. 187.

Hockey. A game in which each player has a hooked stick or handy with which to strike the ball. Hockey is simply the diminutive of hock. Called Shinty in Scotland.

Hocking. Stopping the highways with ropes, and demanding a gratuity from passengers before they were allowed to pass. (See quotation from Brand under Hock-day.)

Hockley-d-the-Hole. Public gardens near Clerkenwell Green, famous for bear- and bull-baiting, dog- and cock-fights, etc. The earliest record of this garden is a little subsequent to the Restoration.

Ho'se Poems. The words uttered by a conjurer when he performs a trick, to cheat or take surreptitiously. The Welsh, hoccu aures (a goblin's trick, our hoar) is a probable etymology. But generally supposed to be Hoc est corpus.

* Ochus Bochus was the name of a famous magician of the North invoked by jugglers. He is mentioned in the French Royal Dictionary.

Ho'used. Hoaxed, cheated, tampered with; as, "This wine is hooused."

"Was ever man so hooused?"
Art of Wheeling, p. 32.

Hod'eken (3 syll.) means Little-hat, a German goblin or domestic fairy; so called because he always wore a little felt hat over his face. Our hidekin.

Hodge. A generic name for a farm-labourer or peasant. (Said to be an abbreviated form of Roger, as Hob is of Rob or Robin.)

"Promises held out in order to gain the votes of the agricultural labourers; promises given simply to obtain the vote of 'Hodges' who will soon find out that his vote was all that was wanted."—Newspaper paragraph, Dec., 1850.

Hodge-podge (2 syll.). A medley. A corruption of hotch-pot, i.e., various fragments mixed together in the "pot-au-feu." (See Hotch-potch.)

Ho'dur. Baldur's twin brother; the God of Darkness; the blind god who killed Baldur, at the instigation of Loki, with an arrow made of mistletoe. Hodur typifies night, as Balder typifies day. (Scandinavian mythology.)

"And Balder's tale of the shining sun
A symbol true hailed forth,
But soon its splendour sanketh down
When Hodur rules the earth"

Friday-Songs: Balder's Hin-Far.

Hog, meaning a piece of money, is any silver coin—sixpence, shilling, or five-shilling. It is probably derived from the larges given on New-Year's Eve called hogmanay, pronounced hog-money.

* In the Bermudas the early coins bore the image of a hog.

Hog seems to refer to age more than to any specific animal. Thus, bears of the second year, sheep between the time of their being weaned and shorn, colts, and bullocks a year old, are all called hogs or hoggets. A boar three years old is a "hog-steer."

* Some say a hogget is a sheep after its first shearing, but a "hogget-fleece" is the first shearing.

To go the whole hog. An American expression meaning unmixed democracy.

"If he means to go the whole hog, or to take only certain joints, and he regulates his price accordingly."

(Men and Manners of America.)

Mahomet forbade his followers to eat one part of the pig, but did not particularise what part he intended. Hence, strict Mahometans abstain from pork altogether, but those less scrupulous eat any part they fancy. Cowper refers to this in the lines:

"With sophistry their cause they sweeten, Till quite from toad to gander taken."

Love of the World Reproued.

Another explanation is this: A hog in Ireland is slang for "a shilling," and to go the whole hog means to spend the whole shilling. (See Hog.)

You have brought your hogs to a fine market. You have made a pretty kettle of fish.

"You have brought your hogs to a fine market"—Hovell (1600).

Hog-Norton. A village in Oxfordshire, now called Hook Norton. I think you were born at Hog-Norton. A reproof to an ill-mannered person.

"I think thou wast born at Hog-Norton, where pigs play upon the organ."—Howell: English Proverbs, p. 16.

Hog in Armour. A person of awkward manners dressed so fine that he cannot move easily. A corruption of "hedge in armour."

Hogg. (See under the word Brewer.)

Hogarth (William), called the "Juliet of Painters" (1695-1764). The Scottish Hogarth, David Allan (1744-1796).

Hogen Mogen. Holland or the Netherlands; so called from Hoge en Mogunlhe (high and mighty), the Dutch style of addressing the States-General.

"But I have sent him for a token to your Low-country Hogen-Mogen."—Butler: Hudibras.

Hogmanay, Hogmena, or Hagemen. Holy month.

New Year's Eve is called hogmanay's night or hogg-night, and it is still the custom in parts of Scotland for persons to go from door to door on that night asking in rude rhymes for cakes or money. (See Hog.)

In Galloway the chief features are "taking the cream off the water," wonderful luck being attached to a draught thereof; and "the first foot," or giving something to drink to the first person who enters the house. A grand bonfire and a procession, in which all persons are masked and in bizarre costume.

King Haco, of Norway, fixed the feast of Yole on Christmas Day, the eve of which used to be called hogg-night, which in the old style is New Year's Eve.

Hogshead, a large cask = 2-pipe or hutt, is a curious instance of the misuse of h. The word is from the Danish Ox-hud (ox-hide), the larger skins in contradistinction to the smaller goat skins. An oxe-hud contained 240 Danish quarts.

Hol Pelloi (The). The poll-men in our Universities, that is, those who take their degrees without "honours." The proletariat. (Greek, meaning "the many," "the general.")

Hotst. Hot with his own petard. Botten with his own weapons, caught in his own trap. The petard was a thick iron engine, filled with gunpowder, and fastened to gates, barricades, and so on, to blow them up. The danger was lost the engineer who fired the petard should be blown up in the explosion.

"Let it work; For he the sport to have the engine Hot with his own petard, and it shall go hard But I will delve one yard below their mines, And blow them at the mean." Shakespeare: Hamlet, ut. 4.

Hoity-toity. (1) Hoity-toity spirits means high spirits, extremely elated and light. Selden, in his Table Talk, says: "In Queen Elizabeth's time gravity and state were kept up... but in King Charles's time there was nothing but Frenchmore [French manners]... toly-polly, and hoity-toity-toi;" where hoity-toity last means lightness.

(2) As an exclamation of reproof it means, Your imagination or spirits are running out of all bounds; hoit-a-toit! hity-fity! "Hoity-toity! What have I to do with dreams?" (Congreve.)

We have the verb "to hoit" to assume; to be elated in spirits, and perhaps hoity-toity is only one of those words with which our language abounds;

as, harum-scarum, titty-totty, namby-pamby, hugger-mugger, fiddle-faddle, and scores of others.

Hoky or Hockey Cake. Harvest cake. The cake given out to the harvesters when the hock cart reached home. (See Hock Cart.)

Holborn is not a corruption of Old Bourne, as Stowe asserts, but of Holeburne, the burn or stream in the hole or hollow. It is spelt Holeburne in Bownaday Book; i. 127 a; and in documents connected with the nunnery of St. Mary, Clerkenwell (during the reign of Richard II.), it is eight times spelt in the same way. (The Times; J. G. Walker.)

He rode backwards up Holborn Hill. He went to be hanged. The way to Tyburn from Newgate was up Holborn Hill, and criminals in ancient times sat with their backs to the horse, when drawn to the place of execution.

Hold of a ship is between the lowest deck and the keel. In merchant vessels it holds the main part of the cargo. In men of war it holds the provisions, water for drinking, etc., stores, and berths. The after hold is aft the main-mast; the main hold is before the same; and the fore hold is about the fore hatches.

Hold. (Anglo-Saxon, hald-an, to hold.)

"He is not fit to hold the candle to him. He is very inferior. The allusion is to link-boys who held, candles in theatres and other places of night amusement.

"Others say that Mr. Hamlet To dominion can't hold a candle." Rossetti.

To cry hold. Stop. The allusion is to the old military tournaments; when the umpires wished to stop the contest they cried out "Hold!"

"Stay on Marsch; And damned be him that first cries, 'Hold, enough!'" Shakespeare: Macbeth, I. 8.

Hold Forth (To). To speak in public; to harangue; to declaim. An author holds forth certain opinions or ideas in his book, i.e., exhibits them or holds them out to view. A speaker does the same in an oratorical display.

Hold Hard. Keep a firm hold, seat, or footing, as there is danger else of being overthrown. A caution given when a sudden change of vis inertiae is about to occur.

Hold In (To). To restrain. The allusion is to horses reined up tightly when running too fast.
Hold Off! Keep at a distance. In French, "Tenez-vous à distance!"

Hold On. Cling fast; to persist. The idea is clinging firmly to something to prevent falling or being overtaken.

Hold Out. Not to succumb to. "Tout fermer; " "l'œil qui ne saurait teurer."

Hold Water (To). To bear close inspection; to endure a trial. A vessel that will hold water is safe and sound.

Hold One Guilty (To). To adjudge or regard as guilty. The French tenir.

Hold One in Hand (To). To amuse in order to get some advantage. The allusion is to horses held in hand or under command of the driver.

Hold One's Own (To). To maintain one's own opinion, position, way, etc. Maintain means to hold with the hand. (Latin, manu tenere.)

Hold the Fort. Immortalised as a phrase from its use by General Sherman, who signalled it to General Corse from the top of Kennesaw in 1864.

Holdfast. Brag is a good dog, but Holdfast is a better. Promises are all very good, but acts are far better.

"Holdfast is the only dog, my duck."
Shakespeare: Henry I, i. 3

Holdfast. A means by which something is clamped to another: a support.

Hole. Pick a hole in his coat. To find out some cause of blame. The allusion is to the Roman custom of dressing criminals in rags (Livy, ii. 61). Hence, a holey coat is a synonym for guilt.

"Hasten, Land of cakes and be that scent Free Mark, the trick to Johnson best of all. If there be a hole in your coat I swear, you tent it.

A child's amuse you taking notes. And, faith, he'll pritit it.
Burns: On the late Cope (Order stand)!

Hole and Corner (business). Underhand and secret.

Holiday Speeches or Words. Fine or well-turned speeches or phrases; complimentary speeches. We have also "holiday manners," "holiday clothes," meaning the best we have.

"With many holiday and lady terms He questioned me."
Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, 1. 3 (Hotspur's defence).

Holopher'nes (4 syl.), called English Henry (in Jerusalem Delivered). One of the Christian knights in the first crusade, slain by Dragut (book ix.).

Holland. The country of paradoxes. The "houses are built on the sand;" the sea is higher than the shore; the keels of the ships are above the chimney-tops of the houses; and the cow's tail does not "grow downward," but is tied up to a ring in the roof of the stable. Butler calls it:

"A land that rides at anchor and is mired.
In which they do not live, but go aboard." Description of Holland.

(See also Don Juan, canto x. 63.)

Holland. A particular kind of cloth; so called because it used to be sent to Holland to be bleached. Lawn is cloth bleached on a lawn; and grass-lawn is lawn bleached on a grass-plat.

Bleaching is now performed by artificial processes.

Hollow. I beat him hollow. A corruption of "I beat him wholly."

Holly used to be employed by the early Christians at Rome to decorate churches and dwellings at Christmas; it had been previously used in the great festival of the Saturnalia, which occurred at the same season of the year. The pagan Romans used to send to their friends holly-sprigs, during the Saturnalia, with wishes for their health and well-being.

Hollyhock is the Anglo-Saxon, holihoc, the marsh-mallow. It is a mistake to derive it from Holy-oak.

Holman (Lieutenant James). The blind traveller (1787-1857).

Holopher'nes (4 syl.). Master Tubal Holophernes. The great sophister-doctor, who, in the course of five years and three months, taught Gargantua to say his A B C backward. (Rabelais: Gargantua, book i. 11)

Holofemus, in Laev's Leabur's Last. Shakespeare satirises in this character the literary affections of the Lyly school. An anagram of Johnes Florio.

Holy Alliance. A league formed by Russia, Austria, and Prussia to regulate the affairs of Europe "by the principles of Christian charity," meaning that each of the contracting parties was to keep all that the league assigned them (1815).

Holy City. That city which the religious consider most especially connected with their religious faith, thus: "Allahabad" is the Holy City of the Indian Mahometans.

Bumvres (3 syl.) of the Hindus. Cusco of the ancient Incas.
Holy Coat

Fez of the Western Arabs.
Jerusalem of the Jews and Christians.
Kairwan, near Tunis. It contains the Omar Mosque, in which is the tomb of the prophet's barber.
Kiev, the Jerusalem of Russia, the cradle of Christianity in that country.
Mecca and Medina of the Mahometans.
Moscow and Kiev of the Russians.
Solovetsk, in the Frozen Sea, is a holy Island much visited by pilgrims.

Holy Coat of Treves, said to be the seamless coat of our Saviour. Deposited at Treves by the Empress Helene, who discovered it in the fourth century.

Holy Communion (The). The fellowship of Christians manifested by their mutual partaking of the eucharist.
The eucharist itself is, by a figure of speech, so called.

Holy Family. The infant Saviour and his attendants, as Joseph, Mary, Elizabeth, Anna, and John the Baptist.
All the five figures are not always introduced in pictures of the "Holy Family."

Holy Isle. Lindisfarne, in the Ger-manc Ocean, about eight miles from Berwick-upon-Tweed. It was once the sea of the famous St. Cuthbert, but now the bishopric is that of Durham. The ruins of the old cathedral are still visible.
Ireland used to be called the Holy Island on account of its numerous "saints."

Guernsey was so called in the tenth century in consequence of the great number of monks residing there.
Rugen was so called by the Slavonic Varini.
Scattery, to which St. Senannus retired, and swore that no female should set foot there, is the one referred to by Thomas Moore in his Irish Melodies,
No. ii. 2.

"Oh! haste and leave this sacred isle
... For on thy deck, though dark it be,
A female form I see."

Holy Land (The).

(1) Christians call Palestine the Holy Land, because it was the site of Christ's birth, ministry, and death.
(2) Mahometans call Mecca the Holy Land, because Mahomet was born there.
(3) The Chinese Buddhists call India the Holy Land, because it was the native land of Sakyamuni, the Buddha
(g.o.c.).
(4) The Greek considered Elis as Holy Land, from the temple of Olympian Zeus and the sacred festival held there every four years.
(5) In America each of the strange politic-religious sects calls its own settlement pretty much the same thing. (See Holy City.)

Holy League (The). A combination formed by Pope Julius II. with Louis
XII. of France, Maximilian of Germany,
Ferdinand III. of Spain, and various Italian princes, against the republic of Venice in 1508.
There was another league so called in the reign of Henri III. of France, in 1376, under the auspices of Henri de Guise, "for the defence of the Holy Catholic Church against the encroachments of the reformers." The Pope gave it his sanction, but its true strength lay in Felipe II. of Spain.

Holy Orders, in the English Church, are those of priest and deacon. In the Roman Church the term includes the sub-deacon. (See Minor Orders.)

Holy Places. Places in which the chief events of our Saviour's life occurred, such as the Sepulchre, Gethsemane, the Supper-room, the Church of the Ascension, the tomb of the Virgin, and so on.

Holy Thursday. The day of our Lord's ascension.

Holy Saturday. The Saturday before Easter Sunday.

Holy Wars are to extirpate "heresy," or to extend what the state supposes to be the one true religion. The Crusades, the Thirty Years' War, the wars against the Albigenses, etc., were so called.

Holy Water. Water blessed by a priest or bishop for holy uses.
As the devil loves holy water; i.e., not at all. This proverb arose from the employment of holy water in exorcisms in the Holy Church.

"I love him as the devil loves holy water."

Holy Week. The last seven days of Passion Week or the Great Week. It begins on Palm Sunday, and ends with Holy Saturday (g.o.c.). The fourth day is called "Spy Wednesday;" the fifth is "Maundy Thursday;" the sixth is "Good Friday;" and the last, "Holy Saturday" or the "Great Sabbath."

Holy Week has been called Hebdomada Maxi-
Gaudiem (Great Week), Hebdomada Passionis; Hebdomada
Lugubris (Solemn Week); Hebdomada Penitenttiae; Hebdomada Indulgentiarum; Hebdomada Luctuorum; Hebdomada Nigra; and Hebdomada Vita.

Holy Writ. The Bible.
Holy Maid of Kent (The). Elizabeth Barton, who incited the Roman Catholics to resist the progress of the Reformation, and pretended to act under direct inspiration. She was hanged at Tyburn in 1534.

Holy of Holies (The). The innermost apartment of the Jewish temple, in which the ark of the covenant was kept, and into which only the High Priest was allowed to enter, and that but once a year—the day of atonement.

Holy Water Sprinkler. A military club set with spikes. So called facetiously because it makes the blood to flow as water sprinkled by an asperrillum.

Holywell Street (London). Fitzstephen, in his description of London in the reign of Henry II, speaks of “the excellent springs at a small distance from the city,” whose waters are most sweet, sublimurious, and clear, and whose runnels murmur over the shining stones. “Among these are Holywell, Clerkenwell, and St. Clement’s well.”

Holystone. A soft sandstone used for scrubbing the decks of vessels.

Home (1 syl.). (Anglo-Saxon, ēam.) Our long home, the grave.

Who goes home? When the House of Commons breaks up at night the door-keeper asks this question of the members. In bygone days all members going in the direction of the Speaker’s residence went in a body to see him safe home. The question is still asked, but is a mere relic of antiquity.

Home, Sweet Home. Words by John Howard Payne (an American), introduced in the melodrama called The Maid of Milan.

Homer. Called Melensigenês (q.r.); the Man of Chios (or Cyprus), the Blind Old Man; Meconides (q.r.), or Meconius, either from his father Mecon, or because he was a native of Mecon (Lydia). He is spoken of as Meconius senex, and his poems as Meconian charae or Meconian curae.

The Casked Homer. An edition corrected by Aristotle, which Alexander the Great always carried about with him, and laid under his pillow at night with his sword. After the battle of Arbela, a golden casket richly studded with gems was found in the tent of Darius; and Alexander being asked to what purpose it should be assigned, replied, “There is but one thing in the world worthy of so costly a depository,” saying which he placed therein his edition of Homer.

The British Homer. Milton (1608-74), The Celtic Homer. Ossian, son of Fingal, King of Morven.

The Homer of dramatic poets. Shakespeare is so called by Dryden. (1654-1616.)

“Shakespeare was the Homer of our dramatic poets; Johnson was the Virgil. I admire rare Ben, but I love Shakespeare.”—Dryden.

Homer of Ferrara. Ariosto is so called by Tasso (1474-1533).

Homer of the Franks. Charlemagne called Angilbert his Homer (died 814).

The Oriental Homer. Firdusi, the Persian poet, who wrote the Chah Nameh (or history of the Persian kings). It contains 120,000 verses, and was the work of thirty years (940-1020).

The Homer of philosophers. Plato (c.c. 429-347).

The prose Homer of human nature. Henry Fielding; so called by Byron. (1707-1768.)

The Scottish Homer. William Wilkie, author of The Engfound (1721-1772).

Homer a Cure for the Ague. It was an old superstition that if the fourth book of the Iliad was laid under the head of a patient suffering from quartan ague it would cure him at once. Socrates Sammonicus, preceptor of Gordian and a noted physician, vouches for this remedy.

“Me Iliades quantum sequere thventi! pec de Maa.”

* The subject of this book is as follows: While Agamemnon adjudges that Menelaus is the winner, and that the Trojans were bound to yield, according to their compact, Pandaros draws his bow, wounds Menelaus, and the battle becomes general. The reason why this book was selected is because it contains the cure of Menelaus by Machaon, “a son of Asclepius.”

Homer in a Nutshell. Cicero says that himself saw Homer’s Iliad enclosed in a nutshell.

Homer Sometimes Nods.

“Quantaque homo dormitat Homereos.”

Homer: Ars Poetica (358)

Homer’s Critic.

Dorotheus spent his whole life trying to elucidate one single word of Homer. Zoilos (3 syl.), the grammarians, was called “Homer’s Scourge” (Homéronmaicy), because he assailed the Iliad and Odyssey with merciless severity.

As some deny that Shakespeare is the author of the plays which are generally ascribed to him, so Wolf, a German critic (1759-1834), in his Prolegomena ad Homeri, denies that Homer was the author of the Iliad and Odyssey.

_Homerio Verse._ Hexameter verse; so called because Homer adopted it in his two great epics. (See Hexameter Verse.)

_Homoepathy_ (5 syl.). The plan of curing a disease by very minute doses of a medicine which would in healthy persons produce the very same disease. The principle of vaccination is a sort of homeopathy, only it is producing in a healthy person a mitigated form of the disease guarded against. You impart a mild form of small-pox to prevent the patient from taking the virulent disease. (Greek, homoo, like, disease.) (See Hahnemann.)

"Tut, madam! one fire burns out another's burning!"

One pain is lessened by another's anguish. . . .

Take then some new infection to thy eye.
And the rank poison of the old will die."—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 2.

_Honest_ (a silent). Honest Jack Bannister. An actor in London for thirty-six years. (1760-1830.)

"After his retirement he was twice accorded by Sir George Rose, when Honest Jack, being on the other side of the street, cried out, 'Stop! moment; Sir George, and I will come over to you.' "No, no, replied his friend, 'I never yet made you even, and will not begin now.'—Gurnet: Rules ofBeauty.

_Honest George._ General Monk (1608-1770).

_Honest Lawyer_ (Ab). The oldest allusion to this strange expression is the epigram on St. Ives (1251-1303), of whom Dom Lobineau says: "If distribuant avec une santé prodigieuse aux pauvres les revenus de son bienfais et ceux de son patrimoine, qui étaient de 4,60 de rente, alors une somme très notable, particulièrement en Basse Bretagne." (Lives of the Saints of Great Britain.)

"Sacros Sanctus Erat.\footnote{Adventures et Contes Populaires.}"

St. Ives was of the land of beef.\footnote{Adventures, et contes populaires.}

An advocate, and not a thief.\footnote{A stretch on popular truth.}

The phrase was facetiously applied by some wag to Sir John Strange, Master of the Rolls, who died, at the age of fifty-eight, in 1704.

"Here lies an honest lawyer that is strange."

"Of course this line forms no part of the inscription in Leyton churchyard, Essex, where Sir John was buried.

_Honey Madness._ There is a rhododendron about Trebizond, the flowers of which the bees are fond of, but if anyone eats the honey he becomes mad. (Tournesol.)

_Honey Soap_ contains no portion of honey. Some is made from the finest yellow soap; and some is a mixture of palm-oil soap, olive-soap, and card-soap. It is scented with oil of verbena, rose-geranium, ginger-grass, bergamot, etc.

_Honey better than Vinegar._ "On prend plus de monchies avec du miel, qu'avec du vinazig." "Plus faut douceur que violence." "Il faut avant manueur bête par doucure." It is better to be preserved in vinegar than to rot in honey. It is better to suffer affliction if thereby the heart is brought to God, than to lose body and soul by worldly indulgences.

_Honeycomb._ The hexagonal shape of the bees' cells is generally ascribed to the instinctive skill of the bee, but is simply the ordinary result of mechanical laws. Solitary bees always make cylindrical cells; and without doubt those of hive bees are made cylindrical, but acquire their hexagonal form by mechanical pressure. Dr. Wollaston says all cylinders made of soft, pliable materials become hexagonal under such circumstances. The cells of trees are circular towards the extremity, but hexagonal in the centre of the substance, and the cellular membranes of all vegetables are hexagonal also. (See Ant.)

_Will Honeycomb._ A fine gentleman. One of the members of the imaginary club from which the Spectator issued.

_Honeydew._ A sweet substance found on lime-trees and some other plants. Bees and ants are fond of it. It is a curious misnomer, as it is the excretion of the aphid or vine-fly. The way it is excreted is this: the ant beats with its antennae the abdomen of the aphid, which lifts up the part beaten, and excretes a limpid drop of sweet juice called honeydew.

_Honeymoon._ The month after marriage, or so much of it as is spent away from home; so called from the practice of the ancient Teutons of drinking honey-wine (hydromel) for thirty days after marriage. Attila, the Hun, indulged so freely in hydromel at his wedding-feast that he died.

"It was the custom of the higher order of the Teutons . . . to drink mead or meethgele (a beverage made from honey) for thirty days after every wedding. From this comes the expression 'to spend the honeymoon'"—W. Paley: Mythological Compendium, § 14. 145.
Honours

Honours. A yeo-nay type, illustrative of what Dr. Young says: "What is mere good nature but a fool?" (Goldsmith: The Good-natured Man.)

Hong Merchants. Those merchants who were alone permitted by the government of China to trade with China, till the restriction was abolished in 1842. The Chinese applied the word hong to the foreign factories situated at Canton.

Hon. Homo sat qui mal y pene (Evil be to him) who thinks evil of this. The tradition is that Edward III. gave a grand court ball, and one of the ladies present was the beautiful Countess of Salisbury, whose garter of blue ribbon accidentally fell off. The king saw a significant smile among the guests, and gallantly came to the rescue "Hon. homo sat qui mal y pene" (Shame to him who thinks shame of this accident), cried the monarch. Then, binding the ribbon round his own knee, he added, "I will bring it about that the proudest noble in the realm shall think it an honour to wear this band." The incident determined him to abandon his plan of forming an order of the Round Table, and he formed instead the order of the "Garter." (Tight and Davis: Annals of Windsor.)

Honour (h silent). A superior attribute, on which other lordships or manners depend by the performance of customary services.

An affair of honour. A dispute to be settled by a duel. Duels were generally provoked by offences against the arbitrary rules of etiquette, courtesy, or fashion, called the "laws of honour," and, as these offences were not recognised in the law courts, they were settled by private combat.

Debts of honour. Debts contracted by betting, gambling, or verbal promise. As these debts cannot be enforced by law, but depend solely on good faith, they are called debts of honour.

Laws of honour. Certain arbitrary rules which the fashionable world tacitly admits; they wholly regard department, and have nothing to do with moral offences. Breaches of this code are punished by duels, expulsion from society, or suspension called "sending to Coventry" (q.c.).

Point of honour. An obligation which is binding because its violation would offend some conscientious scruple or notion of self-respect.

Word of honour. A pledge which cannot be violated without placing the breaker of it beyond the pale of respectability and good society.

Honour and Glory Griffiths. Capt. Griffiths (in the reign of William IV.) was so called, because all his despatches were addressed "To their Honours and Glories at the Admiralty."

Honour paid to Learning. Dionysius, King of Syracuse, wishing to see Plato sent the finest galley in his kingdom royally equipped, and stored with every conceivable luxury to fetch him; and, on landing, the philosopher found the royal state carriage waiting to convey him to the palace.

Ben Jonson, in 1619, made a journey from London to Scotland expressly to see William Drummond, the Scotch poet.

Honours (h silent). Crushed by his honours. The allusion is to the Roman consul who agreed to open the gates of Rome to King Tatius, provided his soldiers would give him the ornaments which they wore on their arms. As they entered they threw their shields on her and crushed her, saying as they did so, "These are the ornaments worn by Sabines on their arms." Roman story says the maid was named Tarpeia, and that she was the daughter of Tarpeius, the governor of the citadel.

Dionysus, the Athenian legislator, was crushed to death in the theatre of Dionysus, by the number of caps and cloaks showered on him by the audience, as a mark of their high appreciation of his merits.

Elagabalus, the Roman Emperor, invited the leading men of Rome to a banquet, and, under the pretence of showing them honour, shaved roses upon them. But the shower continued till they were all buried and smothered by the flowers.

Two or four by honours. A term in whist. If two "partners" hold three court cards, they score two points; if they hold four court cards, they score four points. These are honour points, or points not won by the merit of play, but by courtesy and laws of honour. The phrases mean, "I score or claim two points by right of honours," and "I score or claim four points by right of four court or honour cards."

Honours of War. The privilege allowed to an honoured enemy, on capitulation, of being permitted to retain their offensive arms. This is the highest honour a victor can pay a vanquished foe. Sometimes the soldiers so honoured are required to pile arms; in other cases they are allowed to march with all their arms, drums beating, and colours flying.

Hood.  'Tis not the hood that makes the monk (Cunct?lus non fact? mon?achum). We must not be deceived by appearances, or take for granted that things and persons are what they seem to be.

'They should be good men; their affairs are But all hoods make not monks." Shakespeare, Henry VIII.

Hood (Robin). Introduced by Sir Walter Scott in Ivanhoe. (See Robin.)

Hoods (Anglo-Saxon hôd).
- Black silk without lining: M.A. Cambridge, non Regius (abolished 1838); D.D. Cambridge, Oxford, Dublin.
- Black stuff, with broad white fur trimming: B.A. or L.L.D. Cambridge.
- Black coated silk, with narrow white fur trimming: B.A. Oxford.
- Black silk hood, with lining: With white silk lining, M.A. Cambridge; with dark red silk lining, M.A. Oxford; with dark blue silk lining, Dublin; with russet-brown lining, M.A. London.
- Blue silk hood, with white fur trimming: B.C.L. Oxford.
- Brown (silk or stuff) hood, edged with russet-brown, B.A. London.
- Scarlet cloth hood: Lined with crimson silk, D.C.L. Oxford; lined with pink silk, D.C.L. Dublin; lined with pink silk, D.D. Cambridge; lined with black silk, D.D. Oxford; lined with light cherry-coloured silk, L.L.D. Cambridge.
- Scarlet cashmere hood: Lined with silk, D.D. Dublin; Lined with white silk, D.C.L. Durham.

Violet hoods are St. Andrew’s. "The longer the hood the higher the degree: thus, a bachelor’s hood only reaches to the thighs, but a doctor’s hood reaches to the heels.

Hoodium (American slang). A Californian rough.

Hoodman Blind. Now called "Blindman’s Buff."

‘What devil wasn’t
That thus hath-neutral you at hoodman blind?" Shakespeare: Hamlet, iv. 4.

Hook, Hooks. He is off the hooks. Done for, laid on the shelf, superseeded, dead. The bent pieces of iron on which the hinges of a gate rest and turn are called hooks; if a gate is off the hooks it is in a bad way, and cannot readily be opened and shut.

On one's own hook. On one’s own responsibility or account. An angler’s phrase.

To fish with a golden hook. To give bribes. "Put a fish on a homecun d'or," Risk a sprat to catch a mackerel. To buy fish, and pretend to have caught it.

With a hook at the end. My assent is given with a hook at the end means not intended to be kept. In some parts of Germany, even to the present day, when a witness swears falsely, he crooks one finger into a sort of hook, and this is supposed sufficient to avert the sin of perjury. It is a crooked oath, or an oath "with a hook at the end." (See Over the Left, under Left.

Hook It! Take your hook; Sling your hook. Be off! Be off about your business!

Hook or Crook (Nv). Either rightfully or wrongfully; in one way or another. Formerly the poor of a manor were allowed to go into the forests with a hook and crook to get wood. What they could not reach they might pull down with their crook. The French equivalent is "I don’t ou à tort," or "Je brive et de bruc." Either with the thief’s hook or the bishop’s crook. Mrs. S. C. Hall, in her Ireland (vol. ii. p. 149 a.), states, as the origin of this phrase, that when the ships of Strongbow were entering Waterford harbour he noticed a tower on one side and a church on the other. Inquiring their names, he was told it was the "Tower of Hook" and the "Church of Crook." Then said he, "We must take the town by Hook and by Crook." There is no such person as St. Crook mentioned by the Bollandists. D. mayor Wood was set open and common to the habitants of Bristol; tok away upon them hakes a burden of hop, cram, hook, crook and her wood. — By one’s own hook. (1625)

Hockey Walker. (Nv Walker)

Hooligan. A violent young rough. The term originated in the last years of the nineteenth century from the name of one of this class. From it is derived the verb to hooligan = to indulge in violent horseplay (often ending in the robbery of the victim), and the substantive hooliganism to express such conduct.

Hooped Pots. Drinking pots at one time were made with hoops, that when two or more drank from the same tankard no one of them should take more than his share. Jack Cade promises his followers that "seven half-penny loaves shall be sold for a penny;
Horace

the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops; and I will make it felony to drink small beer." (Shakespeare: '2 Henry IV, iv. 2.)

Hoopoe (Urops Eops). A small crested bird revered by all the ancient Egyptians, and placed on the sceptre of Horus, to symbolise joy and filial affection. (Latin urops, the hoopoe.)

Hops. The plant, called by Tussor "Robin Hop." (Danish hop.) To hop on one leg is the Anglo-Saxon hopetian or hoppan.

"Get into thy hoped, for now it is time To teach Robin Hop on his sole how to climb." Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry, 8h. 17.

Thick as hops. Very numerous; very compact.

"And thousand other things as thick as hops" Taylor the Water font (1639).

Hop-o'-my-Thumb. A nick, the same as the German dumpling, the French le petit pain, and the Scotch Tom-a-lin (or Tomlune). Tom Thumb in the well-known nursery tale is quite another character. He was the son of peasants, knighted by King Arthur, and killed by a spider.

Several dwarfs have assumed the name of Tom Thumb. (See Dwarfs.)

"You stump-o' the Dutter, you Hop-o'-my- Thumb, Your husband must from Eathput come."

Kan oision: Minns.

"Plaine friend Hop-o'-my-Thumb, know you who we are" — Taming of the Shrew (1597).

To hop the twey. To run away from one's creditors, as a bird eludes a follower, "hopping from spray to spray."

"Also to die. The same idea as that above. There are numerous phrases to express the cessation of life; for example, "To kick the bucket" (g. r.); "To lay down one's knife and fork;" "Pegging out" (from the game of cribbage); "To be snuffed out" (like a candle); "He has given in;" "To throw up the sponge" (g. r.); "To roll aslopp;" "To enter Charon's boat" (See Charon); "To join the majority;" "To cave in;" a common Scripture phrase is "To give up the ghost."

Hope. Before Alexander set out for Asia he divided his kingdom among his friends. "My lord," said Perdiccas, "what have you left for yourself?" "Hope," replied Alexander. Wheresoever Perdiccas rejoined, "If hope is enough for Alexander, it is enough for Perdiccas," and declined to accept any bounty from the king.

The Bard of Hope. Thomas Campbell (1777-1844), the author of The Pleasures of Hope. The entire profits on this poem were £300.

The Cope of Good Hope. (See Storms.)

Hopeful. The companion of Christian after the death of Faithful. (Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress.)

Hope-on-High Bombay. A puritanical character drawn by Beaumont and Fletcher.

"Well, said Wildrake, 'I think I can make a "Hope-on-High Bombay" as well as thou canst.' —Sir Walter Scott: Woodstock, c. vii.

Hopkins (Matthew), of Manningtree, Essex, the witch-finder of the associated counties of Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk, and Huntingdonshire. In one year he hanged sixty reputed witches in Essex alone. Dr. Z. Grey says that between three and four thousand persons suffered death for witchcraft between 1643 and 1661.

Nicholas Hopkins. A Carthusian friar, confessor of the Duke of Buckingham, who prophesied "that neither the king (Henry VIII.) nor his heirs should prosper, but that the Duke of Buckingham should govern England.

"I call. That devil-monk
2 Gent. Hopkins that made this mischief.
That was he

Hopkinstonians. Those who adopt the theological opinions of Dr. Samuel Hopkins, of Connecticut. These sectarians hold most of the Calvinistic doctrines, but entirely reject the doctrines of imputed sin and imputed righteousness. The peculiarity of the system is that true holiness consists in disinterested benevolence, and that all sin is selfishness.

Hopping Giles. A lame person; so called from St. Giles, the tutelar saint of cripples, who was himself lame.

Hopton. When in doubt, kill Hopton. Sir Ralph Hopton was a Royalist general. During the Civil Wars we read that Hopton was killed over and over again; thus, in Material Occurrences, Dec. 5th, 1642, we read, "It was likewise this day reported that Sir Ralph Hopton is either dead or dangerously sick." Five months later we read in Special Passages, May 6th, 1643, of Hopton's death after a tight on Roborough Down, in Devonshire. And again, May 15th, 1643, we read of his death in A True Relation of the Proceedings of the Cornish Forces.

Horace. The Roman lyric poet.

Horaces of England. George, Duke of Buckingham, posthumously declared Cowley to be the Pindar, Horace, and Horatian

Virgil of England (1618-1667). Ben Jonson is invariably called Horace by Dekker.

Horaces of France. Jean Macrinus or Salmon (1490-1557); Pierre Jean de Beranger, the French Burns (1780-1837).

Horaces of Spain. The brothers Argensola, whose Christian names were Lupercio and Bartolme.

Horatian Metre (An). Book i. Ode iv. In alternate lines, one of seventeen syllables and the other of eleven, thus:

\[ \frac{\text{1}}{\text{2}} \cdot \frac{\text{1}}{\text{9}} \cdot \frac{\text{1}}{\text{9}} \cdot \frac{\text{1}}{\text{9}} \cdot \frac{\text{1}}{\text{9}} \cdot \frac{\text{1}}{\text{9}} \cdot \frac{\text{1}}{\text{9}} \cdot \frac{\text{1}}{\text{9}} \]

Below is a translation of the first four lines in this Horatian metre (rhyming):

Now that the winter is past, blithe spring to the faulry fields invictly.
And to the dry sands men their keels are hauling.
Cattle no longer their stalls affect, nor the hind his heath doth cherish.
Nor deadly frost spreads over meads her falling.

7 See Alcain, Asclepiadic, Choricambic, Saphic, etc. (See also Hexameters, and Hexameters and Pentameters.)

Horatio. Hamlet’s intimate friend. (Shakespeare: Hamlet.)

Horn. Logistulla gave Astolpho at parting a horn that had the virtue to appall and put to flight the boldest knight or most savage beast. (Arriost: Orlando Furioso, book viii.)

Astolpho’s horn. (See above.)

Cape Horn. So named by Schouten, a Dutch mariner, who first doubled it. He was a native of Hoorn, in north Holland, and named the cape after his native place.

Drinking horn. Drinking cups used to be made of the rhinoceros’s horn, from an Oriental belief that “it sweats at the approach of poison.” (Salmer: Biblical Dictionary.)

King Horn. The hero of a French metrical romance, and the original of our Horns Child, generally called The Geste of Kyng Horn. The nominal author of the French romance is Mestre Thomas. Dr. Percy ascribes the English romance of King Horn to the twelfth century, but this is probably a century too early. (See Ritson’s Ancient Romances.)

Horns. Phrases.

My horn hath He exalted (1 Sam. ii. 10; Ps. lxxxix. 24, etc.). Mr. Buckingham says of a Tyrian lady, “She wore on her head a hollow silver horn, rearing itself upwards obliquely from the forehead. It was some four inches in diameter at the root, and pointed at its extremity. This peculiarity reminded me forcibly of the expression of the Psalmist. ‘Lift not up your horn on high: speak not with a stiff neck. All the horns of the wicked also will I cut off; but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted’ (Ps. lxxv. 5, 10).” Bruce found in Abyssinia the silver horns of warriors and distinguished men. In the reign of Henry V, the “horned head-gear” was introduced into England, and from the effigy of Beatrice, Countess of Arundel, at Arundel church, who is represented with two horns outspread to a great extent, we may infer that the length of the head-horn, like the length of the shoe-point in the reign of Henry VI., etc., marked the degree of rank. “To cut off” such horns would be to degrade; and to exalt or extend such horns would be to add honour and dignity to the wearer.

To draw in one’s horns. To retract, or mitigate, a pronounced opinion; to restrain pride. In French, “Rentrer les cornes.” The allusion is to the snail.

To put to the horn. To denominate as a rebel, or pronounce a person an outlaw; for not answering to a summons. In Scotland the messenger-at-arms goes to the Cross of Edinburgh and gives three blasts with a horn before he heralds the judgment of outlawry.

“A king’s messenger must give three blasts with his horn, by which the person is authorised to be proclaimed rebel to the king for contempt of his authority” — Estienne: Institutes, book ii. 5

To wear the horns. To be a cuckold. In the rutting season, the stags associate with the fawns: one stag selects several females, who constitute his harem, till another stag comes who contests the prize with him. If beaten in the combat, he yields up his harem to the victor, and is without associates till he finds a stag feebler than himself, who is made to submit to similar terms. As stags are horned, and made cuckold of by their fellows, the application is palpable. (See Cunnet.)

Horn-book. The alphabet-book, which was a thin board of oak about nine inches long and five or six wide, on which was printed the alphabet, the nine digits, and sometimes the Lord’s Prayer. It had a handle, and was covered in front with a short of thin horn to prevent its being soiled; the back-board was ornamented with a rude sketch of St. George and the Dragon. The board and its horn cover were held together by a narrow frame or border of brass. (See Cimabue How.) The faithful horn before, from age to age Preserving thy invulnerable face. Behind, thy patron in armour shines, With sword and lance to guard the sacred lines. To instructive handle's at the bottom fixed, Yet wrangling critics should pervert the text. Ticket: The Horn Book. Their books of stature small they took in hand Which with polished horn secured are. To save from finger wet the letters fair. Haustade: Schoolmistress.

Horn-gate. One of the two gates of "Dreams;" the other is of ivory. Visions which issue from the former come true. This whish depends upon two Greek puns; the Greek for horn is κέφαλας, and the verb καταβαίνει or καταβάτει means "to bring to an issue," "to fulfill; so again ελεφαία is ivory, and the verb ελεφάθων means "to cheat," "to deceive." The verb καταβαίνει, however, is derived from κατα, "the head," and means "to bring to a head;" and the verb ελεφάθων is akin to ελέφαντας, "small;" Anchises dismisses Demas through the ivory gate, on quitting the infernal regions, to indicate the unreachability of his vision.

Horn of Fidelity. Morgan La Faye sent a horn to King Arthur, which had the following "virtue:" No lady could drink out of it who was not "true to her husband true;" all others who attempted to drink were sure to spill what it contained. This horn was carried to King Marke, and "his queen with a hundred ladies more" tried the experiment, but only four managed to "drink clean." Ariosto's enchanted cup possessed a similar spell. (See CHASTITY.)

Horn of Plenty. Emblem of plenty. Coöre is drawn with a ram's horn in her left arm, filled with fruits and flowers. Sometimes they are being poured on the earth from "the full horn," and sometimes they are held in it as in a basket. Diodorus (iii. 68) says the horn is one from the head of the goat by which Jupiter was suckled. He explains the fable thus: "In Libya," he says, "there is a strip of land shaped like a horn, bestowed by King Ammon on his bride Anaitha, who nursed Jupiter with goat's milk.

Horn of Power. When Tam'ugin assumed the title of Ghengis Khan, he commanded that a white horn should be the foremost among the trappings of his troops. So the great Mogul "lifted up his horn on high," and was exalted to great power.

Horn of the Son of Oil (The) (Isa. v. 1). The son of oil means Syria, famous for its olives and its olive oil, and the horn of Syria means the strip of land called Syria, which has the sea bounding it on the west and the desert on the east.

Horn with Horn or Horn under Horn. The promiscuous feeding of bulls and cows, or, in fact, all horned beasts that are allowed to run together on the same common.

Horns of a Dilemma. A difficulty of such a nature that whatever way you attack it you encounter an equal amount of disagreeableness. Macbeth, after the murder of Duncan, was in a strait between two evils. If he allowed Banquo to live, he had reason to believe that Banquo would supplant him; if, on the other hand, he resolved to keep the crown for which "he had shed his hands," he must "step further in blood," and cut Banquo off.

Lemma is something that has been proved, and being so is assumed as an axiom. It is from the Greek word λέμα (I assume or take for granted). The horn is a double lemma, or two-edged sword which strikes either way. The horns of a dilemma is a figure of speech taken from a bull, which toses with either of his horns.

"Teach me to plead," said a young rhetorician to a sophist, "and I will pay you when I gain a cause." The master sued for payment at once, and the scholar pleaded, "If I gain my cause you must pay me, and if I lose I am not bound to pay you by the terms of our contract." The master pleaded, "If you gain you must pay me by the terms of the agreement, and if you lose the court will compel you to pay me."

Horns of Moses' Face. This is a mere blunder. The Hebrer "kavan" means "to shoot out beams of light," but has by mistake been translated in some versions "to wear horns." Thus Moses is conventionally represented with horns. "Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone" (Exod. xxxiv. 29); compare 2 Cor. iii. 7-13: "The children of Israel could not steadfastly behold the face of Moses for the glory of his countenance."

Horns of the Altar (To the). Take ad aras amicos. Your friend even to the horns of the altar—i.e. through thick and thin. In swearing, the ancient Romans held the horns of the altar, and one who did so in testimony of friendship could not break his oath without calling on himself the vengeance of the angry gods.

Horn. I'll chance it, as old Horn did his neck. The reference is to Horn, a clergyman of Notts, who committed murder, but contrived to escape to the Continent. After several years of absence, he returned to England, and when told of the risk he ran, he replied, "I'll chance it." He did chance it; but being apprehended, he was tried, condemned, and executed. (The Nevegate Calendar.)

Hornet. One who blows the hunting-horn; a huntsman or master of the hounds. Little Jack Hornet was master of the Abbot of Glastonbury's hounds.

Hornets (Josh. xxiv. 12). "And I sent the hornet before you, which drove them out from before you, even the two kings of the Amorites." The Egyptian standard was a hornet, and in this passage, "I sent the hornet before you," the word hornet must be taken to mean the Egyptian army.

Hornet's Nest. To poke your head into a hornet's nest. To bring a hornet's nest about your ears. To get into trouble by meddling and making. The bear is very fond of honey, and often gets stung by poking its snout by mistake into a hornet's nest in search of its favourite dainty.

Horns (2 syl.). Addl Hornet. The devil, so called in Scotland. The allusion is to the horns with which Satan is generally represented. (See FAIRY.)

Hornpipe (2 syl.). The dance is so called because it used to be danced in the west of England to the pip-corn or hornpipe, an instrument consisting of a pipe each end of which was made of horn.

Horology. The art of measuring time; or constructing instruments to indicate time, i.e. clocks and watches.

Horse. Notabilia.

- The fifteen points of a good horse:
  - "A good horse should have three proportions of a man, three of a woman, three of a fox, three of a hare, and three of an ass.
  - Of men. Bold, proud, and hardy.
  - Of a woman. Fairly-bred, faire of heere, and easy to move.
  - Of a foal. A fair tailie, short ears, with a good troote.
  - Of a nasse. A grate eye, a dry head, and well reared.
  - Of an ass. A hagge chynn, a fat legge, and a good hoof."—Wensyn de Verde (1403).

Horse (Creator of the horse). According to classical mythology, Poseidon [Neptune] created the horse. When the god of Wisdom disputed with the Sea-god which of them should give name to Athens, the gods decided that it should be called by the name of that deity which bestowed on man the most useful boon. Athene (the goddess of Wisdom) created the olive tree, but Poseidon or Neptune created the horse. The vote was given in favour of the olive-tree, and the city called Athens.

- "It was a remarkable judgment, but it must be remembered that an olive branch was the symbol of peace, and was also the highest prize of the victor in the Olympic games. The horse, on the other hand, was the symbol of war, and peace is certainly to be preferred to war.

Horses (four-in-hand). The first person that drove a four-in-hand was Erichthonius, according to Virgil:

- "Primus Erichthonius currit quatuorbonus Jumentis equos,"—Aeneid, viii. 189.

Erichthonius was the first who dared command A chariot yoked with horses four in hand."

- A horse was a kingdom. On the death of Spurius, the several competitors for the throne of Persia agreed that he should be king whose horse weighed first when they met on the day following. The groom of Darius showed his horse a mare on the place appointed, and immediately it arrived at the spot on the following day the horse began to neigh, and won the crown for its master.

- Horse (in the Catacomb). Emblem of the swiftness of life. Sometimes a palm-wreath is placed above its head to denote that "the race is not to the swift."
Horse

Horse (in Christian art). Emblem of courage and generosity. The attribute of St. Martin, St. Maurice, St. George, and St. Victor, all of whom are represented on horseback. St. Leon is represented on horseback, in pontifical robes, blessing the people.

Brazen horse. (See Cambuscus; see also Barbed Steed, Dobbin.)

§ Flesh-eating horse. The horses of Diomed, Tyrant of Thessaly (not Diomed, son of Tydeus); he fed his horses on the strangers who visited his kingdom. Heracles vanquished the tyrant, and gave the carcass to the horses to eat.

Like to the Thracian tyrant who, they say, Feared his horses gave his guests for meat, Till he himself was made his greedy prey, And turn to pieces by Alcides' hurl.

The White Horse. The old 8th Foot; now called "The King's" (Liverpool Regiment); called the "White Horse" from one of the badges a white horse within the garter.

Horse. The public-house sign.

(1) The White Horse. The standard of the Saxons, and therefore impressed on hoppers and bags as the ensign of Kent. On Uffington Hill, Berks, there is formed in the chalk an enormous white horse, supposed to have been cut there after the battle in which Ethelred and Alfred defeated the Danes (871). This rude ensign is about 374 feet long, and 1,000 feet above the sea-level. It may be seen twelve miles off.

(2) The galloping white horse is the device of the house of Hanover.

(3) The rampant white horse. The device of the house of Savoy, descended from the Saxons.

(See Hunters and Runners.)

"O' Donohoe's white horse. Those waves which come on a windy day, crested with foam. The spirit of the hero reappears every May-day, and is seen gliding, to sweet but unearthly music, over the lakes of Killarney, on his favourite white horse. It is preceded by groups of young men and maidens, who sing spring-flowers in his path."

(Derrick's Letters.)

T. Moore has a poem on the subject in his Irish Melodies, No. vi.; it is entitled "O'Donohue's Mistletoe, and refers to a tradition that a young and beautiful girl became enamoured of the visionary chestnut, and threw herself into the lake that he might carry her off for his bride.

7 Horse.

In Phrase and Proverb.

A dast horse. A horse whose merits as a racer are not known to the general public. Flogging the dead horse. (See Flogging.)

Riding the wooden horse. A military punishment now discontinued. It was a flogging-stool.

I will win the horse or lose the saddle. Neck or nothing; double or quits. Milton makes Satan say, "Better to reign in hell than serve in heaven."

Latin: "Aut ter sex, aut tres tecum." (See Ter Sex.)

"As Caesar, aut nullus."
Horseshoes

Horse Marines (The). There is no such force. The Royal Marines are either artillery or infantry; there are no cavalry marines. To belong to the "Horse Marines" is a joke, meaning an awkward lubberly recruit.

Horse-milliner. Properly, one who makes up and supplies decorations for horses.

A horse-soldier more fit for the toilet than the battle-field. The expression was first used by Rowley in his Ballads of Charles, but Sir Walter Scott revived it.

'Tis a Trojan horse (Latin proverb). A deception, a concealed danger. Thus Cicero says, "Intus, intus, inviam, est equus Troja'sus" (Pro Muvena, 78). It was Eosplus who made the Trojan horse.

'Tis a good horse that never stumbles. Everyone has his faults. Every black has its white, and every sweet its sour.

Latin: "Quandque levis dorminat Homas," "Horse; Ars Poetica, 736.

To get upon one's high horse. To give oneself airs. (See Hogn Horse.) To set the cart before the horse. (See Cart.)

When the horse (or stall) is stolen, lock the stable door. The French say, "Apris la mort, le medecime." Somewhat similar is: "After beef, mustard." Working on the dead horse. (See Working.)

Horse. Coarse, acrid or pungent, inferior of its kind, rough. "Horse" is the Anglo-Saxon hæs.

Horse-bean. The bean usually given to horses for food.

Horse-chestnut. If a slip is cut off obliquely close to a joint, it will present a perfect miniature of a horse's hock and foot, shoe and nails. I have cut off numerous specimens. Probably this has given the name horse to the tree. (See Horse-vetch.)

Horse-faced. Having a long, coarse face.

Horse Latitudes. A region of calms between 30° and 55° North; so called because ships laden with horses bound to America or the West Indies were often obliged to lighten their freight by casting the horses overboard when caught in those latitudes.

"Nothing could have been more delightful than our run into the horse latitudes. Land and dead calm, terrible thunderstorms and breezes, fair one hour and foul the next, are the characteristics of these latitudes." Numbers of horses were exported from the mother country, and it was reckoned that more of the amendments in these latitudes than all the rest of the passage. Clark Russell, Lady Maid, vol. 1, chap. vii, p. 166.

Horse-laugh. A coarse, vulgar laugh.

Horse-play. Rough play.

Similarly, horse-playing with one from inflammation of the throat; goose, a rough, prickly plant; goose-berry, a rough berry; goose-grass, the grass whose leaves are rough with hair, etc.

Horse-power. A measure of force. Watt estimated the "force" of a London day-horse, working eight hours a day, at 33,000 foot-pounds (g.t.) per minute. In calculating the horse-power of a steam-engine the following is the formula:

\[ P \times A \times L \times N \]

P, pressure (in lbs.) per sq. inch on the piston.
A, area (in inches) of the piston.
L, length (in feet) of the stroke.
N, number of strokes per minute.

Horse Protestant. As good a Protestant as Oliver Cromwell's horse. This expression arises in a comparison made by Cromwell respecting some person who had less discernment than his horse in the most points of the Protestant controversy.

Horse-radish. The pungent root.

Horse-shoes were at one time nailed up over doors as a protection against witches. Aubrey says, "Most houses at the west-end of London have a horse-shoe on the threshold." In Monmouth Street there were seventeen in 1813, and seven so late as 1835.

"Sirius had across my path retard

The horse-shoes nailed, each threshold a guard.
Gay: Fables, xiii, part 1.

It is lucky to pick up a horse-shoe. This is from the notion that a horse-shoe was a protection against witches. For the same reason our superstitious forefathers loved to nail a horse-shoe on Horse-vetch. The vetch which has pods shaped like a "horse-shoe" sometimes called the "horse-shoe vetch." (See Horse Chestnut.)

Horse and his Rider. One of Aesop's fables, to show that nations crave the assistance of others when they are aggrieved, but become the tools or slaves of those who rendered them assistance. Thus the Celtic Britons asked aid of the Saxons, and the Danish Duchies of the Germans, but in both cases the rider made the horse a mere tool.

Horse-shoes and Nails (for rent). In 1231 Walter le Bruin, farmer, in the Strand, London, was to have a piece of land in the parish of St. Clements, to place there a forge, for which he was to pay the parish six horse-shoes, which rent was paid to the Exchequer every year, and is still rendered to the Exchequer by the Lord Mayor and citizens of London, to whom subsequently the piece of ground was granted.

"In the reign of King Edward I. Walter Marcucullus paid at the crown lands six horse-shoes with nails, for a certain building which he held of the king in capite opposite the stone cross." - Blount: Ancient Tracts.

Horsemen.

Light horsemen. Those who live by plundering ships.

Heavy horsemen. Those who go abroad to clear ships.

Horse yards (c.). One who affects the manners and style of a jockey or horse-dealer.

Hortus Siccus. (Latin, "a dry garden.") A collection of plants dried and arranged in a book.

Horus. The Egyptian day-god, represented in hieroglyphics by a sparrow-hawk, which bird was sacred to him. He was son of Osiris and Isis, but his birth being premature he was weak in the lower limbs. As a child he is seen carried in his mother's arms, wearing the pashent or aff, and seated on a lotus-flower with his finger on his lips. As an adult he is represented hawk-headed. (Egyptian, Hor or Hor, "the day" or "sun's path.") Strictly speaking, Horus is the rising sun, Ra the noonday sun, and Osiris the setting sun. (Whence Greek and Latin: and our: hors.)

Horse. Stockings, or stockings and breeches both in one. French, chaussettes. There were the haut de chaussettes and the bas de chaussettes.

"Their points being broken, down fell their hose." Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 4.

Hospital. From the Latin hospes (a guest), being originally an inn or house of entertainment for pilgrims; hence our words host (one who entertains), hospitality (the entertainment given), and hospitaler (the keeper of the house). In process of time these receptacles were resorted to by the sick and infirm only, and the house of entertainment became an asylum for the sick and wounded. In 1399 Katherine de la Court held a "hospital" at the bottom of the court called Robert de Paris; after the lapse of four years her landlord died, and the tavern or hospital fell to his heirs Johan de Cheyvenne and William Cholet.

Hospital (The), in Post-office pharcology, is the department where loose packages are set to rights.

Hospitalers. First applied to those whose duty it was to provide hospitalum (lodging and entertainment) for pilgrims. The most noted institution of the kind was at Jerusalem, which gave its name to an order called the Knights Hospitalers. This order was first called that of the Knights of St. John at Jerusalem, which still exists; afterwards they were styled the Knights of Rhodes, and then Knights of Malta, because Rhodes and Malta were conferred on them by different monarchs.

"The first crusade . . . led to the establishment of the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem, in 1099. The chief strength of the kingdom lay in the two orders of military monks—the Templars and the Hospitalers or Knights of St. John—Examen: General Sketch, chap. xi.

Host. A victim. The consecrated bread of the Eucharist is so called in the Latin Church because it is believed to be a real victim consisting of flesh, blood, and spirit, offered up in sacrifice. (Latin, hostis.) At the service known as the Benediction it is set up for adoration, and with it the blessing is given in a transparent vessel called a "monstrance." (Latin, monstrare, to show.)
Hostage. An army. At the breaking up of the Roman Empire the first duty of every subject was to follow his lord into the field, and the proclamation was "hostis in hostem (to order out against the foe), which soon came to signify "to order out for military service," and "hostem facere to mean "to perform military service." Hostis (military service) next came to mean the army that went against the foe, whence our word host.

"Like the leaves, of the forest, when summer is grown,
That host with their banners at sunset was seen;
Like the leaves of the forest, when autumn has blown,
That host on the morrow lay withered and strawed."

Byron: Destruction of Scourchurh, stanza 2.

To reckon without your host. To reckon from your own standpoint only. Guests who calculate what their expenses at an hotel will come to always leave out certain items which the landlord adds in.

"Found in few minutes, to his cost ;
He did but count without his host.

Hostage (2 syl.) is connected with the Latin osus, through the Mid. Latin hostigius, French ogie or ogiste, Italian ostaggio.

Hostler is properly the keeper of an hostelry or inn.

Hot. "I'll make the place too hot to hold him. (See TALUS.)
I'll give it him hot and strong. I'll rate him most soundly and severely.
Liquor very hot and strong takes one's breath away, and is apt to choke one.

Hot-Cakes. A Christmas game. One blindfolded kneel down, and being struck had to guess who gave the blow.

"Thus seeks to nine times away.
Like children at hot-cakes play." (1631)

Hot Cross Buns. Forebode says these buns were made of the dough kneaded for the host, and were marked with the cross accordingly. As the Good Friday buns are said to keep for twelve months without turning mouldy, some persons still hang up one or more in their house as a "charm against evil." (See CROSS.)

* The round bun represents the full moon, and the cross represents the four quarters of the moon. They were made in honour of Diana by the ancient Roman priests, somewhere about the vernal equinox. Phenicians, Carthaginians, Egyptians, as well as the Greeks and Romans, worshipped the moon.

Hostage. With speed; fast.
And the Blackfoot who courted each foeman's approach.
"Faith, 'tis hot foot he'd fly from the stout Father Roach." Lower.

N.B. The Blackfoot was an Irish faction, similar to the Terry Alts in the early part of the nineteenth century.

Hot Water (In). In a state of trouble, or of anxiety. The reference is to the ordeal by hot water (q. v.).

Hotch-potch. Blackstone says hotch-potch is a pudding made of several things mixed together. Lands given in frank-marriage or descending in fee-simple are to be mixed, like the ingredients of a pudding, and then cut up in equal slices among all the daughters. (Book ii. 12.)

As to personality: Hotch-potch may be explained thus: Suppose a father has advanced money to one child, at the decease of the father this child receives a sum in addition enough to make his share equal to the rest of the family. If not content, he must bring into hotch-potch the money that was advanced, and the whole is then divided amongst all the children according to the terms of the will.

French, hotchpot, from hacher, to shake or jumble together; or from the German hoch-pot, the huge pot or family caldron. Wharton says it is huche in poche.

Hotch-pot. A confused mixture or jumble, a thick broth containing meat and vegetables.
"A sort of soup or broth, for one;
On hotch-pot of all sorts of slaves.
Thackeray: Ballad of Boundhouse, stanza 2.

Hotspur. A fiery person who has no control over his temper. Harry Perry was so called. Lord Derby was sometimes called the "Hotspur of debate," Lytton, in "Sir Timon," calls him, "frank, haughty, bold, the Rupert of debate." (See Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV.)

Hottentot. Rude, uncultured, a boor. As "You are a perfect Hottentot."

Hou'goumont is said to be a corruption of Châlon Goumont; but Victor Hugo says it is Hugoumont, and that the house was built by Hugo, Sire de Semmer, the same person that endowed the sixth chapel of the abbey of Villers.

Hound. To hound a person is to persecute him, or rather to set on persons to annoy him, as hounds are let from the slips at a hare or stag.

"As he who only lets loose a greyhound out of the ship is said to hound him at the hare." - Bannack.
Hou'qua. A superior quality of tea; so called from Hoque, the celebrated Hsing-Kong tea merchant; died 1846.

Hour. (Greek and Latin, hora.)
At the eleventh hour. Just in time not to be too late; only just in time to obtain some benefit. The allusion is to the parable of labourers hired for the vineyard (Matt. xx.).

My hour is not yet come. The time of my death is not yet fully come. The allusion is to the belief that the hour of our birth and death is appointed and fixed.

"When Jesus knew that His hour was come . . ." - John xiii.

In an evil hour. Acting under an unfortunate impulse. In astrology we have our lucky and unlucky hours.

In the small hours of the morning. One, two, and three, after midnight.

To keep good hours. To return home early every night; to go to bed betimes. "Se retirer la nuit de bonne heure." In Latin, "Tempestre se domum recipère."

Houri (pl. Horrias). The large black-eyed damsels of Paradise, possessed of perpetual youth and beauty, whose virginity is renewable at pleasure. Every believer will have seventy-two of these houris in Paradise, and his intercourse with them will be fruitful or otherwise, according to his wish. If an offspring is desired, it will grow to full estate in an hour. (Persian, horri; Arabic, hariqa, nymphae of paradise. Compare ahiru, black-eyed.) (The Koran.)

House (I syl.). In astrology the whole heaven is divided into twelve portions, called "houses," through which the heavenly bodies pass every twenty-four hours. In casting a man's fortune by the stars, the whole host is divided into two parts (beginning from the east), six above and six below the horizon. The eastern ones are called the ascendant, because they are about to rise; the other six are the descendant, because they have already passed the zenith. The twelve houses are thus awarded:

House. A dwelling.
Like a house afire. Very rapidly. "He is getting on like a house afire" means he is getting on excellently.

To bring down the house (in a theatre, etc.) is to receive unusual and rapturous applause.

To keep house. To maintain a separate establishment. "To go into housekeeping" is to start a private establishment.

To keep a good house. To supply a bountiful table.

To keep open house. To give free entertainment to all who choose to come. "Omnes bene regnabit aperire." In French, "Tient table ouverte."

To throw the house out of the windows. To throw all things into confusion from exuberance of spirit (à des excès de joie). "Caetera terra, terram colo meae;" or "Dona confinire," In French, "Jeter le mouton par le fenêtres."

House. Race or lineage; as, "the House of Hanover," "the House of Austria."

House-boat. A sufficient allowance of wood to repair the dwelling and to supply fuel.

House-flag (A). The distinguishing flag of a company of shipowners or of a single ship-owner, as, for instance, that of the Cunard Company.

House-lock (Jarl's beard). Grown on house-roofs, from the notion that it warded off lightning. Charlemagne made an edict that every one of his subjects should have house-lock on his house-roof. The words are, "Et habet quoque supra dominum numm Joris barbam." It was thought to ward off all evil spirits. Fevers as well as lightning were at one time supposed to be due to evil spirits.

"If the herb house-lock, or sun-reed, do grow on the house-top, the same house reverberates with lightning or thunder."-Thomson's Hut Natural and Artif Conformation.

House Spirits.

Of Denmark, Nine of Nisis (43x1).
Of England, Puck or Robin Goodfellow.
Of Faeroe Islands, Norskib.
Of Finland, Pansi.
Of France, Esper Pollet.
Of Germany, Knob.
Of Ireland, Fear Dearg or Red Man.
Of Naples, Monsieurc of Little Monk.
Of Norway, same as Denmark.
Of Norway, same as Denmark.
Of Scotland, Brownie.
Of Spain, Duende (3x81).
Of Switzerland, Jack of the How.
Of Velard, Newt.

Others of particular houses.
House-top. To cry from the house-top. To proclaim [it] from the house-top. To announce something in the most public manner possible. Jewish houses had flat roofs, which were paved. Here the ancient Jews used to assemble for gossip; here, too, not unfrequently, they slept; and here some of their festivities were held. From the house-tops the rising of the sun was proclaimed, and other public announcements were made.

"That which ye have spoken [whispered] in the ear... shall he proclaimed upon the housetop."

-Luke x. 18.

House and Home. He hath eaten me out of house and home (Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV, ii. 1). It is the complaint of hostess Quickly to the Lord Chief Justice when he asks for "what sum" she had arrested Sir John Falstaff. She explains the phrase by "he hath put all my substance into that fat belly of his;"

"I am undone by his going."

House of Correction. A goal governed by a keeper. Originally it was a place where vagrants were made to work, and small offenders were kept in ward for the correction of their offences.

House of God (The). Not solely a church, or a temple made with hands, but any place sanctified by God's presence. Thus, Jacob in the wilderness, where he saw the ladder set up leading from earth to heaven, said: "This is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven" (Gen. xxviii. 17).

House that Jack Built (The). There are numerous similar glomerations. For example the Hebrew parable of The Two Zuzim. The narration runs thus:

1. This is Zayyah who vanquished 10. Death which killed
2. The butcher which slew 11. The one which drank
3. The ox which drank 12. The water which quenched
4. The fire which burned 13. The stick which beat
5. The dog which worried 14. The cat which killed
6. The kid which my father bought for two zuzim.

(A zuzim was about = a farthing.)

Household Gods. Domestic pets, and all those things which help to endure home. The Romans had household gods called pe-na'-tes, who were supposed to preside over their private dwellings. Of these pe-na'-tes some were called lares, the special genii or angels of the family. One was Vesta, whose office was to preserve domestic unity. Jupiter and Juno were also among the pe-na'-tes. The modern use of the term is a playful adaptation.

"Bearing a nation with all its household gods into exile."

Household Troops. Those troops whose special duty it is to attend the sovereign and guard the metropolis. They consist of the 1st and 2nd Life-guards, the Royal Horseguards, and the three regiments of Footguards called the Grenadier, Coldstream, and Scots Fusilier Guards.

House. To give or receive the Eucharist. (Angle-Saxon, huslani, to give the husel or host.)

"Children were christened, and men housed and assembled through all the land, except such as were in the fall of excommunication to name expressed."- Holinshed: Chronicles.

Houybnouns (houn'naus). A race of horses endowed with reason, who bear rule over a race of men. Gulliver, in his Travels, tells us what he "saw" among them. (Swift.)

"Say, would kind Jove my organ so dispose To hurl immortal Houybnouns through the base
I'd call thee Houybnou, that high-sounding name,
But this children's nonsense should not be."-

How Do You Do? (Ne Do.)

Howard. A philanthropist. John Howard is immortalised by his efforts to improve the condition of prisoners. "He visited all Europe," says Burke, "not to survey the sumptuousness of palaces or the stateliness of temples; not to make accurate measurements of the remains of ancient grandeur, nor to form a scale of the curiosity of modern art; not to collect manuscripts, but to dive into the depths of dungeons; to plunge into the infection of hospitals; to survey the mansions of sorrow and pain; to take the dimensions of misery, depression, and contempt; to remember the forgotten, to attend to the neglected; to visit the forsaken, and to compare the distress of all men in all countries." His plan is original, and it is as full of genius as it is of humanity. It was a voyage of discovery; a circumnavigation of charity." (John Howard, 1726-1790.)

"The radiant path that Howard trod to Heaven."

Bloomfield: Farmer's Boy.
Howdah

The female Howard. Mrs. Elizabeth Fry (1780-1844). All the blood of all the Howards. All the nobility of our best aristocracy. The ducal house of Norfolk stands at the head of the English peerage, and is interwoven in all our history.

"What could ennoble sons, or attract or enslave? All! not all the blood of all the Howards."

What will "all the blood of all the Howards" say to Mr. Walter Rye who, in his History of Norfolk (1883), tells us that "Howard is from hog-ward," and that the original Howards were so called from their avocation, which was to tend the pigs.

Howard. Mr. Bug, late of Epsom (Surrey), then of Wakefield (Yorkshire), landlord of the Swan Tavern, changed his name (June, 1862) to Norfolk Howard.

Howdah. A canopy, or seat fixed on the back of an elephant.

"Leading the array, three stately elephants marched, bearing the Kings in gilded howdahs under gold umbrellas." J. W. Fauver. Up and Down the Hudson. chap. vi. p. 186.

Howdah (2 syl.) A midwife.

Howitzers are guns used to fire buildings, to reach troops behind hills or parapets, to bound their shells along lines and against cavalry, to breach mud walls by exploding their shells, etc. They project common shells, common and spherical case-shot, carcasses, and, if necessary, round shot. In a morter the trunnions are at the end; in howitzers they are in the middle.

"The howitzer was taken to pieces, and carried by the men to its destination." Grant: Personal Memoirs. chap. vi. p. 15.

Howleglass (2 syl.) A clever rascal, the hero of an old German romance by Thomas Munzer, popular in the eighteenth century.

Hlimax. (Sir Horse.)

Hub. The nave of a wheel; a boss; also a skid. (Welsh, hob, a swelling, a protuberance; compare also a hub.) The Americans call Boston, Massachusetts, "the hub (boss) of the solar system."

"Boston State-house is the hub of the solar system." Holmes: Autocrat of the Breakfast Table. chap. vi. p. 124.

"Calcutta swaggers as if it were the hub of the universe."—Daily News, 1846.

Hubbal. An Arab idol brought from Buika, in Syria, by Amir Ibn-Loheh, who asserted that it would procure rain when wanted. It was the statue of a man in red agate; one hand being lost, a golden one was supplied. He held in his hand seven arrows without wings or feathers, such as the Arabs use in divination. This idol was destroyed in the eighth year of "the flight."

Hubbard (Old Mother). The famous dame of nursery mythology, who went to the cupboard to fetch her poor dog a bone; but when she got there the cupboard was bare, so the poor dog had none.

Hubert (a silent), in Shakespeare's King John, is Hubert de Burgh, Justice of England, created Earl of Kent. He died 1243.

St. Hubert. Patron saint of huntsmen. He was son of Bertrand, Duc d'Acquitaine, and cousin of King Pepin. Hubert was so fond of the chase that he neglected his religious duties for his favourite amusement, till one day a stag bearing a crucifix mewed him with eternal perdition unless he reformed. Upon this the merry huntsman entered a cloister, became in time Bishop of Liége, and the apostle of Ardennes and Brabant. Those who were descended of his race were supposed to possess the power of curing the bite of mad dogs.

St. Hubert in Christian art is represented sometimes as a bishop with a miniature stag resting on the book in his hand, and sometimes as a noble huntsman kneeling to the miraculous crucifix borne by the stag.

Hudibras. Said to be a caricature of Sir Samuel Luke, a patron of Samuel Butler. The Grub Street Journal (1731) maintains it was Colonel Rolle, of Devonshire, with whom the poet lodged for some time, and adds that the name is derived from Hugh de Brus, the patron saint of the county. He represents the Presbyterian party, and his: squire the Independents.

"Thus sung there is a valiant man, Luke, In foreign land I kept (Sir Samuel Luke)" Butler: Hudibras. i. 1.

Sir Hudibras. The cavalier of Elissa of Parsimony. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book. ii.)

Hudibrastic Verse. A doggerel eight-syllable rhyming verse, after the style of Butler's Hudibras.

Hudson (Sir Jeffrey). The famous dwarf, at one time page to Queen Henrietta Maria. Sir Walter Scott has introduced him in his Peveril of the Peak, chap. xxxiv. Vandyke has immortalised him by his brush; and his clothes are said to be preserved in Sir Hans Sloane's museum. (1619-1678)
The person slain in a duel by this dwarf was the Hon. Mr. Crofts.

"We fought on horsetack—breaking ground and advancing by signal; and, as I never miss aim, I had the misfortune to kill [my adversary] at the first shot."—Sir W. Scott: Poetical works, ch. xxxiv.

Hue and Cry. A phrase used in English law to describe a body of persons joining in pursuit of a felon or suspected thief. (French, huit, verb huer, to hoot or shout after; Anglo-Saxon, Hu, he.)

Hug the Shore (7%). In the case of a ship, to keep as close to the shore as is compatible with the vessel's safety, when at sea. "Serve la terre."

Hug the Wind (7%). To keep a ship close hauled. "Serve le vent."

Hugger — mugger. The primary meaning is clandestinely. The secondary meaning is disorderly, in a slovenly manner. To hagger is to lie in ambush, from the Danish hug (haggar, huggen), to squat on the ground; mugger is the Danish mug, clandestinely, whence our word smuggle.

The king in Hamlet says of Polonius: "We have done but greely in hagger, mugger to inter him" i.e., to smuggle him into the grave clandestinely and without ceremony.

Sir T. North, in his Plutarch, says: "Antionius thought that his body should be honourably buried, and not in hagger-mugger" (clandestinely).

Humph says:

"While 1, in hagger, mugger had
Have sorrow all the sad and sad"

Hull.

Hull. Mr. and Mrs. Valgarity, of Pretension Hall.

Hugh Lloyd's Pulpit (Merionethshire). A natural production of stone. One pile resembles the Kilmarnock Rock. There is a platform stone with a back in stone. (Hugh prov. Yor.)

Hugh Perry. An English version of "Euphorion," a predecessor of Lucifer matches invented by Hearntur, who opened a shop in the Strand, and advertised his invention thus—

"To save your knuckles time and trouble,
I use Hearntur Euphorion".

(See PROMETHEIANS, VESUVIIANS.)

Hugh of Lincoln. It is said that the Jews in 1235 stole a boy named Hugh, whom they tortured for ten days and then crucified. Eighteen of the richest Jews of Lincoln were hanged for taking part in this affair, and the boy was buried in state. This is the subject of The Prince's Tale of Chaucer, which Wordsworth has modernised. In Rymer's Fossae are several documents relating to this event.

Hugin and Munin [mind and memory]. The two ravens that sit on the shoulders of Odin or Algiz.

"Perhaps the nursery saying, 'A little bird told me that,' is a corruption of Hug and Munin, and so we have the old Northern superstition, haggering among us without our being aware of it."—John Goldar: Jone Danes's Story, ii. 11. (See BIRD.)

Hugo. in Jerusalem Deliverred, Count of Vermandois, brother of Philip of France, leader of the Franks. He died before Godfrey was appointed leader of the united armies (book i.), but his spirit was seen by Godfrey amongst the angels who came to aid in taking Jerusalem (book xvii.).

Hugo. natural son of Azo, Marquis of Este, who fell in love with Parisina, his father's young wife. Azo discovered the intrigue, and condemned Hugo to be beheaded. (Bryon: Parisina.)

Hugon (King). The great holyrobin of France.

Huguenot (Hugenot). First applied to the Reformed Church party in the Amboise Plot (1560), from the German hugenotten (confrater).—Huguenot Pope (La pâpe des Huguenots). Philippe de Mornay, the great supporter of the French Protestants, (1549-1623.)

Hulda [the Bereavect]. Goddess of marriage and fecundity, who sent bridegrooms to maidens and children to the married. (German.) (See BERCHTA.)

Hulda is making her bed. It snows. (See above.)

Hulk. An old ship exhibit for service. (Anglo-Saxon, hull, from Mod. Latin hulka, connected with Greek Hulki — a ship which is towed, a merchant ship.)

Hulking. A great hulking fellow. A great overgrown one. A hulk is a bag,ubby fellow, applied to Falstaff by Shakespeare. It means the body of an old ship. (See above.)

The monster was once brought in on Christmas day was called a hulking or hulke.

Hull. "From Hull, Hull, and Halifax, trust Lord, deliver us!"

This occurs in Taylor, the water poet. Hull is not the town so called, but a furious river in Kingston, very dangerous. In regard to Halifax, the allusion is to the law that the theft of goods to the value of 13d. shall subject the thief to execution "by a ynn."

Hull Cheese. Strong ale, or rather intoxicating cake, like "tipsy cake," thus described by Taylor, the water-poet: "It is much like a loafe out of a brewer's basket; it is composed of two simples—mault and water... and is cousin-germane to the mightiest ale in England. (See vol. ii. of Taylor's Works.)

Hullabaloo. Uproar, Irish pulla-loo, a coromach or crying together at funerals. (See HURLR-BURLX.)

"All this the poor old creature has set up such a pulla-loo, that she brought the seven parishes about her." — Dublin and London Magazine (Lough-bread), 1853.

Hul'sean Lectures. Instituted by the Rev. John Hulse, of Cheshire, in 1777. Every year some four or six sermons are preached at Great St. Mary's, Cambridge, by what is now called the Hulsean Lecturer, who, till 1860, was entitled the Great Hulsean Lecturer. Originally twenty sermons a year were preached and afterwards printed under this benefaction.

Hum and Haw (7d). To hesitate to give a positive plain answer; to hesitate in making a speech. To introduce ham and haw between words which ought to follow each other freely.

Hum a (Tb). A fabulous Oriental bird which never alights, but is always on the wing. It is said that every head which it overshadows will wear a crown (Richardson). The splendid little bird suspended over the throne of Tippoo Saib at Sringapatam represented this poetical fancy.

In the first chapter of the Laius of the Beak Joakab I. certain popular beakery is made to describe himself, in allusion to his many wanderings, to the bird. "Yes, I am like the Huma, the bird that never alights, hence birds in the case as the Huma is always on the wing.

Human Race (b. soft). Father of the human race, Adam.

Human Sacrifice. A custom still subsisting seems to prove that the Egyptians formerly sacrificed a young virgin to the god of the Nile, for they now make a statue of clay in shape of a girl, which they call the "betrothed bride," and throw it into the river. (Savory.)

Humanitarian. Those who believe that Jesus Christ was only man. The disciples of St. Simon are so called also, because they maintain the perfectibility of human nature without the aid of grace.

Humanities or Humanity Studies. Grammar, rhetoric, and poetry, with Greek and Latin (literae humaniores); in contradistinction to divinity (literae divinae).

"The humanities... is used to designate those studies which are considered the most specially adapted for training... true humanity in every man." — French: On the Study of Works, Lecture III, p. 69.

Humber. Chief of the Hans, defeated by Locrin, King of England, and drowned in the river Abus, ever since called the Humber. (Geoffrey of Monmouth: Chronicles.)

"Their cheifest Humber named was Diacht Into the mightie streame he betake. Where he an end of battallie and life did make."

— Spenser: Pierie Queene, b. 10.

Humble Bee. A corruption of the German hummel be, the buzzing bee. Sometimes called the Dumble-dor. Also Humble-bee, from its buzzing drone.

Humble Cow (J). A cow without horns.

"That said John with a head curn... crowned during the humble cow out of the des" — So W. Scott, Twa Moumints, chap. 19.

Humble Pie. To eat humble pie. To come down from a position you have assumed, to be obliged to take "a lower room." " UMibles are the heart, liver, and entrails of the deer, the huntsman'squisites. When the lord and his household dined the venison pasty was served on the day, but the umbles were made into a pie for the huntsman and his fellows.

N.B. Pie and patty are both diminutives of pasty. Pasty and patty are limited to venison, real, and some few other meats; pie is of far wider signification, including fruit, mince, etc.

Hum'bug. A correspondent in Notes and Queries (March 5th, 1892) suggests as the source of umbug of this word the Italian umma bugiardo, a lying man.

"To hum used to signify "to applaud," "to pretend admiration," " hence "to flatter," " to cajole for an end," " to deceive."

"He threatened, but he held "was all a hum." — Peter Pander, 1594.

"Gentlemen, this humbug (expression of applause) is not at all becoming the gravity of this court." — South Trades (183)."
Humming Ale

Hundred-handed

Hundred-handed

Hundred-handed. Strong liquor that froths well, and causes a humming in the head of the drinker.

Hummus (in Covent Garden). So called from the Persian hummoun (a sweating or Turkish bath).

Humour. As good humour, ill or bad humour, etc. According to an ancient theory, there are four principal humours in the body: phlegm, blood, choler, and black bile. As any one of these predominates it determines the temper of the mind and body; hence the expressions sanguine, choleric, phlegmatic, and melancholic humours. A just balance made a good compound called "good humour;" a preponderance of any one of the four made a bad compound called an ill or evil humour. (See Ben Jonson: Every Man Out of His Humour (Prologue).

Humphrey (Master). The imaginary collector of the tales in Master Humphrey's Clock, by Charles Dickens. The good Duke Humphrey. (See Good Duke Humphrey.)

To dine with Duke Humphrey. To have no dinner to go to. Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, son of Henry IV., was renowned for his hospitality. At death it was reported that a monument would be erected to him in St. Paul's, but his body was interred at St. Albans. When the promenaders left for dinner, the poor stay-behinds who had no dinner used to say to the gay sparks who asked if they were going, that they would stay a little longer and look for the monument of the "good duke." To dine with Duke Humphrey in Poet's Walk.

"A similar location is To sup with Sir Thomas Gresham. The Exchange built by Sir Thomas being a common lounge."

"Though little coin thy purseless pocket line,
Yet with great company thou art taken up;
For often with Duke Humphrey thou dost dine,
And often with Sir Thomas Gresham sup." (Heyman: Quodlibet (Epigram on a Jogger), 1639.

Humpty Dumpty. An egg, a little deformed dwarf. Dumpty is a corruption of dumpy (short and thick). A dump is a piece of lead used in chuck-farthing. Humpty is having a hump or hunch. The two mean short, thick, and round-shouldered.

Hunchback. Styled My Lord. Grose says this was done in the reign of Richard III., when many deformed men were made peers; but probably the word is the Greek lordos (crooked).

Hundred. Hero of the hundred fights or battles.

Lord Nelson (1758-1805). Conn, a celebrated Irish hero, is so called by O'Gnive, the bard of O'Niel: "Conn, of the hundred fights, sleeps in thy grass-grown tomb."

Hundred. A county division mentioned in Domesday Book, and supposed to embrace ten tithings for military and constabulary purposes. If a crime was committed (such as robbery, maiming cattle, stack-burning, etc.), these surties were bound to make it good, or bring the offender to justice. Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmorland, and Durham are divided into "wards" (q.v.).

Yorkshire, Lincolnshire, and Notts, into "wapentakes" (q.v.). Yorkshire has also a special division, called "ridings" (q.v.). Kent is divided into five lathes, with subordinate hundreds. (See LATHES.) Sussex is divided into six rapes (1 syl.), with subordinate hundreds. (See RAPES.)

Hundred Days. The days between March 20, 1815, when Napoleon reached the Tuileries, after his escape from Elba, and June 28, the date of the second restoration of Louis XVIII. These hundred days were noted for five things:

The additional Act to the constitutions of the empire, April 22. The Coalition; The Champ de Mai, June 1; The battle of Waterloo, June 18; The second abdication of Napoleon in favour of his son, June 22.

He left Elba February 26; landed at Cannes March 1, and at the Tuileries March 20. He signed his abdication June 22, and abdicated June 28.

The address of the Count de Chambord, the prefect, begins thus: "A hundred days, sire, have elapsed since the fatal moment when your Majesty was forced to quit your capital in the midst of tears." This is the origin of the phrase.

Hundred-eyed (The). Argus, in Greek and Latin fable. Juno appointed him guardian of Io [the cow], but Jupiter caused him to be put to death; whereupon Juno transplanted his eyes into the tail of her peacock.

Hundred-handed (The). Three of the sons of Urknus were so called, viz. Egeon or Briares [Bri'-a-rows], Kottos, and Gyges or Gyris. Called in Greek Hundred Miles (A). Not a hundred miles off. An indirect way of saying in this very neighbourhood, or very spot. The phrase is employed when it would be indiscreet or dangerous to refer more directly to the person or place hinted at; as, "Not a hundred miles off, there is . . ."

Hundred Years' War (The). The struggle between France and England, beginning in the reign of Edward III., 1337, and ending in that of Henry VI., 1453.

Hungarian. One half-starved; intended as a pun on the word hunger (a dinnerless pop).

Hung'ary Water. Made of rosemary, sage, and spices; so called because the receipt was given by a hermit to the Queen of Hungary.

Hunger seasons Food.

English:
"Hunger is the best sauce."
"Hunger is good kitchen meat."

French:
"Il n'y a sauce que d'appétit."
"L'appétit assaisonne tout."

Latin:
"Optimum condimentum fames," (Socrates.)
"Optimum tibi condimentum est fames, potionis satis." (Cicero.)
"Manet hodique vulgo trium proverbium: Famen efficere ut crudum etiam fabus saccharium supiant." (Erasmus.)

Italian:
"La fame e il miglior intingolo."
"Appetito non vuol salsa."

The contrary:
"The full soul loatheth a honey-corn."
"It must be a delicate dish to tempt the overorged appetite." (Southey.)
"He who is not hungry is a fastidious eater." (Spanish.)
"Plenty makes dainty."

Hungry (hunger). The dish out of which the goddess Hel (q.v.) was wont to feed.

Hungry.
Hungry as a dog. In Latin, "Rabidus fame, ceu canis."
Hungry as a hawk.
Hungry as a hunter.
Hungry as a kite. In Latin, Milcinam appetentian habère." (Plautus.)
Hungry as a wolf. In French, "Avoir une faim de loup." Another French phrase is "Avoir un faim de diable."

Hungry Dogs. Hungry dogs will eat dirty puddings.
"To the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet." (Prov. xxvii. 7.)
"When bread is wanting oaten cakes are excellent."

Latin:
"Jejunus raro stomachus vulgaria temnit." (Horace.)

French:
"À la faim il n'y a point de mauvais pain."
"A ventre affamé tout est bon."
"Ventre affamé n'a point d'oreilles."

Italian:
"L'asino chi a fame mangia d'ogni strame."

German:
"Wem kase und brod nicht schmeckt, der ist nicht hungri."

Hun'lades, Hunniades, or Hunn-ady (4 syl.). One of the greatest captains of the fourteenth century. The Turks so much feared them that they used his name for scaring children. (1400-1456.) (See Bogis.)

"The Turks employed this name to frighten their perverse children. He was corruptly denominated 'Jancus Lain.'"—Gibbon: Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, xii. 106.

Hunk. An old hunks. A screw, a hard, selfish, mean fellow. (Icelandic. hunskur, sordid.)

Hunt. Like Hunt's dog, he would neither go to church nor stay at home. One Hunt, a labouring man in Shropshire, kept a mastiff, which, on being shut up while his master went to church, howled and barked so terribly as to disturb the whole congregation: whereupon Hunt thought he would take his Lycisca with him the next Sunday, but on reaching the churchyard the dog positively refused to enter. The proverb is applied to a tricky, self-willed person, who will neither be led or driven.

Hunter. Mr. and Mrs. Leo Hunter. Two lion hunters, or persons who hunt
The mighty hunter. Nimrod is so called (Gen. x. 9). The meaning seems to be a conqueror. Jeremiah says, "I [the Lord] will send for many hunters [warriors], and they shall hunt [chase] them [the Jews] from every mountain... and out of the holes of the rocks" (xvi. 16).

"Proud Nimrod first the bloody chase began—
A mighty hunter, and his prey was man.

Hurlo-Thrumbo

The month or mood following the "harvest moon" (q.v.). Hunting does not begin until after harvest.

Hunting and Runners of classic renown:

Acantus, who took part in the famous Calydonian hunt (a wild boar).

Actaeon, the famous huntsman who was transformed by Diana into a stag, because he chanced to see her bathing.

Adonis, beloved by Venus, slain by a wild boar while hunting.

Adrastus, who was slain at the siege of Thebes by the speed of his horse Arion, given him by Hercules.

Atlantis, who promised to marry the man who could outrun her in running.

Canilla, the swift-footed of all the companions of Diana.

Ladas, the swift-footed of all the runners of Alexander the Great.

Mkleagar, who took part in the great Calydonian hunt.

Orion, the great and famous hunter, changed into the constellation, so conspicuous in November.

Philippides, who ran 153 miles in two days.

Hunting of the Hare. A comic romance, published in Weber's collection. A yeoman informs the inhabitants of a village that he has seen a hare, and invites them to join him in hunting it. They attend with their curs and mastiffs, pugs and house-dogs, and the fun turns on the truly unsportsmanlike manner of giving pass the chase.

Hunting the Gawk. (See April Fool.)

Hunting the Snark. A child's tale by "Lewis Carroll," a pseudonym adopted by C. Lutwidge Dodgson, author of Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, with its continuation, Through the Looking-glass, etc. (See Snark.)

Hunting two Hares. He who hunts two hares leaves one and loses the other. No one can do well or properly two things at once. "No man can serve two masters."

French:

"Poursuis deux lièvres, et les maques" (La Fontaine).

"On ne peut tirer à deux cibles."

Latin:

"Duos qui sequitur lepores, neutrum capit."

"Simul sorbere ac flare non possum."

"Like a man to double business bound,
I stand in pause where I shall first begin,
And both neglect."

Huntingdon (called by the Saxons Huntantun, and in Doomsday Hunting's dune) appears to have derived its name from its situation in a tract of country which was anciently an extensive forest abounding with deer, and well suited for the purposes of the chase.

Huntingdon Sturgeon (a). An ass's foal. Pepys, in his Diary, tells us that during a high flood between the meadows of Huntingdon and Godmanchester something was seen floating on the water, which the Huntingdonians insisted was a sturgeon, but, being rescued, it proved to be a young donkey.

Huon de Bordeaux encounters in Syria an old follower of the family named Gerasmes (2 syl.), whom he asks the way to Babylon. Gerasmes told him the shortest and best way was through a wood sixteen leagues long, and full of fairs; that few could go that way because King O'beron was sure to encounter them, and whoever spoke to this day was lost for ever. If a traveller, on the other hand, refused to answer him, he raised a most horrible storm of wind and rain, and made the forest seem one great river. "But," says the vassal, "the river is a mere delusion, through which anyone can wade without wetting the soles of his shoes." Huon for a time followed the advice of Gerasmes, but afterwards addressed Oberon, who told him the history of his birth. They became great friends, and when Oberon went to Paradise he left Huon his successor as lord and king of Monnur. He married Esclairmond, and was crowned "King of all Faurie." (Huon de Bordeaux, a Romance).

Hurdle Race (a). A race in which the runners have to leap over three or more hurdles, fixed in the ground at unequal distances.

Burdy-gurdy. A stringed instrument of music, like a rude violin; the notes of which are produced by the friction of a wheel.

Hurlo-Thrumbo. A ridiculous burlesque, which in 1790 had an extraordinary run at the Haymarket theatre. So great was its popularity that a club Hurly-burly. Uproar, tumult, especially of battle. A reduplication of hurly. Hurly-burly is the French equivalent, evidently connected with hurly, to howl or yell. (See HULLABALOO.)

Hurrah', the Hebrew יירא. Our "Old Hundredth Psalm" begins with "Shout joyfully [hurrah] to Jehovah!" The word is also of not uncommon occurrence in other psalms. See Votes and Queries, October 16th, 1880, (Norwegian and Danish, hurra) (See HUZZA.)

Hus'band is the house farmer. Bond is Norwegian for a "farmer," hence bonde-by (a village where farmers dwell); and huse means "house." Hus-band-men is the man-of-the-house farmer. The husband, therefore, is the master farmer, and the husband-man the servant or labourer. "Husbandry" is the occupation of a farmer or husband; and a bondman or bondslave has no connection with bond = fetters, or the verb to bind. It means simply a cultivator of the soil. (See VILLEIN.) Old Tusser was in error when he derived the word from "house-band," as in the following distich:

"The name of the husband, what is it to say? Of wife and household the band and the stay."

Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry.

Husband's Boat (The). The boat which leaves London on Saturday, and takes to Margate those fathers of families who live in that neighbourhood during the summer months.

"I shall never forget the evening when we went down to the jetty to see the Husband's boat come in." —The Mattoon Dough.

Husband's Tea. Very weak tea.

Hush-money. Money given to a person who knows a secret to keep him from mentioning it. A bribe for silence or "hushing" a matter up.

Hush'al (2 syl.), in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is Hyde, Earl of Rochester. Hushai was David's friend, who counteracted the counsels of Achitophel, and caused the plot of Absalom to miscarry; so Rochester defeated the schemes of Shaftesbury, and brought to nought the rebellion of the Duke of Monmouth.

N.B. This was not John Wilmot, Earl of Rochester, the wit.

Hussars. Matthias Corvinus compelled every twenty families to provide him with one horse-soldier free of all charge. This was in 1458, and in confirmation of this story we are told that huns is an Hungarian word meaning "twenty," and that hurs means "hunts." When Matthias Corvinus succeeded to the crown of Hungary (1458), Mohammed III. and Frederick III. conspirated to dethrone the "boy king"; but Matthias enrolled an army of Husars, and was able to defy his enemies.

"Item di contingentus ualui prolonee aut husars. Hungari albanum raptum... habiterint..." —A elation in a truce between the Turks and George Brunswich, May 21st, 1460.

Hussites (2 syl.). Followers of John Huss, the Bohemian reformer, in the fourteenth century. (See Bethlem-

Hussy. A little hussy. A word of slight contempt, though in some counties it seems to mean simply girl, as “Come hither, hussy.” Of course, the word is a corruption of housewife or huswif. In Swedish husvif means woman in general. It is rather remarkable that mother in Norfolk has given rise to a similar sort of word, mother, as “Come hither, mother”—i.e. girl. Neither hussy nor mother is applied to married women. In Norfolk they also say mow for a female, and boor for the other sex. Mover is Dutch for woman in general, and boor for peasant, whence our boor.

Husterloe. A wood in Flanders, where Reynard declared his vast treasures were concealed. (Reynard the Fox.)

Hustings. House-things or city courts. London has still its court of Hustings in Guildhall, in which are elected the lord mayor, the aldermen, and city members. The hustings of elections are so called because, like the court of Hustings, they are the places of elective assemblies. (Anglo-Saxon, husting, a place of council.)

Hutchinsonians. Followers of Anne Hutchinson, who retired to Rhode Island. Anne and fifteen of her children were subsequently murdered by the Indians (died 1643).

Hutin. Louis le Hutin, Louis X. Mazerai says he received the name because he was tongue-doughty. The hutinat was a mallet used by cooperers which made great noise but did not give severe blows; as we should say the barker or lurking dog. It is my belief that he was so named because he was sent by his father against the Hutins, a seditionists people of Navarre and Lyons. (1289, 1314-1316.)

Hutkin. A cover for a sore finger, made by cutting off the finger of an old glove. The word hut in this instance is from the German hutn (to guard or protect). It is employed in the German noun finger-hut (a thimble to protect the finger), and in the word kuth or hit. (See Hodeken.)

Hussa! (Old French, huzzer, “to shout aloud;” German, hussh! (See Hurrah.)

Hussy. (See Hussy.)

Hvergelmer. A boiling cauldron in Nifheim, whence issues twelve poisonous springs, which generate ice, snow, wind, and rain. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Hyacinth, according to Grecian fable, was the son of Amyclas, a Spartan king. The lad was beloved by Apollo and Zephyr, and as he preferred the sun-god, Zephyr drove Apollo’s spout at his head, and killed him. The blood became a flower, and the petals are inscribed with the boy’s name. (Virgil: Eclogues, iii. 106.)

“...The hyacinth bewrays the doleful ’A I;’ And calls the tribute of Apollo’s sigh. Still on its bloom the mournful snow retains The lovely blue that dyed the stippling by yea’,” Camoens: Lusiad, 18.

Hyades (3 syll.). Seven nymphs placed among the stars, in the constellation Taurus, which threaten rain when they rise with the sun. The fable is that they wept the death of their brother Hyas so bitterly, that Zeus (1 syll.), out of compassion, took them to heaven, and placed them in the constellation Taurus. (Greek, huirn, to rain.)

Hybla. A mountain in Sicily, famous for its honey. (See Hymettus.)

Hydra. A monster of the Lernean marshes, in Argolis. It had nine heads, and Hercules was sent to kill it. As soon as he struck off one of its heads, two shot up in its place.

Hydra-headed. Having as many heads as the hydra (q.v.); a difficulty which goes on increasing as it is combated.

Hydra-headed multitude. The rabble, which not only is many-headed numerically, but seems to grow more numerous the more it is attacked and resisted.

Hyenas were worshipped by the ancient Egyptians. Pliny says that a certain stone, called the “hyena stone,” found in the eye of the creature, being placed under the tongue, imparts the gift of prophecy (xxxvii. 60).

Hygeia (3 syll.). Goddess of health and the daughter of Asclepius. Her symbol was a serpent drinking from a cup in her hand.

Hyksons. A tribe of Cuthites (2 syll.), driven out of Assyria by Aramites and the Shemites. They founded in Egypt a dynasty called Hyksons (shepherd kings), a title assumed by all the Cuthite chiefs. This dynasty, which gave Egypt six or eight kings, lasted 259 years, when the whole horde was driven from Egypt, and retired to Palestine. It is from these refugees that the lords of the Philistines arose. The word is compounded of hyk (king) and sds (shepherd).
Hylas. A boy beloved by Hercules, carried off by the naiads while drawing water from a fountain in Mytis.

Hylech (in Astrology). That planet, or point of the sky, which dominates at a man's birth, and influences his whole life.

Hymen. God of marriage, a sort of overgrown head-torch Cupid. His symbols are a bridal-torch and veil in his hand.

Hymettus. A mountain in Attica, famous for its honey. (See HYBLA.)

Hymn Tunes. "The Heavens are Telling." (From Haydn's Creation.)
"Marching to Glory." The tune of Marching to Georgia.
"Onward, Christian Soldiers." One of Haydn's Symphonies.
"Lo! He comes with clouds descending," The tune of a hornpipe danced at Saddler's Wells in the eighteenth century. (Heilmesly.)
"There is a Happy Land." An Indian air.
"The Land of the Leal." Scots who have an Wallace bled.
"Brightest and best of the Sons of the Morning." Mendelssohn's Lieder No. 9.

Hymnus Eucharisticus. Sung as the clock strikes 5 a.m. by Magdalen choir on the summit of Wolsey's Tower (Oxford) on May morning to greet the rising sun. Some say the custom dates from the reign of Henry VIII.; if this overshoots the mark, no one knows for certainty a more exact period.

"Te Deum Patrem colimus,
To mundus praequehinc;
Qui corpus elicionem,
Cecisti memorem aramax."

Hymnus Eucharisticus.

Hyperbo'leans (5 syl.). The most northern people, who dwell beyond Bou'reas (the seat of the north wind), placed by Virgil under the North Pole. They are said to be the oldest of the human race, the most virtuous, and the most happy; to dwell for some thousand years under a cloudless sky, in fields yielding double harvests, and in the enjoyment of perpetual spring. When sated of life they crown their heads with flowers, and plunge headlong from the mountain Hunneberg or Halleberg into the sea, and enter at once the paradise of Odin. (Scandinavian mythology.)

The Hyperbo'leans, it is said, have not an atmosphere like our own, but one consisting wholly of feathers. Both Herod'otos and Pliny mention this fiction, which they say was suggested by the quantity of snow observed to fall in those regions. (Herodotos, iv. 31.)

Hyper'lon. Properly, the father of the Sun and Moon, but by poets made a surname of the Sun. Shakespeare makes it a synonym of Apollo. The proper pronunciation is Hyper'lon. Thus Ovid—

"Placent equo Perseis radiis Hyperlon circumcinct." (Fasti, i. 365.)

"So excellent a king, that was to this Hyperlon a satyr." Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 9.

Hyper'mnestra. Wife of Lynceus (2 syl.), and the only one of the fifty daughters of Danaos who did not murder her husband on their bridal night.

Hypnotism. The art of producing trance-sleep, or hypnosis; or the state of being hypnotised. (Greek, hypnos, sleep.)

"The method, discovered by Mr. Braid, of producing this state ... appropriately designated ... hypnosis, consists in the maintenance of a fixed gaze for several minutes ... a bright object placed somewhirt above the line of sight, at so short a distance as to produce pain." — Carpenter: Principles of Mental Physiology, book iv, chap. i. p. 42.

Hypochon'dria. (Greek, hypo chon'dros, under the cartilage)—i.e. the spaces on each side of the epigastric region, supposed to be the seat of melancholy as a disease.

Hypocrisy. L'hypocrisie est un hommage que le vice rend a la vertu. (Rochefoucauld.)

Hy'pocrite (3 syl.). Prince of hy'pocrates. Tiberius Caesar was so called, because he affected a great regard for decency, but indulged in the most detestable lust and cruelty (b.c. 42, 14 to a.d. 37).

Abdallah Ibn Obba and his partisans were called The Hypocrites by Mahomet, because they feigned to be friends, but were in reality disguised foes.

Hyp'ocrites' Isle, called by Rabelais Chaneph, which is the Hebrew for "hypocrisy." Rabelais says it is wholly inhabited by sham saints, spiritual comedians, bead-tumblers, mumblers of ave-mari'as, and such like sorry rogues, who lived on the alms of passengers, like the Hypostatic Union. (Pantagruel, iv. 63.)

Hypostatic Union. The union of two or more persons into one undivided unity, as, for example, the three persons of the eternal Godhead. The Greek hypostasis corresponds to the Latin persona. The three persons of the God and three hypostases of the Godhead mean one and the same thing.

"We do not find, indeed, that the hypostatic pre-existence of Christ was an article of their creed [i.e. of the Nazarenes].—Fisher: Supernatural Origin of Christianity, essay v. p. 319.

Hypfed [hipe]. Melancholy, low-spirited. Hyp. is a contraction of hypochondria.

Hyeson. One of the varieties of green tea. "Ainsi nommé d’un mot chinois qui veut dire printemps, parce que c’est au commencement de cette saison qu’on le cueille." (M. N. Houillet.)

Hyssop. David says (Ps. li. 7): "Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean." The reference is to the custom of someone who was ceremoniously "clean" sprinkling the unclean (when they came to present themselves in the Temple) with a bunch of hyssop dipped in water, in which had been mixed the ashes of a red heifer. This was done as they left the Court of the Gentiles to enter the Court of the women (Numbers xix. 17).

Hy'steron Proteron (Greek). The cart before the horse.

I.

I. This letter represents a finger, and is called in Hebrew yod or yod (a hand). I per se [I by itself], i.e. without compeer, pre-eminently so.

"If then your [yes] agreement want, I to your [yes] must answer, No. Therefore leave off your spelling idea, and let your I [yes] be I per se. i.e. let your yes be yes decidedly.

With Interpreter, p. 116.

* Many other letters are similarly used; as, A per se. (See A-per-se.) Thus in Restituta Eliza is called "The E per se of all that ere hath been." So again, "O," signifies a crier, from "O yes! O yes!"

We have "Villanica discovered by ... the help of a new crier, called O per se [i.e. superior to his predecessors]." 1666.

Shakespeare, in Troilus and Cressida, i. 2, even uses the phrase "a very man per se" = A 1.

I.H.S. i.e. the Greek ΙΗΣ, meaning ΙΗΣου (Jesus), the long e (H) being mistaken for a capital H, and the dash inverted into a cross. The letters being thus obtained, St. Bernardine of Siena, in 1347, hit upon the Latin agrum, Jesus Hominum Salvator. In Greek, Ἰησοῦς Υἱὸς Θεοῦ Σωτήρ. In German, Jesus Heiland Seidnacher. In English, Jesus Heavenly Saviour.

I.H.S. A notarica of Japheth, Ham, Seth, the three sons of Noah, by whom the world was peopled after the Flood.

I.H.S. "In hac salus"—i.e. "Hac cruce."

I.O.U. The memorandum of a debt given by the borrower to the lender. It must not contain a promise to pay. The letters mean, "I owe You."

An I.O.U. requires no stamp, unless it specifies a day of payment, when it becomes a bill, and must have a stamp.

I.R.B. Irish Republican Brotherhood, meaning the Fenian conspiracy.

Iach'imono [Yak-e-me]. An Italian libertine in Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

Iago [Yago or E-a-go]. Othello's ensign or ancient. He hated the Moor both because Cassio, a Florentine, was preferred to the lieutenant instead of himself, and also from a suspicion that the Moor had tampered with his wife; but he concealed his hatred so well that Othello wholly trusted him. Iago persuaded Othello that Desdemona's intrigue with Cassio, and urged him on till he murdered his bride. His chief argument was that Desdemona had given Cassio a pocket-handkerchief, the fact being that Iago had set on his wife to purloin it. After the death of Desdemona, Emilia (Iago's wife) revealed the fact, and Iago was arrested.

Shakespeare generally makes three syllables of the name, as—

"Let it not call your patience, good I-a-go. Left in the conduct of the hud I-a-go!" i. 1.

"This one I-a-go, ancien to the general." It

Iamb'ic. Father of Lambie rese. Archilochos of Paros (b.c. 714-676).

Ian'the (3 syl.), to whom Lord Byron dedicated his Childre Harold, was Lady Charlotte Harley, born 1809, and only eleven years old at the time.

Iap'etoa. The father of Atlas and ancestor of the human race, called genus Iapeti, the progeny of Iapetus (Greek and Latin mythology). By many considered the same as Japheth, one of the sons of Noah.
Iberia. Spain; the country of the Iberus or Ebro. (See Rowe: On the Late Glorious Successes.)

Iberia's Pilot. Christopher Columbus. Spain is called "Iberia," and the Spaniards the "Ibri." The river Ebro is a corrupt form of the Latin Iberus.

"Launched with Iberia's pilot from the steep, To worlds unknown, and isles beyond the deep."—Cowper: The Pleasures of Hope, ii. 211.

Ibid. A contraction of ibidem (Lat.), in the same place.

Ibis or Nile-bird. The Egyptians call the sacred Ibis Father John. It is the avatar of the god Thoth, in whom the guise of an Ibis escaped the pursuit of Typhon. The Egyptians say its white plumage symbolises the light of the sun, and its black neck the shadow of the moon, its body a heart, and its legs a triangle. It was said to drink only the purest of water, and its feathers to secure or even kill the crocodile. It is also said that the bird is so fond of Egypt that it would pine to death if transported elsewhere. It appears at the rise of the Nile, but disappears at its inundation. If, indeed, it devours crocodiles' eggs, scares away the crocodiles themselves, devours serpents and all sorts ofnoxious reptiles and insects, no wonder it should be held in veneration, and that it is made a crime to kill it. (See Birds.)

Ibis. The Nile-bird, says Solinus, "rummages in the mud of the Nile for serpents' eggs, her most favourite food."

Iblis or Eblis. The Lucifer of Moslem theology. Once called Azazel (prince of the apostate angels). (See Enam.) He has five sons:—

Ibrahim. The Abraham of the Koran.

Icarian. Soaring, adventurous. (See Icaros.) Also a follower of Cabet, the Communist, a native of Icaria (last half of the nineteenth century).

Icarus. Son of Daedalos, who flew with his father from Crot; but the sun melted the wax with which his wings were fastened on, and he fell into the sea, hence called the Icarian. (See Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI., v. 6.)

Ice (1 syl.). To break the ice. To broach a disagreeable subject; to open the way. In allusion to breaking ice for bathers. (Latin, sonder glacie.)

Italian, romper il ghiaccio.) (Anglo-Saxon, ice.)

"[We] An' if you break the ice, and do this feat
 Will not so graceless be, to be ingrane."—Shakespeare: Tamora of the Shrew, i. 2.

Ice-blank (The). An indication of pack-ice or of a frozen surface by its reflection on the clouds. If the sky is dark or brown, the navigator may be sure that there is water; if it is white, rosy, or orange-coloured, he may be certain there is ice, for these tints are reflected from the sun's rays, or of light. The former is called a "water sky," the latter an "ice sky."

Ice-brook. A sword of ice-brook temper. Of the very best quality. The Spaniards used to plunge their swords and other weapons, while hot from the forge, into the brook Salo [Xalon], near Bilbilis, in Celtiberia, to harden them. The water of this brook is very cold.

"It is a sword of Spain, the ice-brook temper."—Shakespeare: Othello, v. 2.

"Savo Bilbilis optimam metallum
 Et ferro Placent am sonantem
 Quam fluctus tenet ac inquitum
 Armaturam salo temperatur ambit.

Ice Saints or Frost Saints. Those saints whose days fall in what is called "the black-thorn winter"—that is, the second week in May (between 11 and 14). Some give only three days, but whether 11, 12, 13 or 12, 13, 14 is not agreed. May 11th is the day of St. Mamertus, May 12th of St. Pancratius, May 13th of St. Servatius, and May 14th of St. Boniface.

"Ces saints passent pour saints greloures, geleurs, et guerite du bourgou."—Hublas.

Iceberg. A hill of ice, either floating in the ocean, or aground. The magnitude of some icebergs is very great. One seen off the Cape of Good Hope was two miles in circumference, and a hundred and fifty feet high. For every cubic foot above water there must be at least eight feet below.

Iceland Dogs. Shaggy white dogs, once great favourites with ladies. Shakespeare mentions them (Henry V., ii. 1.)

"Use and custom hath detained . . . Iceland doggs curled and rough all over, which, by reason of the length of their hare make above neither of face nor of body."—Fletcher: Of English Dogges (1576).

Ich Dien. According to a Welsh tradition, Edward I. promised to provide Wales with a prince "who could speak no word of English," and when his son Edward of Carnarvon was born he presented him to the assembly, saying in Welsh Ich dion (behold the man).
Ichneumon. The more general belief is that it was the motto under the plume of John, King of Bohemia, slain by the Black Prince at Cressy in 1266, and that the Black Prince who slew the Bohemian assumed it out of modesty, to indicate that “he served under the king his father.”

Ichneumon. An animal resembling a weasel, and well worthy of being defended by priest and prince in Egypt, as it feeds on serpents, mice, and other vermin, and is especially fond of crocodiles’ eggs, which it scratches out of the sand. According to legend, it steals into the mouths of crocodiles when they gape, and eats out their bowels. The ichneumon is called “Pharaoh’s rat.”

Ichor (I’-kor). The colourless blood of the heathen deities. (Greek, ichor, juice.)

Ichthus for Je’sous, CHristos, THEou Uios, Soter. This notarica is found on many seals, rings, urns, and tombstones, belonging to the early times of Christianity, and was supposed to be a “charm” of mystical efficacy.

Icon Beallike (4 syl.). Portraiture of King Charles I.

“The utter, or Portraiture of his Majesty in his solitude and sufferings... was wholly and only my invention.”—Bauden: Letter to Claremont.

Iconooclasm (Greek, “image breakers”). Reformers who rose in the eighth century, especially averse to the employment of pictures, statues, emblems, and all visible representations of sacred objects. The crusade against these things began in 726 with the Emperor Leo III., and continued for one hundred and twenty years. (Greek, ikon, an image; klaio, I break.)

Ida an Mother. Cybele, who had a temple on Mount Ida, in Asia Minor.

Idealism. The doctrines taught by Idealists.

Subjective idealism, taught by Fichte (2 syl.), supposes the object (say a tree) and the image of it on the mind is all one. Or rather, that there is no object outside the mental idea.

Objective idealism, taught by Schelling, supposes that the tree and the image thereof on the mind are distinct from each other.

Absolute idealism, taught by Hegel, supposes there is no such thing as phenomena; that mind, through the senses, creates its own world. In fact, that there is no real, but all is mere ideal.

These are three German philosophers:

Hegel (1770-1831).
Schelling (1779-1854).
Fichte (1762-1814).

Idealists. Those who believe in idealism. They may be divided into two distinct sections—

(1) Those who follow Plato, who taught that before creation there existed certain types or ideal models, of which ideas created objects are the visible images. Malebranche, Kant, Schelling, Hegel, etc., were of this school.

(2) Those who maintain that all phenomena are only subjective—that is, mental cognisances only within ourselves, and what we see and what we hear are only brain impressions. Of this school were Berkeley, Hume, Fichte, and many others.

Ides (1 syl). In the Roman calendar the 15th of March, May, July, and October, and the 13th of all the other months. (Latin and Etruscan, idūre, to divide, the middle of the month. Always eight days after the Nones.)

“Remember March; the Ides of March remember.”—Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iv, 3.

Idiom. A mode of expression peculiar to a language, as a Latin idiom, a French idiom. (Greek, idios, peculiar to oneself.)

Idiosyncrasy. A crotchet or peculiar one-sided view of a subject, monomania. Properly a peculiar effect produced by medicines or foods; as when coffee acts as an aperient; the electrical current as an emetic, as it does upon me. (Greek, idios syn kyasis, something peculiar to a person’s temperament.)

Idiot meant originally a private person, one not engaged in any public office. Hence Jeremy Taylor says, “Humility is a duty in great ones, as well as in idiots” (private persons). The Greeks have the expressions, “a priest or an idiot” (layman), “a poet or an idiot” (prose-writer). As idiots were not employed in public offices, the term became synonymous with incompetency to fulfil the duties thereof. (Greek, idio’téa.) (See Baron.)

Idle Lake. The lake on which Phedria or Wantonness cruised in her gondola. It led to Wandering Island. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book ii.)

Idle Wheel. The middle of three wheels, which simply conveys the motion of one outside wheel to the other outside wheel.

Suppose A, B, C to be three wheels, B being the idle or governed wheel; B simply converts the motion of A to G, or of G to A.

Idle Worms. It was once supposed that little worms were bred in the fingers of idle servants. To this Shakespeare alludes—

"A round little worm Pricked from the lazy finger of a maid."

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 4.

Idleness. The Lake of Idleness. Spenser says whoever drank of this lake grew "instantly faint and weary." The Red Cross Knight drank of it, and was made captive by Orgoglio. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book i.)

Idol Shepherd (The). Zech. ii. 17. "Woe to the idol shepherd that leaveth his flock." Idol shepherd means self-seeking, counterfeit, pseudo; the shepherd that sets up himself to be worshipped by his people instead of God.

Idomeneus (4 syl.). King of Crete, and ally of the Greeks in the siege of Troy. After the city was burnt he made a vow to sacrifice whatever he first encountered, if the gods granted him a safe return to his kingdom. It was his own son that he first met, and when he offered him up to fulfill his vow he was banished from Crete as a murderer. (Homer: Iliad.)

Compare the story of Jepthah in Judges xi.

Idnun'a or Idun'. Daughter of the dwarf Svati, and wife of Bragi. She kept in a box the golden apples which the gods tasted as often as they wished to renew their youth. Loki on one occasion stole the box and hid it in a wood; but the gods compelled him to restore it. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Iduna seems to personify the year between March and September, when the sun is north of the equator. Her apples indicate fruits generally. Loki carries her off to Giant-Land, when the Sun descends below the equator, and he steals her apples. In time, Iduna makes her escape, in the form of a sparrow, when the Sun again, in March, rises above the equator; and both gods and men rejoice in her return.

Ifa'kina. A corruption of In good faith, I in' kin, where kin is equivalent to dear or good.

Ifreet or Afrteet or Afrit. A powerful evil jin or spirit of Arabian mythology. (See Afriet.)

Ifurin. The Hades of the ancient Gauls. A dark region infested by serpents and savage beasts. Here the wicked are chained in loathsome caverns, plunged into the lairs of dragons, or subjected to a ceaseless distillation of poison. (Celtic mythology.)

Iger'na, Igerne, or Igrayne. Wife of Gorlois, Duke of Tintag'el, in Cornwall, and mother of King Arthur. His father was Uther, pendragon of the Britons, who married Igrane thirteen days after her husband was slain.

Ign'aro. Foster-father of Orgoglio. Whatever question Arthur asked, the old dotard answered, "He could not tell." Spenser says this old man walks one way and looks another, because ignorance is always "wrong-headed." (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book i.)

* (See NON MI RECORDO.)

Ignatius (St.) is represented in Christian art accompanied by lions, or chained and exposed to them, in allusion to his martyrdom. The legend is that he was brought before the Emperor Trajan, who condemned him to be made the food of lions and other wild beasts for the delectation of the people. According to tradition, St. Ignatius was the little child whom our Saviour set in the midst of His disciples for their example. (About 29-115.)

Father Ignatius. The Hon. and Rev. Geo. Spencer, formerly a clergyman of the Church of England, who joined the Roman communion, and became Superior of the order of Passionists. (1799-1864.)

Ignatius Loy'ola, founder of the order of Jesuits, is depicted in art sometimes with the sacred monogram I.H.S. on his breast, and sometimes as contemplating it, surrounded by glory in the skies, in allusion to his boast that he had a miraculous knowledge of the mystery of the Trinity vouchsafed to him. He is so represented in Rubens' famous picture in Warwick Castle.

Igneous Rocks. Those which have been produced by the agency of fire, as the granite, the trappean, and the volcanic. (Latin, ignis, fire.)

Ignis Fa'tuus means strictly a fatuous fire; it is also called "Jack o'
Ignoramus. One who ignores the knowledge of something; one really unacquainted with it. It is an ancient law term. The grand jury used to write Ignoramus on the back of indictments "not found" or not to be sent into court. Hence ignorant. The present custom is to write "No true bill."

Ignoramus Jury. (An). The Grand Jury. (See above.)

Ignorantines (4 syll.). A religious association founded by the Abbé de la Salle in 1724, for educating gratuitously the children of the poor.

Igrayne. (See Igrina.)

Ihram. The white cotton dress worn by Mohammedan pilgrims to Mecca. For men, two scarfs, without seams or ornament of any kind, of any material except silk; one scarf is folded round the loins, and the other is thrown over the neck and shoulders, leaving the right arm free; the head is uncovered. For women, an ample cloak, enveloping the whole person.

II Pastor Fido [the Faithful Swain]. This standard of elegant pastoral composition is by Giovanni Battista Guarini, of Ferrara (1537-1612).

IIiad (3 syll.). The tale of the siege of Troy, an epic poem by Homer, in twenty-four books. Menelaos, King of Sparta, received as his guest Paris, a son of Priam (King of Troy), who ran away with Helen, his hostess. Menelaos induced the Greeks to lay siege to Troy to avenge the perfidy, and the siege lasted ten years. The poem begins in the tenth year with a quarrel between Agamemnon, commander-in-chief of the allied Greeks, and Achilles, the hero who retired from the army in ill-temper. The Trojans now prevail, and Achilles sends his friend Patroclus to oppose them, but Patroclus is slain. Achilles, in a desperate rage, rushes into the battle, and slays Hector, the commander of the Trojan army. The poem ends with the funeral rites of Hector. (Greek, IIaia, genitive, IIaoos, the land of Ilium. It is an adjective, and the word means, "a poem about the land of Ilium.")

"Probably the Aeneid is the genitive of Aeneas, Æneas, and means a poem about Æneas. (See Æneas for another derivation.)

Wolf, Heme, and our own Grote, believed the IIiad to be the work of several poets. R. W. Browne says:—

"No doubt was ever entertained by the ancients respecting the personality of Homer. Pindar, Plato, Aristotle, and others, all assumed this fact; nor did they even doubt that the Iliad and Odyssey were the work of one mind."—Historical Classical Literature, book I, chap. IV. p. 20.

The "IIiad" in a nutshell. Pliny (vii. 21) tells us that the IIiad was copied in so small a hand that the whole work could lie in a walnut-shell. Pliny's authority is Cicero (Apud Gellium, ix. 421). Huet, Bishop of Avranches, demonstrated the possibility of this achievement by writing eighty verses of the IIiad on a single line of a page similar to this "Dictionary." This would be 19,000 verses to the page, or 2,000 more than the IIiad contains.

・ In the Harleian MSS. (530) we have an account of Peter Bales, an Englishman, clerk of the Court of Chancery in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, under date of 1580, who wrote out the whole Bible so small that he inclosed it in a walnut shell of English growth. (See NUTSHELL.)

"Whist, they (as Homer's IIiad in a nut.) A world of wonders in one closed shut." On the Monumental stone of the Traders in Land's Churchyard.

The French IIiad. The Romance of the Rose, begun by Guillaume de Lorris in the latter half of the thirteenth century, and continued by Jean de Meung in the early part of the fourteenth. The poem is supposed to be a dream. The poet in his dream is accosted by Dame Idleness, who conducts him to the Palace of Pleasure, where he meets Love, accompanied by Sweet-looks, Riches, Jollity, Courtesy, Liberality, and Youth, who spend their time in dancing, singing, and other amusements. By this refine the poet is conducted to a bed of roses, where he singles out one and attempts to pluck it, when an arrow from Cupid's bow stretches him fainting on the ground, and he is carried far away from the flower of his choice. As soon as he recovers, he finds himself alone, and resolves to return to his rose. Welcome goes with him; but Danger, Shame-face, Fear, and Slander obstruct him at every turn. Reason advises him to abandon the pursuit, but this he will not do; whereupon Pity and Liberality aid him in reaching the rose of his choice, and Venus permits him to touch it with his lips. Meanwhile, Slander rouses up Jealousy, who seizes Welcome, whom he casts into a strong castle, and gives the key of the castle door to an old bag. Here the poet is left to mourn over his fate, and the original poem ends. Mourning added 18,000 lines to a sequel.

The German Iliad. The Nibelungenlied, put into its present form in 1210 by a wandering minstrel of Austria. It consists of twenty parts. (See NIBELUNG.)

The Portuguese Iliad. The Lusiad (q.v.), by Camoes.

The Scotch Iliad. The Epigoniad, by William Wilkie, called The Scottish Homer (1721-1772). The Epigoniad is the tale of the Epic-oni, or seven Grecian heroes who laid siege to Thebes. When O’Dipos abdicated, his two sons agreed to reign alternate years; but at the expiration of the first year, the elder son, named Eteocles, refused to give up the throne, whereupon Polynikes, the younger brother, induced six chiefs to espouse his cause. The allied army laid siege to Thebes, but without success. Subsequently, seven sons of the chiefs resolved to avenge their fathers’ deaths, marched against the city, took it, and placed Terpendler, one of their number, on the throne. The Greek tragic poets Æschylus and Euripides have dramatized this subject.

Iliad of Ili (An). Ilias mauro-rum (Grecian: Ad Atticum, viii. 11). A number of evils following simultaneously; there is scarce a calamity in the whole catalogue of human ills that finds not mention in the Iliad, hence the Homeric poem was the fountain of classic tragedy.

Ilk. The surname of the person spoken of is the same as the name of his estate. It is quite a mistake to use the phrase “All that ilk” to signify all of that name or sort. Bethune of that ilk means “Bethune of Bethune.” (Gaelic, ilk, clan; Anglo-Saxon, il, the same.)

Ill-got, Ill-spent. Treasures of wickedness profit nothing. (Prov. x. 2.)

Ill May-day. The 1st of May, 1517, when the London apprentices rose up against the resident foreigners, and did great mischief. More commonly known as Evil May-day (q.v.).

Ill Omens averted.

Leotychides II., of Sparta, was told by his augurs that his projected expedition would fail, because a viper had got entangled in the handle of the city key. “Not so,” he replied. “The key caught the viper.”

When Julius Cæsar landed at Adrumetum, in Africa, he happened to trip and fall on his face. This would have been considered a fatal omen by his army; but, with admirable presence of mind, he exclaimed, “Thus I take possession of thee, O Africa!” Told of Scipio also.

When William the Conqueror leaped upon the shore at Bulverhythe he fell on his face, and a great cry went forth that it was an ill-omen; but the duke exclaimed, “I have taken seisin of this land with both my hands.”

When the Duke was arming for the battle, his squire by accident handed him the back piece before the breast-plate, an evil omen, signifying flight. But the Duke, with ready wit, said, “Yes, the last shall be first”—i.e. the duke shall be king.

Napoleon III. did a graceful thing to avert an ill omen. Captain Jean Kœurpreux, in a ball given at the Tuileries, tripped and fell; but Napoleon held out his hand to help him up, saying as he did so, “Monsieur le Commandant, this is the second time I have seen you fall. The first time was by my side in the field of Magenta.” Then, turning to the lady, he added, “Henceforth Captain Kœurpreux is commandant of my Guide.”

Ill-starred. Unlucky; fated to be unfortunate. Othello says of Desdemona, “O ill-starred wench!” Of course, the allusion is to the astrological dogma that the stars influence the fortunes of mankind.

“Where er that ill-starred home may be.”

Moore: Five Worthies.

Ill Wind. ’Tis an ill wind that blows nobody any good. Someone profits by every loss; someone is benefited by every misfortune.

“Except wind renders no evil wind, It is an ill wind that turns none to good.”

Tuner: Five Hundred Points of Good

Ill-fortune, xii.

Illinois, U.S. America. The Delaware Indian word illiní (real men) with the French termination -ois.
Illuminated Doctor. Raymond Lully (1235-1315).

John Tauler, the German mystic (1294-1361).

Illuminati. The baptised were at one time so called, because a lighted candle was given them to hold as a symbol that they were illuminated by the Holy Ghost.

Four religious societies have been so called, viz.:

1. The Hesychasts in the fourteenth century.
2. The Almoravides of Spain in the sixteenth century.
3. The Guerints of France in the seventeenth century.
4. The Mystics of Belgium in the eighteenth century.

Add to these the Rosicrucians (q.r.).

The Order of the Illuminati. A republican society, founded at Ingolstadt in Bavaria, 1776; having for its object the establishment of a religion consistent with "sound reason."

Illuminations. Characteristics of Anglo-Saxon illuminations from the eighth to the eleventh century. Extreme intricacy of pattern.

Interlacings of knots in a diagonal or square form, sometimes interwoven with animals and terminating with heads of serpents or birds. (Sir F. Madden.)

The Durham Book, the work of Eadfrid, Bishop of Lindisfarne, who died 721, is a most splendid specimen of illumination.

The Benedictional of St. Ethelwold, an illuminated MS. by Godeman, in the Duke of Devonshire's library, is worthy of Raphael or Michael Angelo. It was executed between 963 and 984, and is full of miniatures and designs in the highest style of art. Beautiful engravings of it may be seen in the Archæologia.

Illuminator. Gregory, the apostle of Christianity among the Armaghians (257-331).

Illustrious (The).

Albert V., Duke and second Emperor of Austria (1308-1439).

Nicome's des II. Epiph' anés (149-191).

Ptolemy V. Epiph' anés (210, 205-181 b.c.).

Jan-shield (Jam the Illustrious), nephew of Tah Omura, fifth king of the Paiduadian dynasty of Persia (A.C. 840-800).

Kien-lung, fourth of the Manchou dynasty of China (1736-1796).

Imag' e of God. Wear not the image of God in a ring. This is the twenty-fourth symbolic saying in the Protocols of Iamblichus, and is tantamount to the commandment "Thou shalt not take the name of God in vain." Pythagoras meant to teach his disciples by this restriction that God was far too holy a being to be used as a mere ornamental device, and engraved on a ring worn on a man's finger, which might be used for any ordinary purpose.

"In annulo Dei figura ne gestato."

Images which fell from Heaven. Diana of Ephesus (Acts xix. 35). The same is said of the image of Cybèle (3 syl.), set up in the temple of Victory, at Rome.

Im' aum (2 syl.) or Imam. One of the Uléma or priestly body of the Mahometans. He recites the prayers and leads the devotions of the congregation. Imam's wear a high turban. The sultan as "head of the Moslems" is an Imam. The word means teacher or guide.

Im' a'us (3 syl.). The Him' al'ay'a. The word means snow hills (himo, snow).

"The higher incursions of mountain woods From Aima Tir' na, from Im' ams stretched Amidst the roam T' na a sullen bidded."—Thomson: Ailgamus.

Im' be' cölle (3 syl.). One mentally weak. Literally, one who leans "on a stick." (Latin, imbécillus, from in-bécédum.)

Imbroca'do (Spanish). Cloth of gold or silver.

Imbroca'ta, in fencing, is a thrust over the arm. (Italian.)

"If your enemy be cunning and skillful, never stand about giving any fence or imbro' cats, but thrust or strike a stroke, neither it nor any attempt unless you be sure to hit him."—Sarzulo: Pratica del Duello (1595).

Im' bro' glio (Italian). A complicated plot; a misunderstanding between nations and persons of a complicated nature.

Immac' u lato Conception. The dogma that the Virgin Mary was conceived without Original sin. This dogma was first broached by St. Bernard, and was stoutly maintained by Duns Scotus and his disciples, but was not received by the Roman Catholic Church as an article of faith till 1854.

Im' mol' ate (3 syl.). To sacrifice; literally, "put meal on one." The reference is to the ancient custom of sprinkling meal and salt on the head of a victim to be offered in sacrifice.
(Latin, in-suo.)

"In the picture of the immolation of Isaac, or Abraham sacrificing his son, Isaac is described as a little boy."—Brown.

Immortal (The). Yong-Tching, third of the Manchuo dynasty of China, assumed the title. (1723-1736.)

Immortal Four of Italy (The).
Dante (1265-1321).
Petarch (1301-1374).
Ariosto (1474-1533), and Tasso (1544-1595).

"The poets read be o'er and o'er,
And most of all the immortal four Of Italy."—Longfellow: The Wayside Inn.

Immortal Three (The). Homer,
Dante, and Milton.

"Three poets, in three distant ages born,
Greek, Italian, and Englishland did adorn:
The first in loftiness of thought surpassed,
The next in majesty: in both the last:
The verse of nature could no further go.
To make a third, she joined the other two."
Dryden: A Tablet to the Memory of John Milton
(St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapsides).

It was originally in the church of All Hallows, Brod Street.

Immortal Tinker (The). John
Buynya, a tinker by trade. (1628-1688.)

Immortals. A regiment of 10,000 choice foot-soldiers, which constituted the body-guard of the Persian kings.
There was also an army so named at Constantinople, according to Dugan, first embodied by Major Duca.

* The 60th Foot were called "The Immortals," because so many were wounded, but not killed, in Hindustan (1788-1800). This regiment, with the old 33rd, now form the two battalions of the West Riding.

Immortality. Poseidon (Neptune) bestowed immortality on Taphiun, and confined the ghost in a golden lock of hair. His daughter cut off the lock, and the gift was lost. This seems very like the Biblical tale of Samson and Delilah. (See EleCampan.)

Immuring (Latin). Burying in a wall. The Vestal virgins among the Romans, and the nuns among the Roman Catholics, who broke their vows of chastity, were buried in a niche sufficiently large to contain their body with a small pitance of bread and water. The sentence of immuring was Vade in pace, or more correctly, Vade in pacem (Go into peace—i.e., eternal rest).
Some years ago a skeleton, believed to be the remains of an immured nun, was discovered in the walls of Coldingham Abbey.

The immuring of Constance, a nun who had broken her vows, forms a leading incident in Scott's poem of Marmion.

Imogen. Daughter of Cymbeline, the "most tender and artless of all Shakespeare's characters." (Cymbeline.)

Imagines. The lady who broke her vow and was carried off by the ghost of her former lover, in the ballad of Alono the Brave, by Matthew Gregory
Lewis, generally called Monk Lewis.

"Alono the brave was the name of the knight,
And the maiden's the fair Immagine."

Imp (Anglo-Saxon). A graft: whence also a child; as, "You little imp." In hawking, "to imp a feather," is to engraft or add a new feather for a broken one. The needles employed for the purpose were called "imping needles," Lord Cromwell, writing to Henry VIII., speaks of "that noble imp your son."

"Let us pray for . . . the king's most excellent majesty and for . . . his beloved son Edward, our prince, that most angelic imp."—Prayer.

Imp of Darkness (A). Milton calls the serpent "fittest imp of fraud."
(Paradise Lost, ix, 89.)

Impagination. The dogma of Luther that the body and soul of Christ are infused into the eucharistic elements after consecration; and that the bread and wine are united with the body and soul of Christ in much the same way as the body and soul of man are united.
The word means putting into the bread.

Impannata. The Madonna del Annunziata, by Raphael, takes its distinguishing name from the oiled paper window in the background. (Italian, impannata, oiled paper.)

Impear Congressus Achilli. No match for Achilles; the combatants were not equally matched. Said of Troilus. (Virgil: Aenid, i, 475.)

Imperial (A). A tuft of hair on the chin, all the rest of the beard and all the whiskers being shaved off. So called from the Emperor Napoleon III., who set the fashion.

Imperium in Imperio. A government independent of the general authorised government.

Impertinence (4 syl.). A legal term meaning matter introduced into an afdavit, etc., not pertinent to the case.

Imponderables (Latin, things without weight). Heat, light, electricity, and magnetism were, it was at one time supposed, the phenomena of imponderable substances; that of heat was called caloric. This theory is now exploded, but the hypothetical other is without appreciable weight.

Imposition. A task given us as a punishment. Of course the word is taken from the verb imposum, as the task is imposed. The term is common in schools, colleges, and universities. In the sense of a deception it means to “put a trick on a person,” hence, the expressions “to put on one,” “to lay it on thick,” etc.

Imposition of Hands. The bishop, laying his hand on persons confirmed or ordained. (Acts vi., viii., xix.)

Impossibilities. Latin phrases:

- Ab huncus de nihiloe.
- Arsyna are.
- Latenice hane.
- Punitore arsine.
- In tindis hane.

English phrases:

- Gathering grapes from thistles.
- Fetching water in a mead.
- Washing a blackamour white.
- Catching wind in rabbage nets.
- Playing cels by the tail.
- Making cheese of chilk.
- Squaring the circle.
- Turning base metal into gold.
- The exalt of life.
- Making a silk purse of a sow’s ear.

(And hundreds more.)

Impropriation. Profits of ecclesiastical property in the hands of a layman. Appropriation is when the profits of a benefice are in the hands of a college.

Impropriator. A layman who has church lands or ecclesiastical preferment. (Latin, in-proprius, belonging to.)

Improve the Occasion (76). To draw a moral lesson from some event which has occurred. In French, “Profitions de l’occasion.”

Improvigators. Persons who utter verses impromptu. The art was introduced by Petrarch, and is still a favourite amusement of the Italians. The most celebrated are:

- Accolti (Bernardo), of Arezzo, called the “Piumo Areton” (1440-1536).
- Antoniano (Silvio). Eighteenth century.
- Aquilano (Barattoli), of Aquila (1468-1536).
- Bandettini. (See Improvissatrix)
- Berosicid [P. J.], who could convert extempos to Greek or Latin verse, a Dutch newspaper or anything else died 1650.
- Christoporo, nicknamed Altenver, an Italian (1514).
- Corilia. (See Improvissatrix)
- Jhan (Mf.). (See Improvissatrix)
- Kehricius (Erment Lornis). (See Improvissatrix)
- Maron (Andrea). An Italian (1474-1527).

Metastasio (P. A. D. B.), of Assial, who developed, at the age of ten, a great talent for extemporizing verse (1608-1782).

Perrucci (Bernardino), of Stenna, who received an irrele crown in the capital, an honour conferred only on Petrarch and Tasso (1561-1747).

Quinni (Ciparillo). An Italian (1470-1522).

Rossi. Put on at Naples in 1730.

Serafino. (See above, Aquilano.)

Rutini (Bartolomeo). An Italian (died 1822).

Sibici (Ulisse), of Turin (1784-1823). His Death of Charles I., Death of Queen of Scots, and Fall of Missolonga, are very celebrated.

Taddiri (Rossi). (See Improvissatrix)

Zucco (Marco Antonio), of Verona (died 1764).

To these add Galiani, Brando, the brothers Cleri of Holland, Wolf of Alidea, Laron schwartz of Germany, Eugene de Pradel of France, and our own Thomas Hood (1799-1865).

Improvissatrix or Improvisatrice. The most famous improvissators or female improvissators are:

- Maria Magdalen's Morelli Fernandez, sup-
- named the Olympic Gorilla, crowned at Rome for improvisation (1744-1804).
- Tienka Kantense (1785-—).
- Rosa Taddiri (1601-).
- Signora Mazzi, the most talented of all.
- Petrino (Di Benet). Died (1663). She was the inventor of the Ott of Rosses.
- Anna Louisa Kausch, a German (1729-1791.)

In Cena Domini. A papal bull, containing a collection of extracts from different constitutions of the popes, with anathemas against those who violate them; so called from the words with which it commences.

In Commendam (Latin). The holding of church preferment for a time, on the recommendation of the Crown, till a suitable person can be provided. Thus a clergyman who has been elevated to the bench retains for a time his “living” in commendam.

In Esse (Latin). In actual existence. Thus a child living is “in esse,” but before birth is only " in posse."

In Extenso (Latin). At full length, word for word, without abridgment.

In Extremis. At the very point of death. “ In extremo mortis.”

In Fieri. In the course of accomplishment; on the way.

In Flugarte Delicto. Red-handed; in the very fact. “ Il a été pris en flagrant délit,” i.e. “ Sur le fait.”

In for a Penny in for a Pound. I may as well “ be hung for a sheep as a lamb.” If the punishment is the same, then it is worth the risk to commit the offence which brings the greatest profit.

In for It. About “to catch it;” on the point of being in trouble.

" You are in for it I can tell you. I would not stand in your shoes for something."
In Forma

A person who will swear he is not worth £5 has writes, etc., gratis, and is supplied gratuitously with attorney and counsel
(Henry VII., c. 12).

Under the protection of the law.

(Latin) At the outset, at the threshold.

One who stands in a parent's place.

In the middle of the subject. In novels and epic poetry, the author generally begins with some catastrophe, which is explained as the tale unfolds. In history, on the other hand, the author begins ab ovo.

In memory of.

In the clouds; not in actual existence; in contemplation.

In a non-Christian country. A "bishop in partibus" means a bishop in any country, Christian or otherwise, whose title is from some old see which has fallen away from the Catholic faith.
Thus, in England, the Bishop of Cisamus, the Bishop of Emmaus, the Bishop of Amyclae, are bishops in partibus. Dr.
Wiseman was Bishop of Melitopamus before he was Archbishop of Westminster. A bishop in partibus does not mean a bishop in a land of infidels;
he may be so, but this would not make him a bishop in partibus.

In perpetuity, in perpetuity;
as for ever.

Held in reserve, kept back, something done privately, and not announced to the general public.
(In pretore [Latin], in the breast.)
Cardinals in pettro. Cardinals about to be elected, but not yet publicly announced. Their names are in pretore (of the Pope).

What may be considered probable, but has not yet any real existence.

Personal,
and not by deputy or agents.

What is intended or in contemplation to be done at some future time.

In the matter of; on the subject of; as In re Jones v. Robinson. But in rem, against the property or thing referred to.

In its original place.

In statu Quo or In statu quo ante (Latin). In the condition things were before the change took place. Thus, two nations arming for war may agree to lay down arms on condition that all things be restored to the same state as they were before they took up arms.

As a warning, to deter others by terrifying them.

Entirely, altogether.

In a vacuum—
t. e. in a space from which, nominally altogether, and really almost, all the air has been taken away.

A game with four dice,
one extremely common, and frequently alluded to. "In" is a throw of doubles,
"in-and-in" a throw of double doubles, which sweeps the board.

"I have seen three persons sit down at twelve-penny in-and-in, and each draw 40s. a-piece."— Nicker Nickled.

Sometimes the "Ins" means those in office, and the " Outs" those out of office, or in Opposition.

means to be led in by augurs. The Roman augurs met at their college doors the high officials about to be invested, and led them up to the altar; hence to install.

A king or royal prince of the ancient Peruvians. The empire of the Incas was founded by Marco Capcc.

"The Inca was a war-chief, elected by the Council to carry out its decision."—Brinton:
The American Race (north American Tribes), part 1, chap. ii. p. 211.

A singing againsthat is, singing a set form of words in order to bring Divine wrath upon persons or nations.

To make red.
(Latin, uncarnaditus color, carminum)

"No, this my hand will rather
The mutinous sea uncarnadine,
Making the green—one red."

Shakespeare: Macbeth, ii. 2.

A sale by auction. Instead of the hammer of the auctioneer concluding the bids, the purchaser was the last bidder before the candle went out. Another plan is to stick a pin in a candle, and when the pin drops down, the sale of the article is concluded.

"Down were tumbled miracle and martyr.
Put up in lists and sold by inch of candle."
- Peter Pindar: Lyric Odes, xiii.

Indeepsa Rock. Twelve miles from land, in the German Sea. It is dangerous for navigators, and therefore the abbot of Aberbrothok fixed a bell on a float, which gave notice to sailors of its whereabouts. Ralph the Rover, a sea pirate, cut the bell from the float, and was wrecked on his return home on the very rock. Southey has a ballad on the subject.

Precisely the same tale is told of St. Goven's bell, in Pembroke shire. In the chapel was a silver bell, which was stolen one summer evening by pirates, but no sooner had the boat put to sea than all the crew were wrecked. The silver bell was carried by sea-nymphs to the brink of a well, and whenever the stone of that well is struck the bell is heard to N.B. Inch or Innis means island.

Inoeg.—i.e. Inconspicuous (Italian). Under an assumed name or title. When a royal person travels, and does not wish to be treated with royal ceremony, he assumes some inferior title for the nonce, and travels inconspicuous.

Incorruptible (The). Robespierre
(1754-1794). Robert Walpole says that William Shippen was the only man he knew who was proof against a bribe.

"Even the 'Incorruptible' himself fell from his original ideal."-Nineteenth Century, August, 1865, p. 272.

In'cubus. A nightmare, anything that weighs heavily on the mind. At one time supposed to consort with women in their sleep. (Latin, in cubo, to lie on.)

"Merlin was the son of no mortal father, but of an incubus, one of a class of beings not absolutely wicked, but far from good, who inhabited the regions of the air."—Buffon: Age of Chivalry, part i. chap. iii. p. 50.

Indenture. A written contract; so called because the skin on which it was written in duplicate was divided with an indentured edge, to fit into each other.

Independence. The Declaration of Independence. A declaration made July 4th, 1776, by the American States, declaring the colonies free and independent, absolved from all allegiance to Great Britain.

Independence Day (July 4th). So called in the United States of America.
(See above.)

Indian.

Independents. Certain Dissenters are so called, whose fundamental principle is that every congregation is an independent church, and has a right to choose its own minister and make its own laws.

Index (The). The "Roman Index" contains both the Index Librorum Prohibitorum and the Index Expurgatorius.
The former contains a list of such books as are absolutely forbidden to be read by faithful Catholics. The latter contains such books as are forbidden till certain parts are omitted or amended.

The lists are made out by a board of cardinals called the "Congregation of the Index." Of course, it is wholly impossible to keep pace with the present issue of books; but, besides the Protestant Bibles, and the works of such heretics as Arius and Calvin, we find in the lists the following well-known names:

- Of English authors: Addison, Bacon,
  Gibbon, Goldsmith, Hallam, Locke, J.
  S. Mill, Milton, Robertson, Archbishop Whately, etc., and even some children's tales.

- Of French authors: Arnaud, Calvin, Descartes, Fénelon, l'Abbe Fleury, Male-branche, Voltaire, etc.

- Of Italian authors: Dante, Guicciardi-di, Siamouli, etc.

- Of German authors: Kant, Luther, etc.

"Under the auspices of Cardinal Caraffa (part iv.), the Inquisition was introduced into Italy (1522), and exerted the utmost vigilance and se

vency in crushing out the new faith, and the index of prohibited books was established."
- Fiske: Universal History, part iii. period ii. chap.
  iv. p. 414.

India Ink or Chinese ink. So called because it was first brought from China.
It is now made at home of lampblack and glue.

India Paper. A printing-paper made in China and Japan from vegetaable fibre, and used for taking off the finest proofs of engraved plates. Pron-nounce In-de paper.

India Proof. The proof of an engraving on India paper, before lettering.

Indian Arrowroot. The root which the Indians apply to arrow-wounds to neutralise the venom of the arrow.
They mash the meal, and apply it as a poultice. (Miller.)

Indian Drug (The). Tobacco.

"His breath compounded of strong English beer,
And th' Indian drug, would suffer none come er."
- Taylor, the Water Poet (1630).
Indian File (In). One by one. The American Indians, when they go on an expedition, march one by one. The one behind carefully steps in the footprints of the one before, and the last man of the file obliterates the footprints. Thus, neither the track nor the number of invaders can be traced.

"Each man followed his leader in Indian file."
—Captain Hartley: On Horseback through Asia.

Indian Red. Red hematite (per-oxide of iron), found abundantly in the Forest of Dean, Gloucestershire. It is of a deep, lakey hue, used for flesh tints.

The Persian Red, which is of a darker hue with a sparkling lustre, is imported from the island of Ormuz in the Persian Gulf.

The Romans obtained this pigment from the island of Elba. "Ilaus hematitius chalybitus generosus metallicus." (Orid.)

Indian Summer (The). The autumnal summer; generally the finest and mildest part of the whole year, especially in North America.

The mildness of the Indian summer mellowed the pastures far and wide. The russet woods stood ripe to be shorn, but were yet full of leaf. The purple of heath-bloom, faded but not withered, tinged the hills. Field and garden bore the seal of gentle decay;...its time of flowers and even of fruit was over."—C. Brooke: Story of the World, chap. xxvii.

Indians. American Indians. When Columbus landed at Cat Island, he thought that he had landed on one of the Indian islands, and in this belief gave the natives the name of Indians.

India proper is so named from Indus (the river), in Sanskrit Sindhu, in Persic Hind, whence the Greek Hindus. Hindustan is the tan or "country" of the river Hindus.

Indiarubber. A substance made from the sap of various tropical plants, and used for erasing pencil marks, and many other purposes. Pronounce Inda'-rubber.

"He was a man with an indiarubber coat on, indiarubber shoes, an indiarubber cap, and in his pocket an indiarubber purse, and not a cent in his pockets."—Mrs. Crawford: American Biography (Charles Goodyear), vol. ii. p. 804.

Individualists. Individualists hold that as little as possible should be done for its subjects by the State, as much as possible being left to free individual initiative.

Socialism tends to treat the individual as merely a part of the State, holding his possessions (if any) simply by its permission, while Individualism regards the state as a collection of separate units, with rights of life and property independently, which the State does not confer but merely guarantees.

Extreme individualists hold that all government is an evil, though it may be a necessary evil, and the "anarchists" profess the extreme form of the creed.

"Individualism rests on the principle that a man shall be his own master...—Draper: Conflict between Religion and Science, chap. xi. p. 235.

Indoors. In the house. Virgil makes Dido sit "in forbus dire." (Enid, i. 505.)

Induction (Latin, the act of leading in). When a clergymen is inducted to a living he is led to the church door, and the ring which forms the handle is placed in his hand. The door being opened, he is next led into the church, and the fact is announced to the parish by tolling the bell.

Indulgence (3 syl.), in the Roman Catholic Church, is the entire or partial remission of punishment due to sin either in this world or in purgatory. It is supposed that the Church is the bank of the infinite merits of Christ, and... give such indulgences like cheques on a bank. (Latin, indulgentia.)

Inertia. That want of power in matter to change its state either from rest to motion, or from motion to rest. Kepler calls it vis inerte. (Ars in Latin is the Greek a'elé, power or inherent force; In-ars is the absence of this power.)

Inexorable Logic of Facts (The). This was Mazzini's happy expression: "Nella genesi des fatti la logica è inescarabile."

Infallibility (of the Church of Rome) is the doctrine that the Church of Rome cannot at any time cease to be orthodox in her doctrine, and that what she declares ex cathedra is substantially true. The doctrine is based on the Divine promise to the disciples, "Howbeit when the Spirit of Truth is come, he will guide you into all truth." (John xvi. 13).

"The dogma of the "Infallibility of the Pope" was decreed by the Vatican Council in 1870.

Infamous means not allowed to speak or give witness in a court of justice. (Latin, in, negative faci, to speak; Greek, phemi or phaine.)

Infant. Used as a synonym of "childe," meaning a knight or squire;
Infant. Any princess of the blood royal, except an heiress of the crown, is so called in Spain and Portugal.

Infante (3 syl.) All the sons of the sovereigns of Spain and Portugal bear this title, except the crown prince, who is called in Spain the Prince of Asturias. In the Middle Ages the word "childe" was used as a title of honour in England, France, and Germany; hence Childe Harold, Childe-Ric, Childe-bert, etc.

Infantry. Foot soldiers. Said to be first applied to a body of men collected by the Infante or heir-apparent of Spain for the purpose of rescuing his father from the Moors. The success of the attempt rendered the corps popular. (Spanish, infantería; Italian, fanteria; fanțe means a servant.)

Infamous Column. So the corps of Latour d'Auvergne was called, from its terrible charges with the bayonet. (1743-1800.)

Infano. We have Dante's notion of the infernal regions in his Inferno, Homer's in the Odyssey, book xii.; Virgil's in the Aeneid, book vi.; Spenser's in the Faerie Queene, book ii., canto 7; Ariosto's in the Orlando Furioso, book xvii.; Tasso's in Jerusalem Delivered, book iv.; Milton's in Paradise Lost; Pénélon's in Thébaïdes, book xviii.; and Beckford's in his romance of Vathek.

Infra Dig., i.e. Digestam. Not in accordance with one's position and character. (Latin.)

Infra-lapsarians. Those who believe that election and predestination are subsequent to the Fall. The "Supralapsarian" believes that election and predestination were in the eternal counsels of God even before the creation of Adam. (Infra, after; lapsus, the fall; supra, before; lapsus, the fall.)

Ingle (The). The recess with benches in old-fashioned fireplaces, the fire.

"Sit thee by the Ingle when The scar faggot blazes bright." -Keats: "Fairy, stanza i.

Ingoldsby. The Rev. Richard Harris Barham, author of Ingoldsby Legends. (1788-1845.)

Ingrain Colours. Colours dyed in the wool or raw material before manufacture. In French, endro en laine. Such colours are most durable. We speak of "a rogue ingrain," meaning one hopelessly bad. (In the grain, that is, in the texture.)

"Tis ingrain, sir; 'twill endure wind and weather." -Shakespeare: "Twelfth Night," i. 3.

Ingulph's "Croyland Chronicle." Proved to be a forgery by H. J. Riley in the Archæological Journal, 1862. He dates the forgery between 1393 and 1415, and attributes it to Prior Richard of Croyland and Sergeant William Ludington.

Injunction. A writ forbidding a person to encroach on another's privileges; as, to sell a book which is only a colourable copy of another author's book; or to violate a patent; or to perform a play based on a novel without permission of the novelist; or to publish a book the rights of which are reserved. Injunctions are of two sorts—temporary and perpetual. The first is limited "till the coming on of the defendant's answer;" the latter is based on the merits of the case, and is of perpetual force.

Ink. Pancirollus says the emperors used a fluid for writing called encantum. (Italian, unkistó; French, encre; Dutch, ink.)

Inkhorn Terms. This phrase, once common, might be revived to signify pedantic expressions which smell of the lump.

"Shakespeare uses the phrase, an "Inkhorn mate" (I Henry VII., iii. 1).

Ink-pot. Sons and daughters of the ink-pot. Those who maintain themselves by writing for the press. (The Silver Domino.)
Inkle and Yarico. The hero and heroine of a drama so called by George Colman. The story is from the Spectator, No. 11. Inkle is a young Englishman who is lost in the Spanish main: he falls in love with Yarico, an Indian maiden, whom he lives with as his wife; but no sooner does he find a vessel to take him to Barbadoes than he sells her for a slave.

Inn (Anglo-Saxon). Chamber; originally applied to a mansion, like the French hôtel. Hence Clifford's Inn, once the mansion of De Clifford; Lincoln's Inn, the mansion of the Earls of Lincoln; Gray's Inn, that of the Lords Gray, etc.

"Now, whereas Phœbus, with his fiery waine, Unto his home began to draw espze."—Spenser: Faery Queen, vi. 2.

Inns of Court. The four voluntary societies which have the exclusive right of calling to the bar. They are the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn. Each is governed by a board of benchers.

Innings, in cricket, is the turn of the team to be bowled to by their opponents. The persons who "bat" are having their "innings given them"; and the innings of an individual is the time he holds the bat.

A good innings. One in which the batsman has made several runs. Figuratively, a run of luck or business.

He has had a long innings. A good long run of luck. A term in cricket for a time that the eleven are in, or not out as scouts.

Innis Fodhla [Island of Destiny], an old name of Ireland.

"Long before the western districts of Innis Fodhla had any settled name... a powerful king reigned over this part of the sacred island. [The king referred to was Connida, who gave his name to the province of Connacht]."—W. B. Yeats: Fairy Tales and Folk-Lore, pp. 286, 287.

Innocent (Adj.) An idiot or born fool. (See Buxom.)

"An idiot, or one otherwise deficient in intellect, is called an innocent."—Trench: On the Study of Words, lecture iii. p. 97.

Inno中心. Feast of the Holy Innocents. The 28th December, to commemorate Herod's butchery of the children of Bethlehem under two years old, with the design of cutting off the infant Jesus (Matt. ii. 16.)

Innue'do. An implied or covert hint of blame. It is a law term, meaning the person nodded to or indirectly referred to (Latin, in-ndo).

"Implying or suggesting, instead of stating plainly, often increases the effect of what is intended to give pain or pleasure. This is 'innuendo.'"—Bain: Composition, etc. (Innuendo), part i. p. 212.

Innoculate (4 syl.) is to put in an eye (Latin, in-oculare). The allusion is to a plan adopted by gardeners who insert the "eye" or small bud of a superior plant into the stock of an inferior one, in order to produce flowers or fruits of better quality.

In'ogene or Ign'oge (3 syl.). Wife of Brutus, the mythological king of Britain.

"Thus Brutus this realm unto his rule subdued, And reigned long in great felicity. Loved of his friends, and of his foes as well, He left three sons, his famous progeny, Born of fake Inugene of Italy."—Spenser: Faerie Queene, vii. 10.

Inquisition. A court instituted to inquire into offences against the Roman Catholic religion. Fully established by Pope Gregory IX. in 1235. It was most active in Italy, Spain, and Portugal. Those found guilty were hanged over to the secular arm to be dealt with according to the secular laws of the land. Suppressed in France in 1772, and not finally in Spain till 1834. (Latin, inquisitis, a searching into.)

Insane Root (The). Hemlock. It is said that those who eat hemlock can see subjective things as objects. Thus, when Banquo had encountered the witches, who vanished as mysteriously as they appeared, he said to Macbeth, "Were such things [really] here... or have we eaten the insane root, that takes the reason prisoner," so that our eyes see things that are not. (Macbeth, i. 5.)

"Other plants "take the reason prisoner," as the Parnassus, the "Indian nut," "Honey nightshade."

Inscription of a Coin. (See Legend.)

Insolence. (Latin, in-solito.) Unusual conduct, that is, not according to the common courtesies of social life.

Inspired Idiot (The). Oliver Goldsmith was so called by Walpole.

Instinct. Something pricked or punctured into one. Distinguish is of the same root, and means to prick or puncture separately. Extinguish means to prick or puncture out. In all cases the allusion is to marking by a puncture. At college the "markers" at the chapel doors still hold a pin in one hand, and prick with it the name of each "man" who enters. The word is used to express a natural impulse to do something; an inherent habit.

"Although reason may . . . be blended with instinct, the distinction between the two is sufficiently precise. Reason only acts upon a deliberate and often laboriously acquired knowledge of the relation between means and ends." — Romanes: Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. XIII. p. 151 (sixth edition).

Institutes (3 syl.). Elementary law treatises, as the Institutes of Gaius and those of Florentius, Callistratus, Paulus, Ulpius, and Marcellus. The Institutes of Justinian were compiled by Antoulus Pius, and for the most part are mere rechauffades of the preceding ones, giving the words and opinions of the respective authors.

Instructions to the Committee. A Parliamentary dodge for empowering a Committee of the House to do what a Committee would not otherwise be empowered to do.

An "Instruction" must be supplementary and auxiliary to the Bill under consideration.

It must fall within the general scope and framework of the Bill in question.

It must not form the substance of a distinct measure.

Insu'brì. The district of Lombardy which contained Milan, Como, Pa'sìa, Lodì, Novà'sìa, and Verce'lli.

Insult. To leap on the prostate body of a foe. To treat with contumely.

Insulter. One who leaps upon you or against you. Thus Terence says, "Inscuto for es foro calcius" (Eunuchus, ii. 2, 54). It will be remembered that the priests of Baal, to show their indignation against their gods, "leaped upon the altar which they had made" (1 Kings xvii. 26). Zephaniah (i. 9) says that God will punish all those who leap on the threshold." (See DEsultORY.)

Intag'lio (Italian). A design cut in a gem, like a crest or initials in a stamp. The design does not stand out in relief, as in cameo, but is hollowed in.

Intellect. The power of reading mentally; hence the power of understanding and quickly grasping what requires intelligence and thought. (Latin, intulus lepô, I read within me.)

Intendance Militaire. Corps chargé de tout ce qui concerne l'administration et la compatibilité de la guerre.

The Intendants Militaire control the accounts, payments, food, dress, encampments, transport, hospitals, marches, etc., of the army.

Intentiona. Hell is paved with good intentions. In Spanish: "El inferno es lleno de buenos intenciones." Good intentions without corresponding deeds are self-accusers.

Inter Alia (Latín). Among other things or matters.

Inter Cesa et Porrecta. Out of hand. Many things may occur between the cup and lip. (See Cicero: Ad Atticum, v. 18.) Literally, between the slaughter (cesa) of the sacrificial victim and its being laid (porrecta) on the altar. It was not permitted to speak while the priest struck the animal, nor yet while the sacrifice was being consumed by fire; but between these intervals persons were allowed to talk.

Inter Canem et Lupum. Between two difficulties or dangers equally formidable. Between Scylla and Charybdis. Literally, "between dog and wolf."

Inter Nos, or in French Entre nous. Confidentially, between ourselves.

Inter Poc'ula. During a drinking bout.

Inter Rex (Latin). A person appointed to hold the office of king during a temporary vacancy.

Intercal'ary (Latin). Inserted between or amongst others. Thus, an intercalary day is a day foisted between two others, as the 29th February in leap-year. (See CALENDARS.)

"It was the custom with Greeks to add, or, as it was termed, intercalate, a month every other year." — Presbyt. On History, vi.

Interdict and Excommunicate. The Pope or some ecclesiastical interdicts a kingdom, province, county, or town, but excommunicates an individual. This sentence excludes the place or individual from partaking in certain sacraments, public worship, and the burial service. The most remarkable instances are: —

586. The Bishop of Bayeux laid an interdict on all the churches of Rouen, in consequence of the murder of the Bishop Prétetstät.

1081. Poland was laid under an interdict by Pope Gregory VII., because Boleslas II. had murdered Stanislaus at the altar.

1180. Scotland was put under a similar ban by Pope Alexander III.
1200. France was interdicted by Innocent III. because Philippe Auguste refused to marry Ingiburga, who had been betrothed to him.

1209. England was laid under similar sentence by Innocent III., in the reign of King John, and the interdict lasted for six years.

In France, Robert the Pious, Philippe I., Louis VII., Philippe Auguste, Philippe IV., and Napoleon I., have all been subjected to the Papal thunder. In England, Henry II. and John. Victor Emmanuel of Italy was excommunicated by Pius IX. for despoiling the Papacy of a large portion of its temporal dominions.

Interest (Latin). Something that is between the parties concerned. The interest of money is the sum which the borrower agrees to pay the lender for its use. To take an interest in anything is to feel there is something between it and you which may affect your pleasure.

Interest for money. In the Tudor dynasty it was 10 per cent. (37 Henry VIII. chap. 9). In the reign of James it was reduced to 8 per cent.; in Queen Anne's reign to 6 per cent.; in the last quarter of the nineteenth century it was reduced to 2½ per cent.

Intercom of Augsburg (The). A Concordat drawn up by Charles Quint in 1548 to allay the religious turmoil of Germany. It was a provisional arrangement to be in force till some definite decision could be pronounced by the General Council to be held at Trent. The authors of this instrument were J. Pfug (Bishop of Naumburg), Michael Heding (titular Bishop of Sidon), and John Agricola (a priest of Brandenburg).

Interlard (French). To put lard or fat between layers of meat. Metaphorically, to mix what is the solid part of a discourse with fulsome and irrelevant matter. Thus we say, "To interlard with oaths," to "interlard with compliments," etc.

"They interlard their native drinks with choice Of strongest brandy."—Philips: Cider, ii.

Interloper. One who runs between traders. One who sets up business, and by so doing interferes with the actual or supposed rights of others. (Dutch, tromen, to run, to leap.)

Interpolate (4 syl.). For two or more persons to polish up something between them. Metaphorically, to insert spurious matter in a book or document; to gag. (Latin, acer polio, to polish.)

Interpreter (Mr.). The Holy Spirit personified, in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress. He is lord of a house a little way beyond the Wicket Gate. Here Christian was kindly entertained and shown many wonderful sights of an allegorical character. Christians and her party stopped here, and were similarly entertained.

Intone (2 syl.). To thunder out; intonation, the thundering of the voice. (Latin, tono, to thunder.) The Romans said that Cicero and Demosthenes "thundered out their orations." To recite in a musical monotone.

Intoxication. Pliny (xvi. 20) tells us this word is derived from taza, a species of bay-tree used for poisoning arrows. Hence the Greek toxan (a bow and arrows), and toxum (rank poison).

Intrigue (2 syl.), comes from the Greek thiris, hair, whence the Latin trix, trifles or hairs, and the verb intricar, to entangle; the Germans have the verb trugen, to deceive.

Inure (2 syl.), to habituate or harden by use. Ure is an archaic word meaning wise. (Latin, opus, work. French œuvre; old French, enr.)

Invalid (French). A four-sou piece, so called because it was debased to the value of three sous and a-half.

"Tien, prenns cet invalide, a mauvant au bois."

Denis Arlequin (1841).

Inveigle (3 syl.), To lead blindfold; to entice by misrepresentation. (Norman French, enveir; French, enveiller; Italian, inveigolare.)

Invention of the Cross [discovery of the cross]. A festival held on May 3rd, in commemoration of the "discovery of the cross" by the agents of St. Helen, mother of Constantine the Emperor (316). (Latin, inveo, to discover.)

Inventors Punished by their own inventions.

Bastille. Hugues Aubriot, Provost of Paris, who built the Bastile, was the first person confined therein. The charge against him was heresy.

Brazen Bull. Perillos, who invented the Brazen Bull for Phalaris, Tyrant of Agrigentum, was the first person baked to death in the horrible monster.

Captain. Cowper Coles, inventor of the turrent-ship, perished in the Captain off Finisterre September 7th, 1870.

Catherine Wheel. The inventor of St. Catherine's Wheel, a diabolical machine consisting of four wheels turning different ways, and each wheel armed with saws, knives, and teeth, was killed by his own machine; for when St. Catherine was bound on the wheel, she fell off, and the machine flew to pieces. One of the pieces struck the inventor, and other pieces struck several of the men employed to work it, all of whom were killed. (Metaphrases.)

Guillotine. J. B. V. Guillotin, M.D. of Lyons, was guillotined, but it is an error to credit him with the invention of the instrument. The inventor was Dr. Joseph Agnac Guillotin.

Hamman, son of Hammada'tha, the Amalekite, of the race of Agag, devised a gallows fifty cubits high on which to hang Mordecai, by way of commencing the extirpation of the Jews; but the favourite of Absal'mus was himself hanged on his gigantic gallows. In modern history we have a repetition of this incident in the case of Enguerrand de Marigny, Minister of Finance to Philippe the Fair, who was hung on the gibbet which he had caused to be erected at Montfaucon for the execution of certain felons; and four of his successors in office underwent the same fate.

Hopkins (Matthew), the witch-fluter, was himself tried by his own tests, and put to death as a wizard.

Iron Cage. The Bishop of Verdun, who invented the Iron Cages, too small to allow the person confined in them to stand upright or lie at full length, was the first to be shut up in one; and Cardinal La Balue, who recommended them to Louis XI., was himself confined in one for ten years.

Iron Shroud. Ludovi'co Sforza, who invented the Iron Shroud, was the first to suffer death by this horrible torture.

Maiden. The Regent Morton of Scotland, who invented the Maiden, a sort of guillotine, was the first to be behelden thereby. This was in the reign of Queen Elisabeth.

Ostracism. Clisthenes introduced the custom of Ostracism, and was the first to be banished thereby.

The Periere was an instrument for throwing stones of 3,000 lbs. in weight; and the inventor fell a victim to his own invention by the accidental discharge of a petryrre against a wall.

Porta a Faenza. Filippo Strozzi counselled the Duke Alessandro de' Medici to construct the Porta a Faenza to intimidate the Florentines, and here he was himself murdered.

Salisbury (the Earl of) was the first to use cannon, and was the first Englishman killed by a cannon ball.

Urmor'tus induced the Emperor Arc'tadius to abolish the benefit of sanctuary; but a few days afterwards he committed some offence and fled for safety to the nearest church. St. Chrysostom told him he had fallen into his own net, and he was put to death. (Life of St. Chrysostom.)

Winstanley (Mr.) erected the first Eddystone lighthouse. It was a wooden polygon, 100 feet high, on a stone base; but it was washed away by a storm in 1703, and the architect himself perished in his own edifice.

Inventors Punished. A curious instance of the sin of invention is mentioned in the Bridge of Allan Reporter, February, 1803:

"It is told of Mr. Ferguson's grandfather, that he invented a pair of tongs for cleaning grain, and for this proof of superior ingenuity he was summoned before the Kirk Session, and reproved for trying to place the handiwork of man above the time-honoured practice of cleaning the grain on windy days, when the current was blowing briskly through the open doors of the barn."

Investiture. (Latin, clothing in or putting on canonicals.) The admission to office is generally made by investiture; thus, a pair of gloves is given to a Freemason in France; a cap is given to a graduate; a crown, etc., to a sovereign, etc. A crosier and ring used to be given to a church dignitary; but are now simply placed in his hands on his induction into office. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the kings of Europe and the pope were perpetually at variance about the right of investiture; the question was, should the sovereigns or should the pope invest clergymen or appoint them to their livings and dignities? (Latin, vesti, a garment; investo. (See Induction.)

Invisible Doctor. William of Occam or Ockham (a village in Surrey), also called Doctor Singularis. (1270-1347.)

Invisibility, according to fable, may be obtained in a multitude of ways. For example:

Albrie's cloak, called Tarnkappe (3 syl.), which Siegfried got possession of, rendered him invisible. (Nibelungen Lied.)

A chamelon carried in the breast will render a person invisible.

A capon stone, called "Alectoria," will render any person invisible who carries it about his person. (See Mirror of Stones.)

A dead hand. It is believed that a candle placed in a dead man's hand
Invisibles gives no light to any but those who use it. (See HAND.)

Fenn-seed, mentioned by Shakespeare, and by Beaumont and Fletcher, possesses the same charm.

Gyges' ring, taken from the flanks of a brazen horse, made the wearer invisible, provided he turned the ring inwards.

Heliotrope, mentioned by Boccaccio in his Decameron (Day viii. 3), is a green stone, which renders a person invisible. So does the herb called heliotrope, according to Sollinus, who says, "Herba etiam ejusdem nominis...eum, a quacumque gestabatur, subtrahi visibis obvixum." (Georgic, xl.)

The helmet of Perseus (2 syl.) and the helmet of Pluto (called Orci Gala), both rendered the wearer invisible. (Classic story.)

The helmet which Pluto gave to the Cyclops made them invisible whenever it was worn.

Jack the Giant-killer had a cloak of invisibility as well as a cap of knowledge.

Keplin's mantle. The mantle of Hel Keplin, which belonged to the dwarf-king Laurin, rendered the wearer invisible. (The Heldenbuch; thirteenth century.)

The Morus Musphoron was a girdle of invisibility. (Mrs. Centlivre: A Bold Stroke for a Wife.)

Otnit's ring. The ring of Otnit, King of Lombardy, according to the Heldenbuch, possessed a similar charm.

Reynard's wonderful ring had three colours, one of which (the green) caused the wearer to become invisible. (Reynard the Fox, 1498.)

Invisibles. (1) The Rosicrucians were so called, because they never dared to appear in public. (2) The disciples of Osianader, Phaccius, Illicreas, etc., who denied the perpetual visibility of the Church. (Sixteenth century.)

Invisibility.

Stones taken from the cassan plant, which grows in Panter, renders the possessor invulnerable. (Odoratus in Hakluyt.)

A dip in the river Styx rendered Achilles invulnerable. (Greek fable.)

Medusa rendered Jason, with whom she had fallen in love, proof against wounds and fire by anointing him with the Promethean unguent. (Greek fable.)

Siegfried (2 syl.) was rendered invulnerable by anointing his body with dragon's blood. (Nibelungen Lied.)

Iol (pron. Yol). The Danish word for Christmas; the same as Yule.

"The savage Dane
At Yol more deep the mead did drain." Sir W. Scott: Marmion.

Ionian Mode. A species of church music in the key of C major, in imitation of the ancient Greek mode so called.

Ionic Accomplishments. Gesture and dress.

Ionic Architecture. So called from Ionia, where it took its rise. The capitals are decorated with volutes, and the cornice with denticles. The shaft is fluted; the entablature either plain or embossed.

"The people of Ionia formed their order of architecture on the model of a young woman dressed in her hair, and in an easy, elegant shape; whereas the Doric had been formed on the model of a robust, strong man."—Vitruvius.

Ionic School or Ionic Philosophers. Thales, Anaximander, Anaximenes, Heraclitus, and Anaxagoras were all natives of Ionia, and were the earliest of the Greek philosophers. They tried to prove that all created things spring from one principle; Thales said it was water, Anaximenes thought it was air or gas, Anaxagoras that it was atoms, Heraclitus maintained that it was fire or caloric, while Anaximander insisted that the elements of all things are eternal, for ex nihilo nihil fit.

Iormungandur. The serpent that encompasses the whole earth, according to Scandinavian mythology.

Iota or Jot. A very little, the least quantity possible. The iota [i] is the smallest letter of the Greek alphabet, called the Lacedemonian letter. (Hebrew, Yod [y], the smallest Hebrew letter.)

"This hand doth give them here no jot of blood," Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

Iphicles' Oxen. Quid hoc ad Iphileboves? What has that to do with the subject in hand? So in L'Auvat the judge had to pull up the shepherd every minute with the question, "Mess, mon ami, veremos à nos montons." Iphicles or Iphicles was the possessor of large herds of oxen, and Nereus (2 syl.) promised to give his daughter in marriage to Bins if he would bring him the oxen of Iphicles, which were guarded by a very fierce dog. Melenopus contrived to obtain the oxen for his brother, but being caught in the act, he was cast into prison. Melampos afterwards told Astyocha, wife of Iphicles, how to become the mother of children, whereupon Iphicles gave him the coveted herd, and his brother married the daughter of Neleus. The secret told by Melampos to Astyocha was "to steep the rust of iron in wine for ten days, and drink it." This she did, and became the mother of eight sons. (Odyssey, xi.; Iliad, xiii. 23; Apollodorus, i. 9; Pausanias, iv. 36.)

When Tressilian wanted Domnica Holiday to tell him of a smith who could shoe his horse, the pedagogue kept starting from the point, and Tressilian says to him:—

"Permit me to ask, in your own learned phrase, Quod nunc ad Ipsycu hoc tua, what has that to do with my poor ass?"—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth, chap. ix.

"Another similar phrase is "Quid ad Mercuvrum?" "Ti pro's ton 'Erum?"

Another is "Io Heruha?" What has that to do with Hecuba?

Iphicratenses. The best trained and bravest of the Greek soldiers were so called from Iphicrates, an Athenian general. (See Fabian Soldiers.)

Iphigenia. Daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra. Her father having offended A'rtemis (Diana) by killing her favourite stag, vowed to sacrifice to the angry goddess the most beautiful thing that came into his possession in the next twelve months; this was an infant daughter. The father deferred the sacrifice till the fleet of the combined Greeks reached Aulis and Iphigenia had grown to womanhood. Then Calchas told him that the fleet would be wind-bound till he had fulfilled his vow; accordingly the king prepared to sacrifice his daughter, but Artemis at the last moment snatched her from the altar and carried her to heaven, substituting a hind in her place.

The similarity of this legend to the Scripture stories of Jepthah's vow, and Abraham's offering of his son Isaac, is noticeable. (See Dominicus.)

Ipsae Dixit (Latin). A mere assertion, wholly unsupported. We say it is "your ipsae dixit," "his ipsae dixit," "their ipsae dixit," and so on.

Ipsae Facto. Irrespective of all external considerations of right or wrong; absolutely; by the very deed itself. It sometimes means the act itself carries the consequences (as excommunication without sentence of excommunication being directly pronounced).

"Whatever the captain does is right ipsae facto i.e., because it is done by the captain, and any opposition to it is wrong, on board ship."—R. H. Dana.

By burning the Pope's bull, Luther ipsae facto (by the very deed itself) denied the Pope's supremacy. Hence carries excommunication ipsae facto.

Ipheswich. A corruption of GYPES-wich, the town on the river "Gypfen," now called the Orwell.

Iram. The pilgrim's garb is so called by the Arabs.

Iran. The empire of Persia.

"Accent the shame.

His race hath brought on 'Iran's name."

Ireland or Erin is Celtic; from Er or Eir (western). Lloyd (State Worthes, article "Grandison"), with a gravity which cannot but excite laughter, says the island is called the land of I re because of the broils there, which have extended over four hundred years. Wormius derives the word from the Numic Ir, a bow. (See below.)

Ireland. Called by the natives "Erin," i.e. Erinum, or Er-innis, or Ir-innis (west island). By the Welsh "Yver-den" (west valley), By Apuleius, "Hibernia," which is I rina, a corruption of Ir-in-ni-a.

By Juvenal (ii. 260) "Iuvenna" or "Juberna," the same as Erin or Erinna. By Claudian "Ouerina," the same.

By modern "Ireland," which is Ir-in-land (land of the west).

The three great saints of Ireland are St. Patrick, St. Columba, and St. Bridget.

The fair maid of Ireland. Ignis fatuus (q.v.).

"He had read in former times of a young Fire, called 'Ignis Fatuus,' the fire of destiny. by some, 'Will with the Wight,' or 'Jack with the Lantern,' and likewise, by some simple country people, 'The Fair Maid of Ireland,' which used to lead wandering travellers out of their way."—The Seven Champions of Christendom, i. 7.

The three tragic stories of the Irish. (1) the death of the children of Touran; (2) the death of the children of Lir; (3) the death of the children of Uisnach. (O'Flanagan: Transactions of the Gaelic Society of Dublin, vol. i.)

Dean Ireland's scholarships. Four scholarships of £30 a year in the University of Oxford, founded by Dr. John Ireland, Dean of Westminster, in 1825, for Latin and Greek. They are tenable for four years.

* * *

The same person founded an "Exegetical Professorship" of £800 a year.

Irena. The impersonation of Ireland.
whose inheritance was withheld by the tyrant Grantorto. Sir Artegal (Justier) is sent by the Faerie Queene to succour the distressed lady. Grantorto, or the rebellion of 1580, being slain, she is restored to her throne and reigns in peace. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, v.)

Iron. Goddess of the rainbow, or the rainbow itself. In classic mythology she is called the messenger of the gods when they intended discord, and the rainbow is the bridge or road let down from heaven for her accommodation. When the gods meant peace they sent Mercury. (Greek and Latin, iris.)

"I'll have an Iris that shall find thee out." Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., iv. 2.

Irish Apricots. Potatoes.

Irish Stew. A dish of food made by stewing together meat, onions, and potatoes. Called "Irish" from the predominance of potatoes.

Irish Wedding. When a person has a black eye we sometimes say to him, "You have been to an Irish wedding, I see," because the Irish are more famous for giving their guests on these occasions black eyes than white favors.

Iron. The hieroglyphic for iron is δ, which denotes "gold at the bottom" (O), only its upper part is too sharp, volatile, and half corrosive ('); this being taken away, iron would become gold. Iron is called Mars.

Strike while the iron is hot. "Battre le pendant qu'il est chaud," Make hay while the sun shines.

To have many irons in the fire. To have many affairs in hand.

If you have too many irons in the fire, some will burn. If you have too many affairs in hand than you can properly attend to, some of them will be neglected and turn out badly. Both these locutions refer to the "heaters" or irons employed in laundries. If the "heater" is too hot, it will scorch the linen.

To rule with a rod of iron. To rule tyrannically. "Convenir avec une verge de fer."

Iron. (See Pro Iron.)

Iron Age. The era between the death of Charlemagne and the close of the Carolingian dynasty is so called from its almost ceaseless wars. It is sometimes called the leaden age for its worthlessness, and the dark age for its barrenness of learned men.

Iron Age. The age of cruelty and hard-heartedness. When Hubert tells Prince Arthur he must burn his eyes out, the young prince replies, "Ah, none but in this iron age would do it." (Shakespeare: King John, iv. 1.)

Iron-arm. Francis de Lanneau, the Huguenot soldier, Ilus de Fer (1531-1591). (See FIEABRAS.)

Iron Duke (The). The Duke of Wellington was so called from his iron will. (1769-1852.) (See SILVER-HAND.)

Iron Horse (The). The railway locomotive.

"We can now drive the iron horse from India down the valley of the Indus, and (at Mianwaan) in the very states of China, without any political influence."—Mr. Hallis, Dec., 1855.

Iron Mask. The man in the iron mask (called Lestang) was Count Ercole Antonio Matthioli, a senator of Mantua, and private agent of Ferdinand Charles, Duke of Mantua. He suffered imprisonment of twenty-four years for having deceived Louis XIV. in a secret treaty for the purchase of the fortress of Casale, the key of Italy. The agents of Spain and Austria bribed him by out-bidding the Grande Monarque. The secrecy observed by all parties was inviolate, because the infamy of the transaction would not bear daylight. (H. G. A. Ellis: True History of the Iron Mask.)

? M. Loiselle utterly denies that Matthioli (sometimes called Glacomo) was the real homme du masque de fer (See Temple Bar, May, 1872, pp. 182-184): but Marius Topin, in The Man in the Iron Mask, maintains it as an indubitable fact. There is an English translation of Topin's book by Vizetelli, published by Smith and Elder.

There are several others "identified" as the veritable Iron Mask, e.g.—

(1) Louis, Due de Vermandois, natural son of Louis XIV. by De la Valliere, who was imprisoned for life because he gave the Dauphin a box on the ears. (Memoires Secretes pour servir à l'Histoire de France.) This cannot be, as the duke died in camp, 1693.

(2) A young foreign nobleman, chamberlain of Queen Anne, and real father of Louis XIV. (A Dutch story.)

(3) Due de Beaufort, King of the Iron entered into his soul (The). The anguish or annoyance is felt most keenly. The allusion is to the ancient custom of torturing the flesh with instruments of iron.

"I saw the iron enter into his soul, and felt what sort of pain it was that arising from hope deferred."—*Bern: Sentimental Journey.

Iron Maiden of Nuremberg (The). An instrument of torture for "heretics," traitors, parricides, etc. It was a box big enough to admit a man, with folding-doors, the whole studded with sharp iron spikes. When the doors were pressed to these spikes were forced into the body of the victim, who was left there to die in horrible torture. (German, Erme Jungfrau.)

* One of these diabolical machines was exhibited in 1892 in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, and in London.

Irons (L). In foils. "Mettre les jers aux pieds à quelqu'oun."

Ironclad (Au). A ship having the hull sheathed wholly or in part with plates of iron, to resist projectiles.

Ironclad Oath (The). 1866. An Act passed in North America excluding voters in the States lately in rebellion from the franchise; practically disfranchising all Southerners over twenty-five years of age.

Ironside. Edmund II., King of the Anglo-Saxons, was so called, from his iron armour. (989, 1016-1017.)

Nestor Ironside. Sir Richard Steele, who assumed the name in The Guardian. (1791-1792.)

Ironides. The soldiers that served under Cromwell were so called, especially after the battle of Marston Moor, where they displayed an iron resolution.

Irony. A dissembling. (Greek, etron, a dissembler, erronea.)

"So grave a body upon so solemn an occasion should not deal in irony, or explain their meaning byanjur."

Irony of Fate (The). A strange fatality which has brought about something quite the reverse of what might have been expected.

"By the irony of fate the Ten Hours Bill was carried in the very session when Lord Ashley having changed his views on the Corn Laws, felt it his duty to resign his seat in Parliament."—The Leisure Hour, 1857.

Iroquois (Au). Anyone of the five (now six) confederate tribes, viz. the Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas, Senecas, and sixth the Tuscaroras, added in 1712, now forming "The Six Nations of the Iroquois Confederacy."
Irrefragable Doctor. Alexander Hales, an English friar, founder of the scholastic theology (thirteenth century).

Irref'equant is not to relieve, not to lighten. Irrelevant matter is that which does not help to bear the burden or make it lighter; something not pertinent or not material to the point in question. (Latin levire, light.)

Irresis'tible. Alexander the Great went to consult the Delphic oracle before he started on his expedition against Persia. He chanced, however, to arrive on a day when no responses were made. Nothing daunted, he went in search of the Pythia, and when she refused to attend, took her to the temple by force. "Son," said the priestess, "thou art irresistible." "Enough," cried Alexander; "I accept your words as my response."

Irri'ta ble Genus (The) or the "Genus irritable" (Horace: Epistles, ii, 2, 102). Poets, and authors generally.

"It [publishers'] is a wrathful trade, and the irritable genius comprehends the book-selling as well as the book-writing species."—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (1820).

Ireptiles Fellea. Skins having bristly hair like that of goats. (Hercipitus—i.e. "goat's hair." (Persian.) A fell is Anglo-Saxon for "skin," like the Latin pei(isus, English pelt. Thus we say still a "wool-fell." Shakespeare speaks of "a fell of hair" (Macbeth, v. 5). Pellimonger, a dealer in skins.

Irish Ferry. To cross the Irish ferry is to be laid on the shelf. The ferry of the Irish is crossed by those who are exiled to Siberia. It is regarded in Russia as the ferry of political death.

Irus. The beggar of gigantic stature, who kept watch over the suitors of Penelope. His real name was Ar'naos, but the suitors nicknamed him Iros because he carried their messages for them. Ulysses, on his return, felled him to the ground with a single blow, and flung him out of doors.

Pover than Irus. A Greek proverb, adopted by the Romans (see Orat), and existing in the French language ("Plus pauvre qu'Irus"). alluding to the beggar referred to above.

Ir'vingites (3 syl.). The self-styled Catholic Apostolic Church, founded by the Rev. Edward Irving in 1829; they believed in the gift of tongues.

Isaac. A hedge-sparrow, a corruption of Chaucer's word, Hewange.

Isaac of York. The Jew in Ivanhoe, and father of Rebecca. (Sir Walter Scott.)

Isabel, called She-'wolf of France. The adulterous queen of Edward II., daughter of Philippe IV. (le Bel) of France. According to tradition, she murdered her royal husband by thrusting a hot iron into his bowels.

"Mark the year and mark the night When Renart shall re-echo with altright The shrinks of death through Berith's roofs that ring. Shrinks of an agonising king. She-wolf of France, with unremitting fangs, That tear at the bowels of thy wretched mate."—Gray: The Bard.

Isabel. The Spanish form of Eliza-beth. The French form is Isabelle.

Isabella, Princess of Sicily, in love with Robert le Diable, but promised in marriage to the prince of Grana'da, who challenged Robert to mortal combat. Robert was allured from the combat by his friend, but when Alice told him that Isabella "the princess is waiting for him at the altar," a struggle took place between Bertram and Alice, the one trying to drag the duke to the infernal regions, and the other trying to win him to the ways of virtue. Alice prevailed, but the audience is not informed whether Robert married Isabella or not. (Meyerbeer's opera, Robert il Diavolo.)

Isabella, daughter of Hercules, Duke of Ferr'ay, sister of Alfonso and Ippolito, and wife of Francesco Gonzaga, lord of Mantua.

Isabella. (See Pot of Basil.)

Isabelle or Isabella (in Orlando Furioso). Daughter of the king of Galicia, in love with Zerbino; but, being a pagan, Zerbino could not marry her. Zerbino induces her to quit her native land, and gives Odorico charge of her. She is wrecked, and Odorico escapes with her to Rochelle. Here Odorico assails her virtue, but is alarmed by a vessel which he sees approaching, and flees. She is kept captive by the crew for nine months, but Orlando slays or hangs all the crew, and Isabella being free, accompanies her rescuer. Her lament at the death of Zerbino is one of the best parts of the poem (book xil). She retires to a chapel to bury Zerbino, and there is slain by Rod'omont.

Isabelle. The color so called is the yellow of soiled calico. A yellow-dun horse...
Isaf

is called in Franco un cheval isabelle. The tale is attached to Isabel of Austria and Isabel of Castile. It is said that Isabel of Austria, daughter of Philip II., at the siege of Ostend vowed not to change her linen till the place was taken. As the siege lasted three years, we may well suppose that it was somewhat soiled by three years' wear.

"His colour was isabel, a name given in allusion to the wondrous veil of Isabella Clara Eugenia, governess of the Netherlands, at the memorable siege of Ostend, which lasted from 1601 till 1604."—Dillon: Travels in Spain (1761).

Isabel of Castile, we are told, made a vow to the Virgin not to change her linen till Granda fell into her hands; but this siege lasted longer than ladies are wont to wear their body-linen.

"Bright-Sun was mounted on a black horse, that of a fox was a grey, Cherry's was white as milk, and the prince's an isabel."—Quoires d'Arme: Fair-star and Prince Cherry.

Isaf. An Arabian idol in the form of a man, brought from Syria, and placed in Es-Safa, near the temple of Mecca. Some say Isaf was a man converted into stone for impiety, and that Mahomet suffered this one "idol" to remain as a warning to his disciples.

Isenbras or Sir Isumbra. A hero of mediaeval romance, first proud and presumptuous, when he was visited by all sorts of punishments; afterwards prudent and humble, when his afflictions were turned into blessings. It was in this latter stage that he one day carried on his horse two children of a poor woodman across a ford. (See Ysambras.)

"I warn you first at the beginning That I shall make no vain carping [talk] Of deeds of arms nor of amours As duas mystryes and jestours, That makys carping in many a place Of Octonare and Isumbraus."

William of Nassington.

Isengrin or Sir Isgrim, the wolf, afterwards created Earl of Pitwood, in the best-ope of Reynard the Fox. Isengrin typifies the barous, and Reynard the church; and the gist of the tale is to show how Reynard bamboozles his uncle Wolf. (German, Isengrim, a wolf, a surly fellow.)

Isulut. (See Ysonek.)

Ishbaben, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is Sir Robert Clayton, who'd "e'en turn loyal to be made a peer" (part II.).

Ishbosheth, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Richard Cromwell. His father, Oliver, is called Saul. At the death of Saul, Ishboseth was acknowledged king by a party, and reigned two years, when he was assassinated. (Part i. 57, 58.)

"They who, when Saul was dead, without a blow, Made foolish Ishboseth the crown foerego."—Isah'mote'. The petrified city in Upper Egypt, full of men and women turned to stone. (Peary: View of the Levant.)

Marryat has borrowed the idea in his Pacha of Many Tales.

I'siac Tablet. A spurious Egyptian monument sold by a soldier to Cardinal Bembo in 1627, and preserved at Turin. It is of copper, and on it are represented most of the Egyptian deities in the mysteries of Isis. It was said to have been found at the siege of Rome in 1523. The word Isiac is an adjective formed from Isis.

Isidorian Decret'als. Also called Pseudo or False Decretals. A spurious compilation of fifty-nine decreals by Mentz, who lived in the ninth century, and fraudulently ascribed them to Isidore of Seville, who died in the sixth century. Prior to the ninth century the only authentic collection of decreals or letters of the popes in reply to questions proposed to them by bishops, ecclesiastical judges, and others, was that of Dionysius the Little [Exig'ious], a Roman monk, who lived in the middle of the sixth century. He commences with Pope Siricius (fourth century). The Isidorian decreals contain fifty-nine letters ascribed to persons living between Clement and Siricius, and forty others not contained in the Dionysian collection. The object of these forged letters is either to exalt the Papacy or enforce some law assuming the existence of such exaltation. Amongst these spurious letters are the decreal of St. Anec'litus, the decreal of St. Alexander, the letter of Julius to the Easterns, the synodical letter of St. Athana'sius, the decreal of St. Fabian instituting the rite of the chrism, and so on.

"La reforme pseudo-isidoriemme, adoptee par S. Nicholas, en 789, par le humane comte re- menage en 808, conforme par le concile de Trent en 1564, elle est depuis mes soucres le droit commun dans l'Eglise catholique... ce qu'il est impossible de justifier et meme d'excuser, c'est le moyen employee par le pseudo-Isodore pour arriver a ses fins."—Budes Religieuses, No. 47, p. 382.

I'singlass. A corruption of the Dutch hyzyenblies (an air-bladder), being prepared from the bladders and sounds of sturgeon. (German, Ayzen, a sturgeon.)
I'sis. Sister-wife of Osiris. The cow was sacred to her; and she is represented with two long horns from one stem at the top of her head. She is said to have invented spinning and weaving. (Egyptian mythology.) "Inventress of the wool, fair Isis (flax) spins The flying shuttle troo' the dancing strings... Taught by her labours from the fertile soil Immortal Isis clothed the banks of Nile." [Burton : Lives of the Poets, c. ii.

Milton, in Paradise Lost, names Osiris, Isis, and Orus amongst the fallen angels (book i. 478).

Isis, Herodotus thinks, is Demeter (Ceres).

Diodorus confounds her with the Moon, Demeter, and Juno.

Plutarch confounds her with Athene (Minerva), Persephoné (Proserpine), the Moon, and Te'uthys.

Apuleius calls her the mother of the gods Minerva, Venus, Diana, Proserpine, Ceres, Juno, Belona, Hecate, and Rhamnusia [Nemesis].

Lockyer says, "Isis represents the idea of rising or becoming visible, Osiris of disappearing." Thus the rising moon, a rising planet, the coming dawn, etc., is Isis; but the setting sun, the waning moon, a setting planet, evening, etc., is Osiris.

"Now the bright moonbeams kissed the water... and now the mountain and valley, river and plain, were flooded with white light, for mother Isis was arisen."—Rider Haggard: Cleopatra, chap. ii.

Isis was the mother of Horus (the rising sun), and is represented as nursing him.

Isis. Some maintain that Isis was at one time the protectress of Paris, and that the word Paris is a contraction of the Greek Para Isidos (near the temple of Isis), the temple referred to being the Pantheon or church of St. Genevieve. We are told, moreover, that a statue of Isis was for a long time preserved in the church of St. Germain des Prés, but was broken to pieces by Cardinal Bragomet because he saw certain women offering candles to it as to the Virgin.

The Young Isis, Cleopatra (50-30 B.C.).

Islam or Al Islâm. The true faith, according to the Mahometan notion. The Moslems say every child is born in Islam, and would continue in the true faith if not led astray into Magism, Judaism, or Christianity. The word means renunciation or submission to the will of God.

Islam consists of five duties:—
1. Hearing the day's God.
2. Reciting daily prayers.
3. Giving the appointed and legal alms.
4. Observing the Ramazan (a month's fast).

(1) Making a pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in a lifetime.
(2) Moslems and Mahomedans are from the same root.

I'slamite (3 syl.). A follower of Mahomet or believer in Islam.

Island of Saints. So Ireland was called in the Middle Ages.

Island of St. Brandan. The flying island, the supposed retreat of King Rodrigo. So called from St. Brandan, who went in search of the Islands of Paradise in the sixth century.

Island of the Seven Cities. A kind of Dixie land, where seven bishops, who quitted Spain during the dominion of the Moors, founded seven cities. The legend says that many have visited the island, but no one has ever quitted it.

Islands of the Blessed, called by the Greeks "Happy Islands," and by the Romans "Fortunate Islands." Imaginary islands somewhere in the west, where the favourites of the gods are conveyed at death, and dwell in everlasting joy.

"Their place of birth alone is noted To sounds that echo farther west Than your are's Islands of the Blest."—Byron.

Isle of Dogs. So called from being the receptacle of the greyhounds of Edward III. Some say it is a corruption of the Isle of Dogs, and that it is so called in ancient records from the number of wild fowl inhabiting the marshes.

Isle of Lanterns (The), or Lantern-land. An imaginary country inhabited by pretenders to knowledge. In French, Lanternons. (Rabelais: Pantagruel, v. 32, 33.)

Lucian has a similar conceit, called the City of Lanterns; and Dean Swift, in his Gulliver's Travels, makes his hero visit Laputa, the empire of quacks, false projectors, and pretenders to science.

Isle of Mist (The). The Isle of Skye, whose high hills are almost always shrouded in mist.

"Nor sleep the land by thy gate, chief of the Isle of Mist."—[Sammis: Fingal, 1.

Islington (The Magus of). One of the skilful companions of Barlow, the famous archer, was so christened by Henry VIII. (See Shoreditch, The Duke of.)

Ismail'ians (4 syl.). A Mahometan sect, which maintained that Isma'il, and not Moussa, ought to be Imam. In the tenth century they formed a secret society, from which sprang the Assassins.
Ismene (3 syl.) Daughter of OEdipus and Jocasta. Antigone was buried alive by the order of King Creon, for burying her brother Polynices, slain in combat by his brother Eteocles. Ismene declared that she had aided her sister, and requested to be allowed to share the same punishment.

Ismenes. The lady-love of Ismene's, in the erotic romance of Eustathius and Bumathius entitled Ismene and Ismene's (twelfth century). Translated by Godfrey of Viterbo. Especially noteworthy from its being reproduced in the Confessio Amantis of Gower, and forming the plot of Shakespeare's Pericles.

Ismenie. A Théban musician of whom Ath'ea's, King of the Scyth'ians, declared, "I liked the music of Ismenia better than the braying of an ass." (Plutarch.)

Ismeno (in Jerusalem Delivered). A magician who could "call spirits from the vasty deep." He was once a Christian, but became Mahometan. Ismeno was killed by a stone hurled at him by an engine (book xviii.).

Isobars. Lines on a map connecting places which have the same mean barometric pressure. The closer the isobars are the stronger the wind, the farther the lighter. (Greek, bars, weight.)

Is'olde (2 syl.). Wife of King Mark, of Cornwall, who had an illicit affection for Sir Tristram, Mark's nephew. Isolde the White, Sir Tristram's wife.

Isothermal Lines. Lines laid down in maps to show the places which have the same mean temperature. (Greek, iso thermos, equal heat.)

Israel, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, stands for England.

Is'rafiel. The angel of music, who possessed the most melodious voice of all God's creatures. This is the angel who is to sound the Resurrection Trump, and will ravish the ears of the saints in paradise. Israfil, Gabriel, and Michael were the three angels that warned Abraham of Sodom's destruction. (See: Konown.)

"A winged hand, commanded by Israfil, that the angel of the resurrection, came to meet Roland." —Croquemort, n. v.

Issa. Jesus.

Issachar, in Dryden's satire of Ab-salom and Achitophel, means Thomas Thynne, of Longleat Hall, a friend of the Duke of Monmouth. Thynne was assassinated in his carriage, in Pall Mall, by ruffians hired by Count Koningenmark. The cause of the murder was jealousy. Both Mr. Thynne and the count were in love with Lady Elizabeth Percy, the widow of the Earl of Ogle. Her friends contracted her to the rich commoner, but before the match was consummated Mr. Thynne was murdered. Within three months the lady married the Duke of Somerset. (See MORNUM.)

Issachar's ears. Ass's ears. The allusion is to Gen. xlix. 14: "Issachar is a strong ass crouching down between two burdens."

"Is it possible that you, whose ears
Are of the trib's of Issacher's.
Should yet be deaf against a Muse
So favouring at the public voice?"—
Rutter: Mandrake to Satrapyn.

Issalend. The kingdom of Brunhild is identified by Von der Hagen with Iceland, but Wackernagel says it means Amazonian land, and derives it from the Old German Ido (a woman). (The Nibelungen Lied.)

Issue. The point of law in debate or in question. "At issue," under dispute.

To join issue. To take opposite views of a question, or opposite sides in a suit.

To join issues. To leave a suit to the decision of the court because the parties interested cannot agree.

Isthmian Games. Epsom races were styled "Our Isthmian Games" by Lord Palmerston, in allusion to the famous games consisting of chariot races, running, wrestling, boxing, etc., held by the Greeks in the Isthmus of Corinth every alternate spring, the first and third of each Olympiad.

Isthmus of Suez. The covered bridge of St. John's College, Cambridge, is so called, because it connects the college with the grounds on the other side of the river. Suez here is a pun on the word sus (a hog), the Johannis being nick-named hogs in University slang.

Italian Architecture. The Roman architecture revived in the fifteenth century, and in vogue during that and the two succeeding ones. It is divided into three schools—the Florentine, Roman, and Venetian.

Italian of Asia (The). Persian is so called. Noted for its harmony, and its adaptation to verse and the lighter class of music.

Italic School of Philosophy. The Pythagorean, so called because Pythagoras taught in Italy.
Italics. The type first used by Aldo Manuzio in printing the Aldine classics. It was called by him "Cursive" letters (a running hand; from Latin, curvo, to run). Virgil was the first author printed in this type (1501). Francesco of Bologna cast it.

The words italicised in the Bible have no corresponding words in the original. The translators supplied these words to render the sense of the passage more full and clear.

Italy. The champion of Italy was St. Anthony. (Seven Champions of Christendom, part i. 6.)

Itch. My fingers itch to be at him. This is a French locution, "Les poings me démangent de te battre."

An itch for gold. A longing desire. (Anglo-Saxon, giecun, to itch.)

Itching Ears (To have). To have a longing desire to hear news, or some novelty.

"The time will come when they will not endure the sound doctrine; but, having itching ears, will heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts [or longings]."—2 Timothy iv. 3 (R.V.).

Itching Palm (An). A love of money. If the palm of your right hand itches, it betokens that you are going to receive money. So Melton tells us in his Astrologaster, p. 23.

"Let me tell you, chance, you yourself Are much condemned to have an itching palm."—Shakespeare: John of Gaunt, iv. 4.

Itching of the Eye. If the right eye itches it betokens laughter at hand; if the left eye itches, it betokens grief; but Shakespeare does not observe this distinction.

"My right eye itches now, so I shall see My love."—Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen, i 27.

"My eye doth itch; Both that foresight weep."—Shakespeare: Othello, iv. 3.

Itching of the Lips indicates you are about to receive a kiss, or else kiss somebody.

"If your lips itch, you shall kiss somebody."—Melton: Astrologaster, p 32.

Itching of the Nose indicates that you are going to see a stranger.

"We shall ha' guests to-day... My nose itches so."—Dekker: Honest Whore.

Itching of the Thumb, according to Shakespeare, betokens the approach of evil.

"By the pricking of my thumb, Something evil this way comes."—Macbeth, iv. 1.

Ithacan'sian Suitors (The). The suitors of Penelope (4 syl.), wife of Ulysses, King of Ithaca. While the suitors were absent, many suitors presented themselves to Penelope, affirming that Ulysses was certainly dead. Penelope put them off, saying she would give a definite answer when she had finished the robe she was weaving for Laertes; but at night she unrolled all she had woven during the day. At last Ulysses returned and slew the suitors.

"All the ladies, each and each, / Like the Ithacan suitors in old time, / Stared with great eyes, and laughed with alen lips."—Tennyson: The Princess, iv.

Ithuriel. One of the angels commissioned by Gabriel to search for Satan, who had effected his entrance into Paradise. The other angel who accompanied him was Zephon. (Ithuriel means "the discovery of God.")

"Ithuriel to Zephon, with winged speed / Search through this garden; leave unsearched no nook; / But chiefly where those two fair creatures lodge, / Now hid perhaps asleep, secure of harm."—Millon: Paradise Lost, book iv. 786-791.

Ithuriel's Spear. The spear of the angel Ithuriel, the slightest touch of which exposed deceit. Hence, when Satan squatted like a toad "close to the ear of Eve," Ithuriel only touched the creature with his spear, and it resumed the form of Satan.

"Him [i.e. Satan], thus intent Ithuriel with his spear / Touched lightly; for no falsehood can endure / Touch of celestial temper, but returns / Of force to its own likeness."—Millon: Paradise Lost, iv. 810-813.

Itinerary (An). The notification of the route followed by a traveller. The Itinerary of Antoninus marks out all the main roads of the Roman Empire, and the stations of the Roman army. The Itinerary of Peutinger (Tabula Peutingeriana) is also an invaluable document of ancient geography, executed A.D. 393, in the reign of Theodosius the Great, and hence called sometimes the Theodosian Table.

It's did not come into use till the seventeenth century. Dean Trech puts out that Chatterton betrayed his forgeries by the line "Life and its goods I scorn," but the word its was not in use till several centuries after the death of the monk to whom the words are ascribed. In 1548 it was used for its.

"The love and devotion towards God hath it innumerable, and hath it conditio forward in growth of age."—Lambe Ivan. The Russian form of John, called Iuan in Spain, Giovanni in Italian.

Ivanhoe (3 syl.). Sir Wilfred, knight of Ivanhoe, is the disinherited son of Cedric of Rotherwood. He is first introduced as a pilgrim, in which guise he enters his father’s hall, where he meets Rowena. He next appears as Desdichado, the “Disinherited Knight,” in the grand tournament where he vanquishes all opponents. At the intercession of King Richard he is reconciled to his father, and ultimately marries Rowena, his father’s ward. Itobeeca, the Jew’s daughter, to whom he had shown many acts of kindness, was in love with him.

Sir Walter Scott took the name from the village of Ivanhoe, or Invinghoe, in Bucks, a line in an old rhymed proverb — “Tring, King, and Ivanhoe” — having attracted his attention.

Ivanovitch. A lazy, good-natured person, the national impersonation of the Russians as a people, as John Bull is of the English, Brother Jonathan of the Americans, Jean Crapaud of the French, and Cousin Michael of the Germans.

Ivories. Teeth; dice.
To show one’s ivories. To display one’s teeth.
To wash one’s ivories. To rinse the mouth; to drink.

Ivory Gate of Dreams (The). Dreams which delude pass through this gate, those which come true pass through the Gate of Horn. This fancy depends upon two puns: ivory in Greek is elephas, and the verb elephan to cheat with empty hopes; the Greek for horn is keras, and the verb karam to accomplish.

“Sunt genuine sonni portae; quas vera facta sunt, evanescentes sperant, altera multa perfecta sunt, elephas; sed falsa ad certum mutant in sonnum namas.” — Virgil: Aenid, vi. 804-807.

Ivory Palaces are not unfrequently mentioned in the Old Testament. Thus (Psalm xlv. 8), “All thy garments smell of myrrh, aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces;” in 1 Kings xxvii. 39 we read that Ahab built “an ivory house;” and in Amos iii. 15 we read, “I will smite the winter-house with the summer-house, and the houses of ivory.”

Lady Mary Wortley Montague, in her Letters, speaks of the ivory fittings of the harem of the Khayyá’s palace at Adrianople. She says, “Its winter apartments are wainscotted with inlaid work of mother-of-pearl and ivory of different colours” (vol. ii. p. 161-162).

“...the ceilings of the Eastern houses are of mosaic work, and for the most part of ivory, like those superb Ta’bár of Persia.” — St. John Chardin.

Ivory Shoulder. Demeter ate the shoulder of Pelops, served up by Tan-tálos; so when the gods restored the body to life, Demeter supplied the lacking shoulder with one of ivory.

“Not Pelops’ shoulder a whiter than her hand.”

W. Browne: Britannia’s Pastoral, ii. 3.

Ivy (Old English, ify). Dedicated to Bacchus from the notion that it is a preventive of drunkenness. But whether the Dionysian ivy is the same plant as that which we call ivy is doubtful, as it was famous for its golden berries, and was termed chryso-carpus.

Ivy (in Christian art). Symbol of everlasting life, from its remaining continuously green. An ivy wreath was the prize of the Isthmian games, till it was superseded by a pine garland. The plant was sacred to Bacchus and Osiris.

Ivy Bush. Lake an owl in an ivy-bush. Having a sapient, vacant look, as some persons have when in their cups; having a stupid vacant stare. Owls are proverbial for their judge-like solemnity, and ivy is the favourite plant of Bacchus, Gray, in his Elegy, refers to the Owl and the Ivy.

“From under ivy-maned tower
The mourning owl doth to the moon complain
Of such as, wandering near her sacred bower,
Molest her ancient solity reign.”

Shaks. 3.

Ivy Lane (London). So called from the houses of the prebendaries of St. Paul, overgrown with ivy, which once stood there.

Ixion. A king of the Lapithae, bound to a revolving wheel of fire in the Infernal regions, for his impious presumption in trying to imitate the thunder of heaven. (Greek mythology.) "The treadmill is sometimes called "Ixion’s Wheel.”

J.

J. (In Punch). The signature of Douglas Jerrold, who first contributed to No. 9 of the series.

J. J. (In Hogarth’s Gin Lane, written on a gibbet), is intended for Sir Joseph Jekyll, obnoxious for his bill for increasing the duty on gin.
Jaafar. At the battle of Muta, Jaafar carried the sacred banner of "the Prophet." One hand being lopped off, he held it with the other; the other being struck off, he embraced it with his two stumps; his head being clef in twain, he hung himself on the banner staff, and the banner was detained thus till Abdallah seized it and handed it to Khaled. A similar tale is told of Cynegiros (q.v.).

Ja'chin. The parish clerk in Crabbe's Borough. He appropriated the sacramental money, and died disgraced.

(See Boaz.)

(14) Jack-shaw. A boating tailor.
(15) Jack-slave. "Every Jack-slave hath his belly full of fighting." (Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, ii. 1.)
(16) Jack-an-ear. (q.v.).
(18) Jack-in-office. A conceited official, or upstart, who pretends on his official appointment to give himself airs.
(20) Jack-in-the-water. An attendant at the waterman's stairs, etc., willing to wet his feet, if needs be, for a "few coppers."
(21) Jack-of-all-trades. One who can turn his hand to anything, but excels in nothing.
(22) Jack-of-both-sides. One who tries to favour two antagonistic parties, either from fear or for profit.
(24) Cheap Jack. (See cheap.)
(25) Jack will never be a gentleman. A mere parvenu will never be like a well-bred gentleman.
(26) Every man-Jack of them. All without exception, even the most insignificant.
(27) Remember poor Jack. Throw a copper to the boys paddling about the jetty or pier, or performing tricks under the hope of getting a small bounty.

II. Applied to boys who act the part of men.

(1) Jack Frost. Frost personified as a mischievous boy.
(2) Jack Sprat. Who bears the same relation to a man as a sprat does to a mackerel or herring.

(9) Little Jack Horner. (See Jack Horner.)
(10) The house that Jack built (nursery tale).

III. Applied to the males or inferior animals: as—

Jack-ass, Jack-baker (a kind of owl), Jack or dog fox. Jack-hare, Jack-horn, Jack-rat, Jack-shark, Jack-snipe; a young pike is called a Jack, so also were the mule birds used in falconry.

IV. Applied to instruments which supply the place of or represent inferior men or boys:

(1) A jack. Used instead of a turn-slit boy, generally called Jack.
(2) A jack. Used for lifting heavy weights.
(3) Jack. The figure outside old public clocks made to strike the bell.

"Strike like Jack of the clock-house, never but in season."—Strode: Flouting Island.
(4) Jack-roller. The cylinder round which the rope of a well coils.

(5) Jack-in-the-box. The cap or basket on the top of a pole to indicate the place of a sandbank at sea, etc.

(6) Jack-in-the-box. A toy consisting of a box out of which, when the lid is raised, a figure springs.

(7) Boo-boo. An instrument for drawing off boots, which used to be done by inferior servants.

(8) Bottle-roller. A machine for turning the road instead of a turnspit.

(9) Lifting-roller. A machine for lifting the axle-tree of a carriage when the wheels are cleaned.

(10) Roasting-roller. (See Bottle-roller, 8.)

(11) Smoke-roller. An apparatus in a chimney-flue for turning a spit. It is made to revolve by the upward current of smoke and air.

(12) Jack-chain. A small chain for turning the spit of a smoke-roller.

V. Applied to inferior articles which bear the same relation to the thing imitated as Jack does to a gentleman.

(1) Jack. A rough stool or wooden horse for sawing timber on.

(2) Jack. A small drinking vessel made of waxed leather.

"Body of me, I am dry still; give me the jack, boy."—Beaumont and Fletcher: Bloody Brother, ii. 2.

(8) The black jack. The turnip-fly.

(9) The yellow jack. The yellow fever.

VII. Used in proverbial phrases.

"A good Jack makes a good Jill. A good husband makes a good wife, a good master makes a good servant. Jack, a generic name for man, husband, or master; and Gill or Jill, his wife or female servant.

_Every Jack shall have his Jill._ Every man may find a wife if he likes; or rather, every country rustic shall find a lass to be his mate.

"Jack shall have his Jill.

"The man shall have his mare again, and all shall be well.

_Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, i._ 2.

_To play the Jack._ To play the rogue or knave; to deceive or lead astray like Jack-o'-lantern, or ignis fatuus.

"_Your fairy, which you say, is a harmless fairy, has done little better than played the Jack with us._—Shakespeare: Tempest, iv. 1.

_To be upon their jacks._ To have the advantage over one. The reference is to the coat of mail quilted with stout leather, more recently called a jerkin.

VIII. Jack. Armour consisting of a leather surcoat worn over the hauberk, from the fourteenth to the seventeenth century, both inclusive. It was formed by overlapping pieces of steel fastened by one edge upon canvas, coated over with cloth or velvet. In short, it was a surcoat padded with metal to make it sword-proof. These jassieres were worn by the peasantry of the English borders when they journeyed from place to place, and in their skirmishes with mess-troopers.

"Jackes quilted and covered over with leather, fustian, or canvas, over thick plates of iron that are sewed to the same."—Lyd: Euphues.

Colonel Jack. The hero of Defoe's novel so called. He is a thief who goes to Virginia, and becomes the owner of vast plantations and a family of slaves.
Jack-a-Dandy. A term of endearment for a smart, bright little fellow; a Jimmey Jessamy.

"Smart she is, and handy, O! Sweet as sugar-candy, O!"

And I'm her Jack-a-dandy, O!"

Jack - a - dandy. Slang for brandy. Dandy rhymes with brandy. (See Curvy.)

Jack-Ketch. Although this looks very much like a sobriquet, there seems no sufficient evidence to believe it to be otherwise than a real proper name. We are told that the name Jack was applied to hangman from Richard II., to whom the manor of Tyburn once belonged. (See Hangmen.)

Jack Pudding. A buffoon who performs pudding tricks, such as swallowing a certain number of yards of black-pudding. S. Bishop observes that such country names its stage buffoon from its favourite viands: The Dutchman calls him Pikket-kerryne; the Germans, Haus Wurst (John Sausage); the Frenchman, Jean Potage; the Italian, Macaro'm; and the English, Jack Pudding.

Jack Robinson. Before you can say Jack Robinson, Immediately. Grose says that the saying had its birth from a very volatile gentleman of that name.

who used to pay flying visits to his neighbours, and was no sooner announced than he was off again; but the following couplet does not confirm this derivation:

"A wark it ys as easy to be done As to say Jacks a rogue on."

An old Play, cited by Halliwell: Arch. Dict.

Jack Sprat. A dwarf: as if sprats were dwarf mackerels. Children, by a similar metaphor, are called small fry.

Jack Tar. A common sailor, whose hands and clothes are tarred by the ship tackling.

Jack and the Bean Stalk. A nursery tale of German invention. The giant is All-Father, whose three treasures are (1) a harp—i.e. the wind; (2) bags full of treasures—i.e. the rain; and (3) the red hen which laid golden eggs—that is, the genial sun. Man avails himself of these treasures and becomes rich.

Jack of all Trades is Master of None. In French, "Tout savoir est ne rien savoir."

Jack o' both Sides. A supernumerary who plays on both sides to make up a party; one who for profit or policy is quite colourless.

Jack o' the Clock. The figure which comes out to strike the hours on the bell of a clock. A contraction of Jaquemart (q.v.).

"King Richard. Well, what's o'clock?"

Buckingham. Upon the stroke of ten.

K. R. Well, let it strike.

R. Why let it strike ?

K. R. Because that, like a jack, thou keep'st the stroke.

Betwixt thy begging and my meditation."

Shakespeare: Richard III., iii. 111.

Jack of Dover. A stockfish, "hake salted and dried." The Latin for a hake is merluccus, and lucius is a jack or pike. Mer, of course, means the sea, and Dover, the chief Cinque Port, is used as a synonym. Also refuse who collected into a bottle and sold for fresh wine. "To do-over again." (See Dover.)

"Many a Jack of Dover hast me sold That hath been twers hot and twers cold." Chaucer: Canterbury Tales.

Jack of Newbury. John Winchcomb, the greatest clothier of the world, in the reign of Henry VIII. He kept 100 looms in his own house at Newbury, and equipped at his own expense 100 of his men to aid the king against the Scotch in Flodden Field.

Jack o' the Bowl. The most famous brownie or house-spirit of Switzerland; so called from the custom of placing Jacobins

Jack Out of Office. One no longer in office.

"I am left out; for me nothing remains. But long I will not be Jack-out-of-office."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI., 1.1.

Jack the Giant-killer owed much of his success to his four marvellous possessions—an invisible coat, a cap of wisdom, shoes of swiftness, and a resistless sword. When he put on his coat no eye could see him; when he had his shoes on no one could overtake him; his sword would cut through every thing; and when his cap was on he knew every thing he required to know. Yonge says the story is based on the Scandinavian tale of Thor and Loki, while Masson maintains it is a nursery version of the fust of Corinicus in Geoffrey of Monmouth's marvellous history. I apprehend that neither of these suggestions will find many supporters.

"Military success depends (1) on an invisible coat, or secrecy, not letting the foe know your plans; (2) a cap of wisdom, or wise counsel; (3) shoes of swiftness, or attacking the foe before he is prepared; and (4) a resistless sword, or dauntless courage.

Jack the Ripper. An unknown person who so called himself, and committed a series of murders in the East End of London on common prostitutes.

The first was 3rd August, 1888; the next was 9th August; the third was 31st August; the fourth was 29th September; the fifth was 30th September, when two women were murdered; the sixth was November 8th; the seventh was December 7th, in a builder's yard; the eighth was July 11th, 1889, at Whitechapel; the ninth was September 12th.

Jack and James. Jewish, Jacob; French, Jacques, our "Jack," and Jaques; our "James." Jaques used to be the commonest name of France, hence the assumption of the common people was termed the assumption of the Jaques, or the Jaqueres; and a rustic used to be called a Jaques bon hommer. The Scotch call Jack Jack.

Jackal. A tawdry one who does the dirty work of another. It was once thought that the jackals hunted in troops to provide the lion with prey, hence they were called the "Lion's providers." No doubt the lion will at times avail himself of the jackal's assistance by appropriating prey started by these "hunters," but it would be folly to suppose that the jackal acted on the principle of vos non vobs. (See Honeycomb.)

Jacket. The French jaquette, "little jack," a translation of the German Hanecline, a slop cut short. *

Jacket. The skin of a potato. Potatoes brought to table unpeeled are said to be "with their jackets on." To dust one's jacket. (See Dust.)

Jackson. (See Stonewall.)

Jacksonian Professor. The professor of natural and experimental philosophy in the University of Cambridge. This professorship was founded in 1783 by the Rev. Richard Jackson.

Jacob the Soucre of Grammar. Giles Jacob, master of Romsey, in Hampshire, brought up for an attorney. A poetaster in the time of Pope. (See Dunrac, iii.)

Jacob's Ladder. A ladder seen by the patriarch Jacob in a vision. It was set on the earth, and reached to heaven, and angels seemed to be ascending and descending on it (Gen. xxviii. 12). Jacob is, on this account, a cant name for a ladder. There is a pretty blue flower so called.

Jacob's Staff. An instrument for taking heights and distances.

"Reach them a wearing staff, that I may write ;
An with a Jacob's staff to take her height."—Chaucer: The Ricetomb to his Mistress.

The Apostle James is usually represented with a staff.

"As he had traveled many a summer's day,
Through boiling sands of Arme and Yed; And in his hand a Jacob's staff to stay
His weary limbs upon."—Spenser: Faux in Quern, book i. canto vi. 32-35.

Jacob's Stone. The stone inclosed in the coronation chair of Great Britain, brought from Stone by Edward I., and said to be the stone on which the patriarch Jacob laid his head when he dreamt about the ladder referred to above.

This stone was originally used in Ireland as a coronation stone. It was called "Imisfail," or Stone of Destiny. (See Coronation Chair.)

Jacobins. The Dominicans were so called in France from the "Rue St. Jacques," Paris, where they first established themselves in 1219.

Jacobins. A political club, originally called the Club Breton, formed at Versailles in 1789. On their removal to Paris, they met in the hall of an ex-convent of Jacobins (see above), in the Rue St. Honoré.
Jacquard Loom. So called from Jos. Marie Jacquard, of Lyons, who invented this ingenious device for weaving figures upon silks and muslins. (1752-1834.)

Jacqueline (of Paris). A bell weighing 15,000 lbs., cast in 1400.

Jacquerie (La). An insurrection of the peasantry of France in 1358, excited by the oppressions of the privileged classes and Charles the Bad of Navarre, while King Jean was a prisoner in England. When the peasants complained, and asked who was to redress their grievances, they were told in scorn "Jacques Bonhomme (Johnny Goodman), i.e. no one. At length a leader appeared, called himself Jacques Bonhomme, and declared war to the death against every gentleman in France. In six weeks some 12,000 of these insurgents were cut down, and amongst their number was the leader himself. (See JACK, JACQUES.)

Jacques. A generic name for the poor artisan class in France. Jaques is a sort of cotton waistcoat without sleeves.

"Jacques, tu me faust troublier ton homme; Dans le village, un gros hussier Rôde et court, sui du messer : C'est pour l'impôt, pas mon pauvre homme. Leve-toi, Jaques, leve-toi, Va voir venir l'homme du bon.

"Brouiller (Thal)."

Pauvre Jaques. Said to a maiden when she is lackadaisical (French). Marie Antoinette had an artificial Swiss village, which she called her "Petite Suisse," and actually sent to Switzerland for a peasant girl to assist in milking the cows. The Swiss maiden was one day overheard sighing for "Pauvre Jaques," and the queen sent for the distant swain, and had the lovers married.

Jacques Bonhomme. A sort of fairy good-luck, who is to redress all wrongs, and make all the poor wealthy. The French peasants are so called sometimes, and then the phrase is like our term of sneering pity, "my good fellow," or "my fine fellow." (See Jacques.)

Jactitation of Marriage. A false assertion by a person of being married to another. This is actionable.

Jade or The Divine Stone. Worn by the Indians as an amulet to preserve them from the bite of venomous animals, and to cure the gravel, epilepsy, etc. (Hill.)

"The conversation was interrupted by continual cups of tea drunk out of the most beautiful Chinese ware, while the Ambassadriz was of a green jade:—Burke, Across the Table, chap. 1, p. 252.

Jaffier (3 syl.), in Venice Preserved, a tragedy by Otway. He joins the conspiracy of Pierre against the Venetian state, but communicates the secret to his wife Belvide're. Belvide're, being the daughter of a senator, is naturally anxious to save the life of Priuli, her father, and accordingly induces her husband to disclose the plot, under promise of pardon to all the conspirators. The plot being revealed, the senate condemned the conspirators to death; whereupon Jaffier stabbed Pierre to prevent his being broken on the wheel, and then stabbed himself.

Jagger. A gentleman; a sportsman. (German, jäger, a sportsman.)

Jail-bird (f). One who has been in jail as a prisoner.

"At this late period of Christianity we are brought up to bishop jail-birds as we do thieves."—Heecher: The Plymouth Pulpit, August 20th, 1674, vol. ii, p. 257.

Jamambuxes (Soldiers of the round valleys). Certain fanatics of Japan, who roam about and pretend to hold converse with the Devil. They scourge themselves severely, and sometimes refrain from sleeping for several days, in order to obtain the odour of sanctity. They are employed by the people for the discovery of articles stolen or lost.
Jambon. A gun, so called from its fanciful resemblance to a "betterave" or jambon. The botanical name of the root is melochia.

"What would you do to me, brigand? . . . Give me fifty blows of a matraque, as your officer gave you last week for stealing his jambon?" — Quoted: Under Two Flags, chap. xvi.

Jambuschii [Jam-bus-chii]. Adam's preceptor, according to the pre-Adamites. Sometimes called Beau, and sometime Zaghit.

James. A sovereign; a Jacobus. A gold coin circulated in the reign of James I. Worth about 2s.

James (St.). Patron saint of Spain. At Padron, near Compostella, they used to show a huge stone as the veritable boat in which the apostle sailed from Palestine. His body was discovered in 840 by divine revelation to Bishop Theodomir, and King Alfonso built a church at Compostella for its shrine. According to another legend, it was the relics of St. James that were miraculously conveyed to Spain in a ship of marble from Jerusalem, where he was bishop. A knight saw the ship sailing into port, his horse took fright, and plunged with its rider into the sea. The knight saved himself by "boarding the marble vessel," but his clothes were found to be entirely covered with scallop shells.

In the Acta Sanctorum (xi. 37, etc.) we are told, that in Clavigium scarcely a stone is found which does not bear the form of a shell; and if these stones are broken up, the broken bits have also the forms of shells.

In Christian art this saint has sometimes the sword by which he was beheaded, and sometimes he is attired as a pilgrim, with his cloak covered with shells. (See above.)

St. James (the Less). His attribute is a fuller's club, in allusion to the instrument by which he was put to death, after having been precipitated from the summit of the temple.

St. James's College. So called from James I., who granted a charter to a college founded at Chelsea by Dr. Sutcliffe. Dean of Exeter, to maintain priests to answer all adversaries of religion. Land nicknamed it "Controversy College." The college was a failure, and Charles II. gave the site to the Royal Society, who sold it for the purpose of erecting the Royal Hospital for Old Soldiers, which now exists.

St. James's Day. July 25th, the day of his martyrdom.

The Court of St. James or St. James's. The British court. Queen Victoria holds her drawing-rooms and levees in St. James's Palace. Pall Mall; but Queen Anne, the four Georges, and William IV. resided in this palace.

Jennie or Jennie Duff. Weepers. So called from a noted Scotchman of the 18th century, who lived at Edinburgh. His great passion, like that of "Old Q.," was to follow funerals in mourning costume, with orthodox weepers. I myself know a gentleman of a similar morbid passion. (Kay: Original Portraits, i. 7, and ii. 9, 17, 95.)

Jamshid. King of the Genii, famous for a golden cup full of the elixir of life. This cup, hidden by the genii, was discovered while digging the foundations of Persepolis.

"I know too where the genii hid The jewelled cup of their king Jamshid, With herbs and spicery their faithful art had made; The cup, they sang, was full of gold. Thomas Moore: Pimpernel and the Peri.

Jane. A Genoese halfpenny, a corruption of Januensis or Genoensis.

"Because I could not write her name, Jane," Tweedsmuir: First Queen, book iii. chapt. vii. 36.

Jane, a most ill-starred name for rulers. To give a few examples: Lady Jane Grey, beheaded by Mary for treason; Jane Seymour; Jane or Joan Beaufort, wife of James I. of Scotland, who was infamous and savagely murdered; Jane of Burgundy, wife of Philippe le Long, who imprisoned her for adultery in 1314; Jane of Flanders, who was in ceaseless war with Jane of Penthièvre after the captivity of their husbands. This contest is known in history as "the wars of the two Janes" (fourteenth century). Jane of France (de Valois), wife of Louis XII., who repudiated her for being ugly: Jane d'Albret, mother of Henri IV. of France. Being invited to Paris to attend the espousals of her son with Margaret de Valois, she was poisoned by Catherine de Medici (1572); Jane, Countess of Hainault, daughter of Baldwin, and wife of Fernand of Portugal, who was made prisoner at the battle of Bouvines in 1214. She refused to ransom him, and is thought to have poisoned her father; Jane Henriques, wife of John II. of Navarre, stirred up war between her husband and his son Carlos by a former marriage, and ultimately made away with the young prince, a proceeding which caused a revolt of the Catalonians (1462); Jane the Imbecile of Castile, who lost her reason from grief at the neglect of her husband, Philip the..."
Handsome, Archduke of Austria: Jane I. of Naples married Andrew of Hungary, whom she caused to be murdered, and then married the assassin. Her reign was most disastrous. La Harpe has a tragedy entitled Jeanne de Naples; Jane II. of Naples, a woman of most scandalous character, guilty of every sort of wantonness. She married James, Count of March, who put to death her lovers and imprisoned Jane for two years. At her release James fled to France, when Jane had a liaison with Caraccioli, whom she murdered. Jean, the pope, if indeed such a person ever existed.

Jeanne de Pauvole (Joan of Arc) cannot be called a ruler, but her lot was not more happy; etc. etc. (See Joan Two.)

Jane Eyre. The heroine in a novel of the same name, by Currer Bell (q.v.).

Janissaries or Janizaries, a celebrated militia of the Ottoman Empire, raised by Orchan in 1326, and called the Yengi-tschari (new corps). It was blessed by Hadji Bektash, a saint, who cut off a sleeve of his fur mantle and gave it to the captain. The captain put the sleeve on his head, and from this circumstance arose the fur cap worn by these footguards. In 1826, having become too formidable to the state, they were abolished.

"There were two classes of Janissaries, one regularly organised ..., and the other comprising an irregular militia."—Characters: Encyclopaedia, vol. vi. p. 279.

Jannes and Jambres. The two magicians of Pharaoh, who imitated some of the miracles of Moses. The Jannes and Jambres who "withstood Moses," mentioned by St. Paul (2 Tim. iii. 8, 9), are supposed to be the same. The paraphrase Jonathan says they were the sons of Balaam.

Jan'netists. A sect of Christians, who held the doctrines of Cornelius Jansen, Bishop of Ypres, in France. Jansen professed to have formulated the teaching of Augustine, A.D. 1640, which resembled Calvinism in many respects. He taught the doctrines of "irresistible grace," "original sin," and the "utter helplessness of the natural man to turn to God." Louis XIV. took part against them, and they were put down by Pope Clement XI., in 1703, in the famous bull called Unigenitus (q.v.).

Januarius (St.). A martyr in 305. Two vials of his blood are preserved in the cathedral at Naples, and every year on September 19 (the day of his martyrdom) the blood liquefies.

Order of St. Januarius (patron saint of Naples), instituted in 1738 by Infante don Carlos.

January. The month dedicated by the Romans to Janus (g.v.). Janus had two faces, and January could look back to the year past, and forwards to the current year.

Janus. The temple of peace, in Rome. The doors were thrown open in times of war and closed in times of peace. Some think the two faces of this mythical deity allegorise Noah and his sons, who look back on the world before the Flood, and forwards on the world after the deluge had abated. This idea will do very well in poetry.

"Slavery was the bane on which the gates of the temple of Janus turned" (in the American war).—The Times.

Japanese (3 syl.). The language of Japan, a native of Japan, anything pertaining thereto.

Japheth's Stone. According to tradition, Noah gave Japheth a stone which the Turks call giuditash and semkjesi. Whosoever possesses this stone has the power of bringing rain from heaven at will. It was for a long time preserved by the Moguls.

Japhet'idie. The supposed posterity of Japheth, son of Noah. The Aryan family is said to belong to this race.

"The Indo-European family of languages as known by various designations. Some style it Japhetic, as if it appertained to the descendants of the patriarch Japheth, as the Semitic tongues [appertain] to the descendants of Shem"—Whitney: Languages, etc., lecture v. p. 152.

Jaquemart. The automaton of a clock, consisting of a man and woman who strike the hours on a bell. So called from Jean Jaquemart of Dijon, a clockmaker, who devised this piece of mechanism.

Jaques (1 syl.). A morose cynical moraliser in Shakespeare's As You Like It. It is much disputed whether the word is a monosyllable or not. Charles Lamb makes it a disyllable—"Where Jaques fed in solitary vein;" but Sir Walter Scott uses it as a monosyllable—"Whom humorous Jaques with envy viewed."

Jarkman. An Abram-man (g.v.). Jark means a seal, whence also a safe-conduct. Abram-men were licensed beggars, who had the "seal" or licence of the Bethlehem Hospital to beg.

Jarnac. Corp de Jarnac. A peculiar stroke of the sword by which the opponent is ham-strung. The allusion is to the duel between Jarnac and La Châteigneraie, on July 10th, 1547, in the presence of Henri II., when Jarnac dealt his adversary such a blow, from which he died.

Jarndyce v. Jarndyce. An interminable Chancery suit in Dickens's Bleak House. The character of Jarndyce is that of a kind-hearted, easy fellow, who is half ashamed that his left hand should know what his right hand gives.

Jarvey. A hackney-coach driver. Said to be a contraction of Geoffrey; and the reason why this name was selected was because coachmen say to their horses gee-up, and gee-o is a contraction of Geoffrey. Ballantyne says, that one Jarvis, a noted hackney-coachman who was hanged, was the original Jarvey.

A Jarvey's benjamin. A coachman's great-coat. (See Benjamin.)

Jarvie (Rouslie Niel). A Glasgow magistrate in Scott's Rob Roy. He is petulant, conceited, purse-pride, without tact, and intensely prejudiced, but sincere and kind-hearted.

Jaundice (2 syl.) A jaundiced eye. A prejudiced eye which sees "faults that are not." It was a popular belief among the Romans that to the eye of a person who had the jaundice everything looked of a yellow tinge. (French, jaunir, yellow.)

* All seems infected that th'infected see.
  As all seems yellow to the jaundiced eye. — Pope: Essay on Criticism.

Javan (clay). Son of Japheth. In most Eastern languages it is the collective name of the Greeks, and is to be so understood in Isa. lxvi. 19, and Ezek. xxvii. 13.

In the World before the Flood, by James Montgomery, Javan is the hero. On the day of his birth his father died, and Javan remained in the "patriarch's glen" under his mother's care, till she also died. Then he resolved to see the world, and sojourned for ten years with the race of Cain, where he became the disciple of Jubal, noted for his musical talents. At the expiration of that time he returned, penitent, to the patriarch's glen, where Zillah, daughter of Enoch, "won the heart to Heaven denied." The giants invaded the glen, and carried off the little band captives. Enoch reproved the giants, who would have slain him in their fury, but they could not find him, "for he walked with God." As he ascended through the air his mantle fell on Javan, who, "smiling with it as he moved along," brought the captives safely back to the glen again. A tempest broke forth of so fearful a nature that the giant army fled in a panic, and their king was slain by some treacherous blow given by some unknown hand.

Javanese (3 syl.). A native of Java, anything pertaining to Java.

Javert. An officer of police, the impersonation of inexorable law in Les Misérables, by Victor Hugo.

Jaw. Words of complaint; wrangling, abuse, jabber. "To jaw," to annoy with words, to jabber, wrangle, or abuse. The French gueule and gueuder are used in the same manner. Hold your jaw. Hold your tongue or jabber.

What are you jawing about? What are you jabbering or wrangling about? A break-jaw word. A very long word, or one hard to pronounce.

Ja-wab. The refusal of an offer of marriage. Thus when one lady says to another that "Mr. A. B. has got his jawab," she means that he made her an offer of marriage, but was refused. (Vulgar slang.)

Jawbone (2 syl.). Credit, promises. (Jaw, words or talk; bow, good.)

Jay (f). A wanton.

"This jaw of Harry . . . hath betrayed him." — Shakespeare: Cymbeline, ii. 4.

Jay. A plunger: one who spends his money recklessly; a simpleton. This is simply the letter J, the initial letter of Juggins, who, in 1887, made a fool of himself by losses on the turf.

Jazey. A wig; a corruption of Jersey, and so called because they are made of Jersey flax and fine wool.

Je Maintiendrai (I will maintain). The motto of the House of Nassau. When William III. came to England he retained the motto, but added to it, "I will maintain the liberties of England and the Protestant religion."

Je ne Sais Quoi. An indescribable something: as "There was a je ne sais quoi about him which made us dislike him at first sight."

Jeames (1 syl.). Any flunkey. Sometimes the Morning Post is so called.

Thackeray wrote Jeames's Diary (published in Punch), of which Jeames de la Pluche was the hero.
Jean Crapaud. A Frenchman. A Frenchman is called both a toad and a frog. (See CRAPAUD.)

Jean Farnie [Jack Flour]. A sort of Scaramouch, generally very tall, and representing a loutish boy dressed all in white, the hair, face, and hands being covered with flour.

"Jean Farnie s'en servit (du manteau d'un gentilhomme taquin) un bonnet ; et à la voir lancaussier, il semb)lait qu'il nous dise enfin."—Les Jéans de Placoum (1645).

Jean de Lette (Mr. Jenkins). "Qui pour l'ordinaire, dit Tallemant, est un animal mal idone à toute autre chose." (Mme. Deshoulières: Histoires, ix. 209, x. 82.)

Jean de la Sule (French). A Savoyard.

Jean de la Vigne (French). A crucifix. (See next article.)

Jean des Vignes (French). So the jonglers call the poupée to which they address themselves. The French Protestants in the sixteenth century called "the host" Jean, and the word is pretty well synonymous with buffoon. Jean des Vignes was a drunken marionette performer of considerable ability; "Jean" was his name, "des Vignes" his sobriquet. Hence when a person does a bad action, the French say, "Il fait comme Jean des Vignes;" an illicit marriage is called "le mariage de Jean des Vignes," and a bad fellow is "un Jean des Vignes." Hence Assoucy says, "Moï, pauvre soi, plus soi que Jean des Vignes?"

Jeannot (French). One who is minutely great; one who exercises his talents and ingenuity on trifles; one who after great preparation at table to produce some mighty effect, brings forth only a ridiculous mouse.

Jeb'suates (3 syl.), in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, stands for the Roman Catholics; so called because England was Roman Catholic before the Reformation, and Jerusalem was called Jebus before the time of David.

In this poem, the Jeb'suates are the Catholics, and the Levites the dissenting clergy.

"Succeeding times did equal folly call,
Believing nothing, or believing all.
The Egyptian rites the Jeb'suates embraced,
When gods were recommended by their taste."

Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, Part i. 117-123.

Jedwood Justice. Putting an obnoxious person to death first, and trying him afterwards. This sort of justice was dealt to moos-troopers. Same as Jedburgh justice, Jeddart justice. We have also "Cupar justice" and "Abingdon law." Of the last we are told that Major-General Brown, in the Commonwealth, hanged a man first and tried him afterwards.

Jehonnam. The Gehenna or Inferno of the Arabs. It consists of seven stages, one below the other. The first is allotted to atheists; the second to Manicheans (q.v.); the third to the Brahmins of India; the fourth to the Jews; the fifth to Christians; the sixth to the Magians or Ghebers of Persia; and the seventh to hypocrites. (The Koran.)

Jehovistic. (See ELOHISTIC.)

Jehn. A coachman, especially one who drives at a rattling pace.

"The watchman told, saying,. . . . The driving is like the driving of Jehn the son of Nunhin; for he driveth furiously."—2 Kings ix. 20.

Jejune (2 syl.). A jejune narrative. A dry, tedious one. (Latin, jejūnus, dry, spiritless.)

"Tell fare itself, most sorrowful jejune, calls for the kind assistance of a time."—Shakespeare: Retribution, 711.

Jekyll. Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. The two phases of one man, "the law of his members warring against the law of his mind." Jekyll is the "would do good," Hyde is "the evil that is present." (Stevenson: Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.)

Jelly Pardons. When Thomas Cromwell was a clerk in the English factory at Antwerp, two of his fellow-countrymen from Boston (Lincolnshire) consulted with him as to the best means of getting the pardons renewed for the repair of Boston harbour. Cromwell, knowing that Pope Julius was very fond of dainties, provided for him some exquisite jelly, and told his Holiness that only royalty ever ate it in England. The Pope was so pleased with the delicacy that he signed the pardons, on condition of having the recipe of the jelly.

Jellyby (Mrs.). A philanthropist who would spend and be spent to help the poor fun-makers and flower-girls of Borriboonah Gha, but would bundle into the street a poor beggar dying of starvation on her own doorstep. (Dickens: Bleak House.)

Jemmie Duffs. (See JAMIE DUFFS.)
Jemmy, a name found in engravings of the eighteenth century, was James Wordsdale, the painter and dramatic writer (died 1677).

A housebreaker's crowbar. A variant of Jimmy, Jenny, Jinnie, and a diminutive of Jenny. Similarly a "spinning-jimminy" is a small engine for spinning. These crowbars generally take to pieces that they may be slipped into the pocket.

Jemmy. The head of a slaughtered sheep. There are "boiled jemminies," "baked jemminies," and "sanguinary jemminies" (raw sheep's heads). The tradition is that James IV. of Scotland breakfasted on a sheep's head just before the battle of Flodden Field (Sep. 9, 1513).

"Mr. Sikes made many pleasant witticisms on jemminies, a cant name for sheep's heads, and also for an ingenious implement much used in his profession."—Dickens : Oliver Twist Jemmy. A great-coat. So called from the Scotch cloth called jemmy.

Jemmy. Spruce, fine. A diminutive of ginn, spruce or smart (Anglo-Saxon genet). Gimcrack means an ornamental toy, a pretty ornament of no solidity. (See below, JEMMY JESSAMY.)

Jemmy Dawson was one of the Manchester rebels, who was hanged, drawn, and quartered on Kennington Common, Surrey, July 30th, 1746. A lady of gentle blood was in love with the gallant young rebel, and died of a broken heart on the day of his execution. (Perry's Reliques, series 2, book iii. 20.)

Shenstone has a ballad on it, beginning, "Come, listen to my mournful tale."

Jemmy Jessamy (A). A Jack-a-dandy; a lady's fondling, "sweet as sugar-candy."

Jenkinson (Epgram). A swindling rascal, who makes a tool of Dr. Primrose. (Goldsmith : Vicar of Wakefield.)

Jennet. A small Spanish horse.

Jenny. The spinning jenny means the little spinning engine. The word is a corrupt diminutive, "ginie." It is an error to derive the word from the inventor's wife or daughter, seeing his wife's name was Elizabeth, and he had no daughter.

Jenny l'Ouvrière. A generic name for a hard-working, poor, but contented needlewoman. The name was devised by Emile Baratieu, and rendered popular by his song so called.

"Existe-t-il un oiseau familière\nC'est le chanteur de Jenny l'Ouvrière.\nAu cœur content, content de jeu\nElle joue d'être riante, et préfère\nCe qui lui plaît de Dieu.\n (1847.)

Jenny Wren, the sweetheart of Robin Redbreast.

"Robin promised Jenny, if she would be his wife, she should 'feed on cherry-pie and drink currant-wine'; and he says—\n'I'll dress you like a goldfinch,\nOr any peacock gay;\nSo, dearest Jen, if you'll be mine,\nLet us appoint the day.'"

Jenny replies—\n'Cherry-pie is very nice, And so is currant-wine; But I must wear my plain brown gown, And never go too fine.'"

Jefni. i.e. Jai falli (Lapis ruus ; I have failed), an omission or oversight, in a law proceeding. There are several statutes of Jefni for the remedy of slips or mistakes.

Jeopardy (3 syl.). Hazard, danger. Tyrwhitt says it is the French jeu parti, and Frosart uses the phrase, "Si vous les voyons à jeu parti!" (vol. i. c. 244). Jeu parti is a game where the chances are exactly balanced, hence a critical state.

Jereed. A javelin with which the Easterns exercise. (Turkish and Arabic.)

Jerem'had (4 syl.). A pitiful tale, a tale of woe to produce compassion; so called from the "Lamentations" of the prophet Jeremiah.

Jeremiah, derived from "Cucumber." The joke is this: King Jeremiah = Jeve'-king, contracted in Jer'-kin, or gher-kin, and gherkin is a young cucumber.

The British Jeremiah. Gibbon so calls Gildas, author of Lamentations over the Destruction of Britain (516-670).

Jeremy Diddler. An adept at raising money on false pretences. From Kenny's farce called Runaway the Wind.

Jeremy Twitcher. A cunning, treacherous highwayman, in Gay's Beggar's Opera. Lord Sandwich, a member of the New Kit Kat Club, was so called in 1705.

Jericho. Gone to Jericho. No one knows where. The manor of Blackmore, near Chelmsford, was called Jericho, and was one of the houses of pleasure of Henry VIII. When this lascivious prince had a mind to be lost in the embraces of his courtiers, the cant phrase among his courtiers was "He is gone to Jericho." Hence, a place of concealment.

Go to Jericho with you. I wish he had been at Jericho. A euphemistic turn of phrase for "Go and hang yourself," or something more offensive still. This saying is derived from 2 Sam. x. 5 and 1 Chron. xix. 5.

1 And the king said, Tarry at Jericho until your beard be grown.

I wish you were at Jericho, Anywhere out of my way. (See above.)

Jerked [beef], a corruption of the Peruvian word charqui, meat cut into strips and dried in the sun to preserve it. (See Mayne Reid's novels.)

Jerkin. A short coat or jacket; a close waistcoat.

"Master, line, is not this my jerkin? Now is the jerkin under the line."—Shakespeare: The Tempest, iv. 1.

Jeroboam of Rum or Claret (A). Eight bottles; but of whisky three pints. Probably a perversion of "joram." (See Tapit-Hen and Jeroboam.)

"Some 'jeroboams' of very old rum went at 6s. each; seven 'tapit-hens,' of rum fetched 8s. and some 'magnums,' 15s. each."—Truth, March 13, 1867.

A magnun = 2 quart bottles; a tapit-hen = 2 magnuns; a jeroboam = 2 tapit-hens; and a rehoboam = 16 quart bottles.

Jerome (St.). Generally represented as an aged man in a cardinal's dress, writing or studying, with a lion seated beside him. The best painting of this saint is The Communion of St. Jerome, by Domenichino, in the Vatican. It is placed opposite Raphael's Transfiguration.

Jeronimo. The chief character in the Spanish Tragedy by Thomas Kyd. On finding his application to the king ill-timed, he says to himself, "Go be Jeronimo," which tickled the fancy of the audience so that it became for a time the current street jest.

Jerry-built, unsubstantial. A "jerry-builder" is a speculative builder who runs up cheap, unsubstantial houses, using materials of the commonest kind. (See Jury Mast.)

Jerry-shop, or a Tom and Jerry Shop. A low-class beer-house. Probably the Tom and Jerry was a public-house sign when Pierce Egan's Life in London was popular.

Jerry Sneak. A hen-pecked husband, from a celebrated character in Foote's farce of the Mayor ofwater.

Jerrymander. (See Gerrymander.)

Jersey is Cesar's-say—i.e. Caesar's island, so called in honour of Julius Caesar.

Jerusalem, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, means London. (Part i. verse 86, etc.)

Jerusalem Artichoke. A corruption of Gvrasole arctioes. Girasole is the sunflower, which this vegetable resembles both in leaf and stem.

"It hath been prophesied to me many years, I should not die but in Jerusalem."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., iv. 5.

* Pope Silvester II. was told the same thing, and he died as he was saying mass in a church so called. (Bacon: Townshend.)

The Lower House of Convocation now meets in the Jerusalem Chamber. The Upper House meets at Mr. Hodgson's, in Dean's Yard, Westminster.

The crusaders, encamped on the plains of Tortosa, chose Godfrey for their chief, and Alandine, King of Jerusalem, made preparations of defence. The overtures of Argantos to Godfrey being declined, he declared war in the name of the king of Egypt. The Christian army having reached Jerusalem, the king of Tamascon sent Armid a to beguile the Christians; she told an artful tale by which she drew off several of the most puissant. It was found that Jerusalem could never be taken without the aid of Rinaldo; but Rinaldo had withdrawn from the army, because Godfrey had cited him to answer for the death of Girofle, slain in a duel. Godfrey, being informed that the hero was dailying with Armida in the enchanted island, sent to invite him back to the army; he returned, and Jerusalem was taken in a night attack. As for Armida, after setting fire to her palace, she fled into Egypt, and offered to marry any knight who slew Rinaldo; but when she found the Christian army was successful, she fled from the field. The love of Rinaldo returned: he pursued her and she relented. The poem concludes with the triumphant entry of the Christian army into the Holy City, and their devotions at the tomb of the Redeemer. The two chief episodes are the loves of Oliudo (q.v.) and Sophronia, and of Tancred (q.v.) and Corinna.

Jerusalem Pony. A needy clergyman or minister, who renders temporary aid to his brother ministers for hire; so called in humorous discourtesy. The Jerusalem pony is a large species of donkey.
Jew

Jess (pl. Jesses). A short strap of leather tied about the legs of a hawk to hold it on the fist. Hence a bond of affection, etc.

"If I prove her haggard,
Though that her Jesses were my dear heart-strings,
I'd whistle her off."

Shakespeare: Othello, iii. 8.

Jessamy Bride is Mary Horneck, with whom Oliver Goldsmith fell in love in 1769.

Jesse Tree. In Christian art, a vine tracing the genealogy of Christ, called a "rod out of the stem of Jesse" (Isa. xi. 1). Jesse is generally represented in a recumbent position, and the vine is made to rise out of his loins.

Jesse Window (A). A stained-glass window representing Jesse recumbent, and a tree shooting from him containing the pedigree of Jesus.

Jea'edia. The Jew's daughter in the Merchant of Venice, by Shakespeare.

Jesters. (See Fools.)

Jeu'uit (3 syl.). When Ignatius de Loyola was asked what name he would give his order, he replied, "We are a little battalion of Jesus!" so it was called the "Society of Jesus," vulgarised into Jesuits. The society was noted for its learning, political influence, and "pious frauds." The order was driven from France in 1594, from England in 1604, from Venice in 1606, from Spain in 1707, from Naples in 1768; and in 1773 was suppressed by Pope Clement XIV.; but it revived again, and still exists. The word is used by controversialists to express one who "lies like truth," or palters with us in a double sense, that "keeps the word of promise to our ear, and breaks it to our hope."

Jesus Paper. Paper of very large size, chiefly used for engravings. Originally it was stamped with the initials I.H.S. (q.v.).

Jet. So called from the River Gages, in Asia Minor, on the banks of which it was collected by the ancients. It was originally called gagates, corrupted into gagat, jet.

Jet d'Eau (French). A spout or jet of water thrown up into the air, generally from an artificial fountain. The great jet at Versailles rises to a height of 100 feet; that at Chatsworth, the highest in existence, to 267 feet. (French, from the Latin jactus, thrown; jactio, to throw.)

Jetsam or Jetson. Goods cast into the sea to lighten a ship. (French, jeter, to cast out.) (See FLOTSAM and LIGAN.)

Jettator. One with an evil eye, who always brings ill-luck. The opposite of the Mascotte (q.v.), who with a "good eye" always brings good fortune.

The opera called La Mascotte. (1663, by Durce and Chivot.)

Jettatura. The evil-eyed.

"Their stance, if you meet it, is the jettatura, or evil-eye."—Mrs. Gaskell: An Accursed Race.

Jeu d'Esprit (French). A witicism.

Jeu de Mot. A pun; a play on some word or phrase. (French.)

Jeunesse Dorée. The "gilded youth" of a nation; that is, the rich and fashionable young unmarried men.

"The re were three of the Jeunesse dorée, and, as such, were pretty well known to the ladies who promenade the grand circle."—T. Terri: Lady Delmar, ix.

(1) Said to be Khartaphilos, Pilate's porter. When the officers were dragging Jesus out of the hall, Khartaphilos struck Him with his fist in the back, saying: "Go quicker, Man: go quicker!" Whereupon Jesus replied, "I indeed go quickly; but thou shalt tarry till I come again." This man afterwards became a Christian, and was baptised under the name of Joseph. Every 100 years he falls into an ecstasy, out of which he rises again at the age of thirty.

The earliest account of the "Wandering Jew" is in the Book of the Chronicles of the Abbey of St. Albans. This tradition was continued by the Jews of Paris in 1229. In 1522 Philip Monseux, afterwards Bishop of Tournai, wrote the Rhymed Chronicle.

(2) Ahasuerus, a cobbler, who dragged Jesus before Pilate. As the Man of Sorrows was going to Calvary, weighed down with His cross, He stayed to rest on a stone near the man's door, when Ahasuerus pushed Him away, saying, "Away with you; here you shall not rest." The gentle Jesus replied, "I truly go away, and go to rest; but thou shalt walk, and never rest till I come." This is the legend given by Paul von Reisen, bishop of Schwerin (1847) (See Genres: Memoirs of Paul von Reisen (1744)).

(3) In German legend, the "Wandering Jew" is associated with John&quot;Buttadens, seen at Antwerp in the thirteenth century; again, in the fifteenth; and again, in the sixteenth century. His last appearance was in 1774, at Brussels.

Leonard Doldius, of Nürnberg, in his Praxis Alchymiae (1661), says that Ahasuerus is sometimes called Buttades.
Jew's-eye. Worth a Jew's-eye. According to fable, this expression arose from the custom of torturing Jews to extort money from them. The expedition of King John is well known: He demanded 10,000 marks of a rich Jew of Bristol; the Hebrew resisted the exaction, but the tyrant ordered him to be brought before him, and that one of his teeth should be tugged out every day till the money was forthcoming. This went on for seven days, when the sufferer gave in, and John jestingly observed, "A Jew's eye may be a quick ransom, but Jew's teeth give the richer harvest."

Lancelot, in the Merchant of Venice, ii. 5, puns upon this phrase when he says to Jessica:

"There will come a Christian by Will be worth a Jewess' eye."

The best players on this instrument have been Koch, a Prussian soldier under Frederick the Great; Kuwert, Amstein, and some others.

Jew's Myrtle. So called from the popular notion that it formed the crown of thorns placed by the Jews on the Saviour's head.

Jews, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, those English who were loyal to Charles II., called David.

"The Jew, a headstrong, moody, murmuring race, God's pampered people, whom, debauched with ease, No king could govern, nor tugged could please."

Jews born with tails. (See RABOIN.)

Jews' Sabbath. In the Monasticion de Melse, ii. pp. 134, 137, we read that a Jew at Tewkesbury fell into a cesspool, and Richard, Earl of Gloucester, passing by, offered to pull him out, but the Jew refused, saying—

"Sabbato nostra colo; De usteore surgere nole."

Next day, as the Earl was passing again, the Jew cried to him for help, when Gloucester replied—

"Sabbato nostra quietem, Solomum, celebriams imdem."

Jewels in heraldry. The topaz represents "or" (gold), or the planet Sol.

The pearl or crystal represents "argent" (silver), or the planet Luna.

The ruby represents "gules" (red), or the planet Mars.

The sapphire represents "azure" (blue), or the planet Jupiter.

The diamond represents "sable" (black), or the planet Saturn.

The emerald represents "vert" (green), or the planet Venus.

The amethyst represents "purpure" (purple), or the planet Mercury.

Jewels for the months. Each month is supposed to be under the influence of some precious stone:

February: Amethyst. Sincerity.
April: Diamond. Innocence.
May: Emerald. Success in love.
June: Agate. Health and long life.
July: Cornelian. Content.
August: Sardonyx. Conjugal fidelity.
September: Chrysolite. Antidote to madness.
October: Opal. Hope.
November: Topaz. Fidelity.
December: Turquoise. Prosperity.

Jewels for signs of the zodiac—
Aries: Ruby.
Taurus: Topaz.
Gemini: Carbuncle.
Cancer: Emerald.
Leo: Sapphire.
Virgo: Diamond.
Libra: Jacinth.
Scorpio: Agate.
Sagittarius: Amethyst.
Capricornus: Beryl.
Aquarius: Unyx.
Pisces: Jasper.

Jez'ebel. A painted Jezebel. A flaunting woman of bold spirit, but loose morals; so called from Queen Jezebel, the wife of Ahab.

Jib. A triangular sail borne in front of the foremost. It has the bowprit for a base in small vessels, and the jib-boom in larger ones, and exerts an important effect, when the wind is a beam, in throwing the ship's head to leeward.

Jib. The under-lip. A sailor's expression; the under-lip indicating the temper, as the jib indicates the character of a ship.

The cut of his jib. A sailor's phrase, meaning the expression of a person's face. Sailors recognise vessels at sea by the cut of the jibs.

To hang the jib. The jib means the lower lip. To hang the lower lip is to look ill-tempered, or annoyed.

Jib (To). To start aside; a "jibbing horse" is one that is easily startled. It is a sea term, to jib being to shift the boomail from one side of the mast to the other.

Jib-boom. An extension of the bowsprit by the addition of a spar projecting beyond it. Sometimes the boom is further extended by another spar called the flying jib-boom.

Jib-door. A door flush with the outside wall, and intended to be concealed; forming thus part of the jib or face of the house. (See above, line 8.)

Jib-stay (A). The stay on which a jib is set.

Jib Topsail (A). A light sail flying from the extreme forward end of the flying-jib boom, and set about half-way between the mast and the boom.

Jiffy. In a jiffy. In a minute; in a brace of shakes; before you can say "Jack Robinson." (French, rif, tife.)

Jig, from pigme. A short piece of music much in vogue in olden times, of a very lively character, either six-eight or twelve-eight time, and used for dance tunes. It consists of two parts, each of eight bars. Also a comic song.

Jilt (To). (See under Basket.) To give the basket.

Jim Crow. Brought out at the Adelphi in 1836. The character of Jim Crow played by T. D. Rice, as the original of the "nigger minstrels" since so popular. A renegade or turncoat is called a Jim Crow, from the burden of the song, "Wheel about and turn about.

Jingo. By Jingo or By the Living Jingo. Basque "Jainko," the Supreme Being. In corroboration of this derivation it may be stated that Edward I. had Basque mountaineers conveyed to England to take part in the conquest of Wales, and the Plantagenets held the Basque provinces in possession. The word was certainly used as a jargon long before the Crimean War.

"Hey, Jingo! What the devil's the matter? Be 'mercy's swim in Dartford water?"

Nestle: Acanthus (or The Original Horn Fair)

"Dr. Morse, in his Historic Outlines (p. 210 note), says it is St. Gimalithus, and Professor Smith (Notes and Queries, August 12th, 1884, p. 140) is of the same opinion. According to The Times, June 25th, 1877, it is the Persian "jing-a war, and the jirun "Be St. Jingo" is about equal to "By Mars." But the word had originally no connection with our jingoism. It was common enough in the early part of the nineteenth century. A corruption of Jesus, Son of God, thus: Je-nmpv.

Jingoism. The British war braggadocio; called Chauvinism in French; Spread-eagleism in the United States of North America. During the Russo-Turkish War in 1877-1878 England was on the point of interfering, and at the music-hall song became popular containing the following refrain:

"We don't want to fight; but, by Jingo, if we do, We've got the ships, we've got the men, and got the money too."

Jinn. A sort of fairies in Arabian mythology, the offspring of fire. They propagate their species like human beings, and are governed by a race of kings named Suleyman, one of whom "built the pyramids." Their chief abode is the mountain Ka'if, and they appear to men under the forms of serpents, dogs, cats, monsters, or even human beings, and become invisible at pleasure. The evil jinn are hideously ugly, but the good are exquisitely beautiful. According to fable, they were created from fire two thousand years before Adam was made of earth. The singular of jinn is jinnic. (See Fairy.)

Jin'istan. The country of the Jinn, or Fairy Land, the chief province of which is The Country of Delight, and the capital The City of Jewels.

Joachim (St.). The father of the Virgin Mary. Generally represented as an old man carrying in a basket two turtle-doves, in allusion to the offering made for the purification of his daughter. His wife was St. Anne, or St. Anna.
Joan (Pope). A supposed female "pope" between Leo IV. and Benedict III. She is said to have been born in England and educated at Cologne, passing under the name of Joanna Anglicus (John of England). Blondel, a Calvinist, wrote a book in 1640 to prove that Joa such person ever occupied the papal chair; but at least a hundred and fifty authors between the thirteenth and seventeenth centuries repeat the tale as an historic fact. The last person who critically examined the question was Döllinger, in 1868. (See Historic Note Book, 701-2, for authorities pro and con.)

Joan Cromwell. John Cromwell's kitchen-stuff tub. A tub of kitchen perquisites. The flichings of servants sold for "market pennies." The Royalists used to call the Protector's wife, whose name was Elizabeth, Joan Cromwell, and declared that she exchanged the kitchen-stuff of the palace for fellow candles.

Joan of Arc or Jeanne la Pucelle. M. Octave Delpeyrre has published a pamphlet, called Dame Historique, to deny the tradition that Joan of Arc was burnt at Rouen for sorcery. He cites a document discovered by Father Vignier in the seventeenth century, in the archives of Metz, to prove that she became the wife of Sieur des Armoise, with whom she resided at Metz, and became the mother of a family. Vignier subsequently found in the family monument-chest the contract of marriage between "Robert des Armoise, knight, and Jeanne D'Arcy, named the Maid of Orleans." In 1740 there were found in the archives of the Maison de Ville (Orleans) records of several payments to certain messengers from Joan to her brother John, bearing the dates 1435, 1436. There is also the entry of a presentation from the council of the city to the Maid, for her services at the siege (dated 1439). M. Delpeyrre has brought forward a host of other documents to corroborate the same fact, and show that the tale of her martyrdom was invented to throw odium on the English. A sermon is preached annually in France towards the beatification of the Maid, who will eventually become the patron saint of that nation, and Shakespeare will prove a long prophet in the words—

"No longer at St. Denis will we cry,
But Joan la Pucelle shall be France's saint."

Joannes Hagustaldensis is John, Prior of Hexham, author of an Old English Chronicle, and Lives of the Bishops of Hexham, in two books.

Job (o long). The personification of poverty and patience. "Patient as Job," in allusion to the patriarch whose history is given in the Bible.

Poor as Job. Referring to the patriarch when he was by Satan deprived of all his worldly possessions.

"I am as poor as Job, my lord, but not so patient."—Shakespeare: Henry IV., i. 2.

Job's Comforther. One who pretends to sympathise in your grief, but says that you brought it on yourself; thus in reality adding weight to your sorrow. (See above.)

Job's wife. Some call her Rahmat, daughter of Ephraim, son of Joseph; and others call her Makhir, daughter of Manasses. (Sal: Korâd xxii., note.)

She is also called by some Sitis; and a tradition exists that Job, at the command of God, stuck the earth with his foot from the dunghill where he lay, and instantly there welled up a spring of water with which his wife washed his sores, and they were miraculously healed. (Korâd, xxxvi. 41.)

Job's Pound. Bridewell; prison.

Job (o short). A job is a piece of chance work; a public work or office not for the public benefit, but for the profit of the person employed; a sudden blow or "dig" into one.

A bad job. An unsuccessful work; one that brings loss instead of profit; a bad speculation.

To do the job for one. To kill him.

Job (o short). A ministerial job. Sheridan says:—"Whenever any emolument, profit, salary, or honour is conferred on any person not deserving it—that is a job; if from private friendship, personal attachment, or any view except the interest of the public, anyone is appointed to any public office ... that is a job."

"No check is known to blinche, or heart to throb, Save when they lose a question on a job."
—Pope: Essay on Criticism, i. 101

Job Lot (A). A lot of miscellaneous goods to be sold a bargain.

Jobs. A printer's phrase to designate all kinds of work not included in the term "book-work." The French call such work ouvrage de ville.

"Allied to the Latin, o[p*ras*]; Spanish, *ob*ra[fa]; French, ouvrage; the r occurs in the genitive case, opér[es]."

Job (To). To strike. To give one a "job in the eye" is to give one a blow in the eye; and to "job one in the ribs" is to strike one in the ribs, to stab one in the ribs. Job and probe seem to be very nearly allied. Halliwell gives the word "stop," to poke or thrust, which is allied to stab.

Jobation. A scolding; so called from the patriarch Job.

"Jobation .... means a long, dreary homily, and has reference to the tedious reproofs inflicted on the patriarch Job by his too obliging friends."—G. A. Sala: (Brassai), Sept. 6, 1884.

Jobber. One who does small jobs; one who buys from merchants to sell to retailers; a middle-man. A "stock-jobber" is one who buys and sells public funds, but is not a sworn stockbroker.

Jobbing Carpenter. One who is ready to do odd jobs (piece-work) in his own line. (See Job.)

Jocelin de Brakelond, de Rebus gestis Saxonum, etc., published by the Camden Society. This record of the acts of Abbot Samson of Edmondsbury contains much contemporary history, and gives a good account of English life and society between 1173 and 1292.

Jockey is a little Jack (boy). So in Scotch, "Ilka Joanie has her Jockie." (See Jack.)

All fellows, jockey and the Laird (man and master). (Scottish proverb.)

Jockey (Th.). To deceive in trade; to cheat; to indulge in sharp practice.

Jockey of Norfolk. Sir John Howard, a firm adherent of Richard III. On the night before the battle of Bosworth he found in his tent the warning couplet:

"Jockey of Norfolk, be not too bold,
For Dickon, thy master, is bought and sold."

Joe or a Joe Miller. A stale joke; so called from the compilation of jokes under that nom de plume. (See Miller.)

Joey. A grunt; so called from Joseph Hume, M.P., who strongly recommended the coinage for the sake of paying short cab-fares, etc. (Huxley: History of the Silver Coinage of England.)

Jog. Jog away; jog off; jog on. Get away; be off; keep moving. Shakespeare uses the word shog in the same sense—as, "Will you shog off?" (Henry V., ii. 1); and again in the same play, "Shall we shog?" (ii. 3). Beaumont and Fletcher use the same expression in The Corcorb—"Come, prithee, let us shog off!" and again, in Pasquill and Katharine—"Thus it shogges" [goes]. In the Morte d'Arthur we have another variety—"He shokkes in sharpeley" [rushes in]. The words seem to be connected with the Dutch schokken, to jolt, and the Anglo-Saxon seccan, to depart, to flee.

"Jog on a little faster, prithee, I'll take a nap and then be with thee."

—R. L. Leete: The Hare and the Tortoise.

To jog his memory, or Give his memory a jog. To remind one of something apparently forgotten. Jog is to shake or stir up. (Welsh, gogi, to shake; French, choker; our shock, shake, etc.)

Jog-trot. A slow but regular pace.

Joggis or Joggis. The pillory. Jamie- son says, "They punish delinquents, making them stand in 'joggis,' as they call their pillories." (The word is Yoke: Latin, jugum; French, joug; Anglo-Saxon, geoc; our jogy, a jail.)

"Frome une whom Sabotha dace in yo jogisis."

—Glen: History of Dumbarlan.

John. A contraction of Johannes (Joh'n). The French contract it differently, Jean—i.e., Johan or Johah; in Italian, Giovanni.

Popes.

John I. died wretchedly in jail.
John II. and III. were none too happy.
John IV. was assassinated by heresy.
John V. VI. VII. were none too happy.
John VIII. was imprisoned by Lambert, Duke of Spoleto; at a subsequent period he was dressed in female attire out of mockery, and was at last hanged.
John IX. had SYNCHRO HII, for a rival Pope.
John X. was overthrown by Gui. Duke of Tus- can, and died in prison.
John XI. was imprisoned with his mother by Albert, and died there.
John XII. was deposed for sacrilege, and was at last assassinated.
John XIII. was imprisoned by his nobles and deposed.
John XIV. was deposed, and died imprisoned in the Castle of St. Angelo, of a morbidness.
John XVI. was driven from Rome by Cres- centius.
John XVII. (antipope) was expelled by Otto III., and barbarously treated by Gregory.
John XVII. excommunicated.
John XIX. was deposed and expelled by Conrad.
John XX. was a moribund.
John XXI. was excommunicated.
John XXII. was charged with heresy.
John XXIII. died in disgrace, was arrested, and cast into prison for three years.

Certainly a disastrous list of Popes.

John. A proverbially unlucky name with royalty, inasmuch that when John Stuart ascended the throne of Scotland he changed his name to Robert; but misfortune never deserted him, and after an evil reign he died overwhelmed with calamities and infirmity. John Baliau was the mere tool of Edward I.; John of England, a most disastrous reign. John I. of France reigned only a few days; John II., having lost the battle of Poitiers, died in captivity in London; to France his reign was a tissue of evils. John of Bohemia was slain at Cressy. John I. of Aragon was at ceaseless war with his subjects, by whom he was executed; John II. was at ceaseless war with his son, Don Carlos. John I. of Constantinople was poisoned by Basil, his eunuch: John IV. had his eyes put out; John V. was emperor in name only, and was most unhappy: John VI., harassed with troubles, abdicated, and died in a monastery.

"John I. of Sweden was unhappy in his expeditions, and died childless; John II. had his wife driven out of the kingdom by his angry subjects. Jean sans Peur of Burgundy engaged in the most horrible massacres and was murdered. John of Stauiba, called the Parricide, because he murdered his father Albert, after which he was a fugitive and a vagabond on the face of the earth, etc., etc.

N.B. John of Portugal was a signal exception. Iran I., of Russia, surnamed the "Terrible" (1328-1584). He murdered with his own hand his eldest son; Ivan V. (1606-1636) was dumb and nearly blind; Ivan VI. (1737-1762) was dethroned, imprisoned, and put to death. (See Jane.)

King John and the Abbot of Canterbury, John, being jealous of the state kept by the abbot, declared he should be put to death unless he answered three questions. The first question was, how much the king was worth: the second, how long it would take to ride round the world; and the third, what the king was thinking of. The king gave the abbot three weeks' grace for his answers. A shepherd undertook to answer the three questions, so with crozier, nitre, rochet, and cope, he presented himself before the king. "What am I worth?" asked John. "Well," was the reply, "the Saviour was sold for thirty pence, and your majesty is a penny worse than He." The king laughed, and demanded what he had to say to the next question, and the man replied, "If you rise with the sun and ride with the sun, you will get round the world in a day." Again the king was satisfied, and demanded that the respondent should tell him his thoughts. "You think I am the abbot of Canterbury, but I am only a poor shepherd who am come to ask your majesty's pardon for him and me." The king was so pleased with the jest, that he would have made the shepherd abbot of Canterbury; but the man pleaded that he could neither write nor read, whereupon the king dismissed him, and gave him a pension of four nobles a week. (Percy: Reliques, series 2, bk. iii. 6.)

Prester John. The supposed Christian king and priest of a medieval kingdom in the interior of Asia. This Prester John was the Khan Ung who was deposed and slain by Genghis Khan in 1202, said to have been converted by the Nestorian Christians. He figures in Ariosto, and has furnished materials for a host of medieval legends.

"I will fetch you a tooth-picker now from the farthest inch of Asia; bring you the length of Prester John's foot: fetch you a hair off the great Chian's beard . . . ."

Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing, ii. 1.

The three Johns—an alehouse picture in Little Park Street, Westminster, and in White Lion Street, Pontonville—is John Wilkes between the Rev. John Horne Tooke and Sir John Glynn (serjeant-at-law). (Hotten: History of Signboards.)

St. John the Evangelist is represented writing his gospel; or bearing a chalice, from which a serpent issues, in allusion to his driving the poison from a cup presented to him to drink. He is sometimes represented in a cauldron of boiling oil, in allusion to the tradition of his being plunged into such a cauldron before his banishment to the Isle of Patmos.

St. John. The usual war-cry of the English of the North in their encounters with the Scotch. The person referred to is St. John of Beverley, in Yorkshire, who died 721.

John-a-Dreams. A stupid, dreamy fellow, always in a brown study and half asleep.

"Yet I.

A dull and muddle-headed muddle, peak,
Like John-a-dreams, unpregnant of my cause,
And can say nothing."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, ii. 2.

John-a-Dwynas. A foolish character in Whetstone's Promos and Cassandra (1578). Being seized by informers, he stands dazed, and suffers himself to be quietly cheated out of his money.

John-a-Nokes [or Noakes (1 syl.)].

A simpleton.

"John-a-Nokes was driving a cart toward Crowdon, and by the way fell asleep therein. Mean time a good fellow came by and robbed away his two horses. [John] awakening and missing them, said, 'Either I am John-a-Nokes or I am not John-a-Nokes. If I am John-a-Nokes, then I have lost two horses; and if I am not John-a-Nokes, then I have found a cart.'—Copley: Wits, Fubs, and Fancies (1614).
John Anderson, my Jo. This song, like "Green Sleeves and Pudding Pies," "Maggy Lauder" and some others, were invectives against the Catholic clergy about the time of the Reformation. The first verse refers to their luxurious habits:—

"John Anderson, my Jo, aim in as ye can bye,
And ye sall get a sheep's head well baken in a pie.
Well baken in a pie, and the haggis in a pat;
John Anderson, my Jo, cum in, and ze's get that."

Another verse refers to the seven sacraments or "Seven hairns of Mother Church."

John Audley. Is John Audley there? Get done as soon as possible, for there are persons sufficient for another audience. John Audley was a noted showman and actor; when his platform was full, he taught the ticket collector to poke his head behind the green curtain, and cry out: "Is John Audley there?" This was a signal to the actors to draw their piece to a close, and clear the house as quickly as possible. Audley taught this trick to Richardson.

John Bull. The national nickname for an Englishman, represented as a bluff, kindhearted, bull-headed farmer. The character is from a satire by Dr. Arbuthnot. In this satire the Frenchman is termed Lewis Baboon, the Dutchman Nicholas Pig, etc.

John Bull. A comedy by George Colman. Job Thurlowberry is the chief character.

John Chinaman. Either a Chinese or the Chinese as a people.

John Company. Colonel Harold Maitland in Votes and Quisines, August 6th, 1892, p. 116, says that "John" is a perversion of "Hon.," and John Company is the Hon. Company. No doubt Hon., like Haus, may be equal to John, but probably John Company is alluded to the familiar John Bull. The Company was abolished in 1857, in consequence of the Indian Mutiny.

"In old times 'John Company' employed four thousand men in its warehouses."—Old and New London, ii. 163.

John Doe. At one time used in law pleadings for an hypothetical plaintiff: the supposititious defendant being "Richard Roe." These fictions are not now used.

John Dory is technically called Zeus faber, common in the Mediterranean Sea and round the south-western coasts of England. A corruption of jaus adorib is the adorable or sacred yellow fish.

The only interest of this creature in a work like the Dictionary of Phrase and Fable is the tradition that it was the fish from which St. Peter took the stater. Hence it is called in French to poisson de St. Pierre, and in Gascon, the golden or sacred cock, meaning St. Peter's cock. Like the haddock, it has a remarkable oval black spot on each side, said to be the finger-marks of St. Peter, when he held the fish to extract the coin. As neither the haddock nor dory can live in fresh water, of course this tradition is only an idle tale.

John Dory. A piratical French captain, conquered by Nicholl, a Cornishman.

"John Dory bought him an ambuscade nap,
To pour it into his cap—"
Corbett: A Journey to France, p. 129.

John Long. To wait for John Long, the currier. To wait a long time; to wait for John, who keeps us a long time.

John Roberts (A). An enormous tankard holding enough drink for any ordinary drinker to last through Saturday and Sunday. This measure was introduced into Wales in 1886 to compensate topers for the Sunday closing, and derived its name from John Roberts, M.P., author of the Sunday Closing Act. (Standards, March 11th, 1886.)

John Thomas. A generic name for a finger; or footman with large calves and bushy whiskers.

John Drum's Entertainment. Hauling a man by his ears and thrusting him out by the shoulders. The allusion is to "drumming" a man out of the army. There is a comedy so called, published 1601.

"When your briskship sees the bottom of his success in 'k... if you give him not John Drum's entertainment, your meaning cannot be intended"—Shakespeare: All's Well That Ends Well, ii. 8.

John in the Wad. A Will-o'-Wisp. A wad is a wisp, and John or Jack is a name for any inferior person unknown. (See Jack.)

John of Bruges (1 syl.). John van Eyck, the Flemish painter (1370-1441).

John o' Groat, with his two brothers Malcolm and Gavin, came from Holland in the reign of James IV. of Scotland, and purchased the lands of Warre and Dungisbay. In process of time their families increased, and there came to be eight families of the same name.
They lived together amicably, and met once a year in the original house; but on one occasion a question of precedence arose, which was to go out first, and who was to take the head of the table. John o' Groats promised them the next time they came he would contrive to satisfy them all. Accordingly he built an eight-sided room, with a door and window in each side, and placed a round oak table in the room. This building went ever after with the name of John o' Groats's House. The site of this house is the Berubium of Ptolemy, in the vicinity of Duncansby Head.

"Hear, land o'cakes and brother Scots, Fife Maldenkirk to Johnny Groats's... A child's among you takin' notes. And, faith, he'll rent it." Burns: Captain Grose.

John of Hexham. An English historical writer, twelfth century.

John of Leyden (the prophet), being about to marry Bertha, met with three Anabaptists who observed a strong likeness in him to a picture of David in Munster cathedral. They entered into conversation with him, and finding him apt for their purpose, induced him to join their rebellion. The rebels took the city of Munster, and John was crowned "ruler of Westphalia." His mother met him in the street, and John disclaimed all knowledge of her; but subsequently visited her in prison, and obtained her forgiveness. When the emperor arrived with his army, John's Anabaptist friends deserted him, and "the prophet," setting fire to the banquet-room of his palace, perished with his mother in the flames. (Meyerbeer: Le Prophète [an opera].)

His real name was John Bockhold.

John the Almouer. Chrysostom was so called, because he bestowed so large a portion of his revenues on hospitals and other charities. (347-407.)

John the Baptist. Patron saint of missionaries. He was sent "to prepare the way of the Lord."

"In Christian art he is represented in a coat of sheepskins, in allusion to his life in the desert; either holding a rude wooden cross, with a penmon bearing the words, Acer Agnus Dei, or with a book on which a lamb is seated; or holding in his right hand a lamb surrounded by a halo, and bearing a cross on the right foot.

John Tamson's Man, a henpecked husband; one ordered here, and ordered there, and ordered everywhere." Tamson—i.e., spiritless, the slave even of a Tamson.

"'The doll's in the wife!' said Cuddle. 'Dye think I am to be John Tamson's man, and milled by a woman at the days of my life?'—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. xxxix.

John with the Leaden Sword. The Duke of Bedford, who acted as regent for Henry VI. in France, was so called by Earl Douglas.

Johnnie. British bourgeois. Byron, February 23rd, 1824, writes to Murray his publisher respecting an earthquake:

"If you had but seen the English Joannes, who had never been out of a cockney workshop before... [running away...]."

Johnny Crapaud. A Frenchman, so called by the English sailors in the long Napoleon contest. The ancient Flemings used to call the French "Crapaud Franchos." In allusion to the toads borne originally in the arms of France.

Johnny Raw. A Verdant Green: a newly-enlisted soldier; an adult apprentice in the ship-trade.

"The impulse given to ship-building by the continental war, induced employers to take persons as apprentices who had already passed their majority. This class of men-apprentices, generally from remote towns, were called 'Johnny Raws' by the fraternity."—C. Thomson: Anobiography, b. 3.

Johnson (Dr. Samuel) lived in Fleet Street—first in Fetter Lane, then in Boswell Court, then in Gough Square, then in the Inner Temple Lane for seven years, then in Johnson's Court (No. 7) for ten years; and lastly in Bolt Court (No. 8), where he died eight years after. The coffee-house he most frequented was the Mitre tavern in Fleet Street, and not that which has assumed the name of "Dr. Johnson's Coffee-house." The church he frequented was St. Clement Danes in the Strand.

Johnstone. The crest of this family is a winged spur, or spur between two wings, lathered, with the motto, "Veni, quam nun purdatus." When King Edward I. was meditating treachery in favour of Balliol, Johnstone sent to Bruce (then in England) a spur with a feather tied to it. Bruce took the hint and fled, and when he became king conferred the crest on the Johnstone family.

Johnstone's Tippet (N.): A halter.

Join the Majority. (See Majority.)

Joint. The times are out of joint. The times are disquiet and unruly. If the body is out of joint it cannot move easily, and so is it with the body corporate.
Jolly. A sailor's nickname for a marine, who, in his opinion, bears the same relation to a "regular" as a jollyboat or yawl does to a ship. (Danish, jolle, a yawl.)

Jolly God (The). Bacchus. The Bible speaks of wine which "maketh glad the heart of man." Here "jolly" means jovial.

Jolly Good Fellow (A). A very social and popular person. (French, joli.)

"All was jolly quiet at Ephesus before St. Paul came thither."—John Trapp: Commentary (1666).

"For he's a jolly good fellow [three times].
And so see all of us,
With a hif, hif, hif, hoorah!"

Jolly Green. Very simple; easily imposed upon, from being without worldly wisdom.

Jolly Roger (The). (See Roger.)

Jollyboat. A small boat usually hoisted at the stern of a ship. (Danish, jolle; Dutch, jol; Swedish, jolle, u yawl.)

Jonah and the Whale. Mr. Colbert, Professor of Astronomy in Chicago, in a chapter on "Star Grouping," tells us that the whale referred to is the star-group "Cetus," and that Jonah is the "Moon passing through it in three days and nights."

Jonas, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Sir William Jones, Attorney-General, who conducted the prosecution of the Popish Plot (June 25th, 1674); not the great Oriental scholar, who lived 1746-1794. The attorney-general was called in the satire Jonas by a palpable pun.

"Not bull-faced Jonas, who could statues draw To mean rebellion and make treason law."—Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, part 1, 120, 321.

Jonathan. Brother Jonathan. In the revolutionary war, Washington, being in great want of supplies for the army, and having unbounded confidence in his friend, Jonathan Trumbull, governor of Connecticut, said, "We must consult brother Jonathan." Brother Jonathan was consulted on all occasions by the American liberator, and the phrase becoming popular was accepted as the national name of the Americans as a people.

Jonathan and David. In 1 Sam. xviii. 4 we read that Jonathan (the king's son) "stripped himself of his robe and gave it to David, with his sword-bow, and girdle." This was a mark of honour, as princes and sovereigns nowadays strip themselves of a chain or a ring, which they give to one they delight to honour. In 1519 the Sultan Selim, desirous of showing honour to an imam of Constantinople, threw his royal robe over him.

Jonathan's. A noted coffee-house in Change Alley, described in the Tailor as the general mart of stock-jobbers.

* What is now called the Stock Exchange was called Jonathan's.

"Yesterday the brokers and others... came to a resolution that [the new building] instead of being called "New Jonathan's," should be called "The Stock Exchange."... The brokers then collected juniper corns, and christened the house with punch."—Newspaper paragraph (July 15, 1772).

Jonathan's Arrows. They were shot to give warning, and not to hurt. (1 Sam. xx. 36.)

"If the husband would repose his wife, it should be in such a mood as he did admire himself; and his words, like Jonathan's arrows, should be shot, not to hurt, but only to give warning."—Le Fanu: The House in the Churchyard, chap. xix.

Jono (French). A wedding-ring; so called because those who were married by compulsion at Ste. Marine wore rings of jone or straw.

"I'est dans l'église de Ste. Marine que l'on m'a fait voir l'autre jour un prêtre, fier et arrogant, qui se portait avec un air de jones. J'étais avec un jeune homme, qui m'a dit que le prêtre l'avait donné à sa femme parce qu'étant juif il ne pouvait être marié."

* Delancey.

Jones. Etre sur la jone (to be on the straw)—i.e. in prison.

"Plantez aux humbes vos picon: Ta jone au temps les roses dans: Et aussi d'ester sur les jones, Bonnettes en cofre et coules murs: Yvain; Jargon et Jobelin; ballade 1.

Jordan Passed. Death over. Jordan is the Styx of Christian mythology, because it was the river which separated the wilderness [of this world] from the promised land.

"If I still hold closely to Him, What hath He at last? Sorrow vanquished, honour ended, Jordan passed."—John Mason Neale, D.D. (Stephen the Seballete).

Jordelee (3 syll.). Notice given to passengers when dirty water was thrown from chamber windows into the street. Either "Cure de l'eau," or else "Jordel lo!" the mutina being usually called the "Jordan."

"At ten o'clock at night the whole range is flung out of a lack window that looks into some street or lane, and the maid calls 'Gardy loo' to the passers-by."—Smollett: Humphrey Clinker.

The laws has made the Gardy loo out of the wrong window."—Sir W. Scott: Heart of Midlothian.

Jormungandar or Midgarðsormr (i.e. earth's monster). The great serpent, brother of Hela and Fenrir (q.v.), and son of Loki, the spirit of evil. It used to lie at the root of the celestial ash till All-Father cast it into the ocean; it then grew so large that in time it encompassed the whole world, and was for ever biting its own tail.

Josaphat. An Indian prince converted by the hermit Bar'laam, in the Greek religious pastoral entitled Josaphat and Bar'laam, generally ascribed to St. John of Damascus (eighth century).

Joseph (A). One not to be seduced from his continuity by the severest temptation. The reference is to Joseph in Potiphar's house. (Gen. xxxix.) (See BELLEROPHON.)

A joseph. A great coat, so called after Joseph, who wore a garment or coat of many colours.

"At length, Mrs. Bull herself made her appearance, her venerable person, endued with what was then called a Joseph, an ample garment, which had once been green, but now, betwixt state and ladies, had become like the vesture of the patriarch which made it here—a garment of divers colours."—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate, chap. xi.

Joseph (St.). Patron saint of carpenters, because he was of the same craft. This is Joseph, husband of Mary, and the reputed father of Jesus.

In Christian art Joseph is represented as an aged man with a barding staff in his hand.

Joseph Andrews. The hero of a novel written by Fielding to ridicule Richardson's Pamela, whose brother Joseph is supposed to be.

Joseph of Ar'mathe'a brought to Listenise the sanctuairy and also the spear with which Longinus wounded the crucified Saviour. When Sir Balin entered this chamber, which was in the palace of King Pollum, he found it "majestically well light and richly; the bed was arrayed with cloth of gold, the richest that might be thought, and thereby stood a table of clean gold, with four pillars of silver, and upon the table stood the spear strangely wrought." (The History of Prince Arthur, part i, chap. 40.)

Joseph's Coat. (See under COAT.)

Joss. The house-god of the Chinese; every family has its joss. A temple is called a joss-house.

Jossi. Vous êtes orifice, Monsieur Jossi (You are a jeweller, Mr. Jossi). Nothing like leather; great is Diana of the Ephesians; your advice is not disinterested. In Molieres comedy of L'Amour Médéric, a silversmith, by the name of Jossi, being asked the best way of curing a lady pining from love, recommends a handsome present of jewellery. The father replies, "You advise me like a jeweller, Mr. Josse."

Jot. Not a jot. "Jot" is a contraction of iota, called the Logedemonium letter, and the smallest in the alphabet; or the Hebrew yod.

Jotham, in Dryden's satire of Ab-salom and Achitophel, means Savile, Marquis of Halifax. Jotham was the person who uttered the parable of The Trees Choosing a King when the men of Shechem made Abimelech king. (Judges ix.)

Jutunheim (pron. Utn-hime). Giant land. The home or region of the Scandinavian giants or jotuns.

Jour Maigre (French). A day of abstinence, when meat is forbidden to be eaten. (See BANIAN DAYS.)

Jourdain (Monsieur), in Moliere's comedy of Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. He represents a bourgeois placed by wealth in the ranks of gentlemen, and making himself extremely ridiculous by his endeavours to acquire their accomplishments.

Journal. (Latin, diurnum, a daily thing; Welsh, durnod ; Italian, giorno; French, journal, journal, jour, a day.) Applied to newspapers, the word strictly means a daily paper; but the extension of the term to weekly papers is sanctioned by custom.

Journey. A Sabbath-day's journey. The distance between the farthest tents in the wilderness and the tabernacle of Moses, a radius of about a mile; this would make the entire encampment to cover a circumference of six miles.

Journey-weight. The weight of certain parcels of gold in the mint. A journey of gold is fifteen pounds Troy, which is coined into 701 sovereigns, or double that number of half-sovereigns. A journey of silver is sixty pounds Troy, which is coined into 3,960 shillings, or double that number of sixpence, half that number of florins, etc. So called because this weight of coin was at one time esteemed a day's mintage. (French, journée.)

Jouvenne (2 syl). You have been to the fountain of Jouvenne—i.e. You have grown young again. This is a French phrase. Jouvenne is a town of France in the department of Saône-et-Loire, and has a fountain called la fontaine de Jove; but Jouvence means also youth, and la fontaine de jouvence may be rendered "the fountain of youth." The play on the word gave rise to the tradition that whoever drank of this fountain would become young again.

Jove (1 syl.). (See JUPITER.) The Titans made war against Jove, and tried to dethrone him.

"Not stronger were of old the giant crew,
Who sought to pull Jove from royal state;"
Thomson: Castle of Indolence, cant. 1.

Milton, in Paradise Lost, makes Jove one of the fallen angels (i. 512).

Jovial. Merry and sociable, like those born under the planet Jupiter, which astrologers considered the happiest of the natal stars.

"Our jovial star round'd at his birth;"
Shakespeare: Cymbeline, v. 4.

Joy. The seven joys of the Virgin:
(1) The annunciation; (2) the visitation; (3) the nativity; (4) the adoration of the three kings; (5) the presentation in the temple; (6) the discovery of her youthful Son in the midst of the doctors; (7) her assumption and coronation. (See SORROW.)

Joyeuse (2 syl.). Charlemagne's sword, which bore the inscription Decem graces pro'sram custos Carolus; the sword of Guillaume au Court-Nex: anyone's sword. It was buried with Charlemagne. (See SWORDS.)

Joyeuse garde or Garde-Joyeuse. The estate given by King Arthur to Sir Launcelot of the Lake for defending the Queen's honour against Sir Mador.

Juan Fernandez. A rocky island in the Pacific Ocean, off the coast of Chili. Here Alexander Selkirk, a buccaneer, resided in solitude for four years, and his history is commonly supposed to be the basis of Defoe's Robinson Crusoe.

Sailors commonly believe that this island is the scene of Crusoe's adventures: but Defoe distinctly indicates an island on the east coast of South America, somewhere near Dutch Guiana.

Jubal [a trumpet]. The son of Lamech and Adah. He is called the inventor of the lyre and flute (Gen. iv. 19-21).

"Then when he [Jubal] heard the voice of Jubal a lyre, Instructive genius caught the ethereal fire;"
Montgomery: The World Before the Flood, c. 1.

Jubilee (Jewish). The year of jubilee. Every fiftieth year, when land that had passed out of the possession of those to whom it originally belonged was restored to them; all who had been reduced to poverty, and were obliged to let themselves out for hire, were released from bondage; and all debts were cancelled. The word is from jubil (a ram's horn), so called because it was proclaimed with trumpets of rams' horns. (See Leviticus xxv. 11-34, 39-54; and xxvii. 16-24.)

Jubilee (in the Catholic Church). Every twenty-fifth year, for the purpose of granting indulgences. Boniface VIII. instituted it in 1300, and ordered it to be observed every hundred years. Clement VI. reduced the interval to fifty years, Urban IV. to thirty, and Sixtus IV. to twenty-five.

Protestant jubilee, celebrated in Germany in 1517, the centenary of the Reformation.

Shakespeare: Jubilee, held at Stratford-Avon, September 6th, 1769.

Jubilee to commemorate the commencement of the fiftieth year of the reign of George III., October 25th, 1809.

Jubilee to celebrate the close of the Revolutionary War, August 1st, 1814.

1887. The Jubilee to commemorate the fiftieth year of the reign of Queen Victoria.

Judaica (3 syl.). To convert or conform to the doctrines, rites, or manners of the Jews. A Judaising spirit is a desire to convert others to the Jewish religion.

Judaism (3 syl.). The religion of the Jews, or anything else which is special to that people.

Judas, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and 'Tate, was meant for Mr. Fergusson, a Nonconformist. He was ejected in 1662 from his living of Godmersham, in Kent, and afterwards distinguished himself by his political intrigues. He joined the Duke of Monmouth, whom he afterwards betrayed.

Le point de Judas (French). The number thirteen. The Messiah and His twelve disciples made thirteen. And as Judas was the first to die, he was the thirteenth. At the death of the Saviour, the number being reduced to eleven, a twelfth (Matthias) was elected by lot to fill the place of the traitor.

And cried, "So Judas kissed his Master, and said, 'All hail! whom he meant all harm.'" Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI., v. 1.
Judas Slits or Judas Holes. The peep-holes in a prison-door, through which the guard looks into the cell to see if all is right; when not in use, the holes are covered up.

"It was the faint click made by the cover of the 'Judas' as it falls back into the place over the slit where the eyes have been."—The Century; Russian Political Prisons, February, 1880, p. 551.

Judas Tree. A translation of the Latin arbor Judae. The name has given rise to a Greek tradition that it was upon one of these trees that Judas Iscariot hanged himself.

Judas-coloured Hair. Fiery-red. Cain is represented with red hair.

"His very hair is of the dissemblimg colour, something browner than Judas's."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, III. iv. 4.

Jude (St.), in Christian art, is represented with a club or staff, and a carpenter's square, in allusion to his trade.

Judée. La petite Judée (French). The prefecture of police; so called because the bureau is in the Rue de Jerusalem, and those taken there for offences look on the police as their betrayers.

Judge's Black Cap. The judge puts on his black cap (now a three-cornered piece of black silk) when he condemns to death, in sign of mourning. This sign is very ancient. "Haman hasted to his house mourning, having his head covered" (Esther vi. 12). David wept "and had his head covered." (2 Samuel xv. 30). Demosthenes went home with his head covered when insulted by the populace. Darius covered his head on learning the death of his queen. Malcolm says to Macduff in his deep sorrow, "What, man! ne'er pull your hat upon your brows" (Macbeth, iv. 3). And the ancient English, says Fosbroke, "drew their hoods forward over their heads at funerals."

Judges' Robes. In the criminal courts, where the judges represent the sovereign, they appear in full court dress, and wear a scarlet robe; but in Nisi Prius Courts the judge sits merely to balance the law between civilians, and therefore appears in his judicial undress, or violet gown.

Judica (Latin). The fifth Sunday after Lent; so called from the first word of the service for the day, Judica me, Domine (Judge me, O Lord). (Psalm xili.)

Judicium Cruceis was stretching-out the arms before a cross, till one of the party could hold out no longer, and lost his cause. The bishop of Paris and abbot of St. Denis appealed to this judgment in a dispute they had about the patronage of a monastery; each of the disputants selected a man to represent his cause, and the man selected by the bishop gave in, so that the award was given in favour of the abbot.

Judicium Dei (Latinni). The trial of guilt by direct appeal to God, under the notion that He would defend the right even by miracle. There were numerous methods of appeal, as by single combat, ordeal by water or fire, eating a crust of bread, standing with arms extended, consulting the Bible, etc., etc.

Judith. The Jewish heroine of Bethulia, who perilled her life in the tent of Holofernes, the general of Nebuchadnezzar, in order to save her native town. The bold adventurer cut off the head of the Assyrian, and her townsmen, rushing on the invaders, defeated them with great slaughter. (The Book of Judith.)

Jug (J) or a Stone jug. A prison. (See Jogis.)

Juge de Paix (French). A cudgel. "Albert Mangin, condamné à mort le 7 floreal an vi, n'a point dit que les jacobins étaient des secrétaires de la commissaire, et que l'homme qui tenait à la main: Voila un 'Juge de paix' qui me servira à leur caresser la barbe du cou, etc."—L. P. Frondiscou: Brev. des Juges de Paix, etc.

Jugged Hare. The hare being cut up is put into a jug or pipkin, and the pipkin is set in a pan of water. This bain marie prevents the contents of the pipkin from being burnt.

Juggernaut or Jagnamath. A Hindu god. The word is a corruption of the Sanscrit jagannātha (lord of the world). The temple of this god is in a town of the same name in Orissa. King Ayeen Akbery sent a learned Brahman to look out a site for a temple. The Brahman wandered about for many days, and then saw a crow dive into the water, and having washed, made obeisance to the element. This was selected as the site of the temple. While the temple was a building the rajah had a prophetic dream, telling him that the true form of Vishnu should be revealed to him in the morning. When the rajah went to see the temple he beheld a log of wood in the water, and this log he accepted as the realisation of his dream, enshrined it in the temple, and called it Jagannath.

"The idol Juggernaut is in shape like a serpent, with seven heads; and on each cheek it hath the form of a wing, and the wings open, and shut, and flap as it is carried in a stately chariot."—Bruton: Churchill's Collection.
The car of Juggernaut. An enormous wooden machine adorned with all sorts of figures, and mounted on sixteen wheels. Fifty men drag it annually to the temple, and it is said to contain a bride for the god. Formerly many were crushed to death by the car; some being pushed down by the enormous crowd; some throwing themselves under the wheels, as persons in England under a railway train; some perhaps as devotees. By British police arrangements, such immolation is practically abolished.

Juggler means a player. (Latin, joculator.) These jugglers accompanied the minstrels and troubadours, to assist them, and added to their musical talents slight-of-hand, antics, and feats of prowess, to amuse the company assembled. In time the music was dropped as the least attractive, and tricks became the staple of these wandering performers. (Latin, joculator, jocus, a joke or trick.)

Juggs or Jonge. The name given in Scotland to a sort of pillory, consisting of an iron ring or collar fastened by a short chain to a wall, as the "juggs" of Duddingston, Edinburgh. (See Juggors.)

Julian, the Roman emperor, boasted that he would rebuild Jerusalem, but was mortally wounded by an arrow before the foundation was laid. Much has been made of this by early Christian writers, who dwell on the prohibition and curse pronounced against those who should attempt to rebuild the city, and the fate of Julian is pointed out as an example of Divine wrath against the impious disregard of the threat.

"Well pleased they look for Sion's coming state, Nor think of Julian's beast and Julian's fate." —Crabbé: Borough.

St. Julian. Patron saint of travellers and of hospitality. Represented as accompanied by a stag in allusion to his early career as a hunter; and either receiving the poor and afflicted, or ferrying travellers across a river.

"An household, and that a sreet, was he! N'est Julian he was in his country, His breed, his ale, was alway after our [one pattern]; A better envired man was nowhere known." —Chaucer: The Franklin's Tale.

St. Julian was he deemed. A great epicure. St. Julian was the epicurean of saints. (See above.)

Julian Epoch or Era. That of the reformed calendar by Julius Caesar, which began forty-six years before Christ.

Julian Period is produced by multiplying together the lunar cycle, the solar cycle, and the Roman indiction. The first year of the Christian era corresponds to the year 4713 of the Julian, and therefore to reduce our B.C. dates to the Julian, we must subtract them from 4713, but our A.D. dates we must add to that number. So named from Julius Scaliger, the deviser of it.

Julian period. Multiply 26 by 10 and by 15, which will give 8,000, the time when the solar and lunar periods agree.

Julian Year. The year regulated by Julius Caesar, which continued to be observed till it was corrected by Pope Gregory XIII. in 1582.

Julienne Soup. Clear meat soup, containing chopped vegetables, especially carrots; so called after Julian, a French cook, of Boston.

Juliet. Daughter of Lady Capulet, and "sweet sweeting" of Romeo, in Shakespeare's tragedy of Romeo and Juliet. She has become a household word for a lady-love.

Julium St'dus. The comet which appeared at the death of Julius Caesar, and which in court flattery was called the apotheosis of the murdered man.

July'. The seventh month, named by Mark Antony, in honour of Julius Cæsar, who was born in it.

Jumala. The supreme idol of the ancient Finns and Lapps. The word is sometimes used by the Scandinavian poets for the Almighty.

"On a lonely cliff
An ancient shrine he found, of Jumala the seat,
For many a year gone by closed up and desolate." —Frithiof-Saga: The Reconciliation.

Jump. To jump or to fly or unite with like a graft; as, both our inventions meet and jump in one. Hence the adverb exactly, precisely.

"Good advice is easily followed when it jumps with our own inclinations." —Lockhart: Sir Walter Scott, chap. x. p. 241.

* The Scotch use jump, as, "When she had been married jump four months." (The Antiquary.)

Jump at an Offer (To). To accept eagerly.

Jump Over the Broomstick (To). To marry in an informal way. A "brom" is the bit of a bridle; to "jump the brom" is to skip over the marriage restraint, and "broomstick" is a mere corruption.

"A Rumpish wedding is surely better than jumping over a broomstick." —G. A. Sala.

Jumper. The longest jumper on record was Phayllos, who is accredited with jumping 55 feet. Half that length would be an enormous jump.

A counter jumper. A draper’s apprentice or employé, who is accustomed to jump over the shop counter to save the trouble and time of going round.

June (1 syl.). The sixth month. Ovid says, “Junius a jurèmum nomine dictus.” (Fasti, v. 78.)

June Marriages Lucky. “Good to the man and happy to the maid.” This is an old Roman superstition. The festival of Juno moneta was held on the calends of June, and Juno was the great guardian of the female sex from birth to death.

Junior Optime. A Cambridge University term, meaning a third-class “honour” man—i.e. in the mathematical “honour” examination.

Junior Soph. A man of the second year’s standing is so called in the University of Cambridge. (See Soph.)

Junius. Letters of Junius. In 1871 was published a book entitled The Handwriting of Junius Professionally Investigated by Mr. Charles Chabot, expert. The object of this book was to prove that Sir Philip Francis was the author of these letters. On the 22nd May, a third article in the Times to show that the case is “not proven” by Mr. Chabot. Mr. Pitt told Lord Aberdeen that he knew who wrote the Junius Letters, and that it was not Francis. Lady Grenville sent a letter to the editor of Diaries of a Lady of Quality to the same effect.

Junk. Latin, jucunes, from jungo, to join; used for binding, making baskets, mats. The jucunes marmoratus is useful in binding together the loose sands of the sea-shore, and obstructing the incursions of the sea. The jucunes conglomeratus is used in Holland for giving stability to river-banks and canals. (See Rusil.)

Junk. Salt meat supplied to vessels for long voyages; so called because it is hard and tough as old rope-ends so called. Ropes are called junkers because they were once made of bulrushes. Junk is often called salt horse. (See Harness Case.)

Jun'ket. Curded cream with spice, etc.; any dainty. The word is the Italian guarnetza (curd or cream-cheese), so called because carried on junk or bulrushes (girasole).

“Know there was no junkets at the feast.” Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew, ill. 2.

Jupiter. A giant in Scandinavian mythology, said in the Eddas to represent the “eternal principle.” Its skull forms the heavens; its eyes the sun and moon; its shoulders the mountains; its bones the rocks, etc.; hence the poets call heaven “Junker’s skull;” the sun, “Junker’s right eye;” the moon, “Junker’s left eye;” the rivers, “the teetor of old Junner.” (See Giants.)

Juno. The “venerable ox-eyed” wife of Jupiter, and queen of heaven. (Roman mythology.)

The famous marble statue of the Campagna Juno is in the Vatican.

Juno’nian Bird. The peacock, dedicated to the goddess-queen.

Junto. A faction consisting of Russell, Lord-keeper Somers, Charles Montagu, and several other men of mark, who ruled the Whigs in the reign of William III. for nearly twenty years, and exercised a very great influence over the nation. The word is a corruption of the Spanish junta (an administrative assembly), but is in English a term of censure.

Jupiter is the Latin form of Zeus varthp. Verospi’s statue of Jupiter is in the Vatican; but one of the seven wonders of the world was the statue of Olympian Jove, by Phidias, destroyed by fire in Constantinople A.D. 475.

This gigantic statue was nearly sixty feet high, though seated on a throne. The statue was made of ivory; the throne of cedar-wood, adorned with ivory, ebony, gold, and precious stones. The gold holds in his right hand a golden statue of Victory, and his left hand rested on a long sceptre surmounted with an eagle. The role of the god was of gold, and so was the footstool supported by golden lions. This wonderful work of art was removed to Constantinople by Theodosius I.

Jupiter. With the ancient alchemists designated tin.

Jupiter Scapin. A nickname of Napoleon Bonaparte, given him by the Abbé de Pradt. Scapin is a valet famous for his knavish tricks, in Molieère’s comedy of Les Fourberies de Scapin.

Jupiter’s Beard. House-lock. Supposed to be a charm against evil spirits and lightning. Hence grown at one time very generally on the thatch of houses.

“Et habet quipque supra domum sumum Jovis harbium”—Charlemagne’s Edict.

Jurassic Rocks. Limestone rocks; so called from the Jura; the Jurassic period is the geological period when these rocks were formed. Our oolitic series pretty nearly corresponds with the Jurassic.

Jury Leg (A). A wooden leg, or leg for the nonce. (See Jury Mast.)

"I took the leg off with my saw ... seared the stump ... and made a jury leg that he shambles about with as well as ever he did."—Sir W. Scott: The Fatal, chap. 311.

Jury Mast. A corruption of jury mast—i.e. a mast for the day, a temporary mast, being a spar used for the nonce when the mast has been carried away. (French, jour, a day.)

Jus Civile. Civil law.

Jus Divinum. Divine law.

Jus Gentium (Latin). International law.

Jus Martii (Latin). The right of the husband to the wife's property.

Jus de Regisse (liquorice). French slang for a negro.

Jus et Norma Loquendi. The right method of speaking and pronouncing established by the custom of each particular nation. The whole phrase is "Consuetudo, jus et norma loquendi." (Horace.)

Just (The). Aristi'des, the Athenian (died n. c. 469).

Ba'haram, styled Shah Endeb (the Just King), fifth of the Sassan'idin (q.r.) (276-296).

Casimir II., King of Poland (1117, 1177-1194).

Ferdinand I., King of Aragon (1373, 1412-1416).

Haroun al Raschid (The Just). The most renowned of the Abbaside califs, and the hero of several of the Arabian Nights stories (705, 786-808).

James II., King of Aragon (1261-1327).

Khosru or Chosroe, called by the Arabs Malik al Adel (the Just King).

Moran the Just, councillor of Fervdach, King of Ireland.

Pedro I. of Portugal (1320, 1357, 1367).

Juste Milieu (French). The golden mean.

Justices in Eyre (pron. irr). A contraction and corruption of Itineraries—i.e. on circuit.

Indian Boreas, who dwelt in Wabasso (the North). (See SHING'ERS.)

Kami (Arabic, Kā'īr, an infidel). A name given to the Hottentots, who reject the Molem faith Kafiristan, in Central Asia, means "the country of the infidels."

"The affinity of the Kā'īr tribes . . . including the Kā'īr proper and the people of Congo, is based upon the various idioms spoken by them, the direct representatives of a common, but now extinct, mother tongue. This aggregate of languages is now conveniently known as . . . the Kā'īr linguistic system." - K. Johnston : Africa, p. 447.

Kai-omurs (the mighty Omurs), surnamed Ghil-shah (earth's king). Son of Du'iavat, founder of the city Balsk and first of the Kai-omurs or Pāraishtān dynasty of Persia (B.C. 940-920). (See PAISH'DADIAN.)

Kal-an'iana. Sixth the sixth Persian dynasty. The semi-historic period (B.C. 660-331). So called because they took for their affix the term kai (mighty), called by the Greeks Ku (Kiros), and by the Romans Cy (Cyrus).

Kall'yal (2 syl.). The heroine of Southey's Curse of Khāi'mah.

Kallyard School, the name given to a school of writers, who take their subjects from Scottish humble life. The name is due to the motto—"There grows a bonnie brier bush in our kallyard"—used by Ian Maclaren for his book, "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush."

Kain Hens. Hence that a tenant pays to his landlord, as a sort of rent in kind (ill-fed hens). (Tiny Mannering, v.)

Kaiser. The German Emperor. He receives the title from Dalmatia, Croatia, and the line of the Danube, which, by the arrangement of Diodoruean, was governed by a prince entitled Cæsar of the Holy Roman Empire, as successor of the emperor of the old Roman Empire. It was Albert II., Duke of Austria, who added the Holy Roman Empire to the imperial throne in 1493; and William I., king of Prussia, on being crownet German emperor in 1871, took the title.

Kalak. An Esquimaux boat, used by the men only.

Kaled is Gulnare (2 syl.) in disguise of a page in the service of Lara. After Lara was shot, she haunted the spot of his death as a crazy woman, and died of a broken heart. (Byron : Lara.)

Kaleda (Solaric mythology). The god of peace, somewhat similar to the Latin Janus. His feast was celebrated on the 24th of December.

Kali. A Hindu goddess after whom Calcutta receives its name, Kali-Kutta (Kali's village).

Kallyng'a. The last of the four Hindu periods contained in the great Yuga, equal to the Iron Age of classic mythology. It consisted of 342,000 solar-sidereal years, and began 3,102 years before the Christian era. The bull, representing truth and right, has but one foot in this period, because all the world delights in wickedness. (See Kutta.)

Kalmar. The Union of Kalmar. A treaty made on July 12th, 1397, to settle the succession of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark on Queen Margaret and her heirs for ever. This treaty lasted only till the death of Margaret.

Kalmucks —i.e. Khalkhмуrk (apostates) from Buddhism. A race of western Mongols, extending from western China to the valley of the Volga river.

Kalpa. A day and night of Brahma, a period of 4,320,000,000 solar-sidereal years. Some say there are an infinity of Kalpas, others limit the number to thirty. A Great Kalpa is a life of Brahma; the whole duration of time from the creation to the destruction of the world.

Kalpa-Tarou. A tree in Indian mythology from which might be gathered whatever a person desired. This tree is "the tree of the imagination."

Kalyb. The "Lady of the Woods," who stole St. George from his nurse, brought him up as her own child, and endowed him with gifts. St. George enclosed her in a rock, where she was torn to pieces by spirits. (Seven Champions of Christendom, part i.)

Kam. Crooked. (Erse kaam, squint-eyed.) Clean Kam, perverted into Kim Kam, means wholly awry, clean from the purpose.

"This is clean kam—merely awry." (Shakespeare: Coriolanus, ii. 1.)

Kâma. The Hindu god of love. His wife is Kati (rotundamouna), and he is represented as riding on a sparrow, holding in his hand a bow of flowers and five arrows (i.e. the five senses).

Kami. The celestial gods of the first mythical dynasty of Japan, the demi-gods of the second dynasty, the spiritual princes, anyone sainted or Kay or Sir Key. Son of Sir Ector, and foster-brother of King Arthur. In Arthurian romance, this senechal of England is represented as a rude and boastful knight, the first to attempt any achievement, but very rarely successful.
Keelman. The herring dealer or herring fisherman; one who sells the herring by the yard-arm. (See Old Mortality [Introduction], the bill of Margaret Chrystie: "Three chappins of yell with Sandy the keelman, 9d.")

Keelson or Kelson. A beam running lengthwise above the keel of a ship, and bolted to the middle of the floor-frames, in order to stiffen the vessel. The word sou is the Swedish svin, and Norwegian sail, a sill.)

Keening. A weird lamentation for the dead, common in Galway. The coffin is carried to the burying place, and while it is carried three times round, the mourners go to the graves of their nearest kinsfolk and begin keening, after which they smoke.

Keep Down (To). To prevent another from rising to an independent position; to keep in subjection.

Keep House (To). To maintain a separate establishment; to act as house-keeper.

To keep open house. To admit all comers to hospitable entertainment.

Keep Touch. To keep faith; the exact performance of an agreement, as, "To keep touch with my promise" (More). The idea seems to be embodied in the proverb, "Seeing is believing, but feeling is naked truth."

"And trust me on my truth,
If thou keep touch with me,
My dearest friend, as my own heart,
Then shant right welcome be."

*Song of the London Prentices, p. 37.

Keep Up (To). To continue, as, "to keep up a discussion;" to maintain, as, "to keep up one's courage;" to continue pari passu, as "Keep up with the rest."

Keep at Arm's Length (To). To prevent another from being too familiar.

Keep Body and Soul Together (To). To struggle to maintain life; to continue life. Thus we say, "It is as much as I can do to keep body and soul together;" and "To keep body and soul together" we did so and so.

Keep Company with (To). To associate with someone of another sex with a view of marriage. The phrase landlord or government official. In the Dutch and many other navies, delinquents were, at one time, tied to a yard-arm with weights on their feet, and dragged by a rope under the keel of a ship, in at one side and out at the other. The result was often fatal.

Kayward (A). A bargeman. (See Old Mortality [Introduction], the bill of Margaret Chrystie: "Three chappins of yell with Sandy the keelman, 9d.")

Keber. A Persian sect (generally rich merchants), distinguished by their beards and dress. When one of them dies, a cock is driven out of the poultry yard; if a fox seizes it, it is a proof that the soul of the deceased is saved. If this experiment does not answer, they prop the dead body against a wall, and if the birds peck out the right eye first, the Keber is gone to heaven; if the left eye, the carcass is flung into the ditch, for the Keber was a reprobate.

Kehla. The point of adoration; i.e. the quarter or point of the compass towards which persons turn when they worship. The Persian fire-worshippers turn to the east, the place of the rising sun; the Jews to Jerusalem, the city of the King of kings; the Mahometans to Mecca; the early Christians turned to the "east," and the "communion table" even of the "Reformed Church" is placed at the east end of the building, whenever this arrangement is practicable. Any object of passionate desire.

Kehla-Noma. The pocket compass carried by Musulmans to direct them which way to turn when they pray. (See above.)

Kedar's Tents. This world. Kedar was Arabia Deserta, and the phrase Kedar's tents means houses in the wilderness of this world.

"Ah me, 'ah me!' that I
In Kedar's tents here stay;
A place like that on high Lords, thither guide my way"

Kedari. The St. George of Mahometan mythology. He slew a monstrous dragon to save a damsel exposed to its fury, and, having drunk of the water of life, rode about the world to aid those warriors who invoked him. This tradition is exactly parallel to that of St. George, and explains the reason why the one is the field-word with the Turks, and the latter with the ancient English.

Kedereyev. A stew of rice, vegetables, eggs, butter, etc. A corruption of the Indian word Khichri (a medley or hotch-potch). The word has been confounded with a place so called, forty miles south-west of Calcutta, on the Hooghly river.

Keel-hauling or haling. A long, troublesome, and vexatious examination or repetition of annoyances from a relative of a landlord or government official. In the Dutch and many other navies, delinquents were, at one time, tied to a yard-arm with weights on their feet, and dragged by a rope under the keel of a ship, in at one side and out at the other. The result was often fatal.

Keelman (A). A bargeman. (See Old Mortality [Introduction], the bill of Margaret Chrystie: "Three chappins of yell with Sandy the keelman, 9d.")

Keelson or Kelson. A beam running lengthwise above the keel of a ship, and bolted to the middle of the floor-frames, in order to stiffen the vessel. The word sou is the Swedish svin, and Norwegian sill, a sill.)

Keening. A weird lamentation for the dead, common in Galway. The coffin is carried to the burying place, and while it is carried three times round, the mourners go to the graves of their nearest kinsfolk and begin keening, after which they smoke.

Keep Down (To). To prevent another from rising to an independent position; to keep in subjection.

Keep House (To). To maintain a separate establishment; to act as house-keeper.

To keep open house. To admit all comers to hospitable entertainment.

Keep Touch. To keep faith; the exact performance of an agreement, as, "To keep touch with my promise" (More). The idea seems to be embodied in the proverb, "Seeing is believing, but feeling is naked truth."

"And trust me on my truth,
If thou keep touch with me,
My dearest friend, as my own heart,
Then shalt right welcome be."

*Song of the London Prentices, p. 37.

Keep Up (To). To continue, as, "to keep up a discussion;" to maintain, as, "to keep up one's courage;" to continue pari passu, as "Keep up with the rest."

Keep at Arm's Length (To). To prevent another from being too familiar.

Keep Body and Soul Together (To). To struggle to maintain life; to continue life. Thus we say, "It is as much as I can do to keep body and soul together;" and "To keep body and soul together" we did so and so.

Keep Company with (To). To associate with someone of another sex with a view of marriage. The phrase landlord or government official. In the Dutch and many other navies, delinquents were, at one time, tied to a yard-arm with weights on their feet, and dragged by a rope under the keel of a ship, in at one side and out at the other. The result was often fatal.
is almost confined to household servants and persons of a similar status.

Keep Good Hours (7b). To retire to bed somewhat early. To keep bad hours is to sit up late at night.

Keep it Dark. Keep it as a secret; hide it from public sight or knowledge; do not talk about it.

Keep One's Countenance (7b). To refrain from laughing; to preserve one's gravity.

Keep One's Own Counsel (7b). To be reticent of one's own affairs or plans.

Keep your Breath to Cool your Porridge. Look after your own affairs, and do not put your spoke in another person's wheel. Husband your strength to keep your own state safe and well, and do not waste it on matters in which you have really no concern. Don't scold or rail at me, but look at home.

Keep your Powder Dry. Keep prepared for action; keep your courage up.

"Go forth and conquer, Aetopomion mine, This kiss upon your lips retaining; Knowing that is also thine. Forbid the teardrop but and streaming. We're Mars and Venus, you and I. And both must keep our powder dry."

Siune: Dogmat Bulletin (In Love and War).

Keepers. A staff of men employed by Irish landlords in 1843, etc., to watch the crops and prevent their being smuggled off during the night. They were resisted by the Molly Maguires.

Kehama. A Hindu rajah who obtains and sports with supernatural powers. (Southey: Curse of Kehama.)

Kelpie or Kelpy. A spirit of the waters in the form of a horse, in Scottish mythology. Not unlike the Irish Phooka. (See Fairy.)

"Every lake has its Kelpie or Water-horse, often seen by the shepherd sitting upon the brow of a rock, dashing along the surface of the deep, or browsing upon the pasture on its verge."—Graham: Sketches of Perthshire.

Kelsa Convoy (A). A step and a half over the door-stone or threshold.

"It's no expected your honour said leave the land; it's just a Kelsa convoy, a step and a half over the door stone."—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xxx.

Kema. The books containing the secrets of the genii, who, infatuated with love, revealed the marvels of nature to men, and were banished out of heaven. According to some cymologists, the word chemistry is derived from this word. (Zosime Panopolite.)

Kempfer-Haasen. The nom de plume of Robert Pearce Gillies, one of the speakers in the Noctis Ambrosiana. (Blackwood's Magazine.)

Kempis. The authorship of the work entitled De Initiatione Christi, has afforded much controversy as the author of Letters of Junius. In 1604, a Spanish Jesuit discovered a manuscript copy by the Abbot John Gersen or Geesen; and since then three competitors have had angry and wordy defenders, viz. Thomas à Kempis, J. Charlier de Gerson, Chancellor of the University of Paris, and the Abbot Gersen. M. Malou gives his verdict in favour of the first.

Ken or Kiun. An Egyptian goddess similar to the Roman Venus. She is represented as standing on a lion, and holding two serpents in one hand and a flower in the other. (See Amos v. 26.)

Kendal Green. Green cloth for foresters; so called from Kendal, Westmorland, famous at one time for this manufacture. Kendal green was the livery of Robin Hood and his followers. In Rymer's Fœdera (ii, 83) is a letter of protection, dated 1381, and granted by Edward III. to John Kempe of Flanders, who established cloth-weaving in the borough. Lincoln was also famous at one time for dyeing green.

"How couldst thou know these men in Kendal green, when it was so dark thou couldn't but see thy hand?"—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 4.

Kenehill (St.) was murdered at Clente-in-Cowbage, near Winchelcumb, in Gloucestershire. The murder, says Roger of Wendover, was miraculously notified at Rome by a white dove, which alighted on the altar of St. Peter's, bearing in its beak a scroll with these words:

"In Clent cow pasture, under a thorn, Of head bereft, lies Kenehill king-born."

Kenna. (See Kensington.)

Kenna Quhair (I know not where). Scotch for terra incognita.

Kenne. A stone said to be formed in the eye of a stag, and used as an antidote to poison.

Kennedy. A poker, or to kill with a poker; so called from a man of that name who was killed by a poker. (Dictionary of Modern Slang.)

Kensal. A dog's house; from the Latin canis (a dog), Italian cane; but kennel (a gutter), from the Latin cana (a cane, whence canthos), our canal, channel, etc.
Keno. This was a large rich cheese, made by the women of the family with a great affection of secrecy, and was intended for the refreshment of the gossips who were in the house at the "canny minute" of the birth of a child. Called Keno because no one was supposed to know of its existence—certainly no male being, not excepting the master of the house. After all had eaten their fill on the auspicious occasion, the rest was divided among the gossips and taken home. The Keno is supposed to be a relic of the secret rites of the Bona Dea.

Kennington. Oberon, king of the fairies, held his royal seat in these gardens, which were fenced round with spells "interdicted to human touch," but not unfrequently his thievish elves would rob the human mother of her babe, and leave in its stead a sickly changeling of the elfin race. Once on a time it so fell out that one of the infants fostered in these gardens was Albion, the son of "Albion's royal blood:" it was stolen by a fairy named Milkah. When the boy was nineteen, he fell in love with Kenna, daughter of King Oberon, and Kenna vowed that none but Albion should ever be her chosen husband. Oberon heard her when she made this vow, and instantly drove the prince out of the garden, and married the fairy maid to Azriel, a fairy of great beauty and large possessions, to whom Holland Park belonged. In the meantime, Albion prayed to Neptune for revenge, and the sea-god commanded the fairy Oriel, whose dominion lay along the banks of the Thames, to espouse the cause of his linel offspring. Albion was slain in the battle by Azriel, and Neptune in revenge crushed the whole empire of Oberon. Being immortal, the fairies could not be destroyed, but they fled from the angry sea-god, some to the hills and some to the dales, some to the caves and others to river-banks. Kenna alone remained, and tried to revive her lover by means of the herb moly. No sooner did the juice of this wondrous herb touch the body than it turned into a snow-drop. When Wise laid out the grounds for the Prince of Orange, Kenna planned it "in a morning dream," and gave her name to the town and garden. (Tickell: Kennington Gardens.)

Kent (Latin, Can'tum), the territory of the Cantii or Cantî; (Old British, Kent, a corner or headland). In the reign of Queen Elizabeth Kent was so notorious for highway robbery that the word signified a "nest of thieves."

"Some books are arrogant and impudent; so are most thieves in Christendom and Kent."—Taylor, the Water Poet (1660).

A man of Kent. The Thames. These men went out with green boughs to meet the Conqueror, and obtained in consequence a confirmation of their ancient privileges from the new king. They called themselves the Myri. The hopes of East Kent are liked best.

A Kentish man. A resident of Woot Kent.

Holy Maid of Kent. Elizabeth Barton, who pretended to the gift of prophecy and power of miracles. Having denounced the doom and speedy death of Henry VIII. for his marriage with Anne Boleyn, she was executed. Sir Walter Scott (Abbott, xiii.) calls her "The Nun of Kent." (See Fair [Maid of Kent].)

Kent's Hole. A large cave in the limestone rock near Torquay, Devon.

Kent Street Ejection. Taking away the street-door: a method devised by the landlords of Kent Street, Southwark, when their tenants were more than a fortnight in arrears.

Kentish Fire. Rapturous applause, or three times three and one more. The expression originated with Lord Wincopse, who proposed the health of the Earl of Roden, on August 15th, 1834, and added, "Let it be given with the 'Kentish Fire.'" In proposing another toast he asked permission to bring his "Kentish Artillery" again into action. Chambers, in his Encyclopaedia, says it arose from the protracted cheers given in Kent to the No-Popery orators in 1828-1829.

Kentish Koll. Mary Carlton, nicknamed The German Princess. She was transported to Jamaica in 1671: but, returning without leave, she was hanged at Tyburn, January 22nd, 1673.

Kentishmen's Tails. (See Tails.)

Kentucky (T. U. America), so called in 1782, from its principal river. It was admitted into the union in 1792. The nickname of the inhabitants is Corn-crackers. Indian Shawnee Kentucke - "head or long river."

Kepler's Fairy. The fairy which guides the planets. Kepler said that each planet was guided in its elliptical orbit by a resident angel.
Kepler's Laws (Johann Kepler, 1571-1630):

1. That the planets describe ellipses, and that the centre of the sun is in one of the foci.
2. That every planet moves so that the line drawn from it to the sun describes equal areas in equal times.
3. That the squares of the times of the planetary revolutions are as the cubes of their mean distances from the sun.

Kerchief of Pleasantness. An embroidered cloth presented by a lady to her knight to wear for her sake. The knight was bound to place it in his helmet.

Kerna. A kind of trumpet used by Tamerlane, the blast of which might be heard for miles.

Kernel (Anglo-Saxon, cyrnel, a diminutive of corn; seed in general), whence acorn (the ac or oak corn).

Kersey. A coarse cloth, usually ribbed, and woven from long wool: said to be so named from Kersey, in Suffolk, where it was originally made.

Kerseymere. A corruption of Casimir, a man's name. A twilled woolen cloth made in Abbeville, Amiens, Elbeuf, Louviers, Rheims, Sedan, and the West of England. (French casimir, Spanish casimier or casimiro.)

Kersereh or Kerzrane. A flower which grows in Persia. It is said, if anyone in June or July inhales the hot south wind which has blown over this flower he will die.

Keso'ra. The female idol adored in the temple of Juggernaut. Its head and body are of sandal-wood; its eyes two diamonds, and a third diamond is suspended round its neck; its hands are made entirely of small pearls, called perles à l'once; its bracelets are of pearls and rubies, and its robe is cloth of gold.

Kestrel. A hawk of a base breed, hence a worthless fellow. Also used as an adjective.

"No thought of honour ever did arise
In his lower breed; nor in his kestrel kind;
A pleasant vision of glory he did find . . . ."

Spenser: Faerie Queen, book II. canto iv. 3.

Ketch. (See Jack Ketch.)

Ketch. A kind of two-masted vessel. Bomb-ketches were much used in the last century wars.

Ketchup. A corruption of the Japanese Kijap, a condiment sometimes sold as soy, but not equal to it.

Ketmir or Katmir. The dog of the Seven Sleepers. Sometimes called Al Rakim. (Sale's Koran, xviii. n.)

Kettle (A), a watch. A tin kettle is a silver watch. A red kettle is a gold watch. "Kettle," or rather kettle, in slang language is a corrupt rendering of the words to-tick read backwards. (Compare Anglo-Saxon cetel, a kettle, with citel-ian, to tickle.)

Thor's great kettle. The god Thor wanted to brew some beer, but not having a vessel suited for the purpose in Valhalla, stole the kettle of the giant Hymer. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Kettle of Fish. A fête-champêtre in which salmon is the chief dish provided. In these pic-nics, a large caldron being provided, the party select a place near a salmon river. Having thickened some water with salt to the consistency of brine, the salmon is put therein and boiled; and when fit for eating, the company partake thereof in gipsy fashion. Some think the discomfort of this sort of pic-nic gave rise to the phrase "A pretty kettle of fish." (See Kettle of Fish.)

"The whole company go to the waterside today to eat a kettle of fish."—Sir Walter Scott: Marmion, book VI.

Kettledrum. A large social party, originally applied to a military party in India, where drum-heads served for tables. On Tweedside it signifies a "social party," met together to take tea from the same tea-kettle. (See Drum, Hurricane.)

Kettledrumme. (Gabriel.) A Covenantor preacher in Sir Walter Scott's Old Mortality.

Kev'in (St.), like St. Sena'num (q.r.), retired to an island where he vowed no woman should ever land. Kathleen loved the saint, and tracked him to his retirement, but the saint hurled her from a rock. Kathleen died, but her ghost rose smiling from the tide, and never left the place while the saint lived. A bed in the rock at Glendalough (Wicklow) is shown as the bed of St. Kevin. Thomas Moore has a poem on this tradition. (Irish Melodies, iv.)

Kex, hemlock. Tennyson says in The Princess, "Though the rough kex break the starred mosaic," though weeds break the pavement. Nothing breaks a pavement like the growth of grass or lichen.
through it. (Welsh, recys, hemlock; French, cigue; Latin, cicuta.)

Key. (See KAY.)

Key-cold. Deadly cold, lifeless. A key, on account of its coldness, is still sometimes employed to stop bleeding at the nose.

"Poor key-cold figure of a holy king!/
Perched at the house of Lancaster! /
Thou bloodless remnant of that royal blood!"
Shakespeare: Richard III., i. 2.

Key-stone. The Key-stone State. Pennsylvania; so called from its position and importance.

Key and the Bible (.1). Employed to discover whether plaintiff or defendant is guilty. The Bible is opened either at Ruth, chap. i., or at the 51st Psalm; and a door-key is so placed inside the Bible, that the handle projects beyond the book. The Bible, being tied with a piece of string, is then held by the fourth fingers of the accuser and defendant, who must repeat the words touched by the wards of the key. It is said, as the words are repeated, that the key will turn towards the guilty person, and the Bible fall to the ground.

Key of a Cipher or of a romance. That which explains the secret or lays it open ("La clef d'un chiffrer" or "La clef d'un romance").

Key of the Mediterranean. The fortress of Gibraltar; so called because it commands the entrance thereof.

Key of Russia. Smolensk, on the Dnieper.

Key of Spain. Ciudad Rodrigo, taken by the Duke of Wellington, who defeated the French there in 1812.

Keys. (See St. Sitha.)

Keys of stables and cowhouses have not unfrequently, even to the present day, a stone with a hole through it and a piece of horn attached to the handle. This is a relic of an ancient superstition. The hag, halig, or holy stone was looked upon as a talisman which kept off the stendish Mara or night-mara; and the horn was supposed to ensure the protection of the god of cattle, called by the Romans Pan.

Key as an emblem. (Anglo-Saxon, cag.)

St. Peter is always represented in Christian art with two keys in his hand; they are consequently the insignia of the Papacy, and are borne saltire-wise, one of gold and the other of silver.

They are the emblems also of St. Servatius, St. Hippol’ytus, St. Geneviève, St. Petronilla, St. Oswy, St. Martha, and St. Germain of Paris.

The Bishop of Winchester bears two keys and sword in saltire.

The bishops of St. Asaph, Gloucester, Exeter, and Peterborough bear two keys in saltire.

The Cross Keys. A public-house sign; the arms of the Archbishop of York.

The key shall be upon his shoulder. He shall have the dominion. The ancient keys were instruments about a yard long, made of wood or metal. On public occasions the steward slung his key over his shoulder, as our mace-bearers carry their mace. Hence, to have the key upon one’s shoulder means to be in authority, to have the keeping of something. It is said of Bilakim, that God would lay upon his shoulder the key of the house of David (Isa. xxii. 22); and of our Lord that "the government should be upon His shoulder" (Isa. ix. 6). The chamberlain of the court used to bear a key as his insignia.

The power of the keys—i.e., the supreme authority vested in the pope as successor of St. Peter. The phrase is derived from St. Matt. xvi. 19. (Latin, Potestas clariss.)

To throw the keys into the pit. To disclaim a debt; to refuse to pay the debts of a deceased husband. This refers to an ancient French custom. If a deceased husband did not leave his widow enough for her alimony and the payment of his debts, the widow was to throw the bunch of house-keys which she carried at her girdle into the grave, and this answered the purpose of a public renunciation of all further ties. No one after this could come on her for any of her late husband’s debts.

Keys (The House of). One of the three estates of the Isle of Man. The Crown in council, the governor and his council, and the House of Keys, constitute what is termed "the court of Tynwald." The House of Keys consists of twenty-four representatives selected by their own body, vacancies are filled up by the House presenting to the governor "two of the oldest and worthiest men of the isle," one of which the governor nominates. To them an appeal may be made against the verdicts of juries, and from their decision there is no appeal, except to the Crown in council. (Maxu, kiar-as-seed, four-and-twenty.)

*: The governor and his council consists of the governor, the bishop, the attorney-general, two deans (or judges), the clerk of the rolls, the water bailiff, the archdeacon, and the vicar-general.
The House of Keys. The board of landed proprietors referred to above, or the house in which they hold their sessions.

Keyne (St.). The well of St. Keyne, Cornwall, has a strange superstition attached to it, which is this: "If the bridegroom drinks therewith before the bride, he will be master of his house; but if the bride gets the first draught, the grey mare will be the better horse." Southey has a ballad on this tradition, and says the man left his wife at the church porch, and ran to the well to get the first draught; but when he returned his wife told him his labour had been in vain, for she had taken with her a "bottle of the water to church."

Khédive d'Egypte. An old regal title revived by the sultan in 1867, who granted it to Ismael I., who succeeded as Pasha of Egypt in 1863. The title is higher than viceroy, but not so high as sultan. (Turkish, khédive; Persian, khédw; and khidvéi, viceroy.) Pronounce ke-dive, in 2 syl.

Khurasan [Region of the Sun]. A province of Persia, anciently called Aria'na.

The Veiled Prophet of Khurasan, Mor-kanna, a prophet chief, who, being terribly deformed, wore a veil under pretence of shading the dazzling light of his countenance.

"Terror seized her head the last-light which encircled him should fade away, and leave him like the veiled prophet of Khurasan, a sublimated thing of clay."—Lady Hardy: A Casual Acquaintance.

Kl. A Chinese word, signifying ago or period, generally applied to the ten periods preceding the first Imperial dynasty, founded n.c. 2205. It extended over some 300,000 years. The first was founded by Po-ku (highest eternity), and the last by Po-hi, surnamed Tien-Tar (son of heaven).

Kick-Kick (god of gods). An idol worshipped in Pegu. This god is to sleep 6,000 years, and when he wakes the end of the world will come.

Kick (A.). Sixpence. "Two-and-a-kick" = two shillings and sixpence. (Anglo-Saxon, ciec, a bit. In Jamaica a "bit" = sixpence, and generally it means the smallest silver coin in circulation; thus, in America, a "bit" is fourpence. We speak of a "threepenny bit.")

"It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks" (Acts ix. 5; and xxvi. 14.) The proverb occurs in Pindar (2 Pythian Victories, v. 173), in Æschylus (Agamemnon, 1, 624), in Euripides (Bacchi, 791), in Terence (Phormio, i. ii. 27), in Ovid (Tristia, book ii. 15), etc.; but whether the reference is to an ox kicking when goaded, or a horse when pricked with the rows of a spur, is not certain. The plural kentra seems to refer to more than one, and pros kentra cannot refer to a repetition of good thrusts. Altogether, the rows of a spur suit the phrase better than the single point of an ox-goad.

N.B. The Greek pros with an accusative is not = the Latin adversus, such a meaning would require a genitive case; it means in answer to, i.e. to kick when spurred or goaded.

More kicks than ha'pence. More abuse than profit. Called "monkey's allowance" in allusion to monkeys led about to collect ha'pence by exhibiting "their parts." The poor brutes get the kicks if they do their parts in an unsatisfactory manner, but the master gets the ha'pence collected.

Quite the kick. Quite a dandy. The Italians call a dandy a chic. The French chic means knack, as avoir le chic, to have the knack of doing a thing smartly.

"I cocks my last and twirled my stick.
And the girls they called me quite the kick."—George Colman the Younger.

Kick Over the Traces (To). Not to follow the dicta of a party leader, but to act independently; as a horse refusing to run in harness kicks over the traces.

"If the new member shows any inclination to kick over the traces, he will not be their member long."—Newspaper paragraph, Feb., 1867.

Kick the Beam (To). To be of light weight; to be of inferior consequence. When one pan of a pair of scales is lighter than the other, it flies upwards and is said to "kick the beam" [of the scales].

"The evil has eclipsed the good, and the scale, which before rested equally on the ground, now kicks the beam."—Blindstone.

Kick the Bucket (To). A bucket is a pulley, and in Norfolk a beam. When pigs are killed, they are hung by their hind-legs on a bucket or beam, with their heads downwards, and oxen are hauled up by a pulley. To kick the bucket is to be hung on the balk or bucket by the heels.

Kick Up a Row (To). To create a disturbance. "A pretty kick up" is a great disturbance. The phrase "To kick up the dust" explains the other phrases.
Kickshaws. Made dishes, odds and ends, formerly written “kickshose.” (French, qu'elle chose.)

Kicksey-wicksey. A horse that kicks and winses in impatience; figuratively, a wife (grey mare). Taylor, the water poet, calls it kicksy-wrinky, but Shakespeare spells it kicky-wicky.

He wears his honour in a box unseen
That hugs his kicky-wicky here at home,
Sweeping his manly narrow in her arms,
Which should sustain the bound and high curvet
Of Mars's fret steed.

All's Well that Ends Well, II. 3 (Globe ed.).

Kid (A). A faggot or bundle of firewood. To kid is to bind up faggots. In the parish register of Kneesal church there is the following item: “Lending kids to church, 2s. 6d.” that is, carting faggots to church. (Welsh, cidy, faggots.)

Kid (A). A young child. A facetious form from the Anglo-Saxon cýld, a child. The l is often silent, as in calm, half, golf, etc. At one time fault was pronounced fun.

"Are these your own kids? I inquire presently. Yes, two of them: I have six you know."

Kidderminster Poetry. Coarse doggerel verse, like the coarse woollen manufacture of Kidderminster. The term was first used by Shenstone, who applied it to a Mr. C., of Kidderminster.

"The verses you are Kidderminster stuff, And I must own you've measured out enough."

Kidnapper (A). One who nab or steals “kids” or young children.

"Swarms of kidnappers were busy in every northern town."

Kidney. Men of another kidney or of the same kidney. The veins or kidneys were even by the Jews supposed to be the seat of the affections.

Kilda (St.). The farthest of the western isles of Scotland.

Kildare (2 syl.) is the Irish Kill dara, church of the oaks.

Kildare's Holy Fane. Famous for the "Fire of St. Bridget," which was inextinguishable, because the nuns never allowed it to go out. Every twentieth night St. Bridget returned to tend the fire. Part of the chapel of St. Bridget still remains, and is called "The Firehouse."

"A pod Kildaram occurred [in 738] Sancte Brudi- quam mecum tenebam vocant."—Geraldus Cambrensis: Hibernia, n. 34.

Kilkenny. Kilkenny is the Gaelic Kill Kenny, church of St. Kenny or Canice.

Kilkenny Cats. (See Cat.)

Kill (A). The slaying of some animal, generally a bullock, tied up by hunters in a jungle, to allure to the spot and attract the attention of some wild beast (such as a lion, tiger, or panther) preparatory to a hunting party being arranged. As a tiger-kill, a panther-kill.

"A shikarie brought us the welcome tidings of a tiger-kill only a mile and a half from the camp. The next day there was no hunt, as the ground round the panther-kill was too unfavourable to permit of any hunting."—Nineteenth Century, August, 1886.

Kill Two Birds with One Stone (76). To effect some subsidiary work at the same time as the main object is being effected.

Killed by Inches. In allusion to divers ways of prolonging capital punishments in olden times; e.g.: (1) The "iron coffin of Lissa." The prisoner was laid in the coffin, and saw the iron lid creep slowly down with almost imperceptible movement—slowly, silently, but surely; on, on it came with relentless march, till, after lingering days and nights in suspense, the prisoner was at last slowly crushed by the iron lid pressing on him. (2) The "taiser de la Vierge" of Badon-Baden. The prisoner, blindfolded and fastened to a chain, was lowered by a windlass down a deep shaft from the top of the castle into the very heart of the rock on which it stands. Here he remained till he was conducted to the torture-chamber, and commanded "to kiss" the brassen statue of the "Virgin" which stood at the end of a passage; but immediately he raised his lips to give the kiss, down he fell through a trap-door on a wheel with spikes, which was set in motion by the fall. (3) The "iron cages of Louis XI." were so contrived that the victims might linger out for years; but whether they sat, stood, or lay down, the position was equally uncomfortable. (4) The "chambro a cruce" was a heavy chest, short, shallow, and lined with sharp stones, in which the sufferer was packed and buried alive. (5) The "bernicles" consisted of a mattress on which the victim was fastened by the neck, while his legs were crushed between two logs of wood, on the uppermost of which the torturer took his seat. This process continued for several days, till the sufferer died with the lingering torment. Many other modes of stretching out the torment of death might easily be added. (See Iron Maiden.)
King Estmere. The Anglo-Saxon * cyneg, cyn- * ing, from * cyn * a nation or people, and the termination—* ing, meaning "of," as "son of," "chief of," etc. -In Anglo-Saxon times the king was elected on the Witenagemot, and was therefore the choice of the nation.

King.

A king should die standing. So said Louis XVIII. of France, in imitation of Vespasian, Emperor of Rome. (See Dying Sayings: Louis XVIII.)

Like a king. When Porus, the Indian prince, was taken prisoner, Alexander asked him how he expected to be treated. "Like a king," he replied; and Alexander made him his friend.

Pray aid of the king. When someone, under the belief that he has a right to the land, claims rent of the king's tenants, they appeal to the sovereign, or "pray aid of the king."

King Ben. Father of Sir Launcelot du Lac. He died of grief when his castle was taken and burnt through the treachery of his seneschal. (Launcelot du Lac, 1194.)

King Cash, what the Americans call the "Almighty Dollar."

"Now birth and rank and breeding,
Hardly saved from utter smash,
Have been ousted, rather roughly.
By the onslaught of King Cash."

Truth (Christian Number, 1862, p. 14.)

King Cole. (See Cole.)

King Cotton. Cotton, the staple of the Southern States of America, and the chief article of manufacture in England. The expression was first used by James H. Hammond in the Senate of the United States, in 1858. The great cotton manufacturers are called "cotton lords."

King Estmere (2 syl.) of England was induced by his brother Adler to go to King Adland, and request permission to pay suit to his daughter. King Adland replied that Bremor, King of Spain, had already proposed to her and been rejected; but when the lady was introduced to the English king she accepted him. King Estmere and his brother returned home to prepare for the wedding, but had not proceeded a mile when the king of Spain returned to press his suit, and threatened vengeance if it were not accepted. A page was instantly despatched to inform King Estmere, and request him to return. The two brothers in the guise of harpers rode into the hall of King Adland, when Bremor rebuked them, and bade them leave their steeds in the stable. A quarrel ensued, in which Adler swelled "the sadowan," and the two brothers put the retainers to flight. (Percy's Reliques, etc., series i. bk. i. 6.)

King Franconi. Joachin Murat; so called because he was once a mountebank like Franconi. (1767-1815.)

King Horn or Childo Horn. The hero of a metrical romance by Mestre Thomas.

King Log. A roi vainqueur, a king that rules in peace and quietness, but never makes his power felt. The allusion is to the fable of The Frogs desiring a King. (See Log.)

King-maker. Richard Neville, Earl of Warwick; so called because, when he sided with Henry VI., Henry was king; but when he sided with Edward IV., Henry was deposed and Edward was king. He was killed at the battle of Barnet. (1120-1171.)

King Mob. The "ignoble culparty."

King Pétadu. The court of King Pétadu. A kind of Alsata, where all are talkers with no hearers, all are kings with no subjects, all are masters and none servants. There was once a society of beggars in France, the chief of whom called himself King Pétadu. (Latin, petit, to beg.)

King Ryenco. of North Wales, sent a dwarf to King Arthur to say "he had overcome eleven kings, all of which paid him homage in this sort—viz. they gave him their heards to purfll his mantle. He now required King Arthur to do likewise." King Arthur returned answer, "My beard is full young yet for a purfll, but before it is long enough for such a purpose, King Ryenco shall do me homage on both his knees." (See Percy's Reliques, etc., series iii. book 1.)

Spenser says that Lady Bria'na loved a knight named Crudor, who refused to marry her till she sent him a mantle lined with the beards of knights and locks of ladies. To accomplish this, she appointed Mal'effort, her seneschal, to divest every lady that drew near the castle of her locks, and every knight of his beard. (Faerie Queene, book vi. canto 1.)

King Stork. A tyrant that devours his subjects, and makes them submissive with fear and trembling. The allusion is to the fable of The Frogs desiring a King. (See Log.)

King-of-Arms. An officer whose duty it is to direct the heralds, preside at chapters, and have the jurisdiction of armoury. There are three kings-of-arms in England—viz. Garter, Clarenceux, and Norroy; one in Scotland—viz. Lyon; and one in Ireland, called Ulster.

Bath King-of-Arms is no member of the college, but takes precedence next after Garter. The office was created in 1723 for the service of the Order of the Bath. (See HERALDS.)

King of Bark. Christopher III., of Scandinavia, who, in a time of great scarcity, had the bark of birchwood mixed with meal for food. (Fifteenth century.)

King of Beasts. The lion.

King of Dalkey. A burlesque officer, like the Mayor of Garratt, the Mayor of the Pig Market, and the Mayor of the Bull-ring (q.v.).

"Dalkey is a small island in St. George's Channel, near the coast of Ireland, a little to the south of Dublin Bay.

King of Khorassan. So Anva're, the Persian poet of the twelfth century, is called.

King of Metals. Gold, which is not only the most valuable of metals, but also is without its peer in freedom from alloy. It is got without smelting; wherever it exists it is visible to the eye; and it consists with little else than pure silver. Even with this precious alloy, the pure metal ranges from sixty to ninety-nine per cent.

King of Misrule. Sometimes called Lorn, and sometimes Amor, etc. At Oxford and Cambridge one of the Masters of Arts superintended both the Christmas and Camillems sports, for which he was allowed a fee of 40s. These diversions continued till the Reformation. Polydore Vergil says of the feast of Misrule that it was "derived from the Roman Saturnalia," held in King's Cave

October for five days (17th to 22nd).
The Feast of Misrule lasted twelve days. If we compare our Bacchalian Christmases and New Year-tides with these Saturnalia and Feasts of Janus, we shall find such near affinity between them both in regard of time...and in their manner of solemnizing...that we must needs conclude the one to be the very same or issue of the other.”—Prynne: History Multiz.

King of Painters. A title assumed by Parrhasios, the painter, a contemporary of Zeuxis. Plutarch says he wore a purple robe and a golden crown. (Flourished 400 B.C.)

King of Preachers. Louis Bourdaloue, a French clergyman (1632-1704).

King of Rome. A title conferred by Napoleon I., on his son on the day of his birth. More generally called the Duke of Reichstadt (1811-1832).

King of Shreds and Patches. In the old mysteries Vice used to be dressed as a mimic king in a part-coloured suit. (Shakespeare: Hamlet, iii. 4) The phrase is metaphorically applied to certain literary operatives who compile books for publishers, but supply no originality of thought or matter.

King of Spain's Trumpeter (The). A donkey. A pun on the word don, a Spanish magnate.

King of Terrors. Death.

King of Waters. The river Ammon, in South America.

King of Yvetot (pron. Fr-to). A man of mighty pretensions but small merits. Yvetot is near Rouen, and was once a seigneurie, the possessors of which were entitled kings—a title given them in 534 by Clovis I., and continued far into the fourteenth century.

Il était un royaume,
Peu connu dans l'histoire,
Solitair, se ceint tout,
Dommant fort bien sans gloire;
Il communique par Jeumont,
D'un simple hameau de coton,
Bouton
Oh ! oh, oh ! oh !
Aï ! ah ! ah ! ah !
Quel bon petit roi c'étoit ;
La ! la ! la !
A King there was, un roi d'Yvetot, c'est,
But little known in story,
Went soon to bed, till daylight slept,
And soundly did his story,
His royal brow in cotton cap
Would winter, when he took his nap, Kidnapped.
Oh ! oh ! oh !
Aï ! ah ! ah ! ah !
A famous king he !
King of the Bean (roi de la fève). The Twelfth-night king; so called because he was chosen by distributing pieces of Twelfth-cake to the children present, and the child who had the slice with the bean in it was king of the company for the night. This sport was indulged in till the Reformation, even at the two universities.

King of the Beggars or Gipsies. Bamfylde Moore Carew, a noted English vagabond (1689-1770).

King of the Forest. The oak, which not only braves the storm, but fosters the growth of tender parasites under its arms.

King of the Herrings (The). The Chimaera, or sea-ape, a cartilaginous fish which accompanies a shoal of herrings in their migrations.

King of the Jungle (The). A tiger.

King of the Peak (The). Sir George Vernon.

King of the Sea (The). The herring. "The head of an average-sized whale is from fifteen to sixteen feet [about one-third the length], and the lip open some six or eight feet; next to such a mouth there is scarcely any thing, not sufficiently large to allow a herring to pass down it. This little oily fellow [the herring], some fourteen inches in length, would choke a monster whale, and is hence called 'the king of the sea.'”—C. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 132.

King of the Teign. Baldrick of South Devon, son of Eri, who defended his territory against Algar, a lawless chief.

King of the World. So the Caledonians, in Osian's time, called the Roman emperor.

King Chosen by the Neighing of a Horse (A). Darius. (See Horse: A horse wins a kingdom.)

King Over the Water (The). The Young Pretender, or Chevalier Charles Edward.

"My father so far compromised his loyalty, as to announce merely 'The king,' as his first toast after dinner, instead of the emphatic 'King George.' . . . Our guest made a motion with his glass, so as to pass it over the water-decanter which stood beside him, and added, 'Over the water.'"—Sir W. Scott: Bepameron, letter v.

King's [or Queen's] Bench. This was originally the Ante Room, which followed the king in all his travels, and in which he occupied the lit de justice. In the absence of the sovereign, the judges were supreme. Of course there is no lit de justice or bench for the sovereign in any of our law courts now.

King's Cave. Opposite to Campbelton; so called because it was here that King Robert Bruce and his reigne loved when they landed on the mainland from the Isle of Arran. (Statistical Account of Scotland, v. p. 167, article 'Arran').

King's Chair. A seat made by two bearers with their hands. On Candlemas Day the children of Scotland used to bring their schoolmaster a present in money, and the boy who brought the largest sum was king for the nonce. When school was dismissed, the "king" was carried on a seat of hands in procession, and the seat was called the "king's chair."

King's Crag. Fife, in Scotland. Called "king" because Alexander III. of Scotland was killed there.

As he was riding in the dusk of the evening along the sea-coast of Fife, between Burntisland and Cupar, a child became over the breast of the Prince, and his horse, starting or stumbling, was thrown over the rock and killed on the spot. The people of the country still point out the very spot where it happened, and which is called "The King's Crag."—Sir Walter Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, vii.

King's Cross. Up to the accession of George IV. this locality in London was called "Battle Bridge," and had an infamous notoriety. In 1821 some speculators built there a number of houses, and, at the suggestion of Mr. Bray, changed the name.

King's Evil. Scrofula: so called from a notion which prevailed from the reign of Edward the Confessor to that of Queen Anne that it could be cured by the royal touch. The Jacobites considered that the power did not descend to William III. and Anne because the "divine" hereditary right was not fully possessed by them, but the office remained in our Prayer-Book till 1719. Prince Charles Edward, when he claimed to be Prince of Wales, touched a female child for the disease in 1715; but the last person touched in England was Dr. Johnson, in 1712, when only thirty months old, by Queen Anne. The French kings laid claim to the same divine power even from the time of Anne of Cleves, a.d. 481, and on Easter Sunday, 1850, Louis XIV. touched 1,600 persons, using these words: "Le roy te toche, Dieu te guerisse." The practice was introduced by Henry VII. of presenting the person "touched" with a small gold or silver coin, called a touch-piece. The one presented to Dr. Johnson has St. George and the Dragon on one side and a ship on the other; the legend of the former is Soli deo gloria, and of the latter Anna D.G.M.B.R.F.E.T.H. REG. (Anne, by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland Queen."

We are told that Charles II. touched 92,107 persons. The smallest number in one year was 2,925 in 1653; and the largest number was in 1654, when many were trampled to death. (See Macaulay's History of England, chap. xiv.) John Brown, a royal surgeon, had to superintend the ceremony. (See Macleod, vi. 4.)

King's Keys. The crow-bars, hatches, and hammers used by sheriff's officers to force doors and locks. (Law phrase.)

"The door, framed to withstand attacks from these men, constables, and other personas, considered to use the king's keys... set his efforts at defiance"—Sir W. Scott: Regenerate, chap. xix.

King's Men. The 78th Foot; so called from their motto, "Cudich't Rhi" (Help the king).

It was raised by Kenneth Mackenzie, Earl of Seaforth, in 1777, and called the Seaforth Highlanders; in 1783 it became the 72nd Foot. From 1850 to 1861, it was called the "Duke of Albany's Highlanders"; and since 1861 it has been the 2nd Battalion of the "Seaforth Highlanders (Ross-shire Buffs), the Duke of Albany's.

King's Mess. (The). An extra mess of rice boiled with milk—or of almonds, peas, or other pulse—given to the monks of Melrose Abbey by Robert [Bruce], the feast to be held on January 10th, and £100 being set aside for the purpose; but the monks were bound to feed on the same day fifteen poor men, and give to each four ells of broad cloth or six ells of narrow cloth, with a pair of shoes or sandals.

King's Oak. (The). The oak under which Henry VIII. sat, in Epping Forest, while Anne (Boleyn) was being executed.

King's Picture. Money; so called because coin is stamped with "the image" of the reigning sovereign.

King's Cheese goes half in Paring. A king's income is half consumed by the numerous calls on his purse.

King's Hanoverian White Horse. (The). The 8th Foot; called the "King's Hanoverian" for their service against the Pretender in 1715, and called the "White Horse" from their b d' or, now called the "Liverpool Regiment."

King's Own Scottish Borderers. (The). Raised by Leven when Claverhouse rode out of Edinburgh.

Kings. Of the 2,500 sovereigns who have hitherto reigned, 300 have been overthrown. 134 have been assassinated. 125 have been taken captive in war. 108 have been executed.
Kings, etc., of England. Much foolish superstition has of late been circulated respecting certain days supposed to be "fatal" to the crowned heads of Great Britain. The following list may help to discriminate truth from fiction:

(From mean the regular year commenced from To is the day of death.)

WILLIAM I., from Monday, December 25th, 1066, to Thursday, September 9th, 1087; WILLIAM II., from Sunday, September 26th, 1087, to Thursday, August 2nd, 1100; HENRY I., from Sunday, August 5th, 1100, to Sunday, December 1st, 1135; STEPHEN, from Thursday, December 26th, 1135, to Monday, October 25th, 1154.

HENRY II., from Sunday, December 19th, 1154, to Thursday, July 6th, 1189; RICHARD I., from Sunday, September 3rd, 1189, to Tuesday, April 6th, 1199; JOHN, from Thursday, May 27th, 1199, to Wednesday, October 19th, 1216; HENRY III., from Saturday, October 28th, 1216, to Wednesday, November 16th, 1272; EDWARD I., from Sunday, November 20th, 1272, to Friday, July 7th, 1307; EDWARD II., from Saturday, July 8th, 1307, to Tuesday, January 20th, 1327; EDWARD III., from Sunday, January 25th, 1327 (s.s.), to Sunday, June 21st, 1377; RICHARD II., from Monday, June 22nd, 1377, to Monday, September 29th, 1399; HENRY IV., from Tuesday, September 30th, 1399, to Monday, March 20th, 1413; HENRY V., from Tuesday, March 21st, 1413, to Monday, August 31st, 1422; HENRY VI., from Tuesday, September 1st, 1422, to Wednesday, March 4th, 1461; EDWARD IV., from Wednesday, March 4th, 1461, to Wednesday, April 9th, 1483; EDWARD V., from Wednesday, April 9th, 1483, to Sunday, June 22nd, 1483; RICHARD III., from Thursday, June 26, 1483, to Monday, August 22nd, 1485.

HENRY VII., from Monday, August 22nd, 1485, to Saturday, April 21st, 1509; HENRY VIII., from Sunday, April 22nd, 1509, to Friday, January 26th, 1547; EDWARD VI., from Friday, January 26th, 1547, to Thursday, July 6th, 1553; MARY, from Thursday, July 6th, 1553, to Thursday, November 17th, 1554; ELIZABETH, from Thursday, November 17th, 1554, to Thursday, March 24th, 1603.

JAMES I., from Thursday, March 24th, 1603, to Sunday, March 27, 1625; CHARLES I., from Sunday, March 27th, 1625, to Tuesday, January 30th, 1649; [Commonwealth—CROMWELL, died Friday, September 3-13, 1658.] CHARLES II., restored Tuesday, May 29th, 1660, died Friday, February 6th, 1685; JAMES II., from Tuesday, February 6th, 1685, to Saturday, December 11th, 1688; WILLIAM III., from Wednesday, February 13th, 1689, to Monday, March 8th, 1702; ANNE, from Monday, March 8th, 1702, to Sunday, August 1st, 1714. (Both O.S.)

GEORGE I., from Sunday, August 1st, 1714, to Saturday, June 11th, 1727 O.S., 1721 N.S.; GEORGE II., from Saturday, June 11th, 1727, to Saturday, October 25th, 1760, N.S.; GEORGE III., from Saturday, October 25th, 1760, to Saturday, January 29th, 1820; GEORGE IV., from Saturday, January 29th, 1820, to Saturday, June 26th, 1830; GEORGE IV., from Saturday, June 26th, 1830, to Tuesday, June 20th, 1837; VICTORIA, from Tuesday, June 20th, 1837.

Hence fire have terminated their reign on a Sunday, six on a Monday, four on a Tuesday, four on a Wednesday, six on a Thursday, four on a Friday, and six on a Saturday. Nine have begun and ended their reign on the same day; Henry I. and Edward III. on a Sunday; Richard II. on a Monday; Edward IV., Anne, and George I. on a Wednesday; Mary on a Thursday; George III. and George IV. on a Saturday.

Kings, etc., of England.

William I. styled himself King of the English, Normans, and Commissioners; Henry I., King of the English and Duke of the Normans; Stephen, King of the English; Henry II., King of England, Duke of Normandy and Aquitania, and Count of Anjou; John, King of England, Lord of Ireland, Duke of Normandy and Aquitania, and Count of Anjou; Henry III., in 1259, dropped the titles of “Duke of Normandy” and “Count of Anjou.” Edward I., King of England, Lord of Ireland, and Duke of Aquitania; Edward II., made his son “Duke of Aquitania” in the nineteenth year of his reign, and styled himself King of England and Lord of Ireland; Edward III., from 1337, adopted the style of King of France and England, and Lord of Ireland, and Duke of Aquitania; Richard II., King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland; Edward VI., of England, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith—this last title was given to Henry VIII. in the Kings have Long Hands. Do not quarrel with a king, as his power and authority reach to the end of his dominions. The Latin proverb is, "Ad esse in longas regiones esse manus;" and the German, "Mit grossen herren es ist nicht gut kirschen zu essen" ("It is not good to eat cherries with great men, as they throw the stones in your eyes").

"There's such divinity doth hedge a king, That sooner 牛 are seen what it would." Shakespeare: King in Hamlet, v. 3.

The books of the four kings. A pack of cards.

"After supper were brought in the books of the four kings."--Shabatai: Barabba, and Shabbeth, l. 22.

The three kings of Cologne. The representatives of the three kings who came from the East to offer gifts to the infant Jesus. Tradition makes them three Eastern kings, and at Cologne the names ascribed to them are Kaspar, Melchior, and Balthazar.

Kings may override Grammar. (See Grammar.)

Kingly Titles.

Abgarus (The Grand). So the kings of Edessa were styled.

Abint'rach (my father the king). The chief ruler of the ancient Philistines.

Agag (lord). The chief ruler of the Amalekites (4 syll.).

Akbar Khan (very-great chieftain). Hindustan.

Anax. The chief ruler of the ancient Greek kingdoms. Anaxandron was the over-king.

Achon (The). The chief of the nine magistrates of Athens. The next in rank was called Basileus (3 syll.); and the third Polémarch (3 syll.), or Field-Marshall.

Asser or Assyr (blessed one). The chief ruler of ancient Assyria.

Attakey (father prince). Persia, 1118.

Augustus. The title of the reigning Emperor of Rome, when the grand presumptive was styled "Caesar." (See Augustus.)

Kingdom Come. Death, the grave, execution.

"And forty punias be theirs, a pretty sum,
For sending such a rogue to kingdom come."—Peter Pindar: Subjects for Painters.

Kingsale. Wearing a hat in the presence of Royalty.

Kingsley's Stand. The 26th Foot. Called "Kingsley's" from their colonel (1756-1769); and called "Stand" from their "stand" at Mindon in 1759. Now called the "Lancashire Fusiliers."

Kingston Bridge. A card bent, so that when the pack is cut, it is cut at this card. "Faire le Pont?" is thus described in Fleming and Tibbins's Grand Dictionary: "Action de couper quelques-uns des cartes, et de les arranger de telle sorte que celui qui doit couper ne puisse y avoir couper qu'à l'endroit qu'on veut."

Kingston - on - Thames. Named King's-stone, from a large, square block of stone near the town hall, on which the early Anglo-Saxon monarchs knelt when they were anointed to the kingly office: Edward the Elder, Athelstan, Edmund, Ethelred, Ethel, Edwy, and Edward the Martyr received on this stone the royalunction. The stone is now enclosed with railings.

Kingstown (Ireland), formerly called Dunleary. The name was changed in 1821 out of compliment to George IV., who visited Ireland that year, and left Dunleary harbour for his return home on September 6th.

Kingswood Lions. Donkeys: Kingswood being at one time famous for the number of asses kept by the colliers who lived thereabout.

Kinless Loons. The judges whom Cromwell sent into Scotland were so termed, because they condemned and acquitted those brought before them wholly irrespectively of party, and solely on the merits of the charge with which they were accused.

Kiosk. A Turkish summer-house or alcove supported by pillars. (Turkish, kuşh; Persian, kushk, a palace; French, kiosque.) The name is also given to newspaper stands in France and Belgium.

Kirk of Skufl. (Gaelic church in Banffshire; so called because the skulls and other bones of the Norsemen who fell in the neighbouring field, called the Bloody Pots, were built into its walls.

Kirke-grim. The nix who looks to order in churches, punishes those who misbehave themselves there, and the persons employed to keep"it tidy if they fail in their duty. (Scandinavian mythology.)
Kiss. The Queen's Royal West Surrey. Called "Kirke" from Piercy Kirke, their colonel, 1682-1691; and "Lamb" from their badge, the Paschal Lamb, the crest of the house of Braganza, in compliment to Queen Catherine, to whom they were a guard of honour in her progress to London.

Kirkrapine (3 syl.). While Una was in the hut of Corioca, Kirkrapine forced his way in; but the lion, springing on him, tore him to pieces. The meaning is that Romanism was increased by rapine, but the English lion at the Reformation put an end to the rapacity of monks. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, bk. i.)

Kismet. The fulfilment of destiny. (Turkish, qisnet, a lot.)

"The word Ksi:net, which he scarcely comprehended before, seems now to be fraught with... (meaning). This is Kismet; this is the fulfilment of destiny; thus is life love."—Nineteenth Century, February, 1882, p. 240.

Kiss, as a mode of salutation, comes from its use to express reverence or worship. Thus to adore idols and to kiss idols mean the same thing. Indeed, the word adore signifies simply to carry the hand to the mouth, that is, to kiss it to the idol. We still kiss the hand in salutation. Various parts of the body are kissed to distinguish the character of the adoration paid. Thus, to kiss the lips is to adore the living breath of the person saluted; to kiss the feet or ground is to humble oneself in adoration; to kiss the garments is to express veneration to whatever belongs to or touches the person who wears them. "Kiss the Son, lest He be angry" (Ps. ii. 12), means Worship the Son of God. Pharaoh tells Joseph, "Thou shalt be over my house, and upon thy mouth shall all my people kiss," meaning they shall reverence the commands of Joseph by kissing the roll on which his commands would be written. "Samuel poured oil on Saul, and kissed him," to acknowledge submission to God's anointed (1 Sam. x. 1). In the Hebrew state, this mode of expressing reverence arose from the form of government established, whether under the patriarchal or matrimonial figure.

A Judas kiss. An act of treachery. The allusion is to the apostle Judas, who betrayed his Master with a kiss.

Kiss Hands (7b). To kiss the hand of the sovereign either on accepting or retiring from a high government office. (See Kiss.)

"Kissing the hand to the statue of a god was a Roman form of adoration."—Spenser: Principles of Sociology, vol. ii. part iv. chap. 6, p. 123.

Kiss the Book. After taking a legal oath, we are commanded to kiss the book, which in our English courts is the New Testament, except when Jews "are sworn in." This is the kiss of confirmation or promise to act in accordance with the words of the oath (Moravians and Quakers are not required to take legal oaths). The kiss, in this case, is a public acknowledgment that you adore the deity whose book you kiss, as a worshipper.

It is now permitted to affirm, if persons like to do so. Mr. Bradlaugh refused to take an oath, and after some years of contention the law was altered.

Kiss the Dust. To die, or to be slain. In Psalm lxxii, 9 it is said, "his enemies shall lick the dust."

Kiss the Harp's Foot (7b). To be late or too late for dinner. The hare has run away, and you are only in time to "kiss" the print of his foot. A common proverb.

"You may kiss the hare's foot; post factum consumat."—Col: Dictionary.

Kiss the Mistress (7b). To make a good hit, to shoot right into the eye of the target. In bowls, what we now call the Jack used to be called the "mistress," and when one ball just touches another it is said "to kiss it." To kiss the Mistress or Jack is to graze another bowl with your own.

"Rub on, and kiss the mistress."—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, i. 2.

Kiss the Rod (7b). To submit to punishment or misfortune meekly and without murmuring.

Kiss behind the Garden Gate (7b). A pansey. A practical way of saying "Pensée de mort," the flower-language of the pansey.

Kiss given to a Poet. Margaret, daughter of James I. of Scotland and wife of Louis XI. (when only dauphin), kissed the mouth of Alain Chartier "for uttering so many fine things." Chartier, however, was a decidedly ugly man, and, of course, was asleep at the time.

The tale is sometimes erroneously told of Ronard the poet.

Kiss the Gunner's Daughter (7b). To be flagged on board ship, being tied to the breech of a cannon.

"I was made to kiss the wench that never speaks but when she scolds, and that's the gunner's daughter. Yes, the minister's son... has the cat a scratch on his back."—Sir W. Scott: Beaufort, chap. xiv.

Kiss the Place to make it Well. A relic of a very common custom all over the world of sucking poison from wounds. St. Martin of Tours, when he was at Paris, observed at the city gates a leper full of sores; and, going up to him, he kissed the sores, whereupon the leper was instantly made whole (Sulpicius Severus: Dialogues). Again, when St. Mayeul had committed some grave offence, he was sent, by way of penance, to kiss a leper who was begging alms at the monastery. St. Mayeul went up to the man, kissed his wounds, and the leprous left him. Half a score similar examples may be found in the Bollandists, without much searching.

"Who ran to help me when I fell,
And kissed the place to make it well?"

Kissing-comfit. The candied root of the Sea-eggplant maximum prepared as a lozeng, to perfume the breath.

Kissing-crust. The crust where the lower lump of bread kisses the upper. In French, baissière de pain.

Kissing the Hand. Either kissing the sovereign's hand at a public introduction, or kissing one's own hand to bid farewell to a friend, and kissing the tips of our fingers and then moving the hand in a sort of salute to imply great satisfaction at some beautiful object, thought, or other charm, are remnants of pagan worship. If the idol was conveniently low enough, the devotee kissed its hand; if not, the devotees kissed their own hands and waved them to the image. God said He had in Israel seven thousand persons who had not bowed unto Baal, "every mouth which hath not kissed him." (See Kiss.)

"Many... whom the fame of this excellent virtue had shadowed falsely, confounded by that matchless beauty, could but kiss the finger-tips of their right hands at sight of her, as in adoration to the goddess Venus herself."—Pater: Martian the Epicurean, chap. vi.

Kissing the Pope's Toe. Matthew of Westminster says, it was customary formerly to kiss the hand of his Holiness; but that a certain woman, in the eighth century, not only kissed the Pope's hand, but "squeezed it." The Church magnate, seeing the danger to which he was exposed, cut off his hand, and was compelled in future to offer his foot, a custom which has continued to the present hour.

Kissing under the Mistletoe. Balder, the Apollo of Scandinavian mythology, was killed by a mistletoe arrow given to the blind Höder, by Loki, the god of mischief and potectate of our earth. Balder was restored to life, but the mistletoe was placed in future under the care of Friga, and was never again to be an instrument of evil till it touched the earth, the empire of Loki. It is always suspended from ceilings, and when persons of opposite sexes pass under it, they give each other the kiss of peace and love in the full assurance that the epithete is no longer an instrument of mischief.

A correspondent in Notes and Queries suggests that the Romans dedicated the holly to Saturn, whose festival was in December, and that the early Christians decked their houses with the Saturn emblems to deceive the Romans and escape persecution.

Kist-vaen (The). A rude stone sepulchre or mausoleum, like a chest with a flat stone for a cover.

"At length they reached a large mound, on the top of which was placed one of those receptacles for the dead of the ancient British chiefs of distinction, called Kist-vaen, which were composed of upright fragments of granite, so placed as to form a stone coffin..."—Sir Walter Scott: The Betrothed, chap. xxix.

Kist of Whistles (A). A church-organ (Scotch). Cist, a box or chest.

Kistnerappan. The Indian water-god. Persons at the point of death are sometimes carried into the Ganges, and sometimes to its banks, that Kistnerappan may purify them from all defilement before they die. Others have a little water poured into the palms of their hands with the same object.

Kit. (Anglo-Saxon, créste, a chest or box [of tools].) Hence that which contains the necessaries, tools, etc., of a workman.

A soldier's kit. His outfit.

The whole kit of them. The whole lot. (See above.) Used contemptuously.

Kit. A three-stringed fiddle. (Anglo-Saxon, cythere; Latin, cilium.)

Kit-cat Club. A club formed in 1688 by the leading Whigs of the day, and held in Shire Lane (now Lower Slev's Place) in the house of Christopher Cat, a pastry-cook, who supplied the mutton pie, and after whom the club was named. Sir Godfrey Kneller painted forty-two portraits of the club members for Jacob Tonson, the secretary, whose villa was at Barn Elms and latterly the club was held. In order to accommodate the paintings to the height of the club-room, he was obliged to make them three-quarter lengths; hence a three-quarter portrait is still called a kit-cat.
Strictly speaking, a kit-cat canvas is twenty-eight inches by thirty-six.

"Steele, Addison, Congreve, Garth, Vanbrugh, Mauwaring, Steyne, Walpole, and Pultney were of it; so was Lord Dorset and the present Duke. Mauwaring... was the ruling man in all conversation... Lord Sandwich and the Earl of Essex were also members... Each member gave his picture."—Pope to Spence.

Kit Cats. Mutton pies; so called from Christopher Cat, the pastrycook, who excelled in these pasties. (See above.)

Kit's Coty House, on the road between Rochester and Maidstone, a well-known cromlech, is Katigern's or Kittigerrn's coty house—that is, the house or tomb of Kittigern, made of ovals or huge flat stones. (See HACKELL'S CORN and DEVIL'S CORRT.

Katigern was the brother of Vortimer, and leader of the Britons, who was slain in the battle of Aylesford or Epsford, fighting against Hengist and Horsa. Lambarde calls it CitϚtσc&hove (1570). The structure consists of two upright side-stones, one standing in the middle as a support or tenon, and a fourth imposed as a roof. Numberless stones lie scattered in the vicinity. Often spelt "Kitt's Coty House."

Kitchen. Any relish eaten with dry bread, as cheese, bacon, dried fish, etc.

"A luxury heart and scarce seek better kitchen to a barley scote."—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate, chap. xl.

Kitchenmaid (Mrs.). So Queen Elizabeth called Lord Mountjoy, her lord-deputy in Ireland. In one of her letters to Lord Mountjoy she writes:—

'With your frying-pan and other kitchen-stuff you have brought to their last home more relish than those that promised more and did less.'

Kite (A), in legal phraseology, is a junior counsel who is allotted at an assize court to advocate the cause of a prisoner who is without other defence. For this service he receives a guinea as his honorarium. A kite on Stock Exchange means a worthless bill. An honorarium given to a barrister is in reality a mere kite. (See below, KITE-FLYING.)

Kite-flying. To fly the kite is to "raise the wind," or obtain money on bills, whether good or bad. It is a Stock Exchange phrase, and means, as a kite fluctuates in the air by reason of its lightness, and is a mere toy, so these bills fly about, but are light and worthless. (See STOCK EXCHANGE SLANG.)

Kiteley (2 syl.). A jealous city merchant in Ben Jonson's Every Man in His Humour.

Kittle of Fish. A pretty kittle of fish. A pretty muddle, a bad job. Corruption of "kiddle of fish." A kiddle is a basket set in the opening of a weir for catching fish. Perhaps the Welsh hiddil or hidyl, a strainer. (See KETTLE.)

Klaus (Peter). The prototype of Rip Van Winkle, whose sleep lasted twenty years. Pronounce Kluze. (See SANTA KLAUS.)

Klephs (The) etymologically means robbers, but came to be a title of distinction in modern Greece. Those Greeks who rejected all overtures of their Turkish conquerors, betook themselves to the mountains, where they kept up for several years a desultory warfare, supporting themselves by raids on Turkish settlers. Aristoteles Valsaoris (born 1821) is the great "poet of the Klephs." (See Nineteenth Century, July, 1891, p. 130.)

Knack. Skill in handiwork. The derivation of this word is a great puzzle. Minshew suggests that it is a mere variant of knack. Cotgrave thinks it a variant of snap. Others give the German kuecken (to sound).

Knave. A lad, a garçon, a servant. (Anglo-Saxon, enif; French, knave, knave.) The knave of clubs, etc., is the son or servant of the king and queen thereof. In an old version of the Bible we read: "Paul, a knave of Jesus Christ, called to be an apostle," etc. (Rom. 1. 1).

This version, we are told, is in the Harleian Library, but is generally supposed to be a forgery; but, without doubt, Wycliff (Rev. xii. 4, 13) used the compound "Knave-child," and Chaucer uses the same in The Man of Law's Tale, line 5159.

Knave of Sologne (A). More knave than fool. The French say "l'iainsde Sologne." Sologne is a part of the departments of Loirct et Loir-et-Cher.

Knee. Greek, genu; Latin, genu; French, genou; Sanskrit, jari; Saxou, kene; German, kne; English, knee.

Knee Tribute. Adoration or reverence, by prostration or bending the knee.

"Coming to receive from us Knee-tribute yet unpaid, prostration vile."—Milton: Paradise Lost, v. 782.

Kneph. The ram-headed god of ancient Egypt, called also Amen-ra, and by the Greeks, Ammon.

Knickerbockers. Loose knee-breeches, worn by boys, cyclists, sportsmen, tourists, etc. So named from George Cruikshank's illustrations of Washington Irving's book referred to above. In these illustrations the Dutch worthies are drawn with very loose knee-breeches.

Knife is the emblem borne by St. Agatha, St. Albert, and St. Christopher.

The flaying knife is the emblem of St. Bartholomew, because he was flayed.

A sacrificial knife is borne in Christian art by St. Zadkiel, the angel.

The knife of academic knots, Chrysippos, so called because he was the keenest disputant of his age (b.c. 280-207).

War to the knife. Deadly strike.

Knife = sword or dagger.

"Till my keen knife see not the wound it makes."—Shakespeare: Marlowe, I. 2.

Knife and Fork. He is a capital knife-and-fork, a good trencherman.

"He did due honour to the venison; ate and drank, and proved a capital knife-and-fork even at the risk of dying the same night of an indigestion."—Garrick: Promises of Marriage, vi.

Knifeboard. One of the seats for passengers running along the roof of an omnibus. Now almost obsolete.

Knight means simply a boy. (Saxon, cusht.) As boys (like the Latin yer and French garçon) were used as servants, so cusht came to mean a servant. Those who served the feudal kings bore arms, and persons admitted to this privilege were the king's knights; as this distinction was limited to men of family, the word became a title of honour next to the nobility. In modern Latin, a knight is termed märtius (golden), from the gilt spurs which he used to wear.

Lust of the knights. Maximilian I., of Germany (1459, 1493-1519).

Knight Rider Street. London. So named from the processions of knights from the Tower to Smithfield, where tournaments were held. Leigh Hunt says the name originated in a sign or some reference to the Heralds' College in the vicinity.

Knight of La Mancha. Don Quixote de la Mancha, the hero of Cervantes' novel, called Don Quixote.

Knight of the Bleeding Heart. The Bleeding Heart was one of the many semi-religious orders instituted in the Middle Ages in honour of the Virgin Mary, whose "heart was pierced with many sorrows."

"When he was at Holyrood who would have said that the young, sprightly George Douglas would have been content to play the locksmith hero in Lochleven, with no payer amusement than that of turning the key on two or three helpless women? A strange office for a Knight of the Bleeding Heart."—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot, xxiii.

Knight of the Cloak (The). Sir Walter Raleigh. So called from his throwing his cloak into a puddle for Queen Elizabeth to step on as she was about to enter her barge. (See Kenilworth, chap. xvi.)

"Your lordship meareth that Raleigh, the Devonshire youth," said Varney, "the Knight of the Cloak, as they call him at Court."—Dickens, chap. xvi.

Elizabeth, in the same novel, addresses him as Sir Squire of the Soiled Cassock.

Knight of the Couching Leopard (The). Sir Kenneth, or rather the Earl of Huntingdon, Prince Royal of Scotland, who followed, ineptitude, Richard I. to the Crusade, and is the chief character of the Tulisan, a novel by Sir Walter Scott.

Knight of the Post. A man in the pillory, or that has been tied to a whipping-post, is jestingly so called.

Knight of the Rueful Countenance. Don Quixote.

Knight's Fee. A portion of land held by custom, sufficient to maintain a knight to do service as such for the king. William the Conqueror created 60,000 such fees when he came to England. All who had £20 a year in lands or income were compelled to be knights.

Knight's Ward (The). A superior compartment in Newgate for those who paid three pieces by way of "garnish." No longer in existence.

Knights. (See Cross-Legged . . .)

Knights Bachelors. Persons who are simply knights, but belong to no order. (French, bas-echvaliers.)

Knights Bannerets. Knights created on the field of battle. The king or general cut off the point of their flag, and made it square, so as to resemble a banner. Hence knights bannerets are called Knights of the Square Flag.

Knights Baronets. Inferior barons, an order of hereditary rank, created by James I. in 1611. The title was sold for money, and the funds went nominally towards the plantation of Ulster. These knights bear the arms of Ulster, viz. a field argent, a sinister hand couped at the wrist gules. (See Hand.)

Knights Errant. In France, from 768 to 987, the land was encumbered with fortified castles; in England this was not the case till the reign of Stephen. The lords of these castles used to carry off females and commit rapine, so that a class of men sprang up, at least in the pages of romance, who roamed about in full armour to protect the defenceless and aid the oppressed.

"Praetura queaque metit, gladium is the perfect account of a knight errant."—Dryden: Indications of the Times.

Knights of Carpentry or Carpet Knights, are not military but civil knights, such as mayors, lawyers, and so on; so called because they receive their knighthood kneeling on a carpet, and not on the battle-field.

Knights of Industry. Sharpers.

Knights of Labour. Members of a trades union organised in 1834, in the United States of America, to regulate the amount of wages to be demanded by workmen, the degree of skill to be exacted from them, and the length of a day’s work. This league enjoin when a strike is to be made, and when workmen of the union may resume work.

Knights of Malta or Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem. Some time after the first crusade (1042), some Neapolitan merchants built at Jerusalem a hospital for sick pilgrims and a church which they dedicated to St. John; these they committed to the charge of certain knights, called Hospitallers of St. John. In 1310 these Hospitallers took Rhodes Island, and changed their title into Knights of Rhodes. In 1323 they were expelled from Rhodes by the Turks, and took up their residence in the Isle of Malta.

-Knights of St. Crispin. Shoemakers. Crispin Crispian was a shoe maker. (See Henry I., iv. 3.)

Knights of St. Patrick. Instituted in 1783, in honour of the patron saint of Ireland.

Knights of the Bag. Bagmen who travel for mercantile orders.

Knights of the Bath. (See Bath.)

Knights of the Blade. Bullies who were for ever appealing to their swords to browbeat the timid.

Knights of the Chamber or Chamber Knights, are knights bachelors made in times of peace in the presence chamber, and not in the camp. Being military men, they differ from "carpet knights," who are always civilians.

Knights of the Clover. Butchers.

Knights of the Garter. (See Garter.)

Knights of the Green Cloth. Same as Carpet Knights (q.v.).

Knights of the Handcuffs. Constables, policemen, etc., who carry handcuffs for refractory or suspicious prisoners taken up by them.

Knights of the Hare. An order of twelve knights created by Edward III. in France, upon the following occasion:---A great shouting was raised by the French army, and Edward thought the shout was the onset of battle; but found afterwards it was occasioned by a haro running between the two armies.

Knights of the Holy Sepulchre. An Order of military knights founded by Joffrey of Bouillon, in 1099, to guard the "Holy Sepulchre."

Knights of the Pencil. The better in races; so called because they always keep a pencil in hand to mark down their bets.

Knights of the Pestle or Knights of the Pestle and Mortar. Apothecaries or druggists, whose chief instrument is the pestle and mortar, used in compounding medicines.

Knights o’ the Post. Persons who haunted the purlicues of the courts, ready to be hired for a bribe to swear anything; so called from their being always found waiting at the posts which the sheriffs set up outside their doors for posting proclamations on.

"There are knights of the post and handy cheats enough to swear the truth of the broadest contradictions."—South.

"A knight of the post, quoth he, ‘for so I am termed, a fellow that will swear any man for twenty pence.’"—Nash: Pierce Peniles (1528).

Knights of the Rainbow. Flunkies; so called from their gorgeous livories.

"The servants who attended them contradicted the inferences to be drawn from the mark of their masters; and according to the custom of the knights of the rainbow, gave many hints that they were not people to serve any but men of first-rate consequence."—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet, chap. 20.
Knights of the Round Table. King Arthur's knights, so called from the large circular table round which they sat. The table was circular to prevent any heart-sore about precedence. The number of these knights is variously given. The popular notion is that they were twelve; several authorities say there were forty; but the History of Prince Arthur states that the table was made to accommodate 150. King Leodegrance, who gave Arthur the table on his wedding-day, sent him also 100 knights, Merlin furnished twenty-eight, Arthur himself added two, and twenty "sieves" were left to reward merit (chaps. xlv., xlvii.). These knights went forth into all countries in quest of adventures. The most noted are—

Sir Alosen, Balamore, Beatowiris, Beleobus, Beltrone, Borsunt, Bers, Ector, Eric, Eucain, Floll, Ga'heris, Gal'ahad, Ga'ohalt, Garrett, Gawain or Ywain, Grislet, Kay, Lamorev, Lanercot du Lac, Lionel, Marhaus, Palamide, Pequinaet, Pevons, Peredur or Per'ead, Sagris, Superab'ulis, Tor, Tristan or Tristan of Leomains, Turquine, Wigtous, Wip'anor, etc., etc.

A list of the knights and a description of their armour is given in the Theatre of Honour by Andrew Farse (1622). According to this list, the number was 151; but in Lanreid of the Lake (vol. ii. p. 81), they are said to have amounted to 250.

Knights of the Shears. Tailors. The word sheaf is a play on the word shire or county.

Knights of the Shell. The Argonauts of St. Nicholas, a military order, instituted in the 14th century by Carlo III., King of Naples. Their insignia was a "collar of shells."

Knights of the Shire. Now called County Members; that is, members of Parliament elected by counties in contradistinction to Borough members.

Knights of the Spigot. Landlords of hotels, etc.; mine host is a "knight of the spigot."

"When an old song comes across us merry old knights of the spigot it runs away with our discretion."—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth, chap. viii.

Knights of the Swan. An order of the House of Cleve.

Knights of the Stick. Compositors. The stick is the printer's "composing stick," which he holds in his left hand while with his right hand he fills it with letters from his "case." It holds just enough type not to fatigue the hand of the compositor, and when full, the type is transferred to the "galley."

Knights of the Thistle. Said to have been established in 809 by Achacius, King of the Scots, and revived in 1540 by James V. of Scotland. Queen Anne placed the order on a permanent footing. These knights are sometimes called Knights of St. Andrew.

Knights of the Whip. Coachmen.

Knighten Guild, now called Port-sken Ward. King Edgar gave it to thirteen knights for the following conditions:—(1) Each knight was to be victorious in three combats—one above-ground, one underground, and one in the water; and (2) each knight was, on a given day, to run with spears against all comers in East Smithfield. William the Conqueror confirmed the same unto the heirs of these knights. Henry I. gave it to the canons of Holy Trinity, and acquitted it of "all service."

Knipperdollings. A set of German heretics about the time of the Reformation, disciples of a man named Bernhard Knipperdollling. (Blount: Glossographia, 1681.)

Knock Under (To). Johnson says this expression arose from a custom once common of knocking under the table when any guest wished to acknowledge himself beaten in argument. Another derivation is knockle under—i.e. to knockle or bend the knuckle or knee in proof of submission. Bellenden Kerr says it is Te nock under, which he interprets "I am forced to yield."

Knocked into a Cocked Hat. Thoroughly beaten; altered beyond recognition; hors de combat. A cocked-hat, folded into a chapeau bras, is crushed out of all shape.

Knockers. Goblins who dwell in mines, and point out rich veins of lead and silver. In Cardiganshire the miners attribute the strange noises so frequently heard in mines to these spirits, which are sometimes called coblyns (German, Kobolde).

Knot. (Latin nodus, French nœud, Danish kuld, Dutch kant, Anglo-Saxon cnafta, allied to knot.) He has tied a knot with his tongue he cannot untie with his teeth. He has got married. He has tied the marriage knot by saying, "I take thee for my wedded wife," etc., but the knot is not to be untied so easily.
Knot and Bridle

The Gordian knot. (See Gordian.)
The marriage knot. (See Marriage.)
The ship went six or seven knots an hour. The log-line is divided into lengths by knots, each length is the same proportion of a nautical mile as half a minute is of an hour. The log-line being cast over, note is taken of the number of knots run out in half a minute, and this number shows the rate per hour.

True lovers' knot. Sir Thomas Browne thinks the knot owes its origin to the nodus Heracliius, a snaky complication in the caduceus or rod of Mercury, in which form the woollen girdle of the Greek brides was fastened.

To seek for a knot in a rush. Seeking for something that does not exist. Not a very wise phrase, seeing there are jointed rushes, probably not known when the proverb was first current. The Juncus acetosus, the Juncus lamprocarpus, the Juncus obtusifolius, and the Juncus polycarpus, are all jointed rushes.

Knot and Bridle (1). A mob-cap.

"Upon her head a small mob-cap she placed,
Of lawn so stuff, with large flowered ribbon arched,
Yet on a knot and bridle. In a bow,
Of scarlet flaring, her long chin below.
Peter Fidlar: Portfolio (Rush)."

Knots of May. The children's game. "Here we go gathering nuts of May" is a perversion of "Here we go gathering knots of May," referring to the old custom of gathering knots of flowers on May-day, or, to use the ordinary phrase, "to go a-maying." Of course, there are no nuts to be gathered in May.

Knotted Stick is Planed (The).
The house of Orleans is worsted by that of Burgundy. The house of Orleans bore for its badge a baton noble, the house of Burgundy a plane; hence the French saying, "Le baton noble est plané."

Knotgrass. Supposed, if taken in an infusion, to stop growth.

"Get you gone, you dwarf:
You minimus, of hindering knotgrass made."
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 2.

Knout (1 syl.) is a knotted bunch of chongs made of hide. It is a Tartar invention, but was introduced into Russia. (Knout, Tartar for knot.)

Know Thyself. The wise saw of Solon, the Athenian lawgiver (B.C. 683-558).
Koh-i-Nūr [Mountain of light]. A large diamond in the possession of the Queen of England. It was found on the banks of the Godavery (Deccan), 1550, and belonged to Shah Jehan and Aurungzebe the Great (Mogul kings). In 1739 it passed into the hands of Nadir Shah, who called it the Koh-i-Nūr. It next went to the monarchs of Afghanistan, and when Shah Shujah was deposed he gave it to Ranjit Singh, of the Punjab, as the price of his assistance towards the recovery of the throne of Cabul. It next went to Duleop Singh, but when the Punjab was annexed to the British crown in 1849, this noble diamond was surrendered to Great Britain. It is valued at £120,664, some say £110,000.

Kohol or Kohl. Russell says, "The Persian women blacken the inside of their eyelids with a powder made of black Kohol."

"And others mix the Kohol’s jetty dye
To give that long, dark languish to the eye."

Koli or the Kolis. The 51st Foot, so called in 1821 from the initial letters of the regimental title, King’s Own Light Infantry. Subsequently called the "Second Yorkshire (West Riding)," and now called the "1st Battalion of the South Yorkshire Regiment."

Konya Ompax. The words of dismissal in the Eulogistic Mysteries. A correspondent in Notes and Queries says "kou" or "kogx" is the Sanscrit Cauacha (the object of your desire); "ompax" is om (amen), puchas (all is over). If this is correct, the words would mean, God bless you, Amen. The ceremonies are concluded. When a judge gave sentence by dropping his pebble into the urn of mercy or death, he said "Puchas" (I have done it). The noise made by the stone in falling was called puchas (fate), and so was the dripping noise of the clepsydra, which limited the pleader’s quota of time.

Koppa. A Greek numeral = 90. (See Episemon.)

Korán, or, with the article, Al-Korán [the Reading]. The religious, social, civil, commercial, military, and legal code of Islam. It is rather remarkable that we call our Bible the written (Scripture), but the Arabs call their Bible the reciting (Korán). We are told to believe that portions of this book were communicated to the prophet at Mecca and Medîna by the angel Gabriel, with the sound of bells, Kor’igans or Corrigan. Nine fays of Britanny, of wonderful powers. They can predict future events, assume any shape they like, move quick as thought from place to place, and cure diseases or wounds. They are not more than two feet high, have long flowing hair, which they fond of combing. They are not only with a white veil, are excellent singers, and their favourite haunt is beside some fountain. They live at the sound of a bell or benediction. Their breath is most deadly. (Breton mythology.)

Koumiss or Kumiass. Fermented mare’s milk used as a beverage by the Tartar tribes of Central Asia. A slightly alcoholic drink of a similar kind is made with great ceremony in Siberia. It consists of slightly sour cow’s milk, sugar, and yeast. (Russian, kumis.)

"Kumiss is still prepared from mare’s milk by the Cumricks and Nogais, who, during the process of making it, keep the milk in constant agitation."—Raoul (1203) in his History of the World, pp. 50-51.

* The ceremony of making it is described at full length by Noel, in the Dictionary de la Fable, vol. iv. p. 334.

Kraal. A South African village, being a collection of huts in a circular form. (From corral.)

Kraken. A supposed sea-monster of vast size, said to have been seen off the coast of Norway and on the North American coasts. It was first described (1750) by Pontoppidan. Pliny speaks of a sea-monster in the Straits of Gibraltar, which blocked the entrance of ships.

Kratim. The dog of the Seven Sleepers. More correctly called Katmir or Ketmir (q.v.).

Kremlin (The). A gigantic pile of buildings in Moscow of every style of architecture: Arabic palaces, Gothic forts, Greek temples, Italian steeples, Chinese pavilions, and Cyclopean walls. It contains palaces and cathedrals, museums and barracks, arsenals and shops, the Russian treasury, government offices, the ancient palace of the patriarch, a throne-room, churches, convents, etc. Built by two Italians, Marco and Pietro Antonio, for Ivan III. in 1485. There had been previously a wooden fortress on the spot. (Russian kreml, a fortress.)

"Towers of every form, round, square, and with pointed roofs, bellfirs, domes, turrets, spires, stately buildings fixed on masts, steppes of every height, style, and colour; palaces, domes, watch-towers, walls embattled and pierced with loopholes, harnesses, fortifications of every description, choises by the side of cathedrals; monuments of pride and caprice, voluptuousness, glory, and piety."—De Cassine, chap. 221.
Every city in Russia has its kremlin (citadel); but that of Moscow is the most important.

Krems White takes its name from Krems in Austria, the city where it is manufactured.

Kreuzer (pron. kroiz-zer). A small copper coin in Southern Germany, once marked with a cross. (German, kreuz, a cross; Latin, cruz.)

Kriemhild (2 syl.). A beautiful Burgundian lady, daughter of Dancrat and Uta, and sister of Gunther, Gernot, and Giselher. She first married Siegfried, King of the Netherlanders, and next Etzel, King of the Huns. Hagan, the Dane, slew her first husband, and seized all her treasures; and to revenge these wrongs she invited her brothers and Hagan to vi-it her in Hungary. In the first part of the Nibelungenlied, Kriemhild brings ruin on herself by her tattling tongue:—(1) She tells Brunhild, Queen of Burgundy, that it is Siegfried who has taken her ring and girdle, which so incurses the queen that she prevails on Hagan to murder the Netherlander; (2) she tells Hagan that the only vulnerable part in Siegfried is between his shoulders, a hint Hagan acts on. In the second part of the great epic she is represented as bent on vengeance, and in executing her purpose, after a most terrible slaughter both of friends and foes, she is killed by Hildebrand. (See Brunhild, Hagan.)

Krisna (the black one). The eighth avatar or incarnation of Vishnu. Kansa, demon-king of Mathura, having committed great ravages, Brahman complained to Vishnu, and prayed him to relieve the world of its distress; whereupon Vishnu plucked off two hairs, one white and the other black, and promised they should revenge the wrongs of the demon-king. The black hair became Krisna. (Hindu mythology.)

Kris Kringle. A sort of St. Nicholas (q.v.). On Christmas Eve Kris Kringle, arrayed in a fur cap and strange apparel, goes to the bedroom of all good children, where he finds a stocking or sock hung up in expectation of his visit, in which depository he leaves a present for the young wearer. The word means Christ-child, and the eve is called "Kris - Kringle Eve." (See Santa Claus.)

Krita. The first of the four Hindu periods contained in the great Yuga, when the genius of Truth and Right, in the form of a bull, stood firm on his four feet, and man gained nothing by iniquity. (See Kaliyuga.)

Krupp Gun. (See Gun.)

Krupp Steel. Steel from the works of Herr Krupp, of Essen, in Prussia.

Ku-Klux-Klan (The). (1864-1876.) A secret society in the Southern States of America against the negro class, to intimidate, flog, mutilate, or murder those who opposed the laws of the society. In Tennessee one murder a day was committed, and if anyone attempted to bring the murderers to justice he was a marked man, and sure to be mutilated or killed. In fact, the Ku-Klux-Klan was formed on the model of the "Molly Maguires" and "Moonlighters" of Ireland. Between November, 1864, and March, 1865, the number of cases of personal violence was 400. (Greek, kudos, a circle.)

Kudo. Praise, glory. (Greek.)

Kufic. Ancient Arabic letters; so called from Kufa, a town in the pashalik of Bagdad, noted for expert copyists of the ancient Arabic MSS.

Kufic Coins. Mahometan coins with Kufic or ancient Arabic characters. The first were struck in the eighteenth year of the Heg'ira (A.D. 638).

Kumara [youthful]. The Hindu war-god, the same as Karthikeya (q.v.). One of the most celebrated Hindu poems is the legendary history of this god. R. T. H. Griffith has translated seven cantos of it into English verse.

Kurd. A native of Kurdistan.

Kuraal. Public room at German watering-place for use of visitors.

Kuru. A noted legendary hero of India, the contests of whose descendants form the subject of two Indian epics.

Kyanise (3 syl.). To apply corrosive sublimate to timber in order to prevent the dry-rot; so called from Dr. Kyan, who invented the process in 1832. (See Paynising.)

Kyle, Carrick, and Cunningham. Ayshire is divided into three parts: Kyle, a strong corn-growing soil; Carrick, a wild hilly portion, only fit for feeding cattle; and Cunningham, a rich dairy land. Hence the saying—

"Kyle for a man, Carrick for a cow, Cunningham for butter, Galloway for wool."
Kyrie Eleison [Xi-ri-e E-li-s'n].
"Lord, have mercy." The first movement of the Catholic mass. Both the music and the words are so called. In the Anglican Church, after each commandment, the response is, "Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law."

Kyrie Society (The). Founded 1878, for decorating the walls of hospitals, school-rooms, mission-rooms, cottages, etc.; for the cultivation of small open spaces, window-gardening, the love of flowers, etc.; and improving the artistic taste of the poorer classes.

L

L. This letter represents an ox-goad, and is called in Hebrew la'med (an ox-goad).

L for fifty is half C (centum, a hundred).

L., for a pound sterling, is the Latin libra, a pound. With a line drawn above the letter, it stands for 50,000.

L. E. L. Letitia Elizabeth Landon (afterwards Mrs. Maclean), a poetess of the "Lara" and "Corsair" school (1802-1839). L.L.D. Doctor of Laws—i.e. both civil and canon. The double L is the plural; thus MSS. is the plural of MS. (manuscript); pp., pages.

L. L. Whisky. Lord-Lieutenant whisky. Mr. Kinahan being requested to preserve a certain cask of whisky highly approved of by his Excellency the Duke of Richmond, marked it with the initials L.L., and ever after called this particular quality L.L. whisky. The Duke of Richmond was Lord-Lieutenant from 1807 to 1813.

L.S. Locus sigillt, that is, the place for the seal.

L. S. D. Latin, libra (a pound); solidus (a shilling); and denarius (a penny); through the Italian lire (2 syl.), soldi, denari. If farthings are expressed the letter q (quadranis) is employed. Introduced by the Lombard merchants, from whom also we have Cr. (creditor), Dr. (debtor), bankrupt, do or ditto, etc.

La-de-da. A yea-nay sort of a fellow, with no backbone. "Da," in French, means both oui and neni, as Oui-da (ay marry), Neni-da (no forsooth).

"I wish that French brother of his, the Parthian la-de-da, was more like him, more of an American."—A. G. Gunter: Baron Monks, book iii. 8.

La Garde Meurt ne se Rand pas. The words falsely ascribed to General Cambronne, at the battle of Waterloo; inscribed on his monument at Nantes.

La Joyeuse. The sword of Charlemagne. (See Sworn.)

La Musette de Portici. Auber's best opera. Also known as Masaniello.

La Roche (1 syl.). A Protestant clergyman, whose story is told in The Mirror, by Henry Mackenzie.

Labadists. A religious sect of the seventeenth century, so called from Jean Labadie, of Bourg in Guyenne. They were Protestant ascetics, who sought reform of morals more than reform of doctrine. They rejected the observance of all holy days, and held certain mystic notions. The sect fell to pieces early in the eighteenth century.

Labarum. The standard borne before the Roman emperors. It consisted of a gilded spear, with an eagle on the top, while from a cross-staff hung a splendid purple streamer, with a gold fringe, adorned with precious stones. Constantine substituted a crown for the eagle, and inscribed in the midst the mysterious monogram. (See Constantine's Cross.) Rich (Antiquities, p. 361) says, "probably from the Gaulish lab, to raise; for Constantine was educated in Gaul." The Greek laba is a staff. (See Gibbon: Decline and Fall, etc. chap. xx.)

La'be (Queen). The Circe of the Arabians, who, by her enchantments, transformed men into horses and other brute beasts. She is introduced into the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, where Beder, Prince of Persia, marries her, defeats her plots against him, and turns her into a mare. Being restored to her proper shape by her mother, she turns Beder into an owl; but the prince ultimately regains his own proper form.

Labour of Love (A). Work undertaken for the love of the thing, without regard to pay.

Labourer is Worthy of his Hire. In Latin: "Digna omnis pabulo." "The dog must be fed indeed that is not worth a bone." Hence the Mosaic law, "Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn."

Labourers (The Statute of). An attempt made in 1349 to fix the rate of wages at which labourers should be compelled to work.

Labyrinth. A mass of buildings or garden-walks, so complicated as to puzzle strangers to extricate themselves. Said to be so called from Labyrins, an Egyptian monarch of the 12th dynasty. The chief labyrinths are:

(1) The Egyptian, by Petenuchis or Tithees, near the Lake Moris. It had 3,000 apartments, half of which were underground. (B.C. 1800.) Pliny, xxxvi. 13; and Pomponius Mela, i. 9.

(2) The Cretan, by Dadaulos, for imprisoning the Minotaur. The only means of finding a way out of it was by help of a skein of thread. (See Virgil: Enéid, v.)

(3) The Cretan conduit, which had 1,000 branches or turnings.

(4) The Lembian, by the architects Zemilis, Rholes, and Theodorus. It had 183 columns, so nicely adjusted that a child could turn them. Vestiges of this labyrinth were still in existence in the time of Pliny.

(5) The labyrinth of Clusium, made by Lars Por'sena, King of Etruria, for his tomb.

(6) The Samian, by Theodo'trus (B.C. 540). Referred to by Pliny; by Herodotus, ii. 145; by Strabo, x.; and by Diodorus Siculus, i.

(7) The labyrinth at Woodstock, by Henry II., for the Fair Rosamond.

(8) Of mazes formed by hedges. The best known is that of Hampton Court.

Lac of Rupees. The nominal value of the Indian rupee is 2s., and a lac means 100,000. At this estimate, a lac of rupees = 200,000s., or £10,000. Its present value varies according to the market value of silver. In 1894 between 13 and 14 pence.

Lace. I'll have your jacket for you, beat you. (French, laine, a lash; German, laschen, to strike; our lash.)

Laced. Tea or coffee laced with spirits, a cup of tea or coffee qualified with brandy or whisky.

"Descom Bernard ... had his nurse, and his teacher ... laced with a little spirits,"—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. xi.

"Dandie, partook of a cup of tea with Miss Allen, just laced with two ... aspomunia of cokane,"—Ditto, chap. iii.

Lacedemonian Letter (The). The Greek ι (iota), the smallest of all letters. Laconic brevity. (See Laconic.)

Lacedemonians (The). The Duke of Cornwall's Light Infantry. So called because in 1777 their colonel made a long march, under heavy fire, on the Spartan discipline and military system. (See Red Feathers.)

Lachesis [Lak'-e-sis]. The Fate who spins life's thread, working into the web the sundry events destined to occur. Clotho held the distaff, and Atropos cut off the thread when life was to be ended. (Greek, klato, to draw thread from a distaff; Lachesis from laychano, to assign by lot; and Atropos = inflexible.)

Laconical. Affected, pensive, sententious, artificially tender.

Laconic. Very concise and pithy. A Spartan was called a Lacon from La'conia, the land in which he dwelt. The Spartans were noted for their brusque and sententious speech. When Philip of Macedon wrote to the Spartan magistrates, "If I enter Laconia, I will level Lacedemon to the ground," the ephor wrote word back the single word, "If." (See above LACEDEMONIAN LETTER.)

"In 1490 O'Neil wrote to O'Donnel: "Send me the tribute, or else——" To which O'Donnel replied: "I owe none, or else——""

Lacustrine Deposits. Deposits formed at the bottom of fresh-water pools and lakes. (Latin, lacus, a lake.)

Lacustrine Habitations. The remains of human dwellings of great antiquity, constructed on certain lakes in Ireland, Switzerland, etc. They seem to have been villages built on piles in the middle of a lake.

Lad o' Wax. A little boy, a doll of a man. In Romeo and Juliet the Nurse calls Paris "a man of wax," meaning a very "proper man." Horace speaks of the "waxen arms of Telephus," meaning well modelled.

La'das. Alexander's messenger, noted for his swiftness of foot, mentioned by Catullus, Martial, and others. Lord Rosebery's horse Ladon won the Derby in 1894.

Ladies. (See after Lady.)

La'don. One of the dogs of Actaeon.

Ladon. The dragon which guarded the apples of the Hesperides.

Ladrones. The island of thieves; so called, in 1619, by Magellan.

Lady. A woman of wealth, of station, or of rank. Verstegan says, "It was anciently written Hleafedian ["flæfdʒiən], contracted first into Ladf, and then into Lady. Lef or Hlaf (loaf) means food in general or bread in particular, and dip-iaw or dip-an, to help, serve, or care for; whence lady means the "bread-server." The lord (or loef-ward) supplied the food, and the lady saw that it was properly served, for the ladies used to carve and distribute the food to the guests.

Another etymology is Hlæf-særcilde and leat-wards, where le stands for a female suffix like ian-me; as Carolus, female Carolina, or Carolina; Jo-sepgh, Josephina or Josephine; Ear, Earina, etc. etc.

Ladies retire to the drawing-room after dinner, and leave the gentlemen behind. This custom was brought in by the Norsemen. The Yanks always dismissed all women from their drinking parties. (S. Budnury.)

Ladybird, Ladyfly, Ladycow, or May-bug. The Bishop Barnaby, called in German, Uner laerrin hahn (our Lady-fowl), Markeiv-hahn (Mary-fowl), and Marren Kiffer (Mary’s beetle).
"Cushcow Lady," as it is called in Yorkshire, is also the German Marrenkael (Lady-calf), in French, bète à Dieu.
Thus the cockchafer is called the May-bug, where the German Kiffer is rendered bug; and several of the scarabaei are called bugs, as the rose-bug, etc. (See Bisnor.)

Lady Bountiful. The benevolent lady of a village. The character of Lady Bountiful is from the Beaux' Stratagem, by Farquhar.

Lady Chapel. The small chapel east of the altar, or behind the screen of the high altar; dedicated to the Virgin
Mary.

Lady Day. The 25th of March, to commemorate the Annunciation of Our Lady, the Virgin Mary. There is a tradition that Adam was created on this day. Of course, this rests on Jesus being "the Second Adam," or "federal head."

Lady Isabella, the beloved daughter of a noble lord, accompanied her father and mother on a chase one day, when her step-mother requested her to return and tell the master-cook to prepare
"the milk-white doe for dinner." Lady Isabella did as she was told, and the master-cook replied, "Thou art the doe that I must dress." The scullion-boy exclaimed, "O save the lady's life, and make thy pies of me!" but the master-cook heeded him not. When the lord returned he called for his daughter, the fair Isabella, and the scullion-boy said,"If now you will your daughter see, my lord, cut up that pie." When the lord father comprehended the awful tragedy, he adjudged the cruel step-dame to be burnt alive, and the master-cook "in boiling lead to stand;" but the scullion-boy he made his heir.
(Perry: Reliques, etc., series iii., bk. 2.)

Lady Magistrate. Lady Berkley was made by Queen Mary a justice of the peace for Gloucestershire and appointed to the quorum of Suffolk. Lady Berkley sat on the bench at assizes and sessions, sit with a sword, Tony Lumpkln says of Mr. Hardcastle—
"He'll persuade you that his mother was an elderman and he must a justice of the peace."—
Goldsmith: Sir Stamps to Cogges.

Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity, founded in 1502 by the mother of Henry VII. The year following she founded a preachership. Both in the University of Cambridge.

Lady in the Saque. The apparition of this bag forms the story of the Teenstival Chamber, by Sir Walter Scott.

An old woman, whose dress was an old-fashioned gown, which better call a saque; that is, a sort of robe completely loose in that body, but gathered into broad plaited upon the neck and shoulders.

Lady of England. Maud, daughter of Henry I. The title of "Dominia An-glorum" was conferred upon her by the Council of Winchester, held April 7th,
1141. (Byner: Presbyterian, i.)

Lady of Mercy (Owr). An order of knighthood in Spain, instituted in 1218 by James I. of Aragon, for the deliverance of Christian captives amongst the Moors. Within the first six years, as many as 400 captives were rescued by these knights.

Lady of Shallott. A maiden who tell in love with Sir Lancelot of the Lake, and died because her love was not returned. Tennyson has a poem on the subject; and the story of Elaine, "the lily maid of Astolat," in the Idylls of the King, is substantially the same. (See Elaine.)

Lady of the Bleeding Heart.
Ellen Douglas; so called from the cognance of the family. (Sir Walter Scott: Lady of the Lake, ii. 10.)

Lady of the Broom (The). A housemaid.

"Highly disgusted at a farthing candle,
Lady by the Lady of the Broom,
Named Susan . . . ."
Peter F indal: The Diamond Pm.
Lady of the 'Haystack' made her appearance in 1776 at Bourton, near Bristol. She was young and beautiful, graceful, and evidently accustomed to good society. She lived for four years in a haystack; but was ultimately kept by Mrs. Hannah More in an asylum, and died suddenly in December, 1801. Mrs. More called her Louisa; but she was probably a Mademoiselle La Fritien, natural daughter of Francis Joseph I., Emperor of Austria. (See World of Wonders, p. 134.)

Lady of the Lake. Vivien, mistress of Merlin, the enchanter, who lived in the midst of an imaginary lake, surrounded by knights and damsels. Tennyson, in the Idylls of the King, tells the story of Vivien and Merlin. (See LANCELOT.)

Lady of the Lake. Ellen Douglas, who lived with her father near Loch Katrine. (Sir Walter Scott: The Lady of the Lake.)

Lady of the Rock (Our). A miraculous image of the Virgin found by the wayside between Salamanca and Ciudad Rodrigo in 1409.

Ladies' Mile (The). That part of Hyde Park which is most frequented by ladies on horseback or in carriages.

Ladies' Plate (The). In races, is not a race for a prize subscribed for by ladies, but a race run for by women.

"On the Monday succeeding St. Wilfred's Sunday, there were for many years at Ripon's Common, a race called the Ladies' Plate, of its value for horses, etc., ridden by women."—Sporting Magazine, vol. xx., New Series, p. 257.

Ladies' Smocks. Garden cress, botanically called Cardamine, a diminutive of the Greek kardamon, called in Latin nasturtium, sometimes called Nose-smart (Kara-damon, head-afflicting); so nasturtium is Nasi-tortium (nose-twisting), called so in consequence of its pungency.

"When ladies' smocks of silver white
Do paint the meadows with delight."

Called Ladies' smocks because the flowers resemble linen exposed to whiten on the grass—"when maidens bleach their summer smocks." There is, however, a purple tint which mars its perfect whiteness. Another name of the plant is "Cuckoo-flower," because it comes into flower when the cuckoo sings.

Ladies and Gentlemen. Till 1808 public speakers began their addresses with "gentlemen and ladies;" but since then the order has been reversed.

Leading. The strongest chain that had hitherto been made. It was forged by Ass Thor to bind the wolf Fenrir with; but the wolf snapped it as if it had been made of tow. Fenrir was then bound with the chain Dromi, much stronger than Leading, but the beast snapped it instantly with equal ease. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Lealapa. A very powerful dog given by Diana to Procurs; Procurs gave it to Cephalus. While pursuing a wild boar it was metamorphosed into a stone. (See Dogs, Acteon's fifty dogs.)

Laertes (3 syl.). Son of Polonius and brother of Ophelia. He kills Hamlet with a poisoned rapier, and dies himself from a wound by the same foil. (Shakespeare: Hamlet.)

Lesta're Sunday. The fourth Sunday in Lent is so called from the first word of the Introit, which is from Isai. lxvi. 10: "Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad with her all ye that love her." It is on this day that the pope blesses the Golden Rose.

Lagado. Capital of Balibarbi, celebrated for its grand academy of projectors, where the scholars spend their time in such useful projects as making pincushions from softened rocks, extracting sunbeams from cucumbers, and converting ice into gunpowder. (Swift: Gulliver's Travels, Voyage to Lapisita.)

Lager Beer. A light German beer. Lager means a "storehouse," and lager beer means beer stored for ripening before being used.

Laird (Scotch). A landed proprietor.

Lagoon. A shallow lake near river or sea, due to infiltration or overflow of water from the larger body.

Lais. A courtesan or Greek Hetaira. There were two of the name; the elder was the most beautiful woman of Corinth, and lived at the time of the Peloponnesian War. The beauty of the latter excited the jealousy of the Thessalian women, who pricked her to death with their bodkins. She was contemporary with Phryne (2 syl.), her rival, and sat to Apelles as a model.

Laissez Faire, Laissez Passer. Lord John Russell said: "Colbert, with the intention of fostering the manufactures of France, established regulations limiting the webs woven in looms to a particular size. He also prohibited the introduction of foreign manufactures:
Then the French vine-growers, finding they could no longer get rft of their wine, began to grumble. When Colbert asked a merchant what relief he could give, he received for answer, ‘Laissez faire, laissez passer;’ that is to say, Don’t interfere with our mode of manufactures, and don’t stop the introduction of foreign imports.”

The laissez-faire system. The let-alone system.

Lake School (The). The school of poetry introduced by the Lake poets Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey, who resided in the Lake district of Cumberland and Westmoreland, and sought inspiration in the simplicity of nature. The name was first applied in derision by the Edinburgh Review to the class of poets who followed the above-named trio.

N.B. Charles Lamb, Lloyd, and Professor William (Christopher North) are sometimes placed among the “Lakers.”

Laked'mon or Laquedin (Istae). The name given in France, in the fourteenth century, to the Wandering Jew.

Lak'in. By'r Lakin. An oath, meaning “By our Lady-km,” or Little Lady, where little does not refer to size, but is equivalent to dear.

Laks’mi or Lakshmi. One of the consorts of Vishnu; she is goddess of beauty, wealth, and pleasure. (Hindu mythology.)

Lalla Rookh [tuley cheek] is the supposed daughter of Au-rung-ze-be, Emperor of Delhi, betrothed to Allir, Sultan of Lesser Buchar’in. On her journey from Delhi to the valley of Cashmere, she is entertained by a young Persian poet named Fer’amor, who is supposed to relate the four poetical tales of the romance, and with whom she falls in love. (Thomas Moore: Lalla Rookh.) (See Fer'amor.)

Lama, among the Mongols, means the priestly order. Hence the religion of the Mongols and Cymruus is termed Lamism. The Grand Lamas wear yellow caps, the subordinate Lamas red caps. (See Grand Lama.)

Le'maism [Tibetan, Blama, spiritual teacher]. The religion of Tibet and Mongolia, which is Buddhism corrupted by Sivaism and spirit-worship.

Lamb. In Christian art, an emblem of the Redeemer, called the “Lamb of God.” It is also the attribute of St. Agnes, St. Geneviève, St. Catherinae, and St. Regin. John the Baptist either carries a lamb or is accompanied by one. It is also introduced symbolically to represent any of the “types” of Christ; as Abraham, Moses, and so on.

Lamb (The Vegetable) or Tartarian lamb: technically called Polypodium Barometz. It is a Chinese fern with a decumbent root, covered with a soft, dense yellow wool. Sir Hans Sloane, who calls it the Tartarian lamb, has given a print of it; and Dr. Hunter has given a print which makes its resemblance to a lamb still more striking. The down is used in India for stuffing hangamorrhage.

“Rooted in earth each cloven hoof descends, And round and round her flexible neck she bends; Crowns the grey coral moss, and heavy thyme, Or lap with rosy tongue the molten rime; Eyes with mute tenderness her distant lam, And seems toœst, a Vegetable Lamb.”—Darwin: Lovers of the Plants, 283, etc.

Lamb. Cold lamb. A schoolboy’s joke. Setting a boy on a cold marble or stone hearth. Horace (Sat. i. 5, 22) has “Dotare lambos,” which may have suggested the pun.

Lamb-pie. A flogging. Lamb is a pun on the Latin verb lambo (to lick), and the word “lick” has been perverted to mean flog (see Lick); or it may be the old Norse lam (the hind), meaning hand- or slay-pie. (See LAMMING.)

Lamb’s Conduit Street (London). Stow says, “One William Lamb, citizen and clothworker, born at Satton Valence, Kent, did found near unto Oldbourne a faire conduit and standard; from this conduit, water clear as crystal was conveyed in pipes to a conduit on Snow Hill” (26th March, 1577). The conduit was taken down in 1746.

Lamb’s Wool. A beverage consisting of the juice of apples roasted over spiced ale. A great day for this drink was the feast of the apple-gathering, called in Irish In mas ubhal, pronounced “lammus ool,” and corrupted into “lamb’s wool.”

“The pulp of the roasted apples, in number four or five . . . mixed in a wine quart of fair water, laboured together until it come to be as apples and ale, which we call lammbes wool.”—Johnson’s Gerard, p. 1400.

Lambert’s Day (St.), September 17th. St. Landebert or Lambert, a native of Maastricht, lived in the seventh century.

“Be ready, as your lives shall answer it.”

At Coventry, upon St. Lambert’s day.”—Shakespeare: Richard II, 1. 1.
Lamбро was the father of Haïdée. Major Lamбро, the prototype, was head of the Russian pratical squadron in 1791. He contrived to escape when the rest were seized by the Algerines on the island of Zia. (Byron: Don Juan, iii. 20.)

Lamé Duck (A), in Stock Exchange parlance, means a member of the Stock Exchange who waddles off on settlement day without settling his account. All such defaulters are black-boarded and struck off the list. Sometimes it is used for one who cannot pay his debts, one who trades without money.

"Pit!... gambled and lost; Who must answer for the cost? Not he, indeed! A duck confounded lame. Not unattended waddling..."

Peter Fudor: From Improvidentiæ.

Lame King. A Grecian oracle had told Sparta to "Beware of a lame king." Agesilaos was lame, and during his reign Sparta lost her supremacy.

Lame Viceregent (in Hudibras). Richard Cromwell.

Lam'reock (Sir), of Wales. A knight of the Round Table, son of Sir Pellinore, and brother of Sir Percival. He had an amour with his own aunt, the wife of King Loto. Strange that of all the famous knights of the Round Table, Sir Gualdol and Sir Galahad were the only ones who were continent.

Lam'ia. A female phantom, whose name was used by the Greeks and Romans as a bugbear to children. She was a Libyan queen beloved by Jupiter; but robbed of her offspring by the jealous Juno; and in consequence she vowed vengeance on all children, whom she delighted to cut out and murder. (See FAIRY.)

"Kraiss has a poem so called. His Lami is a serpent who assumed the form of a beautiful woman, was beloved by a young man and got a soul. The tale was drawn from Philostratus."—De Vita Apollonii, book iv., introduced by Burton in his Anatomy of Melancholy.

Lammas. At latter Lammas—i.e. never. (See NEVER.)

Lammas Day (August 1st) means the loaf-mass day. The day of first-fruit offerings, when a loaf was given to the priests in lieu of the first-fruits. (Saxon, klaim-messe, for hlaf-messe dies.) August 1 Old Style, August 12 New Style.

Lammas-tide. Lammas time, or the season when lammas occurs.

Lammer Beads. Amber beads, once used as charms. (French, l'ambré; Teutonic, lamertyn-stein.)

Lammermoor. (See Edgar, Lucia.)

Lamming (A). A beating. (See LAMB-PIER.)

Lammin. Lamkin. Linkin, or Bold Rakin. A Scottish ogre, represented in the ballad as a bloodthirsty mason; the terror of the Scotch nursery.

Lam'ourette's Kiss. On July 7th, 1792, the Abbé Lamourette induced the different factions of the Legislative Assembly of France to lay aside their differences; so the deputies of the Royalists, Constitutionalists, Girondists, Jacobins, and Orleanists rushed into each other's arms, and the king was sent for to see "how these Christians loved one another;" but the reconciliation was hollow and unsound. The term is now used for a reconciliation of policy without abatement of rancour.

Lamp. To smell of the lamp. To bear the marks of great study, but not enough laboured to conceal the marks of labour. The phrase was first applied to the orations of Demosthenes, written by lamp-light with enormous care.

Lamp of Heaven (The). The moon, Milton calls the stars "lamps."

"Why shouldst thou, In thy dark lantern thus close up the stars, That Nature hung in heaven, and filled their lamps With everlasting oil, to give due light To the mind and lonely traveller?"

Comus, 290-291.

Lamp of Phoebus (The). The sun. Phoebus is the mythological personification of the sun.

Lamp of the Law (The). Inmerius the German was so called, who first lectured on the Pandects of Justinian after their discovery at Amalphi in 1137.

Lamps. The seven lamps of sleep. In the mansion of the Knight of the Black Castle were seven lamps, which could be quenched only with water from an enchanted fountain. So long as these lamps kept burning, everyone within the room fell into a deep sleep, from which nothing could rouse them till the lamps were extinguished. (See ROSANA.) (The Seven Champions of Christendom, ii. 8.)

Sepulchral lamps. The Romans are said to have preserved lamps in some of their sepulchres for centuries. In the papacy of Paul III, one of these lamps was found in the tomb of Tullia (Cleoro's daughter), which had been shut up for 1,560 years. At the dissolution of the monasteries a lamp was found which is said to have been burning 1,200 years. Two are preserved in Leyden museum.
Lampadion. The received name of a lively, petulant courtisan, in the later Greek comedy.

Lampoon. Sir Walter Scott says, "These personal and scandalous libels, carried to excess in the reign of Charles II., acquired the name of lampoons from the burden sung to them: 'Lampone, lampone, camerada lampone'—Guzzler, guzzler, my fellow guzzler." (French. lamper, to guzzle.) Sir Walter obtained his information from Trevoux.

Lampos and Phaeton. The two steeds of Auro'ra. One of Actaeon's dogs was called Lampos.

Lancashire Lads or "The Lancashire." The 47th Foot. Now called the First Battalion of the North Lancashire Regiment.

Lancaster. The camp-town on the river Lune.

Lancaster Gun. A species of rifled cannon with elliptical bore; so called from Mr. Lancaster, its inventor.

Lancastrian (A). One who pursues the system of Joseph Lancaster (1778-1838) in schools. By this system the higher classes taught the lower.

Lancastrian (A). An adherent of the Lancastrian line of kings, as opposed to the Yorkists. One of the Lancastrian kings (Henry IV., V., VI.).

Lance (1 syl.), in Christian art, is an attribute of St. Matthew and St. Thomas, the apostles; also of St. Longinus, St. George, St. Adalbert, St. Oswin, St. Barbara, St. Michael, St. Doro'thius, and several others.

Astolpho had a lance of gold that with enchanted force dismounted everybody it touched. (Orlando Furioso, bk. ix.)

A free-lance. One who acts on his own judgment, and not from party motives. The reference is to the Free Companies of the Middle Ages, called in Italy condottieri, and in France Compagnies Grandes, which were free to act as they liked, and were not servants of the Crown or of any other potentate. It must be confessed, however, that they were willing to sell themselves to any master and any cause, good or evil.

Lance-Corporal and Lance-Sergeant. One from the ranks temporarily acting as corporal or sergeant. In the Middle Ages a lance meant a soldier.

Lance-Knight. A foot-soldier; a corruption of lanci quart or lancequinet, a German foot-soldier.

Lance of the Ladies. At the termination of every joust a course was run "pour les dames," and called the "Lance of the Ladies."

Lancelot (Sir). "The chief of knights" and "darling of the court." Elaine, the lily of Astolat, fell in love with him, but he returned not her love, and she died. (See Elaine.) (Tennyson: Idylls of the King; Elaine.)

Lancelot or Lancelot Gobbo. Shylock's servant, famous for his soliloquy whether or not he should run away from his master. (Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice.)

Lancelot du Lac. One of the earliest romances of the "Round Table" (1494). Sir Lancelot was the son of King Ban of Benwicke, but was stolen in infancy by Vivienne, called "La Dame du Lac," who dwelt "en la marche de la petite Bretagne;" she plunged with the babe into the lake, and when her protégé was grown into man's estate, presented him to King Arthur. The lake referred to was a sort of enchanted delusion to conceal her demesnes. Hence the cognomen of du Lac given to the knight. Sir Lancelot goes in search of the Grail or holy cup brought to Britain by Joseph of Arimathe'a, and twice caught sight of it. (See Graal.) Though always represented in the Arthurian romances as the model of chivalry, Sir Lancelot was the adulterous lover of Guinevere, wife of King Arthur, his friend. At the close of his life the adulterous knight became a hermit, and died in the odour of sanctity.

Sir Lancelot is meant for a model of fidelity, bravery, fruitfulness in love, and reparation; Sir Galahad of chastity; Sir Gawain of courtesy; Sir Kay of a rude, honest knight; and Sir Mador of treachers.

Sir Lancelot du Lac and Tarquin. Sir Lancelot, seeking some adventure, met a lady who requested him to deliver certain Knights of the Round Table from the power of Tarquin. Coming to a river, he saw a copper basin suspended to a tree, and struck at it so hard that the basin broke. This brought out Tarquin, when a furious encounter took place, in which Tarquin was slain, and Sir Lancelot liberated from durance "three score knights and four, all of the Table Round." (Percy: Reliques, etc., bk. ii. series 1.)

Lancelot of the Lake. A Scottish metrical romance, taken from the French roman called Lancelot du Lac. Gaiiot, a neighbouring king, invades Arthur's territory, and captures the castle of Lady Melybail among others. Sir Lancelot goes to chastise Galiot, sees Queen Guinevere, and falls in love with her. Sir Gawayne is wounded in the war, and Sir Lancelot takes prisoner. In the French romance, Sir Lancelot makes Galiot submit to Arthur, but the Scotch romance terminates with the capture of the knight.

Lancers (The). The dance so called was introduced into Paris in 1836. It is in imitation of a military dance in which men used lances.

Land. See how the land lies. See what we have to do; see in what state matters are. See in what state the land is that we have to travel or pass over, or in what direction we must go. Joshua sent spies (ii. 1) "to view the land" before he attempted to pass the Jordan.

"Put your blanket down there, boys, and turn in. You'll see how the land lies in the morning."

—Doubleday: Robbery under Arms, ch. vi.

Land-damn. A corruption of landan (to rate or reprove severely). According to Dean Milles the word is still used in Gloucestershire.

"You are afraid... would I know the villain, I would land-damn him."—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, ii. 1.

Land-loupers. Persons who fly the country for crime or debt. Louper, looper, loaver, and lusher are varieties of the German lüster, a vagrant, a runner.

Land-lubber. An awkward or inexpert sailor on board ship. (Lubber, the Welsh lob, a dance.)

Land of Beulah (Isa. xxi. 4). In Pilgrim's Progress it is that land of heavenly joy where the pilgrims tarry till they are summoned to enter the Celestial City; the Paradise before the resurrection.

Land of Bondage. Egypt was so called by the Jews, who were bondmen there to the Pharaohs "who knew not Joseph."

Land of Cakes. Scotland, famous for its oatmeal cakes.

Land of Myrrh. Azar or Saba.

Land of Nod (The). To go to the land of Nod is to go to bed. There are many similar phrases, and more in French than in English. Of course, the reference is to Gen. iv. 16, "Cain went... and dwelt in the land of Nod:" but where the land of Nod is or was nobody knows. In fact, "Nod" means a vagrant or vagabond, and when Cain was driven out he lived "a vagrant life," with no fixed abode, till he built his "city." (See Needham.)

Land of Promise. Canaan, the land which God promised to give to Abraham for his obedience.

Land of Shadows (Gone to the). Fallen asleep. Shadows = dreams, or shadows of realities.

Land of Stars and Stripes (The). The United States of America. The reference is to their national flag.

Land o' the Leal (The). The Scotch Dixie Land (q.r.). An hypothetical land of happiness, loyalty, and virtue. Caroline Oliphant, Baroness Nairne, meant heaven in her exquisite song so called, and this is now its accepted meaning. (Leal = faithful, and "Land of the Leal" means the Land of the faithful.)

Landau. A four-wheeled carriage, the top of which may be thrown back; invented at Landau, in Germany.

Landy'da. (See Raven.)

Landière (French, 3 syl.). A booth in a fair; so called from Le Landit, a famous fair at one time held at St. Denis. Landit means a small present such as one receives from a fair.

"Il promet des bonbons, il faut le brûler; Qu'au lieu de vins, nous prenons un vin landit."

Land-l seventime: Le Vin de l'État.

Landscape (4) is a land picture. (Anglo-Saxon landscipe, verb scop-an, to shape, to give a form or picture of.)

Father of landscape gardening. A. Lenotre (1613-1700).

Lane. No evil thing that walks by night, blue meagre hag, or stubborn unhallow ghost, no goblin, or smart fairy of the mine, has power to cross a lane; once in a lane, the spirit of evil is in a fix. The reason is obvious: a lane is a spur from a main road, and therefore forms with it a sort of T, quite near enough to the shape of a cross to arrest such simple folk of the unseen world as care to trouble the peaceful inmates of the world we live in.

Land. 'Tis a long lane that has no turning. Every calamity has an ending. The darkest day, stop till to-morrow, will have passed away.

"Hope peeps from a cloud on our squad. Whose beams have a been long in deep mourning: 'Tis a lane, let me tell you, my lad, Very long that has never a turning."

Peter Fendler: Great Gry and Little Wool, epist. I.
Lan... (The) and The Garden. A short way of saying "Drury Lane" and "Covent Garden," which are two theatres in London.

Lane, of King's Bromley Manor, Staffordshire, bears in a canton "the Arms of England." This honour was granted to Colonel John Lane, for conducting Charles II. to his father's seat after the battle of Worcester. (See next paragraph.)

Jane Lane, daughter of Thomas and sister of Colonel John. To save the King after the battle of Worcester, she rode behind him from Houghton, in Staffordshire, the ancient seat of the Lanes, to the house of her cousin, Mrs. Norton, near Bristol. For this act of loyalty the king granted the family to have the following crest: A strawberry- roan horse saliant (couped at the flank), bridled, bitted, and garnished, supporting between its feet a royal crown proper; motto, Garde le Roy.

Lanfus's Son. (See Ferraud.)

Lang Syne (Scotch, long since) In the olden time, in days gone by.

"There was musical delighting about the place lang-syne."—Scott: 'My bonny lass, chap. xi.'

The song called Auld Lang Syne, usually attributed to Robert Burns, was not composed by him, for he says expressly in a letter to Thomson, "It is the old song of the olden times, which has never been in print. I took it down from an old man's singing." In another letter he says, "Light be the turf on the heaven-inspired poet who composed this glorious fragment." Nothing whatever is known of the author of the words; the composer is wholly unknown.

Langbourn Ward (London). So called from the long bourn or rivulet of sweet water which formerly broke out of a spring near Magpye Alley. This bourn gives its name to Sharebourne or Southbourne Lane.

Langstaff (Launcolot). The name under which Salmagundi was published, the real authors being Washington Irving, William Irving, and J. K. Paulying.

Language. The primeval language. Psammechetos, an Egyptian king, entrusted two new-born infants to a shepherd, with strict charge that they were never to hear any one utter a word. These children were afterwards brought before the king and uttered the word bekos (baked bread). The same experiment was tried by Frederick Il. of Sweden, James IV. of Scotland; and one of the Mogul emperors of India. James IV., in the 15th century, shut up two infant children in the lard of a sepulchre, with a dumb attendant to wait on them.

The three primitive languages. The Persians say that Arabic, Persian, and Turkish are three primitive languages. The serpent that seduced Eve spoke Arabic, the most suasive language in the world; Adam and Eve spoke Persian, the most poetic of all languages; and the angel Gabriel spoke Turkish, the most menacing of all languages. (Chardin.)

"Language given to men to conceal their thoughts," is by Montroux, but is generally fathered on Talleyrand.

Characteristics of European languages: L'Italian se parle aux dames. Le Français se parle aux hommes. L'Anglais se parle aux oiseaux. L'Allemand se parle aux chevaux. L'Espagnol se parle à Dieux.

L'Anglais. English, according to the French notion, is both sing-song and sibilant.

Charles Quint used to say, "I speak German to my horses, Spanish to my God, French to my friends, and Italian to my mistresses."

Lan... (Lydis). A young lady of romantic notions in The Rivals, a play by Sheridan.

Lantern. In Christian art, the attribute of St. Gudule and St. Hugh.

The feast of lanterns. Tradition says that the daughter of a famous mandarin, walking alone by a lake one evening, fell in. The father called together his neighbours, and all went with lanterns to look for her, and happily she was rescued. In commemoration thereof an annual festival was held on the spot, and grew in time to the celebrated "feast of lanterns." (Present State of China.)

À la lanterne. Hang him with the lantern or lamp ropes. A cry and custom introduced in the French revolution.

Lantern Jaws. Cheeks so thin that one may see daylight through them, as light shines through the horn of a lantern. In French, "un visage si maigre que si on mettait une bougie allumée dans..."
Lantern-Land. The land of literary charlatans, whose inhabitants are graduates in arts, doctors, professors, prelates, and so on. (Rabelais: Pantagruel, v. 33.) (See CITY OF LANTERNS.)

Lanternise. Spending one’s time in learned trifles; darkening counsel by words; mystifying the more by attempting to unravel mysteries; putting truths into a lantern through which, at best, we see but darkly. When monks bring their hoods over their faces “to meditate,” they are said by the French to lanternise, because they look like the tops of lanterns; but the result of their meditations is that of a “brown study,” or “fog of sleepy thought.” (See above.)

Lapæon [La-ó-ké-ó-on]. A son of Priam, famous for the tragic fate of himself and his two sons, who were crushed to death by serpents. The group representing these three in their death agony, now in the Vatican, was discovered in 1506, on the Equiline Hill (Rome). It is a single block of marble, and was the work of Agesander of Rhodes and two other sculptors. Thomson has described the group in his Liberty, pt. iv. (Virgil: Envid, ii. 40 etc., 212 etc.)

“Th’ miserable sire, Wrapped with his sons in fate’s severest grasp.”

Laodamia. The wife of Protesilaus, who was slain before Troy. She begged to be allowed to converse with her dead husband for only three hours, and her request was granted; when the respite was over, she accompanied the dead hero to the shades of death. Wordsworth has a poem on the subject.

Laodicean. One indifferent to religion, caring little or nothing about the matter, like the Christians of that church, mentioned in the Book of Revelation (chapter iii. 14-18).

Lapet (Mons.). The beau-ideal of poltroonery. He would think the world out of joint if no one gave him a tweak of the nose or lug of the ear. (Beaumont and Fletcher: Nice Valar, or the Passionate Madman.)

Mons. Lapet was the author of a book on the punctilios of duelling.

Lap’ithæ. A people of Thessaly, noted for their defeat of the Centaurs. The subject of this contest was represented on the Parthenon, the Theseum at Athens, the Temple of Apollo at Bassæ, and on numberless vases. Raphael painted a picture of the same subject. (Classic mythology.)

Lapping Water. When Gideon’s army was too numerous, the men were taken to a stream to drink, and 300 of them lapped water with their tongue; all the rest supped it up (Judg. vii. 4-7). All carnivorous animals lap water like dogs, all herbivorous animals suck it up like horses. The presumption is that the lappers of water partook of the carnivorous character, and were more fit for military exploits. No doubt those who fell on their knees to drink exposed themselves to danger far more than those who stood on their feet and lapped water from their hands.

Laprel. The rabbit, in the tale of Reynard the Fox. (French, lapin, rabbit.)

Lapeus Lingus (Latin). A slip of the tongue, a mistake in uttering; a word, an imprecise word inadvertently spoken.

We have also adopted the Latin phrase lapesus calamit (a slip of the pen), and lapesus memoria (a slip of the memory).

Laputa. The flying island inhabited by scientific quacks, and visited by Gulliver in his “travels.” These dreamy philosophers were so absorbed in their speculations that they employed attendants called “flappers,” to flap them on the mouth and ears with a blown bladder when their attention was to be called off from “high things” to vulgar mundane matters. (Swift.)

“Realising in a manner the dreams of Laputa, and endeavouring to extract sagacity from cucumbers.”—De Quincy.

Lapwing (The). Shakespeare refers to two peculiarities of this bird; (1) to allure persons from its nest, it flies away and cries loudest when farthest from its nest; and (2) the young birds run from their shells with part thereof still sticking to their head.

“Far from her nest the lapwing cries away.”

Comedy of Errors, iv. 2.

“This lapwing runs away with the shell on his head.”—Hamlet, v. 2.

Lar Familyris (plu. Lares familiares). The familiar lar was the spirit of the founder of the house, which never left it, but accompanied his descendants in all their changes. (See LAKES.)
La'ra. The name assumed by Lord Conrad, the Corsair, after the death of Medo'tra. He returned to his native land, and was one day recognised by Sir Ezzelin at the table of Lord Otho. Ezzelin charged him home, and a duel was arranged for the day following; but Ezzelin was never heard of more. In time Lara headed a rebellion, and was shot by Lord Otho, the leader of the other party. (Byron: Lara.) (See Conrad.)

The seven infants of Lara. Gonzales Duritio de Salas de Lara, a Castilian hero of the eleventh century, had seven sons. His brother, Rodrigo Velasquez, married a Moorish lady, and these seven nephews were invited to the feast. A fray took place in which one of the seven slew a Moor, and the bride demanded vengeance. Rodrigo, to please his bride, waylaid his brother Gonzales, kept him long enough in a dungeon of Cor'dova, and the seven boys were betrayed into a ravine, where they were cruelly murdered. While in the dungeon, Zaida, daughter of the Moorish king, fell in love with Gonzales, and became the mother of Madarru, who avenged the death of Lara's seven sons by slaying Rodrigo.

Larboard, now called port (q.v.). (Starboard is from Anglo-Saxon sternbord, the steer-board, or right side of a ship.) Larboard is the French bâbord, the left-hand side of a ship looking towards the prow; Anglo-Saxon beor-bord.

"Who gave a heel, and there a larb to part, And going down a head forenoon—sink in short." Byron: Don Juan (The Shipwreck).

*: "To give a heel" is to sway over on one side. Here it means a heel to the starboard side.

Larceny. Petty theft, means really the peculations and thefts of a mercenary. (Greek λητομ, hire [laires, a hireling]; Latin latro, a mercenary, whence latrocinium; French, larcen.)

Larder. A place for keeping lard or bacon. This shows that swine were the chief animals salted and preserved in olden times. (Latun, lardum, lard.)

The Douglas Larder. The English garrison and all its provisions in Douglas castle massed together by good Lord James Douglas, in 1307.

"He caused all the lardells containing flour, meat, wheat, and malt to be knocked in pieces, and the contents mixed on the floor: then he staved the great headstones of wine and ale, and mixed the liquor with the stores; and last of all, he killed the proctors, and hung the dead bodies among this disgusting heap, which his men called in derision of the English, 'The Douglas Larder.'"—Sir Walter Scott; Tales of a Grandfather, 14.

Wallace's Larder is very similar. It consisted of the dead bodies of the garrison of Ardrossan, in Ayrshire, cast into the dungeon keep. The castle was surprised by Wallace in the reign of Edward I.

Larés. The Etruscan lar (lord or hero). Among the Romans larés were either domestic or public. Domestic lares were the souls of virtuous ancestors exalted to the rank of protectors. Public lares were the protectors of roads and streets. Domestic lares were images, like dogs, set behind the "hall" door, or in the lararium or shrine. Wicked souls became lares or ghosts that made night hideous. Penates were the natural powers personified, and their office was to bring wealth and plenty, rather than to protect and avert danger. (See FAETH.)

Large. To sail large is to sail on a large wind—i.e. with the wind not straight astern, but what sailors call "abash the beam."

Set at large, i.e. at liberty. It is a French phrase; prendre le large is to stand out at sea, or occupy the main ocean, so as to be free to move. Similarly, to be set at large is to be placed free in the wide world.

Larigot. Boire à tire larigot. To tope, to house. Larigot is a corruption of "l'arigo" (a limb), and boire a tire larigot means simply "to drink with all your might," as jouer de l'arigo means "to play your best"—i.e. "with all your power." It is absurd to derive the word larigot from "la Rigaud," according to Noel Taillelep, who says (Rome, xiv.): "Au xiii. siècle, l'archevêque Éudes Rigaud fit présent à la ville de Rouen d'une cloche à laquelle resta son nom. Cette clôche était d'une grandeur et d'une grosseur, telles que ceux qui la mettaient en mouvement ne manquaient pas de boire abondamment pour reprendre des forces. De là l'habitude de comparer ceux qui buvaient beaucoup aux sonneurs chargés de tirer la Rigaud," i.e. the bell so called.

Lark. A spree; a corruption of the Anglo-Saxon lác (play, fun). (See SKY-LARK.)

Larks. When the sky falls we shall catch larks. A way of stating to a person that his scheme or proposal is absurd or ridiculous.

French: "Si le ciel tombait, il y aurait bien des sotines." Latin: "Quid, si regio ad illos, qui aitum, quid si munc colium ruin?" Verses: Eclogae Virgilianae, iv, 3; verse 41.
Larry Dugan's Eye-water. Blacking; so called from Larry Dugan, a noted shoeblad of Dublin, whose face was always smudged with his blacking.

Lara. The overking of the ancient Etruscans, like the Welsh "pendragon."
A satrap, or under-king, was a lucum. Thus the king of Prussia is the German lar, and the king of Bavaria is a lucum.

There be thirty chosen prophets,
The wisest of the land,
Who always by Lara Portens,
Both morne and evening sound."
(Macaulay: Lays of Ancient Rome,
(1808.)

Larve. Mischievous spectres. The larva or ghost of Caligula was often seen (according to Suetonius) in his palace.

Lascer. A native East Indian sailor in the British service. The natives of the East Indies call camp-followers lasvrea. (Hindu, lask-hara, a soldier.

Last. (Anglo-Saxon last, a footstep, a shoemaker's last.) The cobbler should stick to his last ("Ne sutor ultra crepidam"). Apelles having executed a famous painting, exposed it to public view, when a cobbler found fault because the painter had made too few latches to the goloshes. Apelles amended the fault, and set out his picture again. Next day the cobbler complained of the legs, when Apelles retorted, "Keep to the shop, friend, but do not attempt to criticise what you do not understand." (See Wire.)

Last Man (The). Charles I. was so called by the Parliamentarians, meaning that he would be the last king of Great Britain. His son, Charles II., was called The Son of the Last Man.

Last Man. A weirdly grotesque poem by Thomas Hood.

"So there he hung, and there I stood,
The last man left alive.

Last Words. (See Dying Sayings.)

Last of the Fathers. St. Bernard,
Abbot of Clairvaux. (1091-1153.)

Last of the Goths. Roderick, who reigned in Spain from 414 to 711.
Southey has an historic tale in blank verse on this subject.

Last of the Greeks. Philopomen of Arenadia. (n.c. 233-183.)

Last of the Knights. (See Knights.)

Last of the Mo'rones. The Indian chief, Uncas, is so called by Cooper, in his novel of that title.

Last of the Romans.
Marcus Junius Brutus, one of the murderers of Cesar. (n.c. 85-42.)
Caio Cassius Longinus, so called by Brutus. (Died B.C. 42.)
Stilicho, the Roman general under Theodosius. (The Nineteenth Century, September, 1892.)

Aetius, a general who defended the Gauls against the Franks and other barbarians, and defeated Attila in the Champs Catalauniques, near Chalons, in 491. So called by Procopius.

Francois Joseph Terasse Despillons; so called from the elegance and purity of his Latin. (1751-1789.)

Pope calls Congreve Ultimus Romanorum.
(1670-1729.) (See Ultimus.)

Last of the Tribunes (The). Cola di Rienzi (1314-1354). Lord Lytton has a novel so called.

Last of the Troubadours. Jacques
Jaemin, of Gascoy (1798-1864).

Lat (EP). A female idol made of stone, and said to be inspired with life;
the chief object of adoration by the Arabs before their conversion.

Lat, at Somat in India, was a single stone fifty fathoms high, placed in the mist of a temple supported by fifty-six pillars of massive gold. This idol was broken in pieces by Mahmood Ibra-Sulikutigwen, who conquered that part of India. The granite Lat, facing a Jain temple at Modhubidary, near Man-galore, in India, is fifty-two feet high.

"The grand Lat of Modhubidary, in India, is half-two feet high.

Lateran. The ancient palace of the Lateran, given by the Emperor Con-tantine to the popes, Lateran, from later, to hide, and rana, a frog. It is said that Nero, on one occasion, vomited a frog covered with blood, which he believed to be his own progeny, and had it hidden in a vault. The vault which was built on the site of this vault was called the "Lateran," or the palace of the hidden frog. (Buckle: History of Civilisation.)

The locality in Rome so called contains the Lateran palace, the Piazza, and the Basilica of St. John Lateran. The Basilica is the Pope's cathedral church. The palace (once a residence of the Popes) is now a museum.

Lath or Lathe. A division of a county. Sometimes it was an intermediate division between a hundred and a shire, as the lathes of Kent and rapes of Sussex, each of which contained three or four "hundreds" apiece. In Ireland the arrangement was different. The officer over a lath was called a lathreeve. (Anglo-Saxon læð, a canton. )

"If all that tything failed, then all that lath was charged for that tything; and if the lath failed, then all that hundred was demanded for them (i.e. turbulent fellows), and if the hundred, then all sure."—Spenser: Arden.

Lathet. A good lather is half a shave. This is the French proverb, "Barbe bien savonnée est à moitié faîte.""

Latin. The language spoken by the people of Latium, in Italy. The Latins are called aborigines of Italy. Alba Longa was head of the Latin League, and, as Rome was a colony of Alba Longa, it is plain to see how the Roman tongue was Latin.

"The earliest extant specimen of the Latin language is a fragment of the hymn of the Fratriæ Archæorūm, which occurred in every 10th of May, a public sacrifice for the fertility of the fields."—Sellar: Roman Poets of the Middle Ages, chap. ii. p. 21.

Classical Latin. The Latin of the best authors about the time of Augustus, as Livy, Tacitus, and Cicero (prose), Horace, Virgil, and Ovid (poets).

Late Latin. The period which followed the Augustan age. This period contains the Church Fathers.

Low Latin. Medieval Latin, mainly bastard German, French, Italian, Spanish, and so on.

Middle Latin. Latin from the sixth to the sixteenth century A.D., both inclusive. In this Latin, propositions frequently supply the cases of nouns.

New Latin. That which followed the revival of letters in the sixteenth century.

"Latium. The tale is that this word is from latae, i.e. long, and was so called because Saturn lay hid there, when he was driven out of heaven by his sons."

The Latin Church. The Western Church, in contradistinction to the Greek or Eastern Church.

The Latin cross. Formed thus: +

* The Greek cross has four equal arms, thus: +

Latin Learning, properly so called, terminated with Boëthius, but continued to be used in literary compositions and in the services of the church.

Latinum. King of the Laurentians, a people of Latium. According to Virgil, Latinum opposed Æneas on his first landing, but subsequently formed an alliance with him, and gave him Lavinia in marriage. Turnus, King of the Rutuli, declared that Lavinia had been betrothed to him, and prepared to support his claim by arms. It was agreed to decide the rival claims by single combat, and Æneas being victor, obtained Lavinia for his wife.

Latinum (in Jerusalem Delivered), an Italian, went with his five sons to the Holy War. His eldest son was slain by Solymon; Aramantès, going to his brother's aid, was also slain; then Sabi'nus; and lastly, Picas and Laurentès, twins. The father now rushed on the soldier, and was slain also. In one hour the father and his five sons were all slain.

Lattitudinarians. A sect of divines in the time of Charles II., opposed both to the High Church party and the Puritans. The term is now applied to those persons who hold very loose views of Divine inspiration and what are called orthodox doctrines.

La toxin. Mother of Apollo and Diana. When she knelt by a fountain in Delos (infants in arms) to quench her thirst at a small lake, some Lycean clowns insulted her and were turned into frogs.

"As when those limits that were transformed to Frogs Raided at Lato's twin-born progeny,
Which afloat held the sun and moon in fee."

Hilton: Somnus.

Latria and Dulia. Greek words adopted by the Roman Catholics; the former to express that supreme reverence and adoration which is offered to God alone; and the latter, that secondary reverence and adoration which is offered to saints. (Latria is the reverence of a latria, or hired servant, who receives wages; dulia is the reverence of a doulos or slave.)

Latticework or Chequers. A public-house sign, the arms of Fitzwarren, the head of which house, in the days of the Henrys, was invested with the power of licensing the establishments of vintners and publicans. Houses licensed notified the same by displaying the Fitzwarren arms. (The Times, April 29, 1869.)

The Fitzwarren arms were chequered and gules, hence public-houses and their signs are still frequently called the "Red Latticework."

"A' calls me even now, my lord, through a red lattice."—Shakespeare: Henry IV. Act ii.

Laugh in One's Sleeve (To). The French is: "Rire sous cape," or: "Rire sous son bonnet." The German is: "In feineschen lachen." The Latin is: "In stummacho ridere." These expressions indicate secret derision; laughing at one, not with one. But such phrases as "In sinu gaudeo" mean to feel secret joy, to rejoice in one's heart of hearts.
Laugh

Laugh on the Other Side of Your Mouth. To make a person laugh on the other side of his mouth is to make him cry, or to cause him annoyance. To "laugh on the wrong side of one's face" is to be humiliated, or to lament from annoyance.

"Then laughest thou: by-and-by thou wilt laugh on the wrong side of thy face."—Carlyle: The Diamond Necklace, chap. iii.

Laughing Philosopher. Democritos of Abdo'm, who viewed with supreme contempt the feeble powers of man. (B.C. 460-357.) (See Weeping Philosopher.)

Laughing-stock. A butt for jokes.

Laughter. We are told that Jupiter, after his birth, laughed incessantly for seven days.

Calchas, the Homeric soothsayer, died of laughter. The tale is that a fellow in rage told him he would never drink of the grapes growing in his vineyard, and added, if his words did not come true he would be the soothsayer's slave. When the wine was made, Calchas, at a great feast, sent for the fellow, and laughed so incessantly at the non-fulfilment of the prophecy that he died. (E. Bulwer Lytton: Tales of Miletus, iv.)

* * *

(See AGNUS and DEATH FROM STRANGE CAUSES.)

Launcelot. The clownish serving-man of Proteus, famous for his soliloquies to his dog Crab. (Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona.)

Launcelot. (See Lancelot.)

Launched into Eternity. Hanged.

"He ate several oranges on his passage, iniquitously, for his lordship was toady, and then, as old Rowe used to say, 'was launched into eternity.'—Gilly Williams to Lord Harrington. (This man was his lordship's servant, hanged for robbery.)

Launfal (Sir). Steward of King Arthur. He so greatly disliked Queen Guenevere, daughter of Ryon, King of Ireland, that he feigned illness and retired to Carleyoum, where he lived in great poverty. Having obtained the loan of a horse, he rode into a forest, and while he rested himself on the grass two damsels came to him, who invited him to rest in their lady's bower hard by. Sir Launfal accepted the invitation, and fell in love with the lady, whose name was Tryamour. Tryamour gave the knight an unfailling purse, and when he left told him if he ever wished to see her all he had to do was to retire into a private room, and she would instantly be with him. Sir Launfal now returned to court, and excited much attention by his great wealth; but having told Guenevere, who solicited his love, that she was not worthy to kiss the feet of her lady-love, the queen accused him to Arthur of insulting her person. Thereupon Arthur told him, unless he made good his word by producing this paragon of women, he should be thrown alive. On the day appointed, Tryamour arrived; Launfal was set at liberty and accompanied his mistress to the isle of Ole'on, and no man ever saw him more. (Thomas Chaloner: Sir Launfal, a metrical romance of Henry VI.'s time.)

Laura, the name immortalized by Petrarch, was either the wife of Hugues de Sade, of Avignon, or a fictitious name used by him on which to hang incidents of his life and love. If the former, her maiden name was Laura de Novaes.

Laura, Beppo's wife. (See Beppo.)

Laurs. (Greek, laura.) An aggregation of separate cells under the control of a superior. In monasteries the monks live under one roof; in lauras they live each in his own cell apart; but on certain occasions they assemble and meet together, sometimes for a meal, and sometimes for a religious service.

Laureate. Poets so called from an ancient custom in our universities of presenting a laurel wreath to graduates in rhetoric and poetry. Young aspirants were wreathed with laurels in berry (ornel de baie de doreur). Authors are still so "crowned" in France. The poets laureate of the two last centuries have been—

Ben Jonson, 1615, appointed by King James.
Sir William Davenant, 1657.
John Dryden, 1670.
Thomas Shadwell, 1683.
Nahum Tate, 1682.
Nicholas Rowe, 1715.
Laurence Fenelon, 1718.
Colley Cibber, 1723.
William Whitehead, 1737.
Thomas Watson, 1760.
Henry James Pye, 1790.
Robert Southey, 1813.
William Wordsworth, 1844.
Alfred Tennyson, 1850.
Alfred Austin, 1866.

Six or seven of these are almost unknown, and their productions are seldom read.

Laurel. The Greeks gave a wreath of laurels to the victor in the Pythian games, but the victor in the Olympic games had a wreath of wild olives, the victor in the Nemean games a wreath of green parsley, and the victor in the Isthmian games a wreath of dry parsley or green pine-leaves. (See CROWN.)

Laurel. The ancients believed that laurel communicated the spirit of prophecy and poetry. Hence the custom of crowning the pythoness and poets, and of putting laurel leaves under one's pillow to acquire inspiration. Another superstition was that the bay laurel was antagonistic to the stroke of lightning; but Sir Thomas Browne, in his _Vulgar Errors_, tells us that Vitomoraxtus proves from personal knowledge that this is by no means true.

_Laurel_, in modern times, is a symbol of victory and peace. St. Guadule, in Christian art, carries a laurel crown.

_Lawrence_ (Friar). The Franciscan friar who undertakes to marry Romeo and Juliet. To save Juliet from a second marriage he gives her a sleeping draught, and she is carried to the family vault as dead. Romeo finds her there, and believing her sleep to be the sleep of death, kills himself. On waking, Juliet discovers Romeo dead at her side, and kills herself also. (Shakespeare: _Romeo and Juliet._) (See LAWRENCE.)

_Lavinia_, Sir (2 syl.), Brother of Elaine, and son of the Lord of Astolat. He accompanied Sir Lancelot when he went, incognito, to look for the ninth diamond. Lavinia is described as young, brave, and a true knight. (Tennyson: _Idylls of the King_; _Elaine._)

_Lavallette_ (l'arquis de), a French statesman who was condemned to death for sending secret despatches to Napoleon, was set at liberty by his wife, who took his place in the prison.

Lord Nithsdale escaped in a similar way from the Tower of London. His wife disguised him as her maid, and with her he passed the sentries and made good his escape.

_Lavender_. From the Spanish _lavandera_ (a laundress), the plant used by laundresses for scenting linen. The botanical name is _Lavandula_, from the Latin _lavare_, to wash. It is a token of affection.

"He from his lass him lavender hath sent, Showing his love, and doth requital crave; Him rosemary his swain heareth, whose intent Is that he should hear in remembrance have."—Dracont: _Eloge_, iv.

Laid up in lavender—i.e. taken great care of, laid away, as women put things away in lavender to keep off moths. Persons who are in hiding are said to be in lavender. The French have the phrase "Élever dans du coton," referring to the custom of wrapping up things precious in cotton wool.

"Je vous que tu sois chez moi, comme dans du coton."—La Mascarotte, l. 5.

_In lavender._ In pawn. In Latin _pignor_ _opponere_.

"The poor gentleman gives so dear for the lavender it is laid up in, that if it lies long at the broker's house he seems to lose his apparel twice."—Greene: _Imp. Har. Misc._, v. 365.

_Lavinia_. Daughter of Lati'nus, betrothed to Turnus, King of the Rutuli. When Ænes landed in Italy, Latinus made an alliance with the Trojan hero, and promised to give him Lavinia to wife. This brought on a war between Turnus and Ænes, which was decided by single combat, in which Ænes was victor. (Virgil: _Aenid._)

Lavinia. The daughter of Titus Andronicus, bride of Bassia'nus, brother of the Emperor of Rome. Being grossly abused by Chiron and Demetrius, sons of Tam'or, Queen of the Goths, the savage wontons cut off her hands and pluck out her tongue, that she may not reveal their names. Lavinia, guiding a stick with her stumps, makes her tale known to her father and brothers, whereupon Titus murders the two Moorish princes and serves their heads in a pasy to their mother, whom he afterwards slays, together with the Emperor Saturninus' her husband. (Titus Andronicus, a play published with those of Shakespeare.)

1. In the play the word is accented Andron'icus, not Androni'cus.

_Lavinia_. Italy: so called from Lavinia, daughter of Lati'nus and wife of Ænes. Ænes built a town which he called Lavin'ium, capital of Lat'i'um.

"From the rich Lavinian shore 1 your market come to store,"—A well-known _Ode._

_Lavinia and Palemon_. A free poetical version of Ruth and Boaz, by Thomson in his _Antinum._

_Lavolet or Lavo'ta_. (French, _la rolle_.) A lively dance, in which was a good deal of jumping or capering, whence its name. Trolius says, "I cannot sing, nor heel the high lavolet" (iv. 4). It is thus described:—

"A lofty jumping or a leaping round, Where each arm in arm two dancers are entwined, And whirl themselves with strict embracements bound, And still their feet an anapest do sound."—Sir John Davies.

_Law_. To give one law. A sporting term, meaning the chance of saving oneself. Thus a hare or a stag is allowed "law"—i.e. a certain start before any hound is permitted to attack it; and a træsser allowed law is one to whom time is given to "find his legs.

Quips of the law, called "devices of Cépola," from Bartholomew Cépola, whose law-quirks, teaching how to elude the most express law, and to perpetuate lawsuits ad infinitum, have been frequently reprinted — once in octavo, in black letter, by John Pett, in 1503.

The Man of Lawes Tale, by Chaucer.
This story is found in Gower, who probably took it from the French chronicle of Nicholas Trivet. A similar story forms the plot of Enware, a romance printed in Ritson’s collection. The treason of the knight who murders Hermengilde resembles an incident in the French Roman de la Violette, the English metrical romance of Le bone Florence of Rome (in Ritson), and a tale in the Gesù
Romalearum, c. 09 (Madden’s edition).
(See Constance.)

Law Latin. (See Dog Latin.)

Law’s Bubble. The famous Mississippi scheme, devised by John Law, for paying off the national debt of France
(1716-1720). By this “French South-Sea Bubble” the nation was almost ruined. It was called Mississippi because the company was granted the “exclusive trade of Louisia’na on the banks of the Mississippi.”

Laws of the Medes and Persians.

Unalterable laws.

“Now, O King... sign the writing, that it be not changed, according to the law of the Medes

The Laws of Hovel Dha, who reigned in South Wales in the tenth century, printed with a Latin translation by Wotton, in his Leges Wallacei (1811).

Laying. (Scots.) A tavern reckoning.

Lawsuits. Miles d’Illiers, Bishop of Chartres (1459-1493), was so litigious, that when Louis XI. gave him a pension to clear off old scores, and told him in future to live in peace and goodwill with his neighbours, the bishop earnestly entreated the king to leave him some three or four to keep his mind in good exercise. Similarly Panurge entreated Pan-tagruel not to pay off all his debts, but to leave some centimes at least, that he might not feel altogether a stranger to his own self. (Rabelais: Pantagruel, iii. 5.) — (See Lilburn.)

Lawn. Fine, thin cambric bleached on a lawn, instead of the ordinary bleaching grounds. It is used for the sleeves of bishops, and sometimes for ladies’ handkerchiefs.

Lawn-market (The). To go up the Lawn-market, in Scotch parlance, means to go to be hanged.

“I’m the Lawn-market, down the West Row,
Up the long ladder, down the short law.”

—Schoolboy Rhyme (Scotland).

Lawrence (Sr.). Patron saint of curriers, because his skin was broiled on a gridiron. In the pontificate of Sextus I, he was charged with the care of the poor, the orphans, and the widows. In the persecution of Valerian, being summoned to deliver up the treasures of the church, he produced the poor, etc., under his charge, and said to the preator, “These are the church’s treasures.” In Christian art he is generally represented as holding a gridiron in his hand. He is the subject of one of the principal hymns of Prudentius. (See Lawrence.)

St. Lawrence’s tears or The fiery tears of St. Lawrence. Meteoric or shooting stars, which generally make a great display on the anniversary of this saint (August 10th).

*: The great periods of shooting stars are between the 9th and 14th of August, from the 12th to the 14th of November, and from 6th to 12th December.

Tom Lawrence, alias “Tylburn Tom” or “Tuck,” A highwayman. (Sir Walter Scott: Heart of Midlothian.)

Lawyer’s Bags. Some red, some blue. In the Common Law, red bags are reserved for Q.C.’s and Sergeants;
but a stuff-gownsman may carry one “if presented with it by a silk.” Only red bags may be taken into Common Law Courts, blue must be carried no farther than the robing-room. In Chancery Courts the etiquette is not so strict.

Lay Brothers. Men not in orders received into the convents and bound by vows. (Greek, latais, people.)

Lay Figures. Wooden figures with free joints, used by artists chiefly for the study of drapery. This is a meta-orphical use of lay. As divines divide the world into two parties, the ecclesiastics and the laity, so artists divide their models into two classes, the living and the lay.

Lay Out (To). (a) To disburse: Il depensa de grandes sommas d’argent.
(b) To display goods: Mettre des marchandises en monstre. To place in convenient order what is required for wear:
Préparer ses beaux habits.
(c) To prepare a corpse for the coffin, by placing the limbs in order, and dressing the body in its grave-clothes.

Lay about One (70). To strike on all sides.

"H'ell lay about him to-day."—Shakespeare:
Froissart and Gresspin, i. 2.

Lay by the Heels (70). To render powerless. The allusion is to the stocks, in which vagrants and other petty offenders were confined by the ankles, locked in what was called the stocks, common, at one time, to well-nigh every village in the land.

Lay of the Last Minstrel. (For plot see MARGARET.)

Lay to One's Charge (70). To attribute an offence to a person.

"And he [Stephen] knoved down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord lay not this sin to their charge."—Acts vii. 93. The phrase occurs again in the Bible, e.g. Deut. xxi. 8; Rom. viii. 33, etc.

Layamon, who wrote a translation in Saxon of the Brut of Wace, in the twelfth century, is called The English
Ennius. (See ENNIUS.)

Layers-over for Meddlers. No-thinking that concerns you. A reprooof for inquisitive children who want to know what a person is doing or making, when the person so engaged does not think proper to inform them. A "layer-over" is a whip or slap. And a "layer-over for meddlers" is a whip or chastisefor those who meddle with what does not concern them.

Lazar House or Lazarotto. A house for poor persons affected with contagious diseases. So called from the beggar
Lazarus (q. e.)

Lazarists. A body of missionaries founded by St. Vincent de Paul in 1624, and so termed from the priory of St.
Lazure, at Paris, which was their headquar ters from 1632 to 1792.

Lazarillo de Tormes (1553). A comic romance, something in the Gil Blas style, the object being to satirise all classes of society. Lazarillo, a light, joyful, audacious man-servant, sees his masters in their undress, and exposes their foibles. This work was written by Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, general and statesman of Spain, author of War against the Moors.

Lazarone (3 syl.) Italian Lazaro, plu. Lazaroni. The mob. Originally applied to all those people of Naples who lived in the streets, not having any habitation of their own. So called from the hospital of St. Lazarus, which served as a refuge for the destitute of that city. Every year they elected a chief, called the Capo Lazaro. Man-siello, in 1647, with these vagabonds accomplished the revolution of Naples.
In 1798 Michele Sforza, at the head of the Lazaroni, successfully resisted Etienne Championnet, the French general.

Lazarus. Any poor beggar; so called from the Lazarus of the parable, who was laid daily at the rich man's gate
(St. Luke xvii.).

Lazy.

Lazy as David Lawrence's dog.
Here Lawrence is a corruption of Laurence, an imaginary being supposed by Scottish peasantry to preside over the lazy and indolent. Laziness is called "Lawrence." (See and compare DAVY JONES.)

Lazy as Joe, the marine, who laid down his musket to sneeze. (Nailor's proverb.)

Lazy as Ludlam's dog, which leaned his head against the wall to bark. This Ludlam was the famous sorcerer of Surrey, who lived in a cave near Farnham, called "Ludlam's Cave." She kept a dog, noted for its laziness, so that when the rustics came to consult the witch, it would hardly condescend to give notice of their approach, even with the ghost of a bark. (Ray: Proverbs.)

Lazy Lawrence of Lubberland.
The hero of a popular tale. He served the schoolmaster, the squire's cook, the farmer, and his own wife, which was accounted high treason in Lubberland.
One of Miss Edgeworth's tales, in the Parents' Assistant, is called Lazy Lawrence.

Lazy Lobkin (A). A lob (says
Halliwell) is "the last person in a race." (Somersetshire). (Welsh llbg, a do it, our "lubber.")

"A lazy lobkin, like an idle boute."
Burton: Old Mincypap, etc. (1602).

Lazy Man's Load. One too heavy to be carried; so called because lazy people, to save themselves the trouble of coming a second time, are apt to overload themselves.

Lazyland (Gone to). Given up to indolence and idleness.

Lazaroni. (See LAZARONE.)

L'Etat c'est Moi (I am the State).
The saying and belief of Louis XIV. On this principle he acted with tolerable consistency.

Le Roi le Vent (French, The King wills it.) The form of royal assent made by the clerk of parliament to bills submitted to the Crown. The dissent is expressed by Le roi se v'avisera (the king will give it his consideration).

Le'a. One of the "daughters of men," beloved by one of the "sons of God." The angel who loved her ranked with the least of the spirits of light, whose post around the throne was in the uttermost circle. Sent to earth on a mission, he saw Lea bathing and fell in love with her; but Lea was so heavenly-minded that her only wish was to "dwell in purity, and serve God in singleness of heart." Her angel lover, in the madness of his passion, told Lea the spell-word that gave him admittance into heaven. The moment Lea uttered that word her body became spiritual, rose through the air, and vanished from his sight. On the other hand, the angel lost his otherworld nature, and became altogether earthly, like a child of clay." (Moore: Loves of the Angels, story 1.)

Lea'ba na Feine [ Beds of the Fréine]. The name of several large piles of stones in Ireland. The ancient Irish warriors were called Fe'í-ne, which some mistake for Phœni (Carthaginians), but which means hunters.

Leach. Leachcraft. A leach is one skilled in medicine, and "leach-craft" is the profession of a medical man. (Anglo-Saxon, lece, one who relieves pain, lecceraef.)

"And straightway sent, with careful diligence, To fetch a leach the which had great insight In that disease." (Spenser: Faerie Queen, book i. canto x. line 23.)

Lead (pronounced led), the metal, was, by the ancient alchemists, called Saturn. (Anglo-Saxon, lead.)

To strike lead. To make a good hit.

"That, after the failure of the king, he should strike lead in his own house secret... an inevitable law."—Bret Harte: Foot of Fire Forks.

Lead (pronounce lead). (Anglo-Saxon led-an.)

To lead apes in hell. (See Apes.)

To lead by the nose. (See under Nose.)

To lead one a pretty dance. (See under Dance.)

Leaden Hall (Showers of). That of artillery in the battlefield.

Leaden Hall (pronounce leden), so named from the ancient manor of Sir Hugh Neville, whose mansion or hall was roofed with lead, a notable thing in his days. "Leadenhall Street" and "Leadenhall Market," London, are on the site of Sir Hugh's manor.

Leader (A) or a leading article. A newspaper article in large type, by the editor or one of the editorial staff. So called because it takes the lead or chief place in the summary of current topics, or because it is meant to lead public opinion.

The first fiddle of an orchestra and the first cornet—a-piston of a military band is called the leader.

Leading Case (A). A lawsuit to settle others of a similar kind.

Leading Note in music. The sharp seventh of the diatonic scale, which leads to the octave, only half a tone higher.

Leading Question. A question so worded as to suggest an answer. "Was he dressed in a black coat?" leads to the answer "Yes." In cross-examining a witness, leading questions are permitted, because the chief object of a cross-examination is to obtain contradictions.

Leading Strings. To be in leading-strings is to be under the control of another. Leading-strings are those strings used for holding up infants just learning to walk.

Leaf. Before the invention of paper one of the substances employed for writing was the leaves of certain plants. In the British Museum are some writings on leaves from the Malabar coast, and several copies of the Bible written on palm-leaves. The reverse and obverse pages of a book are still called leaves; and the double page of a ledger is termed a "folio," from folium (a leaf).

Leaf. (Anglo-Saxon lef.)

To take a leaf out of [my] book. To imitate me: to do as I do. The allusion is to literary plagiarisms.

To turn over a new leaf. To amend one's ways. The French equivalent is: "Je lui ferai chanter une autre chanson." But in English, "To make a person sing another tune," means to make him eat his words, or change his note for one he will not like so well.

League.

The Grey League [lia grisea]. 15th century. So called from the grey homespun dress adopted by the leaguers.

The Holy League. Several leagues are so denominated. The three following are the most important: 1511, by Pope Julius II.; Ferdinand the Catholic, Henry VIII., the Venetians, and the Swiss against Louis XII.; and that of 1576, founded at Péronne for the maintenance of the Catholic faith and the exclusion of Protestant princes from the throne of France. This league was organised by the Guises to keep Henri IV. from the throne.

Leak Out (To). To come clandestinely to public knowledge. As a liquid leaks out of an unsound vessel, so the secret cozes out unawares.

Leal. Loyal, trusty, law-abiding.

Land of the Leal. (See LAND . . .)

Leander (3 syl.) A young man of Abydos, who swam nightly across the Hellespont to visit his lady-love, Hero, a priestess of Sestos. One night he was drowned in his attempt, and Hero leaped into the Hellespont also. This story is told in one of the poems of Musaeus, entitled Hero and Leander. (See Marlowe's poem.) (See HERO.)

Lord Byron and Lieutenant Ekenhead repeated the experiment of Leander and accomplished it in 1 hour 10 minutes. The distance, allowing for drifting, would be about four miles. A young man of St. Croix, in 1817, swam over the Sound from Cronenburgh, in 2 hours 40 minutes, the distance being six miles.

Leaning Tower. The one at Pisa, in Italy, is 178 feet in height, and leans about 14 feet. At Caerphilly, in Glamorganshire, there is a tower which leans eleven feet in eighty.

"The Leaning Tower of Pisa continues to stand because the vertical line drawn through its centre of gravity passes within its base." — Quot. Physics.

Leap Year. Every year divisible by four. Such years occur every fourth year. In ordinary years the day of the month which falls on Monday this year, will fall on Tuesday next year, and Wednesday the year after; but the fourth year will leap over Thursday to Friday. This is because a day is added to February, which, of course, affects every subsequent day of the year. (See BRITISH.

The ladies propose, and, if not accepted, claim a silk gown. St. Patrick, having "dropped the frogs out of the bags," was walking along the shores of Lough Neagh, when he was accosted by St. Bridget in tears, and was told that a mutiny had broken out in the nunnery over which she presided, the ladies claiming the right of popping the question." St. Patrick said he would concede them the right every seventh year, when St. Bridget threw her arms round his neck, and exclaimed, "Arrah, Patrick, jewel, I daurn't go back to the girls wid such a proposal. Make it one year in four." St. Patrick replied, "Bridget, auschla, squeeze me that way agin, an' I'll give ye leap-year, the longest of the lot." St. Bridget, upon this, popped the question to St. Patrick himself, who, of course, could not marry; so he patched up the difficulty as best he could with a kiss and a silk gown.

"The story told above is of no historic value, for an Act of the Scottish Parliament, passed in the year 1228, has been unearthed which runs thus:—

"Ordinat that during ye reign of her most blessed majestie, Margaretha, duchesse of faith high and love estate, shall haue libertie to speake ye sae shal she like. But if he refuse to tak her to his wyf, he shal be mutch in the sum of an hundred pounds, or less, as his estate may bee, except he всегда can make it appear that he is hounded to another woman, then he shall be free."

N.B. The year 1228 was, of course, a leap-year.

Leap in the Dark (A). Thomas Hobbes is reported to have said on his death-bed, "Now am I about to take my last voyage—a great leap in the dark." Rabelais, in his last moments, said, "I am going to the Great Perhaps." Lord Derby, in 1886, applied the words, "We are about to take a leap in the dark," to the Reform Bill.

Lear (King). A legendary king of Britain, who in his old age divided his kingdom between Goneril and Regan, two of his daughters, who professed great love for him. These two daughters drove the old man mad by their unnatural conduct. (Shakespeare: King Lear.)

Percy, in his Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, has a ballad about King Lear and his Three Daughters (series i. book 2).

Camden tells a similar story of Inn, King of the West Saxons (see Remains, p. 306, edition 1674). The story of King Lear is given by Geoffrey of Monmouth in his Chronicles, whence Holinshed transcribed it. Spenser has introduced the same story into his Fáéirí Ceóerne, book ii. canto 10.

Learn (1 syl.). Live and learn.

Cato, the censor, was an old man when he taught himself Greek.

Michael Angelo, at seventy years of age, said, "I am still learning."

John Keble wrote out Hamlet thirty times, and said, on quitting the stage, "I am now beginning to understand my art."
Mrs. Siddons, after she left the stage, was found studying Lady Macbeth, and said, "I am amazed to discover some new points in the character which I never found out while acting it."

Milton, in his blindness, when past fifty, sat down to complete his Paradise Lost.

Scott, at fifty-five, took up his pen to redeem an enormous liability.

Richardson was above fifty when he published his first novel, Pamela.

Benjamin West was sixty-four when he commenced his series of paintings, one of which is Christ Healing the Sick.

Learn by Heart (To). The heart is the seat of understanding; thus the Scripture speaks of men "wise in heart;" and "slow of heart" means dull of understanding. To learn by heart is to learn and understand. To learn by rote is to learn so as to be able to repeat; to learn by memory is to commit to memory without reference to understanding what is so learnt. However, we employ the phrase commonly as a synonym for committing to memory.

Learned (2 syll.). Coloman, king of Hungary, was called The Learned (1095-1114). (See Beaucherc.)

The Learned Blacksmith. Elihu Burritt, the linguist, who was at one time a blacksmith (1811-1879).

The Learned Painter. Charles LeBrun, so called from the great accuracy of his costumes (1619-1690).

The Learned Tailor. Henry Wild, of Norwich, who mastered, while he worked at his trade, the Greek, Latin, Hebrew, Chaldaic, Syriac, Persian, and Arabic languages (1631-1731).

Least Said the Soonest Mended (Thc) or The Less Said . . . Explanations and apologies are quite useless, and only make bad worse.

Leather. Nothing like leather. My interest is the best nostrum. A town, in danger of a siege, called together a council of the chief inhabitants to know what defence they recommended. A mason suggested a strong wall, a shipbuilder advised "wooden walls," and when others had spoken, a currier arose and said, "There’s nothing like leather."

In Botallack, Cornwall, a standing toast is Tin and Pitchards, the staples of the town:

"Another version is, "Nothing like leather to administer a thrashing."

Leather or Prunella. It is all leather or prunella. Nothing of any moment, all rubbish. Prunella is a woollen stuff, used for the uppers of ladies’ boots and shoes. (See Salt.)

"Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow;
The rest is but leather or prunella."

Leathering. To give one a leathering is to beat him with a leather belt, such as policemen wear, and boys used to wear. (The Welsh lathen is a rod.)

Leatherstocking (Natty). The nickname of Natty Bumppo (q.v.), in Cooper’s novel, called The Pioneers. A half-savage and half-Christian hero of American wild life.

Leave in the Lurch (To). (See LEFT IN THE Lurch.)

Leave out in the Cold (To). To slight, to take little or no interest in a person; to pass by unnoticed. The allusion is to a person calling at a house with a friend and the friend not being asked to come in.

Leave some for Manners. In Ecclesiasticus it is written:

"Leave off first for manners sake; and be not unmeetly, lest thou offend."—Chap. xxxi. 17.

Leaves without Figs. Show of promise without fulfilment. Words without deeds. Keeping the promise to the ear and breaking it to the sense. Of course, the allusion is to the barren fig-tree referred to in Luke xiii.

Led Captain (A). An obsequious person, who dances attendance on the master and mistress of a house, for which service he has a knife and fork at the dinner table. He is led like a dog, and always graced with the title of captain.

Le‘da and the Swan. This has been a favourite subject with artists. In the Orléans gallery is the chef-d’œuvre of Paul Veronese. Correggio and Michael Angelo have both left paintings of the same subject.

Legger (A). A book "laid up" in the counting-house, and containing thedebits and credits of the merchant or tradesman, arranged under "heads." (Dutch legyer, to lay; whence legyer.)

Legger-lines, in music, are lines which lie above or below the staff. (Dutch, legyer, to lie.)

Lee. Under the lee of the land. Under the shelter of the cliffs which break the force of the winds. (Anglo-Saxon, lea, a shelter.)

Under the lee of a ship. On the side opposite to the wind, so that the ship shelters or wards it off.

To lay a ship by the lee, or, in modern nautical phraseology, to heave to, is to arrange the sails of a ship so that they may lie flat against the masts and shrouds, that the wind may strike the vessel broadside so that she will make little or no headway.

Lee Hatch. Take care of the lee hatch. Take care, helmsman, that the ship goes not to the leeward of her course—i.e. the part towards which the wind blows.

Lee Shore is the shore under the lee of a ship, or that towards which the wind blows. (See Lee.)

Lee-side and Weather-side. (See Leeward.)

Lee Tide, or Leeward Tide, is a tide running in the same direction as the wind blows. A tide in the opposite direction is called a tide under the lee.

Leeds (a Stock Exchange term). Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Ordinary Stock. It is the Leeds line.

The Austrian Leeds. Brunn, in Moravia, noted for its woollen cloth. So it was called in the palmy days of Austria.

Leek. Wearing the leek on St. David’s day. Mr. Brady says St. David caused the Britons under King Cadwallader to distinguish themselves by a leek in their caps. They conquered the Saxons, and recall their victory by adopting the leek on every anniversary (March 1st). (Clavis Calendaria.) Wearing the leek is obsolete. (Anglo-Saxon leaxe.)

Shakespeare makes out that the Welsh wore leeks at the battle of Poitiers, for Fluellen says:—

"If your majesties is remembered of it, the Welshmen did good service in a garden where leeks did grow, wearing leeks in their Montimouth caps, which, your majesty know, to this hour is an honourable badge of the service; and I do believe your majesty takes no scorn to wear the leek upon St. Tavy’s Day."—Henry V, iv. 7.

To eat the leek. To be compelled to eat your own words, or retract what you have said. Fluellen (in Shakespeare’s Henry V) is taunted by Pistol for wearing a leek in his hat. "Hence," says Pistol, "I am qualmish at the smell of leek." Fluellen replies, "If peace be, I peseech you . . . at my desire . . . to eat this leek." The ancient answers, "Not for Cadwallader and all his ghosts." Then the poppy-dyed Welshman beats him, nor desists till Pistol has swallowed the entire abhorrence.

Leech. There are lees to every wine. The best things have some defect. A French proverb.

"Doubt is the lees of thought."

Bach: Doubt, etc., i. 11.

Settling on the lees. Making the best of a bad job; settling down on what is left, after having squandered the main part of one’s fortune.

Leet (A). A manor-court for petty offences; the day on which such a court was held. (Anglo-Saxon, lethe, a law-court superior to the wapentake.)

"Who has a breast so pure, but some underly apprehensions? Keep leets and low-days, and in session sit With meditations lawful?"

Shakespeare: Othello, iii. 2.

Leeward and Windward. Leeward is toward the lee, or that part towards which the wind blows; windward is in the opposite direction, viz. in the teeth of the wind. "Leeward," pronounced lew-evd. (See Lee.)

Leftevre. The poor lieutenant whose story is so touchingly told in Sterne’s Tristram Shandy book vi. chap. 6.

Left, unlucky; Right lucky. The augur among the Romans having taken his stand on the Capitoline Hill, and marked out with his wand the space of the heavens to be the field of observation, divided the space into two from top to bottom. If the birds appeared on the left side of the division, the augury was unlucky, but if the birds appeared on the right side the augury was pronounced to be favourable.

"Hadst, gentle bird, turn thy wings and fly on my right hand! but the bird flew on the left side. Then the eat grew very heavy, for he knew the omen to be unlucky."—R. Gurnard the Poor, i.

The Left, in the Legislative Assembly of France, meant the Girondists: it was famous for its orators. In the House of Commons the Opposition occupies the left-hand side of the Speaker. In the Austrian Assembly the democratic party is called The Left.

Over the left. A way of expressing disbelief, incredulity, or a negative. The allusion is to morganatic marriages (q.r.). When a woman so married claimed to be a wedded wife, she was told that such was the case "over the left." (See below.)

Minister (the left hand), meaning not straightforward, dishonest, is far older than morganatic marriages. The ancient Greek augurs considered all signs seen by them over the left shoulder to be unlucky, and foreboding evil to come. Plutarch, following Plato and Left-handed Aristotle, gives as the reason, that the west (or left side of the augur) was towards the setting or departing sun.

Left-handed Compliment (A). A compliment which insinuates a reproach. (See below.)

Left-handed Marriage. A morganatic marriage (q.e.). In those marriages the husband gives his left hand to the bride, instead of the right, when he says, "I take thee for my wedded wife." George William, Duke of Zell, married Eleanora d'Esmeria in this way, and the lady took the name and title of Lady of Harburg; her daughter was Sophia Dorothea, the wife of George I.

Left-handed Oath (A). An oath not intended to be binding. (See above.)

Left in the Lurch. Left to face a great perplexity. In cribbage a lurch is when a player has scored only thirty holes, while his opponent has made sixty-one, and thus won a double.

Leg (A), that is, a blackleg (q.e.).
To make a leg, is to make a bow. "The pursuivant smiled at their simplicity, and making many legs, took their reward." The King and Miller of Mansfield.

Leg-ball. A runaway. To give leg-ball, to cut and run.

Leg-bye (A), in cricket, is a run scored from a ball which has glanced off any part of a batsman's person except his hand.

Leg of Mutton School (Th.). So Eckhart called those authors who lauded their patrons in prose or verse, under the hope of gaining a commision, a living, or, at the very least, a dinner for their pains.

Legs. On his legs. Mr. So-and-So is on his legs, has risen to make a speech. On its last legs. Moribund; obsolete; ready to fall out of cognisance.
To set on his legs. So to provide for one that he is able to earn his living without further help.
To stand on one's own legs. To be independent: to be earning one's own living. Of course, the allusion is to being nursed, and standing "alone." (See Borrow.)

Legal Tender (A). The circulating medium of a nation, according to a standard fixed by the government of that nation. It may be in metal, in paper, or anything else that the government may choose to sanction. In England, at present (1895), the standard is a gold sovereign, guaranteed of a fixed purity. In some countries it is silver, and in some countries the two precious metals are made to bear a relative value, say twenty silver shillings (or their equivalents) shall equal in commercial value a gold sovereign. In Germany, before 1872, a very base silver was a legal tender, and in Ireland James II. made a farthing the legal tender represented by an English shilling, so that 5d. was really a legal tender for a sovereign. Of course, export and import trade would not be possible under such conditions.

Legem Pone. Money paid down on the nail; ready money. The first of the psalms appointed to be read on the twenty-fifth morning of the month is entitled Legem pone, and March 25th is the great pay-day; in this way the phrase "Legem pone" became associated with cash down.

"In this there is nothing to be stated; all their speech in legem pone." — Mivart: Essays in Prison, p. 26.

"They were all in our service for the legem pone." — Ozil: Babylon.

Legend means simply "something to be read" as part of the divine service. The narratives of the lives of saints and martyrs were so formed from their being read, especially at matins, and after dinner in the refectories. Exaggeration and a love for the wonderful so predominated in these readings, that the word came to signify the untrue, or rather, an event based on tradition.

"A myth is a pure and absolute imagination; a legend has a basis of fact, but annulises, abridges, or modifies that basis at pleasure." — Halliwell: Historic Relics, lecture i. p. 253, note 2.

Legend of a Coin is that which is written round the face of a coin. Thus, on a shilling, the legend is round the head of the reigning sovereign; as, "VICTORIA DEI GRATIA BRITANNIAR: REGINA F: D:" (or "BRITANNIAR: REG: F: D:"). The words "ONE SHILLING" on the other side of the coin, written across it, we denominate the "inscription."

Legend de Auræ, by Jacques de Voragine. A collection of monkish legends in Latin. (1230-1298.)

The Golden Legend, of Longfellow, is a semi-dramatic poem taken from an old German tale by Hartmann von der Aue, called Poor Henry. (Twelfth century.)

Leger. St. Leger Stakes (Doncaster): so called from Colonel Anthony St. Leger, who founded them in 1776. The colonel was governor of St. Lucia, and cousin of the Hon. Elizabeth St. Leger (the lady Freemason).

The St. Leger Stakes are for both colts and mares. Those which have run in the Derby or Oaks are eligible.

Leger-de-Main. Slight of hand; conjuring which depends chiefly on lightness of hand, or dexterity.

Legion. "My name is Legion: for we are many" (St. Mark v. 9). A proverbial expression somewhat similar to hydra-headed. Thus, speaking of the houseless poor, we should say, "Their name is Legion;" so also we should say of the diseases arising from want of cleanliness, the evils of ignorance, and so on.

The Third Legion. The Roman legion that disembarked the Marcomanni in 179 is so called, because (as the legend informs us) a thunderstorm was sent in answer to the prayers of certain Christians; this storm relieved the thirst of the legion. In like manner a hail-storm was sent to the aid of Joshua, at the time when he commanded the sun to stay its course, and assisted the Israelites to their victory. (Dion Cassius, lxxi. 8. (See Joshua x. 10-12.)

Legion of Honour. An order of merit instituted by the First Consul in 1802, for either military or civil merit. In 1813 there were 49,117 members, but in 1831 one new member was elected for every two extinct ones, so that the honour was no longer a mere farce.

Napoleon III. added a lower order of this Legion, called the Mérite Militaire, the ribbon of which was yellow, not red. The old Legion consisted of Grand Cross, Grand Officers, Commanders, Officers, and Chevaliers, and the ribbon of the order was red.

"The Legion of Honour gives pensions to its military members, and five hundred to some four hundred of the daughters, sisters, and uncles of its members."

Legislator or Son of Parnassus. Boileau was so called by Voltaire, because of his Art of Poetry, a production unequalled in the whole range of didactic poetry. (1636-1711.)

Leglin-girth. To cast a leglin-girth. To have "a screw loose;" to have made a "four pas;" to have one's reputation blown upon. A leglin-girth is the lowest hoop of a leglin or milk-pail. (See Sir Walter Scott: Fortunes of Nigel, chap. xxii.)

Legree. A slave-dealer in Uncle Tom's Cabin, by Mrs. Beecher Stowe.

Leibnitz-ism or Leibnitzian-ism. The doctrines taught by G. W. von Leibnitz, the German philosopher (1646-1716). The opposite of Spinoza-ism. Spinoza taught that whatever is, is God manifested by phenomena. The light and warmth of the sun, the refreshing breeze, space, and every visible object, is only deity in detail. "That God, in fact, is one and all."

Leibnitz, on the other hand, taught that phenomena are separate from deity, as body is from soul; but although separate, that there is between them a pre-established harmony. The electricity which runs along a telegraph wire is not the message, but it gives birth to the message by pre-established harmony.

So all things obey God's will, not because they are identical, but on account of this pre-established harmony.

Leicester (pron. Las'ter) is the cump-town on the river Leire, which is now called the Soar.

Leicester Square (London). So called from a family mansion of the Sydneys, Earls of Leicester, which stood on the north-east side.

"The Earl of Leicester father of Almeron Sydenly ... built for himself a study house at the north-east corner of a square plot of 'Leamun Land,' belonging to the parish of St. Martin's, which plot henceforth became known to Londoners as Leicester Fields. A square gradually grew up on the spot, and was completed in 1717."—Cassey's Magazine, London Legends, x. 2

Leigh (Aurora) (pron. Lee). The heroine of Mrs. Browning's poem so called, designed to show the noble aim of true art.

Leilah ([L-i-lah]). A beautiful young slave, the concubine of Hassan, Caliph of the Ottoman Empire. She falls in love with the Giaour, flees from the turmoil, is overtaken by an emir, and cast into the sea. (Byron: The Giaour.)

Lely (Sir Peter), the painter, was the son of Vander Vaas or Face, of Westphalia, whose house had a lily for its sign. Both father and son went by the nickname of Lelys (the Lily), a sobriquet which Peter afterwards adopted as his cognomen.

Leman (Lake). Geneva; called in Latin Lemanus.

"Lak Leman wore me with his crystal face."—Lord Byron: Childe Harold, ii. 68.

Lemnian Deed (A). One of unusual barbarity and cruelty. The phrase arose from two horrible massacres perpetrated by the Lemnians: the first was the murder of all the men and male children. on the island by the women; and the other was the murder by the men of all the children born in the island of Athenian parents.

Lemnian Earth. A species of earth of a yellowish-grey colour, found in the island of Lemnos, said to cure the bites of serpents and other wounds. It was called terra sigillaeta, because it was scaled by the priest before being vended. Philoctetes was left at Lemnos when wounded in the foot by Hercules.

Lemnian Women. (The). A somewhat similar story is told of these women to that of the Danaides (q.v.). When they found that their husbands liked the Thracian women better than themselves, they agreed together to murder every man in the island. Hypsipyle saved her father, and was sold to some pirates as a slave.

Lemnos. The island where Vulcan fell when Jupiter flung him out of heaven. Probably it was at one time volcanic, though not so now.

Lemon Sola, which abound on the south coast of England and about Marseilles. Lemon is a corruption of the French limande, a dab or flat-fish. The "flounder sole." There are several varieties. (Latin lima, mud.)

Lemnster Ore. Fine wool, of which Leominster carpets are made.

"A bank of more, spongy and swelling, and far more soft, than the finest Leemster ore." - Herrick: Oberon's Palace.

Lemures (3 syl.). The spirits of the dead. Good lemures were called Latrae, but bad ones Larvae, spectres who wandered about at night-time to terrify the living. (Ovid: Fasti, v.)

Lend a Hand. (See Hand.)

Length (A). Forty-two lines. This is a theatrical term; an actor says he has one, two, or more lengths in his part, and, if written out for him, the scribe is paid by the length.

Length-month. (See Lent.)

Lens (Latin, a lentil or bean). Glasses used in mathematical instruments are so called because the double convex one, which may be termed the perfect lens, is of a bean shape.

Lenson. As much akin as Lenson hill to Pilsen pin; i.e. not at all. Lenson hill and Pilsen pin are two high hills in Dorsetshire, called by sailors the Cow and Calf. Out at sea they look like one elevation, though in reality several hills separate them.

Lent (Anglo-Saxon, lenten). Lententid (spring-tide) was the Saxon name for March, because in this month there is a manifest lengthening of the days. As the chief part of the great fast falls in March, this period of fast received the name of the Lenten-fasten, or Lent. It is from Ash Wednesday to Easter.

"The Fast of thirty-six days was introduced in the fourth century. Felix III. added four more days in 487, to make it correspond with our Lord's fast in the wilderness.

Galeazzo's Lent. A form of torture devised by Galeazzo Visconti, calculated to prolong the unfortunate victim's life for forty days.

Lent Lily (The). The daffodil, which blooms in Lent.

Lenten. Frugal, stinted, as food in Lent. Shakespeare has "lenten entertainment." (Hamlet, ii. 2): "a lenten answer" (Twelfth Night, i. 5); "a lenten pyn" (Romeo and Juliet, ii. 4).

"And with a lenten salad coiled her blood." - Dryden: Hind and Panther, ii. 27.

Leodragrace, of Camilliad, the father of Guinevere, wife of King Arthur.

Leon (in Orlando Furioso), son of Constantine, the Greek emperor, is promised Bradamant in marriage by his parents, Amon and Beatrice; but Bradamant loves Rogero. By-and-by a friendship springs up between Leon and Rogero, and when the prince learns that Bradamant and Rogero are betrothed to each other, he nobly withdraws his suit, and Rogero marries Bradamant.

Leonard. A real scholar, forced for daily bread to keep a common school. (Crabbe: Borough, letter xxiv.)

St. Leonard is usually represented in a deacon's dress, and holding chains or broken fetters in his hand, in allusion to his untiring zeal in releasing prisoners. Contemporary with Clovis.

Leonidas of Modern Greece. Marco Bozzaris, who with 1,200 men put to rout 4,000 Turco-Albanians, at Kerpenisi, but was killed in the attack (1823). He was buried at Missolonghi.

Leontine Contract. A one-sided agreement; so called in allusion to the fable of The Lion and his Fellow-Hunters. (See Glaucus.)
Le'ónine Verses, properly speaking, are either hexameter verses, or alternate hexameter and pentameter verses, rhyming at the middle and end of each respective line. These fancies were common in the 12th century, and were so called from Leóninus, a canon of the Church of St. Victor, in Paris, the inventor. In English verse, any metre which rhymes middle and end is called a Leónine verse. One of the most noted specimens celebrates the tale of a Jew, who fell into a pit on Saturday and refused to help him the day following, because it was Sunday:--

"Tejde manus, Salomon, ego te de stercore fulvum.

Sabbata nostra colo, de stercore surgere nolo,

Sabbata nostra quidem Salomon celebrabat.

Tibi dem."

Hexameters and pentameters.

"Help for you out of this mine: here, give me your hand, Hezekiah."

"No, it is the Sabbath, a time labour's accounted a crime.

If on the morrow you've leisure, your aid I'll accept with much pleasure."

"That will be my Sabbath, so, here I will leave you and go."

E. O. B.

Leonnys, Leonnese, or Lyonnesse. A mythical country, contiguous to Cornwall.

Leôno'ra, wife of Fernando Florestan, a state prisoner in Seville. (Berth-oven: Fidelio, an opera.) (See Fernando.)

Leôno'ra. A princess who fell in love with Mauricco, the supposed son of Azucen's the gipsy. The Conte di Luna was in love with her, and, happening to get Maurice and his reputed mother into his power, condemned them to death. Leonora interceded for Maurice, and promised the count if he would spare his life to "give herself to him." The count consented, and went to the prison to fulfil his promise, when Leonora fell dead from the effect of poison which she had sucked from a ring. Maurice, perceiving this, died also. (Verdi: Il Trovatore, an opera.)

Leôno'ra de Guzman. The mistress of "favorite" of Alfonso XI. of Castile. Ferdinand, not knowing who she was, fell in love with her; and Alfonso, to save himself from excommunication and reward Ferdinand for his services, gave them in marriage to each other. No sooner was this done than the bridegroom hearing who his bride was, indignantly rejected her, and became a monk. Leonora entered the same monastery as a novice, made herself known to Ferdinando, obtained his forgiveness, and died. (Donizetti: La Favorita, an opera.)

Leontes (3 syl.), King of Sicilia, invited his friend Polix'enes, King of Bohemia, to pay him a visit, and being seized with jealousy, ordered Camillo to poison him. Camillo told Polixenes of the king's jealousy, and fled with him to Bohemia. The flight of Polixenes increased the anger of Leontes against Hermi'one, his virtuous queen, whom he sent to prison, where she was confined of a daughter (Per'dita), and it was reported that she had died in giving birth to the child. Per'dita, by order of the jealous king, was put away that she might be no more heard of as his; but, being abandoned in Bohemia, she was discovered by a shepherd, who brought her up as his own child. In time, Florizel, the son and heir of Polixenes, under the assumed name of Doricles, fell in love with Per'dita; but Polixenes, hearing of this attachment, sternly forbade the match. The two lovers, under the charge of Camillo, fled to Sicily, where the mystery was cleared up, Leontes and Hermione re-united, and all "went merry as a marriage bell." (Shakespeare: Winter's Tale.)

Leopard, in Christian art, is employed to represent that beast spoken of in the Apocalypse with seven heads and ten horns; six of the horns bear a nimbus, but the seventh, being "wounded to death" lost its power, and consequently has no nimbus.

Leopard, in heraldry, represents those brave and generous warriors who have performed some bold enterprise with force, courage, promptitude, and activity.

Leopards. So the French designate the English, because their heralds describe our device as a lyon léopard. Bertrand du Guesclin, the famous Breton, declared that men "devoyent bien honorer le noble Fleur-de-lis, plus qu'ils ne faisaient le felon Léopard."

Lepracouna. The fairy shoemaker. (Irish leith-ghrovan, from leith-brog, one-shoe maker, so called because he is always seen working at a single shoe.)

"Do you not catch the tiny clamour,

Busy click of an elfin hammer.

Voice of the Lepracoun singing shrill,

As he merrily plies his trade?"

W. B. Yeats: Fairy and Folk Tales, p. 82.

Lerna. A Lerna of ills (mal'o'rum Lerna). A very great evil. Lake Lerna Les Anguilles de Melun. Crying out before you are hurt. When the Mystery of St. Bartholomew was performed at Melun, one Languille took the character of the saint, but when the executioner came to "flay him alive," got nervous and began to shriek in earnest. The audience were in hysteries at the fun, and shouted out, Languille eric ante quon unicorche," and "Les anguilles de Melun" passed into a French proverb.

Lesbian Poets (Thc). Terpan'dor, Aces'tus, Ari'on, and the poetess Sappho, all of Lesbos.

Lesbian Rule (Thc). A post facto law. Making an act the precedent, instead of squaring conduct according to law.

Lesbian Majesty. (See Leze Majesty.)

Lesbian Diet. Great abstinence; so called from Lessius, a physician who prescribed very stringent rules for diet. (See Banting.)

Les'trigons. A race of giants who lived in Sicily. Ulysses sent two of his men to request that he and his crew might land, but the king of the place ate one for dinner and the other fled. The Lestrigons assembled on the coast and threw stones against Ulysses and his crew. Ulysses fled with all speed, but lost many of his men. There is considerable resemblance between this tale and that of Polyphem, who ate one of Ulysses' companions, and on the fight of the rest assembled with other giants on the shore, and threw stones at the retreating crew, whereby several were killed.

Let, to permit, is the Anglo-Saxon lat-1n, to suffer or permit; but let (to hinder) is the verb lett-an. It is a pity we have dropped the second t in the latter word.

"Oftentimes I purposed to come unto you, but was [have been] let hitherto."—Romans xi. 29.

Let Drive (Tb). To attack; to fall foul of. A Gallicism. "Se lasser aller a ..."—i.e. to go without restraint.

"They knewest not my old ward; here I (Falstaff) lay, and thus I bore my point. Four rogues in buckram let drive at me. ... These four came all a-front, and mainly thrust at me."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 4.

Let us Eat and Drink; for tomorrow we shall Die (Isaiah xxii. 13).

The Egyptians in their banquets exhibited a skeleton to the guests, to remind them of the brevity of human life, saying as they did so, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die."

Lethe's (2 syl.); in Greek mythology, is one of the rivers of Hades, which men, who were made to go there, were obliged to taste, that they might forget everything said and done in the earth on which they lived. (Greek lethe, lebhe, latian, to cause persons not to know.)

Leth'an Dew. Dreamy forgetfulness; a brown study. Lethie, in mythology, is the river of forgetfulness. Sometimes incorrectly called Lethean.

"The soul with tender luxury you [Muses] fill, And o'er the senses Lethean dews distil."—Fletcher: The Shipwreck, iii. 4.

Letter-Gae. The preconter is called by Allen Ramsay "The Letter-gae of holy rhyme." "Holy rhyme" means hymns or chants.

"There were no so many hairs on the warlock's face as there's on Letter-gae's stan at this moment."—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. xi.

Letter-lock. A lock that cannot be opened unless certain chosen letters are arranged in a certain order.

"A strange lock that opens with a M.E.N."—Beaumont and Fletcher: Noble Gentleman.

Letter of Credit. A letter written by a merchant or banker to another, requesting him to credit the bearer with certain sums of money. Circular Notes are letters of credit carried by gentlemen when they travel.

Letter of Licence (A). An instrument in writing made by a creditor, allowing a debtor longer time for the payment of his debt.

Letter of Marque. A commission authorising a privateer to make reprisals on a hostile nation till satisfaction for injury has been duly made. Here "marque" means march, or marcha, a border-land (whence our "marquis," the lords appointed to prevent border-incursions). A letter of marque or mart was permission given for reprisals after a border-incursion. Called jin marcham.

Letter of Orders (A). A certificate that the person named in the letter has been admitted into holy orders.

Letter of Pythagoras (Thc). The Greek upsilon, v

"They placed themselves as in the order and figure of v, the letter of Pythagoras, as causes do in their flight."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, iv. 35.

Letter of Safe Conduct. A writ under the Great Seal, guaranteeing safety to and fro to the person named in the passport.
Letter of Uriah (2 Sam. xi. 14). A treacherous letter of friendship, but in reality a death-warrant. (See Bellerophon.)

"However, sir, here is a guarantee. Look at its contents; I do not again carry the letters of Uriah."—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet, chap. xvi.

Ac, the first common letter (except in initials), and e, o, u, d, are the most common final letters.

Letters. Philo affirms that letters were invented by Abraham.

Many attribute the invention to Dadamantl, the Assyrian.

Blair says they were invented by Memnon, the Egyptian, B.C. 1829.

The same authority states that Menes invented hieroglyphics, and wrote in them a history of Egypt, B.C. 2122.

Josephus asserts that he had seen inscriptions by Seth, son of Adam.

Lucan says:

"Phoeniciae prinim, feminae, et eruditum, et Manipulam, et hominum vocem exsurgentur figuris."—Pharsalia, iii. 220.

Sir Richard Phillips says—"Thoth, the Egyptian who invented current writing, lived between B.C. 2800 and 3000."

Many maintain that Jehovah taught men written characters when He inscribed on stone the ten commandments. Of course, all these assertions have a similar value to mythology and fable.

Cœtins, the Phenician, introduced sixteen of the Greek letters.

Simonides introduced η, ο, ε; and Epicarmos introduced θ, χ. At least, so says Aristotle. (See Lacedemonian Letter, and Letter of Pythagoras.)

Father of Letters (Père des Lettres). François I. of France (1494, 1515-1547), Lorenzo de' Medici, the Magnificent (1448-1492).

A man of letters. A man of learning, of erudition.

Letters expletive, and marks on letters.

In French there are two letters expletive—a and è. The former, called 1 epexegesis, is placed before the preceding word ends with a vowel, as a-ton. The latter is called "euphonistic," and is used in interrogative sentences between the third person singular of verbs ending with a vowel, and a pronoun beginning with a vowel, as quelle-est à droite?

The chief accents are the grave (˘), acute (˚) and circumflex (˚). Two dots over the letter of two vowels (called dimessio), signify that each vowel is to be sounded, as Adlusis (A ˚ l). A hyphen between two or more nouns (or adjectives) denotes that they form a compound word, as mother-in-law.

In French, the mark (˚) under the letter e is called a cedilla, and signifies that the c (which would otherwise be k) is to be pronounced like e, as ca (cake), and gare (person).

An aum, comma (˚) over an a, o, or u, in Scandinavian languages, is called an umud, and a vowel no more is called an umante (˚ e t). An "o o" over the vowel o in German, is called a wiedepunct (˚ e t), and gives the vowel the sound of a French eau, as en, etc.; but over the vowel t it gives the sound of the French in dust.

Letters Negligeable. An order from the Lord Chancellor to a peer to put in an appearance to a bill filed in chancery.

Letters Overt. The same as letters patent (q.v.)

Letters Patent. So denominated because they are written upon open sheets of parchment, with the seal of the sovereign or party by whom they were issued pendent at the bottom. Close letters are folded up and sealed on the outside. (See Thomas Duffus Harvey.)

Letters at the Foot of a Page. Printers affix a letter to the first page of each sheet; these letters are called signatures. They begin with b, and sometimes, but not always, omit j, v, w. A is reserved for the title and preface. After z, the alphabet is used double—thus, A A or 2 A—and then trebled, quadrupled, etc., as necessity demands. Sometimes figures, 1, 2, 3, etc., are used instead of letters. (See Sheet.)

Letters of Administration. The legal instrument granted by the Probate Court to a person appointed administrator to one who has died intestate.

Letters of Bellerophon. (See Bellerophon.)

Letters of Horning. (See under Horn, Horns.)

Letters of Junius. (See Junius.)

Letters of the Sepulchre. The laws made by Godfrey and the Patriarchs.
of the court of Jerusalem. There were two codes, one respecting the privileges of the nobles, and the other respecting the rights and duties of the burghers. They were kept in a coffer laid up in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

Lettre de Cachet (French). An arbitrary warrant of imprisonment; a letter folded and sealed with the king's cachet or little seal. These were secret instructions to the person addressed to proceed against someone named in the letter. The lieutenant-general of police kept an unlimited number of these instruments, and anyone, for a consideration, could obtain one, either to conceal a criminal or to incarcerate someone obnoxious. This power was abolished in the Revolution.

Lettre de Jérusalem. A letter written to extort money. (See Vidocq: Les Voleurs, i. 240-253.)

Leucadia or Leneas. The promontory from which desponding lovers threw themselves into the sea. Sappho threw herself from this rock when she found her love for Phaon was in vain.

"Thence injured lovers, leaping from shore,
Their dance extinguished, and fire to love."

Pope: Sappho to Phaon.

Leucippos (Greek, Leukippos). Founder of the Atomistic School of Greek philosophy (about n.c. 428).

Leucothea [White Goddess]. So Iwo was called after she became a sea-nymph. Her son Palamon, called by the Romans Portunus, or Portunus, was the protecting genius of harbours.

"By Leucothea's lovely hands,
And her son who rules the strand!"

Milton: Comus, 866-7.

Leu. The register of the Recording Angel, in which he enters all the acts of the member of the human race. (According to the Koran.)

Levant and Couthant. Applied to cattle which have strayed into another's field, and have been there long enough to lie down and sleep. The owner of the field can demand compensation for such intrusion. (Latin, "levantes et cubantes", rising up and going to bed.)

Levant and Ponent Winds. The east wind is the Levant, and the west wind the Ponent. The former is from levo, to rise (sunrise), and the latter from ponens, to set (sunset).

"Forth rush the Levant and the Ponent winds." Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 704.

Levant, the region, strictly speaking, means the eastern shore of the Mediterranean; but is often applied to the whole East.

Levant. He has levant'd—i.e. made off, decamped. A levant is one who makes a bet, and runs away without paying his debt; he loses. (Spanish "levantar el campo, la casa," to break up the camp or house; our leave.

In the Slang Dictionary, p. 214, we are told that "it was formerly the custom, when a person was in pecuniary difficulties, to give out that he was gone to the Levant." Hence, when one lost a bet and could not or would not pay, he was said to have levant'd—i.e. gone to the Levant. Of no historic value.

Levée. Levée en masse (French). A patriotic rising of a whole nation to defend their country from invasion.

The Queen's Levée. It was customary for the queens of France to receive at the hour of their levée—i.e. while making their toilet—the visits of certain noblemen. This custom was afterwards demanded as a right by the court physicians, messengers from the king, the queen's secretary, and some few other gentlemen, so that ten or more persons were often in the dressing-room while the queen was making her toilet and sipping her coffee. This was now used to express that concourse of gentlemen who wait on the queen on mornings appointed. No ladies except those attached to the court are present on these occasions.

* Kings and some nobles have their levées sometimes of an evening.

When I was very young (and Lord Eldon to Mrs Porteous). Lord Mandeville used to hold levées on Sunday evenings—"Twice: Lord Eldon, vol. i. chap. v. p. 68.

Level Best. To do one's level best.
To exert oneself to the utmost Au gré de nos pouvoirs. In 1877 Mr. Hale published a book entitled His Level Best.

Level Down. To bring society, taxes, wages, etc., to an equality by reducing all to the lowest standard.

Level Up (Th). To raise the lower strata of society, or standard of wages, etc., to the level of the higher.

Levellers. (April, 1649.) A body of men that first appeared in Surrey, and went about pulling down park palings and levelling hedges, especially those on crown lands. Colonel Lilburne was lodged in prison for favouring the Levellers. (See LILBURN.)

Levellers. Radicals in the time of Charles I. and the Commonwealth, who wanted all men to be placed on a level with respect to their eligibility to office.
Levellers (in Irish History), 1740. Agrarian agitators, afterwards called Whiteboys (q.v.). Their first offences were levelling the hedges of enclosed commons; but their programme developed into a demand for the general redress of all agrarian grievances.

Lever de Rideau. A light and short dramatic sketch placed on the stage while the manager is preparing to introduce his drama for the night, or "draw up the curtain" on the real business.

"An attempt to pack a romantic tragedy into the space filled by an ordinary lever de rideau. - Nineteenth Century, Dec. 1867, p. 564.

Leveret. A young hare. The Duke d'Epereun always swooned at the sight of a leveret, though he was not affected if he saw a hare. (See Fox.)

Leviathan. The crocodile, or some extinct sea monster, described in the Book of Job (chap. xii.). It sometimes in Scripture designates Pharaoh, King of Egypt, as in Isa. lxxiv. 14, Isa. xxvii. 1, and Ezek. xxix. 3, etc., where the word is translated "dragon."

The Leviathan of Literature. Dr. Johnson (1709-1784).

Levites (2 syl.). In Dryden's Abra- lom and Achitophel, means the Dissenting clergy who were expelled by the Act of Conformity.

Levitical. Belonging to the Levites or priestly tribe of Levi; pertaining to the Jewish priesthood, as the Levitical law, Levitical rites.

Lewd (Anglo-Saxon, leowde) simply means folk in general, verb led-an. The present meaning refers to the licentiousness of the clergy.

"All that a lewd man hath need to know for help of soul." - Cotton Society's Publications.

Lewis (Moth). (See Monk.)

Lewis Baboon. Louis XIV. of France is so called in Arbuthnot's History of John Bull. Of course, there is a play upon the word Bourbon.

Lewkner's Lane. Now called "Charles Street," Drury Lane, London, always noted for ladies of the pavement.

"The nymphs of chaste Diana's train, The same with those of Lewkner's Lane." Butler: Hudibras, part II, canto 1.

Lex non Scripta. The common law, as distinguished from the statute or written law. Common law does not derive its force from being recorded, and though its several provisions have been compiled and printed, the compilations are not statutes, but simply remembrancers.

Lex Talionis (Latin). Tit for tat; the law of retaliation.

Leyden Jar or Phial. A glass vessel partly coated, inside and out, with lead-foil, and used in electrical experiments to receive accumulated electricity; invented by Vanleigh, of Leyden.

Leze Majesty. High treason; i.e. "Crimen læse Majestatis."

Li-Flambe. The banner of Clovis miraculously displayed to him in the skies. (See TOADS.)

Lin-fall (of Ireland). The Futali Marmer or Stone of Destiny. On this stone the ancient Irish kings sat at their coronation, and according to tradition, wherever that stone might be the people there would be dominant. It was removed to Scone; and Edward removed it from Scone Abbey to London. It is kept in Westminster Abbey under the royal throne, on which the English sovereigns sit at their coronation. (See CORONATION CHAIR, Scone.

Liakura (3 syl.). Parnassus.

"But where is he that hath beheld The peak of Liakura unveiled?"

Byron: The Giaour.

Liar. Al Aswad, who set himself up as a prophet against Mahomet. He was called the Weathercock because he changed his creed so often, the Impostor, and the Liar.

Moseilma, another contemporary, who affirmed that the "belly is the seat of the soul." He wrote to Mahomet, and began his letter: "From Moseilma, prophet of Allah, to Mahomet, prophet of Allah," and received for answer a letter beginning thus: "From Mahomet the prophet of God, to Moseilma the Liar." (Anglo-Saxon, lif-yan or life-yan)

Priner of Liars. Ferdinand Mendez Pinto, a Portuguese traveller, whose narrative is so much after Munchausen's style, that Cervantes dubbed him "Prince of Liars." The Tatler called him a man "of infinite adventure and unbounded imagination."

Libel means a little book (Latin, libellus). A lampoon, a satire, or any defamatory writings. Originally it meant a plaintiff's statement of his case, which usually "defames" the defendant.

The greater the truth, the greater the libel. The dictum of William Murray, Earl of Mansfield (1704-1793).

Don't not know that old Mansfield, who writes like the Bible. Says: 'The more 'tis a truth, sir, the more 'tis a libel?" Burns.
Libitina

Liber Albus contains the laws and customs of the city of London, compiled in 1419, by John Carpenter, town clerk.

Liber Niger or The Black Book of the Exchequer, compiled by Græve of Tilbury, in the reign of Henry II. It is a roll of the military tenants.

Liberal Unionists or Tory Democrats. Those Conservatives or Tories who have a strong bias towards democratic measures.

Liberal Unionists. Those Whigs and Radicals who united, in 1886, with Lord Salisbury and the Conservative party to oppose Home Rule for Ireland. Mr. Gladstone had brought in a Bill to give the Irish Home Rule. Lord Hartington was chief of the Whigs, and Mr. Chamberlain chief of the Radicals, who seceded from Mr. Gladstone's party.

Liberals. A political term first employed in 1815, when Lord Byron and his friends set on foot the periodical called The Liberal, to represent their views in politics, religion, and literature. The word, however, did not come into general use till about 1831, when the Reform Bill, in Lord Grey's Ministry, gave it prominence.

"Influenced in a great degree by the philosophy and the politics of that time, they [the Whigs] endeavored to substitute cosmopolitan for national principles, and they baptised the new scheme of politics with the plausible name of Liberalism." —Barron, June 24, 1872.

Liberator (The). The Peruvians so call Simon Bolivar, who established the independence of Peru. (1783-1831.) Daniel O'Connell was so called, because he tried to sever Ireland from England, (1775-1847.)

Liberator of the world. So Dr. Franklin has been called. (1706-1790.)

Liberia. An independent republic of western Africa settled by free negroes.

Libertines. A sect of heretics in Holland, led by Quinton a factor, and Copin. They maintained that nothing is sinful but what is sinful, and that perfect innocence is to live without doubt.

"By a "libertine" is now generally meant a profligate, or one who puts no restraint on his personal indulgence."

"A libertine, in earlier use, was a speculative free-thinker in matters of religion and in the theory of morals... but it has come to signify a profligate." —French: On the Study of Words, lecture III. p. 80.

Liberty. Liberty means "to do what one likes." (Latin, liber, free.)

Civil Liberty. The liberty of a subject to conduct his own affairs as he thinks proper, provided he neither infringes on the equal liberty of others, nor offends against the good morals or laws under which he is living.

Moral Liberty. Such freedom as is essential to render a person responsible for what he does, or what he omits to do.

National Liberty. The liberty of a nation to make its own laws, and elect its own executive.

Natural Liberty. Unrestricted freedom to exercise all natural functions in their proper places.

Personal Liberty. Liberty to go out of one's house or nation, and to return again without restraint, except deprived thereof by way of punishment.

Political Liberty. The right to participate in political elections and civil offices; and to have a voice in the administration of the laws under which you live as a citizen and subject.

Religious Liberty. Freedom in religious opinions, and in both private and public worship, provided such freedom in no wise interferes with the equal liberty of others.

Cap of Liberty. The Goddess of Liberty, in the Aventine Mount, was represented as holding in her hand a cap, the symbol of freedom. In France the Jacobins wore a red cap. In England, a blue cap with a white border is the symbol of liberty, and Britannia is sometimes represented as holding such a cap on the point of her spear. (See CAP OF LIBERTY.)

Liberty. The Goddess of Liberty. On December 10th, 1795, Mlle. Maillard, an actress, was selected to personify the "Godess of Liberty." Being brought to Notre Dame, Paris, she was seated on the altar, and lighted a large candle to signify that Liberty was the "light of the world." (See Louis Blanc : History, ii. 365-367.)

The statue of Liberty, placed over the entrance of the Palais Royal, was modelled from Mme. Tallien.

The Goddess of Reason. (Aug. 10, 1793.) The Goddess of Reason was enthroned by the French Convention at the suggestion of Chaumette; and the cathedral of Notre Dame de Paris was desecrated for the purpose. The wife of Momoro the printer was the best of these goddesses. The procession was attended by the municipal officers and national guards, while troops of ballet girls carried torches of truth. Incredible as it may seem, Gobet (the Archbishop of Paris), and nearly all the clergy stripped themselves of their canonicals, and, wearing red nightcaps, joined in this blasphemous mockery. So did Julien of Toulouse, a Calvinistic minister.

"Mrs. Mororo, it is admitted, made one of the best goddesses of Reason, though her teeth were a little defective." —Curigie : French Revolution, vol. II. book v. 4.

Libitina. The goddess who, at Rome, presided over funerals.

"Omnia mortis ; nullaque pars mei vital Libitina."
Libra [the balance]. One of the twelve signs of the Zodiac (September 22 to October 22), when day and night being weighed would be found equal.

Library. One of the most approved materials for writing on, before the invention of paper, was the thin rind between the solid wood and the outside bark of certain trees. This substance is in Latin called liber, which came in time to signify also a "book." Hence our library, the place for books; librarian, the keeper of books; and the French livre, a book.

Lick, German, library engravings, founded and contains large.

There were 900 burnt, the library, the place for books; librarian, the keeper of books; and the French livre, a book.

The Vienna, about 500,000 books and 20,000 manuscripts.
The Vatican, about 200,000 books and 40,000 manuscripts.
The Imperial Library of Russia, about 650,000 books and 21,000 manuscripts.
The Copenhagen Library, about 500,000 books and 18,000 manuscripts.

Libya. Africa, or all the north of Africa between Egypt and the Atlantic Ocean. It was the Greek name for Africa in general. The Romans used the word sometimes as synonymous with Africa, and sometimes for the fringe containing Carthage.

Licentiate (4 syl.) One who has a licence to practise some art or faculty, as a licentiate of medicine.

Lich. A dead body. (Anglo-Saxon, lic; German, leiche.)

Lich-field, in Staffordshire. The field of the dead, i.e. of the martyred Christians.

Lich-fowls. Birds that feed on carrion, as night-ravens, etc.

Lich-gate. The shed or covered place at the entrance of churchyards, intended to afford shelter to the coffin and mourners, while they wait for the clergyman to conduct the corse into the church.

Lich-owl. The screech-owl, superstition supposed to foretell death.

Lich-wake or Lyke-wake. The funeral feast or the waking of a corpse, i.e. watching it all night.

Lich-way. The path by which a funeral is conveyed to church, which not unfrequently deviates from the ordinary road. It was long supposed that wherever a dead body passed became a public thoroughfare.

Lichten. Belonging to the lich-ground or cemetery. In Chichester, just outside the city walls on the east, are what the common people call the lighten or liten schools, a corruption of lichten schools, so termed because they stand on a part of the ancient Saxon lich-are. The spelling usually adopted for these schools is "litten."

Lick, as I licked him. I flogged or beat him. (Welsh, llach, a slap, verb llachian; Anglo-Saxon, lie-an, to strike, or slick.)

Lick into Shape (To). According to tradition the cubs of bears are cast shapeless, and remain so till the dam has licked them into proper form.

"So watchful Brain forms, with plastic care,
Each growing lump, and lends it to a bear."
Lick the Dust (To)

To fall in battle.

"His enemies shall lick the dust."—Psalm lxxi. 9.

Licks the Butter

The very dogs refused to lick the butter from his forehead. Before the dead body of a Persian is removed from the house, the forehead is smeared with clarified butter or ghee, and the dogs of the house are admitted. If the dog or dogs lick the butter, it is a good omen; if not, it signifies portend.

Lickspittle (A)

A servile toady.

"His heart too great, though fortune little.
To lick a rascal statesman's spittle."—Swift.

Lictors

Binders (Latin, ligo, to bind or tie). These Roman officers were so called because they bound the hands and feet of criminals before they executed the sentence of the law. (Aulus Gellius.)

"The lictors at that word, tall women all and strong.
Each with his axe and sheaf of twigs, went down into the throng."—Macaulay: Virginia.

Lid

Anglo-Saxon, lid; Dutch and Danish, lid. "Close" is the Latin supine clus-us.

Liddell's [the terror of nations].
The throne of Alfrater, whence he can view the whole universe. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Lie

(Anglo-Saxon, lige, a falsehood.)

Father of lies. Satan (John viii. 44).

The greatest lie. The four, P's (a Palmer, a Pardoner, a Poticary, and a Pedlar) disputed as to which could tell the greatest lie. The Palmer said he had never seen a woman out of patience; whereupon the other three P's threw up the sponge, saying such a falsehood could not possibly be outdone. (Heywood: The Four P's.)

White lies. (See White.)

Lie Circumstantial (The) or The lie with circumstance.

Sir, if you said so, it was a lie. As 'Touchstone' says, this insult is voidable by this means—"If you said so, I sayd it was a lie," but the word "if" makes the insult hypothetical. This is the lie direct in the second degree or once removed. (See COUNTERCHECK.)

Lie Direct (The)

Sir, that's a lie. You are a liar. This is an offence no gentleman can take.

"One day as I was walking, with my customary swagger.
Says a fellow to me, 'Pistol, you're a coward, though a braggart."

Now, this was an indignity no gentleman could take, sir:

So I told him flat and plump, 'You lie'—(under a mistake, sir)."

Lie Quarrelsome (The)

To tell one flat and plump "You lie." Touchstone calls this "the countercheck quarrelsome."

"If again (the fifth time) it was not well cut, he would say I lied: this is called the countercheck quarrelsome."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, v. 4.

Lie hath no Feet (A)

Because it cannot stand alone. In fact, a lie wants twenty others to support it, and even then is in constant danger of tripping.

(Lie, Anglo-Saxon, liegan, to 'hide or rest; but lie, to deceive, is the Anglo-Saxon verb liegan.)

"Lie heavy on him, earth, for he laid many a heavy load on thee."

This is part of Dr. Evans's epitaph on Sir John Vanbrugh, the comic poet, herald, and architect. "The heavy loads" referred to were Blenheim, Greenwich Hospital (which he finished), Castle Howard in Yorkshire, and other massive buildings. (1660-1726.)

Lie Low (To)

To conceal oneself or one's intentions.

"All this while Brer Rabbit lay low."—Uncle Remus.

Lie Over (To)

To be deferred; as, this question must lie over till next sessions.

Lie-to (To)

To stop the progress of a vessel at sea by reducing the sails and counterbraiding the yards; to cease from doing something. A nautical phrase.

"We now ran plump into a fog, and were obliged to lie-to."—Lord Dufferin.

Lie Up (To)

To refrain from work; to rest.

Lie at the Catch (To)

Thus Talkative says to Faithful, "You lie at the catch, I perceive." To which Faithful replies, "No, not I; I am only for setting things right." "To lie at the catch, or lie on the catch, is to lie in wait or to lay a trap to catch one.

Lie in State (To)

"Étre couché sur un lit de parade." A dead body displayed to the general public.

Lie on Hand (To)

To remain unsold. "Rester depuis longtemps en main.";

Lie to One's Work (To)

To work energetically.

Lie with One's Fathers (To)

To be buried in one's native place. "Reposer avec ses pères."

"I will lie with my fathers, and thou shalt carry me out of Egypt."—Genesis xlvii. 30.

Liebenstein and Sternfels

Two ruined castles of the Rhine. According to tradition, Leoline, the orphan, was the sole surviving child of the lord of Liebenstein; and two brothers, named Warbeck and Otho, were the surviving children of the lord of Sternfels. Both the brothers fell in love with Leoline; but, as Leoline gave the preference to Otho, Warbeck joined the Crusades. A Templar in time persuaded Otho to do the same; but, the war being over, Otho stayed at Constantinople, where he fell in love with a Greek, whom he brought home for his bride. Leoline retired to the adjacent convent of Bornhofen. Warbeck defied his brother to single combat for this insult to his betrothed; but Leoline with the nuns interposed to prevent the fight. The Greek wife, in time, eloped with one of the inmates of Sternfels, and Otho died childless. A band of robbers broke into the convent; but Warbeck armed in its defence. He repelled the robbers, but received his death-wound, and died in the lap of Leoline; thus passed away the last lord of Liebenstein. (Traditions of the Rhine.)

Liege. The word means one bound, a bondsman (Latin, ligo, to bind); hence, vassals were called liege-men—i.e., men bound to serve their lord. The lord was called the liege-lord, being bound to protect the vassals.

Unarmed and mounted, on his knees, and with his hands placed between those of his lord, he [the military tenant] repeated these words: "Now, my lord, I have become your liegeman of life and limb, and earthly worship; and faith and truth I will bear to you to live and die."—Luard: History of England, vol. ii. chap. 1. p. 27.

Lien. A bond. (Latin, liga'tamen.) Legally, a bond on goods for a debt; a right to retain goods in a creditor's hands till he has satisfied a legal claim for debt.

Lieuse (2 syl.). Abbe de Lieuse or Abbas Letticius. The French term for the "Boy Bishop," or "Abbot of Unreason." (See Abbot.)

Lieutenant (pronounce lesient-unt) is the Latin lomes-tans, through the French. A Lieutenant-Colonel is the Colonel's deputy. The Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland is a vicerey who represents the crown in that country.

Life. (Anglo-Saxon, life)

Drawn from life. Drawn or described from some existing person or object.

For life. As long as life continues.

For the life of me. True as I am alive. Even if my life depended on it. A strong asseveration.

"Nor could I, for the life of me, see how the crown of all the world had anything to do with what I was talking about."—Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield.

---

Is life worth living? Schopenhauer decides in the negative. In the "funeral service" we are taught to thank God for delivering the deceased "out of the miseries of this sinful life." On the other hand, we are told that Jesus called Lazarus from the grave, not by way of punishment, but quite the contrary. "On days like this, one feels that Schopenhauer is wrong after all, and that life is something truly worth living for."—Grant Allen: The Curate of Charmagne.

Large as life. Of the same size as the object represented.

On my life. I will answer for it by my life; as, "Il le fera j'en reponds sur ma vie."

To be a charmed life. To escape accidents in a marvellous manner.

To know life. In French, "Savoir ce que c'est que de vivre." "Not to know life," is the contrary—"Ne savoir ce que c'est que de vivre."

To the life. In exact imitation. "Done to the life." "Faire le portrait de quelqu'un au naturel" (or) "d'apres nature."

Life-boat (A). A boat rendered especially buoyant for the purpose of saving those who are in peril of their life at sea.

Life-buoy (A). A float to sustain two or more persons in danger of being drowned at sea.

Life-Guard. Two senior regiments of the mounted body-guard, comprising 878 men, all six feet high; hence, a fine, tall, manly fellow is called "a regular Life-guardman."

Life Policy (A). An assurance to be paid after the death of the person.

Life Preserver (A). A buoyant jacket, belt, or other appliance, to support the human body in water; also a loaded staff or knuckle-duster for self-defence.

Lift. To have one at a lift is to have one in your power. When a wrestler has his antagonist in his hands and lifts him from the ground, he has him "at a lift," or in his power.

"Sir," says he, "I have you at a lift.

Now you are come unto your latest shift."—Percy: Reliques: Guy and Amadis.

Lift not up your Horn on High. (Psalm lxxv. 5.) Do not behave scornfully, maliciously, or arrogantly. (See under Horn.)

Lift up the Heel against Me (7). To kick me (physically or morally); to treat with contumely or contempt: to oppose, to become an enemy. As an unruly horse kicks the master who trusts and feeds him.

"Yes, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted his heel against me."—Psalm xii. 9.

Lift up the Voice (2b). To shout or cry aloud; to utter a cry of joy or of sorrow.

"Saul lifted up his voice and wept."—1 Sam. xxiv. 10.

Lifted up. Put to death; to raise on a cross or gibbet.

"When ye have lifted up the Son of Man, then shall ye know that I am he."—John viii. 28.

Lifter. A thief. We still call one who plunders shops a "shop-lifter."

"Is he so young a man, and so old a lifter?"—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, i. 2.

Lifting (The). In Scotland means lifting the coffin on the shoulders of the bearers. Certain ceremonies preceded the funeral.

"When at the funeral of an ordinary husbandman, one o'clock was named as the hour for 'lifting,' the party began to assemble two hours previously."—Salvador: Agnostic Journal, Jan. 14, 1886, p. 27.

At the first service were offered meat and ale; at the second, shortbread and whisky; at the third, seed-cake and wine; at the fourth, currant-bun and rum; at the last, sugar-biscuits and brandy.

Lifting, or Lifting the Little Finger. Tippling. In holding a beaker or glass, most persons stick out or lift up the little finger. "Lifting" is a contracted form of the full phrase.

Ligan. Goods thrown overboard, but tied to a cork or buoy in order to be found again. (Latin ligare, to tie or bind.)

Flotsam. The débris of a wreck which floats on the surface of the sea, and is often washed ashore. (Latin flotare, to float.)

Jetsam or jetson. Goods thrown overboard in a storm to lighten the vessel. (Latin jetare, to cast forth, through the French jeter.)

Light. Life. Othello says, "Put out the light and then put out the light." In May, 1886, Abraham Harper, a market-gardener, of Oxford, hit his wife in the face, and threatened to "put her light out," for which he was fined 5s. and costs. (Truth, May 20th, 1886.)

Light. Graces, holiness. Called "the candle of the Lord," the "lamp of God," as, "The spirit of man is the lamp of the Lord."—Prov. xxii. 27.

"Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works."—Matt. v. 16.

To stand in one's own light. To act in such a way as to hinder advancement.

"He stands in his own light through nervous fear."—The Leisure Hour, 1886.

Light Comedian (4), in theatrical parlance, is one who performs in what is called legitimate comedy, but is very different to the "low comedian," who is a farceur. Orlando, in As You Like It, might be taken by a "light comedian," but not by a "low comedian." Tony Lumpkin and Paul Pry are parts for a "low comedian," but not for a "light comedian."

Light Horsemen. Those who live by plunder by night. Those who live by plunder in the daytime are Heavy Horsemen. These horsemen take what they can crib aboard ship, such as coffee-beans, which they call "pease;" sugar, which they call "sand;" rum, which they called "vinegar," and so on. The broker who buys these stolen goods and asks no questions is called a "fence." (See Captain Marryat: Poor Jack, chap. xviii.)

Light Troops, i.e. light cavalry, meaning Lancers and Hussars, who are neither such large men as the "Heavies," nor yet so tall. (See LIGHT-ARMED ARTILLERY.)

Light-armed Artillery. The Royal Horse Artillery. The heavy artillery are the garrison artillery.

Light as a Feather. (See SIMILES.)

Light-fingered Gentry (The). Pickpockets and shop-lifters.

Light Gains make a heavy Purse. Small profits and a quick return, is the best way of gaining wealth. French, "Le petit gain remplit la bourse;" Italian, "I guadagni mediocri empiiono la borsa."

Light of One's Countenance (The). The bright smile of approbation and love.

"Lift up the light of Thy countenance on us."—Psalm iv. 6.

Light of the Age. Maimonide's or Rabbi Moses ben Maimon, of Cordova (1135-1204).

Light of the Harem. The Sultana Nourmahal, afterwards called Nour-jahan (Light of the World). She was the bride of Selim. (Thomas Moore: Lalla Rookh.)
Lighthouse. The most celebrated of antiquity was the one erected by Ptolemy Soter in the island of Pharos, opposite Alexandria. Josephus says it could be seen at the distance of 42 miles. It was one of the "seven wonders" of the ancient world.

Of modern lighthouses the most famous are the Eddystone, 14 miles S.W. of Plymouth Sound; the Tour de Corduan, at the entrance of the Gironde, in France; and the Bell Rock, which is opposite the Firth of Tay.

The largest lighthouses are:—(1) The lighthouse at Hell Gate in New York, 250 feet high, with 9 electric lamps of 6,000 candle-power each. (2) The Bartholdi Statue of Liberty, in New York harbour, 220 feet high. (3) One in Genoa, Italy, 210 feet in height. (4) Cape Hatteras Light, which is 189 feet high. (5) Eddystone Lighthouse is 85 feet high, and lights a radius of 17 miles.

Lightning [Jupiter]. Hamitic of Carthage was called "Barbax," both on account of the rapidity of his march and also for the severity of his attacks. (B.C. 247-228.)

Cloud lightning. Two or more flashes of lightning repeated without intermission.

Forced lightning. Zig-zag lightning.

Global lightning. A meteoric ball of fire, which sometimes falls on the earth and flies off with an expansion.

Lightning Conductor. A metal rod raised above a building with one end in the earth, to carry off the lightning and prevent its injuring the building.

It must be pointed at the top extremity to ensure quiet discharge.

Lightning Preservers. The most approved classical preservatives against lightning were the eagle, the sea-calf, and the laurel. Jupiter chose the first, Augustus Caesar the second, and Tiberius the third. (Calvus, x. ; taurum, in Vit. Aug., x. ; ditto in Vit. Tib., lxix.)

(See HOUSE-LEEK.)

Bodies struck by lightning were said to be incorruptible; and anyone so distinguished was held by the ancients in great honour.

(J. C. Bullenger: De Terrae Motu, etc., v. 11.)

Lightning Proof. A building protected by lightning conductors (one or more).

Lightning Rod (A). (See LIGHTNING CONDUCTOR.)

Ligurians. A congregation of missionary priests called also Hecatomists, founded in 1732, by St. Alphonse Liguori. Their object is the religious benefit of the people, and the reform of public morality.

Ligurian Arts. Deception, trickery.

Ligurian Republic (The). Venetia, Genoa, and a part of Sardinia, tied up in one bundle by Napoleon I. in 1797, and bound with a constitution similar to that of the French "Directory," so called from Liguria, pretty well commensurate with these districts. It no longer exists.

Ligurian Sage (The). Aulus Persius Flaccus, born at Volaterrae, in Etruria, according to ancient authors; and at Luna Portus, in Liguria, according to some modern authorities. (A.D. 34-62.)

(See Satires, vi. 6.)

Lilburn Shawl. The name of a place in Wensleydale, Yorkshire. Shawl is shaw, a hill; shaw' = shaw-hill.

Lilburne. If no one else were alive, John would quarrel with Lilburne. John Lilburne was a contentious Leveller in the Commonwealth; so rancorous against rank that he could never satisfy himself that any two persons were exactly on the same level. (See LAWSUITS.)

Lil'inau was wood by a phantom that lived in her father's pines. At nightfall the phantom whispered love, and won the fair Lilinau, who followed his green waving plume through the forest, and was never seen again. (American-Indian tradition.)

Lilis or Lil'ith (Rabbinical mythology). The Talmudists say that Adam had a wife before Eve, whose name was Lilis. Refusing to submit to Adam, she left Paradise for a region of the air. She still haunts the night as a spectre, and is especially hostile to new-born infants. Some superstitions Jews still put in the chamber occupied by their wife four coins, with labels on which the names of Adam and Eve are inscribed, with the words, "Avaunt thee, Lilith!" Goethe has introduced her in his Faust.

(See LAMIA.)

"It was Lilith, the wife of Adam . . .
Not a drop of her blood was human,
But she was made like a soft sweet woman." D. G. Rossetti: Eden Bower.

* The fable of Lilie or Lilith was invented to reconcile Gen. i. with Gen. ii. Genesis i. represents the simultaneous creation of man and woman out of the earth; but genesis ii. represents that Adam was alone, and Eve was made out of a rib, and was given to Adam as a helpsmeet for him.

Lilli-Burlero or Lilli-Bulle'reo and Bullen-a-iah. Said to have been the words of distinction used by the Irish Papists in their massacre of the Protestants in 1641. A song with the refrain of "Lilli-burlero, bullen-a-la!" was written by Lord Wharton, which had a more powerful effect than the Philippics of either Demosthenes or Cicero, and contributed not a little to the great revolution of 1688. Burnet says, "It made an impression on the [king's] army that cannot be imagined.
. The whole army, and at last the people, both in city and country, were singing it perpetually ... never had so slight a thing such great an effect." The song is in Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, series ii. bk. 3. (See Sterne; Tristram Shandy, chap. ii.)

"Lilli bullero, lilli bullero bullen a la,
Lero lero, lilli bullero, lero lero bullen a la.
Lero lero, lilli bullero, lero lero bullen a la.

Mr. Chappell attributes the air to Henry Purcell.

Lilliput. The country of the pigmies called "Lilliputians," to whom Gulliver was a giant. (Swift; Gulliver's Travels.)

Lily (The). There is a tradition that the lily sprang from the repentant tears of Eve as she went forth from Paradise.

Lily in Christian art is an emblem of chastity, innocence, and purity. In pictures of the Annunciation, Gabriel is sometimes represented as carrying a lily-branch, while a vase containing a lily stands before the Virgin, who is kneeling in prayer. St. Joseph holds a lily-branch in his hand, to show that his wife Mary was always the virgin.

Lily. (Emblem of France.) Tasso, in his Jerusalem Delivered, terms the French Gigli di'oro (golden Lilies). It is said the people were commonly called Litarti, and the Kingdom Litium in the time of Philippe le Bel, Charles VIII., and Louis XII. They were so called from the fleur-de-lys, the emblem of France.

"I saw my country's lily torn."
Blowfield. (A Frenchman is speaking.)

"Theburghers of Ghent were bound by solemn oath not to make war upon the lilies."-Millington: Life of Louis.

Lily of France. The device of Clovis was three black toads, but an aged hermit of Joyce-en-vallee saw a miraculous light stream one night into his cell, and an angel appeared to him holding a shield of wonderful beauty: its colour was azure, and on it were emblazoned three gold lilies that shone like stars, which the hermit was commanded to give to Queen Clotilde. Scarcely had the angel vanished when Clotilde entered, and, receiving the celestial shield, gave it to her royal husband, whose arms were everywhere victorious. (See Les Petits Bollandistes, vol. vi. p. 426.)

"Un hermite appota à la ditte royne un drap d'azur à Trois Fleurs de Lis d'or, que l'ange luy allt donnée & de delui la ditte royne a son mary à luy Clotilde pour le porter comme ses armes en lie qu'il les portoit d'or à trois crapazv de sablie."-Chifflet.

The kings of France were called "Lords of the Silver Lilies."

Florence is called "The City of Lilies."

Lily of the Valley. The Convallaria majalis (the May valley plant), one of the species is Solomon's seal. It is by no means the case that the Convallaria grow only in valleys, although they prefer shady places.

This is not the lily (Matt. vi. 26) which is said to excel Solomon in all his glory. The Lilium Candidum is the flower alluded to by our Lord: a tall majestic plant, common in Palestine, and known by us as the Garden Lily. It is bell-shaped, with white petals and golden yellow stamens. John (Archaeologica Biblica, p. 195) tells us that "at festivals the rich and powerful robed themselves in white cotton, which was considered the most splendid dress."

Lily Maid of Astolat. (See Elaine.)

Lim Hay. Lick it up like Lim hay.
Lim, on the Mersey, is famous for its excellent hay.

Limb. To tear limb from Warburton.
Lymm cum Warburton forms one rectory in Cheshire. The play is on limb and Lymm.

Limb of the Law (.J.). A lawyer, or a clerk articled to a lawyer. The hands are limbs of the body, and the lawyer's clerks are his hands to copy out what the head of the office directs.

Limberham. A tame, foolish keeper. The character is in Dryden's comedy of Limberham, or the Kind Keeper, and it is supposed to satirise the Duke of Lauderdale.

Limbo. A waste-basket: a place where things are stowed, too good to destroy but not good enough to use. In School theology unbaptised infants and good heathens go to Limbo. (Latin, limbus, the edge.) They cannot go to heaven, because they are not baptised; and they cannot go to the place of torment, because they have not committed Limb. Go to limbo — that is, prison.

Limbus, preceded by in or to becomes limbo—as, in limbo, to limbo. Occasionally, limbo stands for limbus.

Limbus Patru'rum. The Limbus of Fools, or Fool's Paradise. As fools are not responsible for their works, they are not punished in Purgatory, but cannot be received into Heaven; so they go to a place called the Paradise of Fools.

"Then might you see
Cowls, hoods, and habits, with their wearers tossed
And flitted into rage: then toilettes, beads, indulgences, dispensers, pardons, bulles.
The sport of winds. All these, upsurged aloft, Into a Limbo large and broad, since called The Paradise of Fools."
—Shakespeare: Henry VIII., v. 4.

Limbus Patrum. The half-way house between earth and heaven, where the patriarchs and prophets, after death, await the coming of Messiah. According to the Roman Catholic notion, this is the "hell," or hades, into which Jesus Christ descended after He gave up the ghost on the cross. Limbo, and sometimes limbo patrum, is used for "quod," jail, confinement.

"I have some of them in limbo patrum, and there they are like to dance these three days."
—Shakespeare: Henry VIII., v. 4.

Limbus Fuerorum. The Child's Paradise, for children who die before they are responsible for their actions.

Limbus of the Moon. In the limbo of the moon, Ariosto (in his Orlando Furioso, xxxiv. 70) says, in the moon are treasured up such stores as these: Time mispent in play, all vain efforts, all vows never paid, all intentions which lead to nothing, the vanity of titles, flattery, the promises of princes, death-bed alms, and other like vanities.

Limerick. A nonsense verse or song, in the metre of the example.

"There was a young lady of Wilt, Who walked up to Scotland on stilts; When they said it was shocking, She answered, 'Then what about Klitta?'

There is a chorus, "We'll all come up, come up to Limerick," but the connection with the Irish city is not clear.

Lime Street. London. The place where, in former times, lime was sold in public market. It gives its name to one of the wards of London.

Limited Liability. The liability of a shareholder in a company only for a fixed amount, generally the amount of the shares he has subscribed for. The Limited Liability Act was passed 1855.

Limmor. A drawer, a painter, an artist. A contraction of illuminator, or rather luminier (one who illuminates manuscripts).

"The limmer, or illuminer ... throws us back a time when the illumination of MSS. was a leading occupation of the painter."—Trench: On the Study of Words, lecture iv. p. 171.

Limp. Formed of the initial letters of Louis (XIV.), James, Mary, Prince (of Wales). A Jacobite toast in the time of William III. (See NOTARICA.)

Lina. The Goddess Flax.

"Inventress of the web, fair Linia Flax,
The weaving shuttle through the dancing strings."—Darnais: Loves of the Plants, canto ii.

Lincoln. A contraction of Lindum-colonia. Lindum was an old British town, called Llyn-dene (the fen-town). If we had not known the Latin name, we should have given the etymology Llyn-cologne (the fen-hill, or hill near the pool), as the old city was on a hill.

The devil looks over Lincoln. (See DEVIL.)

Lincoln College (Oxford). Founded by Richard Fleming in 1427, and completed by Rotherham, Bishop of Lincoln, in 1479.

Lincoln Green. Lincoln, at one time, was noted for its green, Coventry for its blue, and Yorkshire for its grey. (See KENDAL GREEN.)

"... and curls in Lincoln green.
—Drayton: Poliphilus, xxv.

Falstaff speaks of Kendall Green (Westmoreland), 1 Hen. IV., ii. 4.)

"... And there be a sort of ragged knives come in... Clothed all in Kendale green."
—Plays of Robin Hood.

Lincoln's Inn. One of the fashionable theatres in the reign of Charles II.

Lincoln's Inn Fields. London. Henry Lacy, Earl of Lincoln, built an inn (mansion) here in the 14th century. The ground belonged to the Black Friars, but was granted by Edward I. to Lacy. Later, one of the bishops of Chichester, in the reign of Henry VII., granted leases here to certain students of law.

Lincolnshire Bagpipes. The croaking of frogs in the Lincolnshire fens. We have Cambridgeshire nightingales, meaning frogs; fen nightingales, the Lègè nightingale. In a somewhat similar way asses are called "Arcadian nightingales."

"Melancholy as ... the drone of a Lincolnshire bagpipe."—Shakespeare: 1 Hen. IV., I. 2.
Lindabrides. A heroine in The Mirror of Knighthood, whose name at one time was a synonym for a kept mistress, in which sense it was used by Scott, Kenilworth and Woodstock.

Linden Tree (A). Baucis was converted into a linden tree. Philemon and Baucis were poor cottagers of Phrygia, who entertained Jupiter so hospitably that he promised to grant them whatever request they made. They asked that both might die together, and it was so. At death Philemon became an oak and Baucis a linden tree. Their branches intertwined at the top.

Lindor. A poetic swain of the Cor'don type, a lover en bergère.

"Do not, for heaven's sake, bring down Corydon and Lindor upon us."—Sir Walter Scott.

Line. Trade, business.

What line are you in? What trade or profession are you of? "In the book line"—i.e. the book trade. This is a Scripture phrase. "The lines have fallen to me in pleasant places, yea, I have a goodly heritage." The allusion is to drawing a line to mark out the lot of each tribe, hence line became the synonym of lot, and lot means position or destiny; and hence a calling, trade, or profession. Commercial travellers use the word frequently to signify the sort of goods which they have to dispose of; as, one travels "in the hardware line," another "in the drapery line," or "grocery line," etc.

Line (The). The equator. (See Crossings the Line.)

The deep-sea line. A long line marked at every five fathoms, for sounding the depth of the sea.

The line. All regiments of infantry except the foot-guards, the rifles brigade, the marines, the militia, and the volunteers.

Line a Day (A). ("Nulla dies sine lineâ.") Apelles the artist said he never passed a day without doing at least one line, and to this steady industry he owed his great success.

Line of Battle. The order of troops drawn up so as to present a battle-front. There are three lines—the van, the main body, and the rear. A fleet drawn up in line of battle is so arranged that the ships are ahead and astern of each other at stated distances.

All along the line, in every particular. The reference is to line of soldiers.

"The accuracy of the statement is contested all along the line by persons on the spot."—W. E. Gladstone (Newspaper report).

To break the enemy's line is to derange their order of battle, and so put them to confusion.

Line of Beauty. According to Hogarth, is a curve thus ( ). Mengs was of the same opinion, but thought it should be more serpentine. Of course, these fancies are not tenable, for the line which may be beautiful for one object would be hideous in another. What would Hogarth have said to a nose or mouth which followed his line of beauty?

Line of Communication, or rather Lines of Communication, are trenches made to continue and preserve a safe correspondence between two forts, or two approaches to a besieged city, or between two parts of the same army, in order that they may co-operate with each other.

Line of Demarcation. The line which divides the territories of different proprietors. The space between two opposite doctrines, opinions, rules of conduct, etc.

Line of Direction. The line in which a body moves, a force acts, or motion is communicated. In order that a body may stand without falling, a line let down from the centre of gravity must fall within the base on which the object stands. Thus the leaning tower of Pisa does not fall, because this rule is preserved.

Line of Life (The). In French, la ligne de vie. So also, line of duty, la ligne du devoir, etc. In palmistry, the crease in the left hand beginning above the web of the thumb, and running towards or upward to the wrist is so called.

The nearer it approaches the wrist the longer will be the life, according to palmists. If long and deeply marked, it indicates long life with very little trouble; if crossed or cut with other marks, it indicates sickness.

Line of March. The ground from point to point over which an army moves.

Line of Operation (The). in war. The line between the base of operation (q.v.) and the object aimed at. Thus, if a fleet is the base and the siege of a city is the object aimed at, the line of operation is that drawn from the fleet to the city. If a well-fortified spot is the base and a battle the object, the line of operation is that which lies between the fortified spot and the battle-field.

Line upon Line. Admonition or instruction repeated little by little (a line at a time). Apelles said "*Nulla dies nine lined. A drawing is line upon line, an edifice is brick upon brick or stone upon stone.

"Line upon line upon line, here a little and there a little."—Isaiah xxxvii. 10.

Lines. The lines have fallen to me in pleasant places. The part allotted to me and measured off by a measuring line. (Psalms xvi. 6.)

Hard lines. Hard restrictions. Here lines means an allotment measured out.

To read between the lines. To discern the secret meaning. One method of cryptography is to write in alternate lines; if read by line by line, the meaning of the writer is reversed or wholly misunderstood. Thus lines 2, 4, 6 of the following cryptogram would convey the warning to Lord Montague of the Gunpowder Plot.

"My lord, having just returned from Paris,
(2) stay away from the house to-night and give me the pleasure of your company.
(1) Two friends and men have concurred to punish those who pay not regard to their health, and
(6) the wickedness of the time adds greatly to its wear and tear."

Linen Goods. In 1721 a statute was passed imposing a penalty of £5 upon the wearer, and £20 upon the seller of, a piece of calico. Fifteen years later this statute was so far modified that calicoes manufactured in Great Britain were allowed, "provided the warp thereof was entirely of linen yarn." In 1774 a statute was passed allowing printed cotton goods to be used on the payment of threepence a yard duty; in 1806 the duty was raised to threepence halfpenny. This was done to prevent the use of calicoes from interfering with the demand for linen and woollen stuffs. The law for burying in woollen was of a similar character. The following extracts from a London news-letter, dated August 2nd, 1768, are curious. [Note—chintz is simply printed calico.]

"Yesterday three tradesmen's wives of this city were convicted before the St. Hoo, the Lord Mayor for wearing chintz gowns on Sunday last, and each of them was fined £3. These make-shift women who have been convicted of the above offence within twelve months past .... There were several ladies in St. James's Park on the same day with chintz gowns on, but the persons who gave informers of the above three were not able to discover their names or places of abode .... Yesterday a waggon loaded with £200 worth of chintz was seized at Dartford in Kent by some custom-house officers. Two post-chaises laden with the same commodity got off with their goods by swiftness of driving."

Lingo. Talk, language. A corruption of lingua.

Lingua Franca. A species of corrupted Italian spoken on the coasts of the Mediterranean. The Frank's language mixed with the Italian.

Lining of the Pocket. Money.

"My money is spent: Can I be content With pockets deprived of their lining?"

_The Lady's Decoy, or Mam Midway's Defence,_ 1786, p. 4.

When the great court tailor wished to obtain the patronage of Beanz Brummel, he made him a present of a dress-coat lined with bank-notes. Brumme wrote a letter of thanks, stating that he quite approved of the coat, and he especially admired the lining.

Linnaean System. A system devised by Linnaeus of Sweden, who arranged his three kingdoms of animals, vegetables, and minerals into classes, orders, genera, species, and varieties, according to certain characteristics.

Linne (The Heir of). The Lord of Linne was a great spendthrift, "who wasted his substance in riotous living." Having spent all, he sold his estates to John of the Scales, his steward, reserving to himself only a "poor and lonesome lodge in a lonely glen." When he had squandered away the money received for his estates, and found that no one would lend or give him more, he retired to the lodge in the glen, where he found a rope with a running noose dangling over his head. He put the rope round his neck and sprang aloft, when lo! the ceiling burst in twain, and he fell to the ground. When he came to himself he espied two chests of beaten gold, and a third full of white money, and over them was written, "Once more, my son, I set thee clear; amend thy life, or a rope at last must end it." The heir of Linne now returned to his old hall, where he asked his quadrant steward for the loan of forty pence; this was refused him. One of the guests procured the loan, and told John of the Scales he ought to have lent it, as he had bought the estate cheap enough. "Cheap call you it?" exclaimed John; "why, he shall have it back for 100 marks less." "Done," said the heir of Linne, and counted out the money. He thus recovered his estates, and made the kind guest his forester. (Perry: _Reliques, series ii. book 2._)

Linsey-woolly MILLION (The). The great unwashed. The artisan class, supposed to dress in linsey-woolly. "Broad-cloth" being for the gentry.

"Truth needs not, John, the eloquence of oraths; But more than a decent suit of clothes Requirest braid gold lace and expenfive garis, That makes the linsey-woolly million stare."—Peter Pindar: _Silvanus Urban._

Linsepe (French, 2 syl.) means a prince in slang or familiar usage. It comes from the inspector or monitor of the cathedral choir called the Spé or the Inspé (inspector), because he had to superintend the rest of the boys.

Lion (as an agnomen).

ALP ASELAN [the Valiant Lion], son of Toguir Beg, the Perso-Turkish monarch. (Reigned 1063-1072.)

Ali was called The Lion of God for his religious zeal and great courage. His mother called him at birth Al Haidara, the Rooged Lion. (A.D. 602, 655-661.)

Ali Fisa, called The Lion of Janina, overthrown in 1822 by Ibrahim Pusha. (1741, 1788-1822.)

ANIOCH (fifth of the dynasty of Ninu, the Assyrian), called Anioch Elasas—i.e. Anioch Melech al Asser, the Lion King of Assyria. (B.C. 1927-1897.)

DAMELOWI, Prince of Hialez, who founded Lemberg (Lion City) in 1259.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, called The Lion of the North. (1504, 1611-1632.)

HAMZA, called The Lion of God and of His Prophet. So Gabriel told Mahomet his uncle was cæsured in heaven.

HENRY, Duke of Bavaria and Saxony, was called The Lion for his daring courage. (1120-1195.)

LOUIS VIII. of France was called The Lion because he was born under the sign Leo. (1187, 1223-1226.)

RICHARD I. Coeur de Lion (Lion’s heart), so called for his bravery. (1157, 1189-1199.)

WILLIAM of Scotland, so called because he chose a red lion ramuants for his cognisance. (Reigned 1165-1214.)

† The Order of the Lion. A German Order of civil merit, founded in 1815.

Lion (as an emblem). A lion is emblem of the tribe of Judah: Christ is called the lion of the tribe of Judah.

"Judah is a lion’s whelp; ... he crouched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up?"—Genesis xlix. 4.

A lion emblematic of St. Jerome. The tale is, that while Jerome was lecturing one day, a lion entered the schoolroom, and lifted up one of its paws. All the disciples fled; but Jerome, seeing that the paw was wounded, drew out of it a thorn and dressed the wound. The lion, out of gratitude, showed a wish to stay with its benefactor. Hence Jerome is typified as a lion, or as accompanied by a lion. (Kneusman: Lives of the Saints, p. 784.)

Androcles and the Lion. This is a replica of the tale of Androcclus. Androcles was a Roman slave, condemned to encounter a lion in the amphitheatre; but when the beast was let loose it crouched at the feet of the slave and began licking them. The circumstance naturally excited the curiosity of the consul; and the slave, being brought before him, told him the following tale: "I was compelled by cruel treatment to run away from your service while in Africa, and one day I took refuge in a cave from the heat of the sun. While I was in the cave a lion entered, limping, and evidently in great pain. Seeing me, he held up his paw, from which I extracted a large thorn. We lived together in the cave for some time, the lion catering for both of us. At length I left the cave, was apprehended, brought to Rome, and condemned to encounter a lion in the amphitheatre. My enemy was my old friend, and he recognised me instantly." (A. Gellius: Noctes, v. 15.)

St. Gerasimus and the Lion. A very similar tale is told of St. Gerasim (A.D. 475). One day, being on the banks of the Jordan, he saw a lion coming to him, limping on three feet. When it reached the saint, it held up to him the right paw, from which Gerasimus extracted a large thorn. The grateful beast attached itself to the saint, and followed him about as a dog. (Vie des Pères des Déserts d’Orient.)

Sir George Davis and the Lion. Sir George Davis was English consul at Florence at the beginning of the 19th century. One day he went to see the lions of the great Duke of Tuscany. There was one which the keepers could not tame; but no sooner did Sir George appear than it manifested every symptom of joy. Sir George entered its cage, when the lion leaped on his shoulder, licked his face, wagged its tail, and fawned on him like a dog. Sir George told the great duke that he had brought up the creature; but as it grew older it became dangerous, and he sold it to a Barbary captive. The duke said that he had bought it of the very same man, and the mystery was solved.

Half a score of such tales are told by the Hollandistes in the Acta Sanctorum.

"The lion an emblem of the resurrection. According to tradition, the lion’s whelp is born dead, and remains so for three days, when the father breathes on it and it receives life. Another tradition is that the lion is the only animal of the cat tribe born with its eyes open, and it is said that it sleeps with its eyes open. This is not strictly correct, but undoubtedly it sleeps watchfully and lightly."

Mark the Evangelist is symbolised by a lion, because he begins his gospel with the scenes of John the Baptist and Jesus in the Wilderness. Matthew is symbolised by a lion, because he begins his gospel with the humanity of Jesus, as a descendant of David. Luke is symbolised as a calf, because he begins his gospel with the priest sacrificing in the temple. John is symbolised by an eagle, because he soars high, and begins his gospel with the divinity of the Logos. The four symbols are those of Ezekiel's cherubim.

The American lion. The puma.
A Cotswold lion. A sheep.

Lion (grateful for kindness):—
Androclus. (See under Lion as an emblem.)

Sir Iwan de Galles was attended by a lion, which, in gratitude to the knight, who had delivered it from a serpent with which it had been engaged in deadly combat, ever after became his faithful servant, approaching the knight with tears, and rising on his hind-feet like a dog.

Sir Geoffrey de Latour was aided by a lion against the Saracens; but the faithful brute was drowned in attempting to follow the vessel in which the knight had embarked on his departure from the Holy Land.

St. Germain. (See under Lion as an emblem.)

St. Jerome. (See under Lion as an emblem.)

Lion, in Heraldry.
(1) Couchant. Lying down; head erect, and tail beneath him. Emblematic of sovereignty.
(2) Coward or Coq. With tail hanging between his legs.
(3) Dormant. Asleep, with head resting on his fore-paws.
(4) Passant. Walking, three feet on the ground; in profile. Emblematic of resolution.
(5) Passant Gardant. Three feet on the ground; full face. The "Lion of England." Resolution and Prudence.
(6) Passant Regardant. Three feet on the ground; side face turned backwards.
(7) Rampant. Erect on his hind legs; in profile. Emblematic of magnanimity.
(8) Rampant Gardant. Erect on his hind legs; full face. Emblematic of prudence.
(9) Rampant Regardant. Erect on his hind legs; side face looking behind. Emblematic of circumspection.
(10) Regardant. Looking behind him; emblematic of circumspection.

(11) Salient. In the act of springing forward on its prey. Emblematic of valour.
(12) Sejant. Sitting, rising to prepare for action; face in profile, tail erect. Emblematic of counsel.
(13) Sejant Affronté (as in the crest of Scotland).
(14) Statant. Standing with four legs on the ground.
(15) Lion of St. Mark. A winged lion sejant, holding an open book with the inscription "Iux tibi Marce, Evangelista Meus." A sword-point rises above the book on the dexter side, and the whole is encircled by an aureola.
(16) Lion of Venice. "The same as the lion of St. Mark.
Then there are black, red, and white lions, with many leonine monsters.

A lion at the feet of knights and martyrs, in effigy, signifies that they died for their magnanimity.

The lions in the arms of England. They are three lions passant gardant, i.e. walking and showing the full face. The first lion was that of Rollo, Duke of Normandy, and the second represented the country of Maine, which was added to Normandy. These were the two lions borne by William the Conqueror and his descendants. Henry II. added a third lion to represent the Duchy of Aquitaine, which came to him through his wife Eleanor. The French heralds call the lion passant a leopard; accordingly, Napoleon said to his soldiers, "Let us drive these leopards (the English) into the sea."

* In heraldry any lion not rampant is called a lion lepardo.

The lion in the arms of Scotland is derived from the arms of the ancient Earls of Northumberland and Huntingdon, from whom some of the Scotch monarchs were descended. The treasure is referred to the reign of King Achaicus, who made a league with Charlemagne, "who did augment his arms with a double trace formed with Floure-de-lyces, signifying thereby that the lion henceforth should be defended by the ayele of Frenchmen." (Holinhshed: Chronicles.)

Sir Walter Scott says the lion rampant in the arms of Scotland was first assumed by William of Scotland, and has been continued ever since.

"William King of Scotland, having chosen for his armorial bearing a Red Lion rampant, acquired the name of William the Lion: and this rampant lion still constitutes the arms of Scotland; and the president of the heraldic court is called Lord Lion King-at-Arms." — Tales of a Grandfather.
A marble lion was set up in honour of Leonidas, who fell at Thermopylae, and a Belgian lion stands on the field of Waterloo.

Lion in classic mythology, Cybele (3 syl.) is represented as riding in a chariot drawn by two tame lions.

Practically, the, goddess of nature among the Hindus, is represented in a similar manner.

Hippomenes and Atalanta (fond lovers) were metamorphosed into lions by Cybele.

Hercules is said to have worn over his shoulders the hide of the Nem'ean lion, which he slew with his club. Terbour is also represented as arrayed in a lion's hide.

The Nem'eon lion, slain by Hercules. The first of his twelve labours. As it could not be wounded by any weapon, Hercules squeezed it to death.

Lion (a public-house sign).

Black lion comes from the Flemings.

"Au noir lyon la fleur-de-lis,"

Prés la terre de ça le Lyn.

Godfrey de Paris.

Blue, the badge of the Earl of Mortimer, also of Denmark.

Blue seems frequently to represent silver; thus we have the Blue Boar of Richard III., the Blue Lion of the Earl of Mortimer, the Blue Swan of Henry IV., the Blue Dragon, etc.

Crowned, the badge of Henry VIII.

Golden, the badge of Henry I., and also of Percy, Duke of Northumberland.

Passant gardant (walking and showing a full face), the device of England.

Rampant, the device of Scotland.

Rampant, with the tail between its legs and turned over its back, the badge of Edward IV., as Earl of March.

Red, of Scotland; also the badge of John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, who assumed this badge as a token of his claim to the throne of Castile.

Sleeping, the device of Richard I.

Statant gardant (i.e. standing and showing a full face), the device of the Duke of Norfolk.

White, the device of the Dukes of Norfolk; also of the Earl of Surrey, Earl of Mortimer, and the Fitz-Hammonds.

For who in field or forest stalk,

Saw the blanche lion e'er fall back? [Duke of Norfolk!]

Sir Walter Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel.

The winged lion. The republic of Venice. Its heraldic device.

White and Red Lions. Prester John, in a letter to Manuel Comenius, of Constantinople, 1165, says his land is "the home of white and red lions."

Lion-hunter (A). One who hunts up a celebrity to adorn or give prestige to a party. Mrs. Leo Hunter, in Pickwick, is a good satire on the name and character of a lion-hunter.

Lion-killer (The). Jules Gerard (1817-1864).

Lion Sermon (The). Preached in St. Katharine Cree church Leadenhall-street, London, in October, to commemorate "the wonderful escape" of Sir John Gayer, about 250 years ago, from a lion which he met with on being shipwrecked on the coast of Africa. Sir John was Lord Mayor in 1647.

Sir John Gayer besought the lion, the relief of the poor on condition that a commemorative sermon was preached annually at St. Katharine Cree. It is said that Sir John was on his knees in prayer when the lion came up, smelt about him, prowled round and round him, and then stalked off.

Lion-sick. Sick of love, like the lion in the fable. (See Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, ii. 3.)

Lion Tamer (The). Ellen Bright, who exhibited at Wombwell's menagerie, was so called. She was killed by a tiger in 1880, at the age of seventeen.

Lion and Unicorn. The animosity which existed between these beasts, referred to by Spenser in his Faerie Queene, is allegorical of the animosity which once existed between England and Scotland.

"Like as a Lyon, whose imperial powre

A proud rebellious unicorn defere."

Book ii. canto 5.

Lion and Unicorn. Ever since 1603 the royal arms have been supported as now by the English lion and Scottish unicorn: but prior to the accession of James I., the sinister supporter was a family badge. Edward III., with whom supporters began, had a lion and eagle; Henry IV., an antelope and swan; Henry V., a lion and antelope; Edward IV., a lion and bull; Richard III., a lion and boar; Henry VII., a lion and dragon; Elizabeth, Mary, and Henry VIII., a lion and greyhound. The lion is dexter—i.e. to the right hand of the wearer or person behind the shield.

Lion and the True Prince (The). The lion will not touch the true prince (1 Henry IV., ii. 4). This is a religious superstition; the "true prince," strictly speaking, being the Messiah, who is called "the Lion of the tribe of Judah." Loosely it is applied to any prince of blood royal, supposed at one time to be hedged around with a sort of divinity.

"Fetch the Numidian lion I brought over; if she be sprung from royal blood, the lion will do her reverence, else he'll tear her."

Beaumont and Fletcher: The Mad Lover.

Lion of God. Ali was so called, because of his zeal and his great courage. (602, 655-661.)

Lion of St. Mark. (See under Lion, heraldry.)

Lion of the Reformation. (The). Spenser says that while Una was seeking St. George, she sat to rest herself, when a lion rushed suddenly out of a thicket, with gaping mouth and lashing tail; but as he drew near he was awe-struck, and, laying aside his fury, kissed her feet and licked her hands; for, as the poet adds, "beauty can master strength, and truth subdue vengeance." (The lion is the emblem of England, which waits upon Truth. When true faith was deserted by all the world, England the lion came to its rescue.) The lion then followed Una as a dog, but when Una met Hypocrisy, Sansloy came upon them and killed the lion. That is, during the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., England the lion followed the footsteps of Truth, but in the reign of Mary, Hypocrisy came and False-faith killed the lion, i.e. separated England from Truth by fire and sword.

Lion of the Zodiac. One of the signs of the Zodiac (28th of July to the 23rd of August).

Lion's Claws. Commonly used as ornaments to the legs of furniture, as tables, chairs, etc.; emblematical of strength and stability. The Greeks and Romans employed, for the same purpose, the hoofs of oxen.

Lion's Head. In fountains the water generally is made to issue from the mouth of a lion. This is a very ancient custom. The Egyptians thus symbolised the inundation of the Nile, which happens when the sun is in Leo. The Greeks and Romans adopted the same device for their fountains.

Lion's Mouth. To place one's head in the lion's mouth. To expose oneself needlessly and foolhardily to danger.

Lion's Provider. A jackal; a foil to another man's wit, a humble friend who plays into your hand to show you to best advantage. The jackal feeds on the lion's leavings, and is supposed to serve the lion in much the same way as a dog serves a sportsman. The dog lifts up its foot to indicate that game is at hand, and the jackal yells to advertise the lion that they have roused up his prey. (See Jackal.)

"... the poor jackals are less foul.
As being the brave lion's keen providers,
Than human insects curving for spiders."

Byron: Don Juan, ix. 77.

Lion's Share. The larger part: all or nearly all. In Aesop's Fables, several beasts joined the lion in a hunt; but, when the spoil was divided, the lion claimed one quarter in right of his prerogative, one for his superior courage, one for his dam and cubs, "and as for the fourth, let who will dispute it with me." Awed by his frown, the other beasts yielded and silently withdrew. (See Montgomery.)

Lions. (The). The lions of a place are sights worth seeing, or the celebrities; so called from the ancient custom of showing strangers, as chief of London sights, the lions at the Tower. The Tower menagerie was abolished in 1894.

Lionise a Person. (To) is either to show him the lions, or chief objects of attraction; or to make a lion of him, by fitting him and making a fuss about him. To be lionised is to be so treated.

Liosalifar. The light Alfs who dwell in the city Alf-heim. They are whiter than the sun. (See Dock-Alfar.) (Scandinavian mythology.)

Lip. (Anglo-Saxon, lippe, the lip.)

To curl the lip. To express contempt or disgust with the mouth.

To hang the lip. To drop the under lip in sullenness or contempt. Thus Helen explains why her brother Troilus is not abroad by saying, "He hangs the lip at something." (Act iii. 1.)

"A foolish hanging of thy tender lip."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 4.

: To shoot out the lip. To show scorn.

"All they that see me laugh me to scorn. They shoot out the lip: they shake the head."

Psalm xix. 7.

Lip Homage. Homage rendered by the lips only, that is, either by a kiss like that of Judas, or by words.

Lip Service. Verbal devotion. Honouring with the lips while the heart takes no part nor lot in the matter. (See Matt. xv. 8, Isa. xxxix. 13.)

Lips. The calves of our lips (Hosea xiv. 2). The sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving.
The fruit of the lips. Thanksgivings.

"Let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually, that is, the fruit of our lips giving thanks to His name."—Heb. xiii. 15.

Liquor up. Take another dram.

Lil (King). Father of Fionnuala. On the death of Fingula, the mother of his daughter, he married the wicked Aoife, who, through spite, transformed the children of Lil into swans, doomed to float on the water till they heard the first mass-bell ring. Thomas Moore has versified this legend.

"Silent, O Moyle, be the roar of thy water,
Break not, ye breaze, your chain of repose,
While murmuring mournfully, lit's lovely daughter
Tells to the night-stars the tale of her woes."—Irish Melodies, No. 11. 3.

Liri. A proud but lovely daughter of the race of man, beloved by Rubi, first of the angel host. Her passion was the love of knowledge, and she was captivated by all her lover told her of heaven and the works of God. At last she requested Rubi to appear before her in all his glory, and as she fell into his embrace was burnt to ashes by the rays which issued from him. (Moore: Loves of the Angels, story ii.)

Lisboa or Lisbon. Lisbon (q.v.)

"What beauties doth Lisboa list to unfold,"—Byron: Childe Harold, i. 16.

"And thou, famed Lisboa, whose embattled wall
Rose by the hand that wrought proud Hom's fell!
Mickle: Ledad.

Lisbon. A corruption of 'Ulyssippe' (Ulysses' polis or city). Said by some to have been founded by Lusus, who visited Portugal with Ulysses, whence "Lusitania" (q.v.); and by others to have been founded by Ulysses himself. This is Camoens' version. (See above.)

Lisimahago (Captain), in Smollett's Humphry Clinker. Very conceited, fond of disputation, jealous of honour, and brim-full of national pride. This poor but proud Scotch officer marries Miss Tabitha Bramble. The romance of Captain Lisimahago among the Indians is worthy of Cervantes.

Lissarte of Greece. One of the knights whose adventures and exploits are recounted in the latter part of the Spanish version of Anaxid of Gaul. This part was added by Juan Diaz.

Lit de Justice. Properly the seat occupied by the French king when he attended the deliberations of his parliament. The session itself. Any arbitrary edict. As the members of Parliament derived their power from the king, when the king himself was present their power returned to the fountain-head, and the king was arbitrary. What the king then proposed could not be contested, and of course, had the force of law. The last lit de justice was held by Louis XVI. in 1787.

Little, Thomas Moore published a volume of amatory poems in 1808, under the name of Thomas Little.

"When first I came my proper name was Little—now I'm Moore."—Hood: The Wre Horn.

Little. Little by little. Gradually; a little at a time.

Many a little makes a mickle. The real Scotch proverb is: "A wheen o' mickles mak's a muckle," where mickle means little, and muckle much; but the Anglo-Saxon mircel or mycrel means "much," so that, if the Scotch proverb is accepted, we must give a forced meaning to the word "mickle."

Little Britain or Britanny. Same as Armorica. Also called Benwic.

Little Corporal (The), Napoleon Bonaparte. So called after the battle of Lodi, in 1796, from his low stature, youthful age, and amazing courage. He was barely 5 ft. 2 in. in height.

Little Dauphin (The). The eldest son of the Great Dauphin—i.e., the Duc de Bourgogne, son of Louis, and grandson of Louis XIV.

Little Ease. The name of a prison cell too small to allow the prisoner to stand upright, or to lie down, or to assume any other position of ease. I have seen such a cell at St. Cyr; and according to Curiosity, or, The General Library, p. 69 (1738), cells of this kind were used "at Guildhall for marly apprentices."

Little-Eclans. The two great empires of Lilliput and Blefuscu waged a destructive war against each other, exhausted their treasures, and decimated their subjects on their different views of interpreting this vital direction contained in the 64th chapter of the Bloomer (Koran): "All true believers break their eggs at the convenient end." The godfather of Calin Defar Plume, the reigning emperor of Lilliput, happened to cut his finger while breaking his egg at the big end, and very royally published a decree commanding all his liege and faithful subjects, on pains and penalties of great severity, to break their eggs in future at the small end. The orthodox Blefuscu'dians deemed it their duty to resist this innovation, and declared a war of extermination against the heretical Lilliputians. Many hundreds of large treatises were published on both sides, but those of a contrary opinion were put in the Index expurgatorius of the opposite empire. (Gulliver’s Travels, Voyage to Lilliput, iv.)

"The battle between the Little-endians and the Big-endians broke out on Thursday, like the after-burn of a more serious conflagration."—The Times.

Little Englishers. Those who uphold the doctrine that English people should concern themselves with England only: they are opposed to colonisation and extension of the Empire.

Little-Go. The examination held in the Cambridge University in the second year of residence. Called also "the previous examination," because it precedes by a year the examination for a degree. In Oxford the corresponding examination is called The Smalls. (See Mods.)

Little Jack Horner. (See Jack.)

Little John. A big stalwart fellow, named John Little (or John Nailor), who encountered Robin Hood, and gave him a sound thrashing, after which he was rechristened, and Robin stood godfather. Little John is introduced by Sir Walter Scott in The Talisman.

"'This infant was called John Little,' quoth he: 'Which name shall be changed anon.' The words we'll transpost, so wherever he goes, His name shall be called Little John." Robin Hood, xx. xi.

Little John was executed on Arbor Hill, Dublin.

It will be remembered that Maria in Twelfth Night, represented by Shakespeare as a little woman, is by a similar pleasantry called by Viola, "Olivia's giant;" and Sir Toby says to her, "Good night, Peothosilla's"—i.e. Amazon.

Little Masters. A name applied to certain designers, who worked for engravers, etc., in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Called little because their designs were on a small scale, fit for copper or wood. The most famous were Jost Amman, for the minuteness of his work; Hans Burgmair, who made drawings in wood illustrative of the triumph of the Emperor Maximilian; Hans Sebald Beham; Albert Altdorfer, and Henrich Aldegravere. Albert Dürer and Lucas van Leyden made the art renowned and popular.

Little Nell. A child of beautiful purity of character, living in the midst of selfishness, worldliness, and crime. (Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop.)

Little Ones (The). The small children, and young children generally.

Little Paris. Brussels, the capital of Belgium, and Milan, in Italy, are so called, from their gaiety and resemblance in miniature to the French capital.

Little Pedington. The village of quackery and cant, humbug, and egoism, wherever that locality is. A satire by John Poole.

Little Red Ridinghood. This nursery tale is, with slight alterations, common to Sweden, Germany, and France. It comes to us from the French, called Le Petit Chaperon Rouge, in Charles Perrault’s Contes des Temps.

Little Gentleman in Velvet (The). The mole. "To the little gentleman in velvet" was a favourite Jacobite toast in the reign of Queen Anne. The reference was to the mole that raised the mole-hill against which the horse of William III. stumbled at Hampton Court. By this accident the king broke his collar-bone, a severe illness ensued, and he died early in 1702.

Little Packs become a Little Pedlar. "Little boats must keep near shore, larger ones may venture more."

"Mainwaring is a clever justice—In him, my lord, our only trust is—Bordiet's a nation meddler: Volks shud turn round and see their backs, And meend [mind] old provers: 'Little packs become a little pedlar.'
Peter Pindar: Midwinter Election, letter 1.

Liturgy originally meant public work, such as arranging the dancing and singing on public festivals, the torch-races, the equipping and manning of ships, etc. In the Church of England it means the religious forms prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer. (Greek, liturgia.)

Live. He lived like a knave, and died like a fool. Said by Bishop Warburton of Henry Rich, first Earl of Holland, the turncoat. He went to the scaffold dressed in white satin, trimmed with silver.

Liver-vein (The). A love rhapsody. The liver was anciently supposed to be the seat of love. When Longaville reads the verses, Biron says, in an aside, "This is the liver-vein, which makes flesh a deity." (Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, iv. 3.)

Livered. As, white-livered, lily-livered. Cowardly. In the auspices taken by the Greeks and Romans before battle, if the liver of the animals sacrificed was healthy and blood-red, the omen was favourable; but if pale, it augured defeat.

"Thou illy-livered blo."—Shakespeare: Macbeth v. 3.

Liverpool. Said to be the "liver-pool." The liver is a mythic bird, somewhat like the heron. The arms of the city contain two livers.

Liverpudlian. A native of Liverpool.

Livery. What is delivered. The clothes of a man-servant delivered to him by his master. The stables to which your horse is delivered for keep During the Merovingian and Carolingian dynasties, splendid dresses were given to all the members of the royal household; barons and knights gave uniforms to their retainers, and even a duke's son, serving as a page, was clothed in the livery of the prince he served. (French, livier.)

"What livery is we know well enough; it is the allowance of horse-meats to keep horses as lively; the which word, I guess, is derived of delivering forth their nightly food."—Spenser on Ireland.

Livery. The colours of a livery should be those of the field and principal charge of the armorial shield; hence the Queen's livery is gules (scarlet) or scarlet trimmed with gold. The Irish regiments preserve the charge of their own nation. Thus the Royal Irish Dragoon Guards have scarlet uniform with blue facings, and the Royal Irish Lancers have blue uniform with scarlet facings.

Livery-men. The freemen of the ninety-one guilds of London are so called, because they are entitled to wear the livery of their respective companies.

Livy of France (The). Juan de Mariana (1537-1624).

Livy of Portugal (The). João de Barros, the best of the Portuguese historians. (1496-1570.)

Lisa. An innkeeper's daughter in love with Elv'no, a rich farmer: but Elv'no loves Amin'na. Suspicious circumstances make the farmer renounce the hand of Amin and promise marriage to her rival; but Lisa is shown to be the paramour of another, and Amin, being proved innocent, is married to the man who loves her. (Bellus: La Son-nambula.) Or Lisa. (See Elvino.)

Lizard (The). Supposed, at one time, to be venomous, and hence a "lizard's leg" was an ingredient of the witch's cauldron in Macbeth.

Lizard Islands. Fabulous islands where damsels outcast from the rest of the world are received. (Torymada: Garden of Flowers.)

Lizard Point (Cornwall). A corruption of "Lazars' Point," i.e. the place of retirement for lazars or lepers.

Lloyd's. An association of underwriters, for marine insurances. So called because the society moved in 1716 from Cornhill to a coffee-house in Lombard Street kept by a man named Lloyd.

Lloyd's Books. Two enormous ledger-like volumes, raised on desks at the entrance (right and left) of Lloyd's Rooms. These books give the principal arrivals, and all losses by wrecks, fire, or other accidents at sea. The entries are written in a fine, bold Roman hand, legible to all readers.

Lloyd's List. A London periodical, in which the shipping news received at Lloyd's Rooms is regularly published.

Lloyd's Register. A register of ships, British and foreign, published yearly.

Lloyd's Rooms. The rooms where Lloyd's Books are kept, and the business of the house is carried on. These rooms were, in 1774, removed from Lombard Street to the Royal Exchange, and are under the management of a committee.

Loaf. Never turn a loaf in the presence of a Menteith. Sir John Stewart de Menteith was the person who betrayed Sir William Wallace to King Edward. His signal was, when he turned a loaf set on the table, the guests were to rush upon the patriot, and secure him. (Sir Walter Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, vii.)

Loaf held in the Hand (A) is the attribute of St. Philip the Apostle, St. Oysth, St. Joanna, Nicholas, St. Godfrey, and of many other saints noted for their charity to the poor.

Loafer. Tramps, thieves, and the ne'er-do-well. Idle fellows who get their living by expedients; chevaliers d'industrie. (German, läufer, a runner; Dutch, looper.)

"Until the differentiation of the labourer from the loafer takes place, the unemployed question can never be properly dealt with."—Nineteenth Century, December, 1882, p. 653.

Loathly Lady. A lady so hideous that no one would marry her except Sir Gawain; and immediately after the marriage her ugliness—the effect of enchantment—disappeared, and she became a model of beauty. Love beautifies.
Loaves and Fishes. With an eye to the loaves and fishes; for the sake of ... With a view to the material benefits to be derived. The crowd followed Jesus Christ, not for the spiritual doctrines which He taught, but for the loaves and fishes which He distributed amongst them.

"Jesus answered them and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, ye seek Me, not because ye saw the miracles, but because ye did eat of the loaves, and were filled."—John VI. 26.

Lob. A till. Hence lob-sneak, one who robs the till; and lob-speaking, robbing tills. (See next article.)

Lob's Pound. A prison, the stocks, or any other place of confinement. (Welsh, lob, a dolt). The Irish call it Pook's or Pook's fold, and Puck is called by Shakespeare "the lob of spirits," and by Milton, "the lubber fiend." Our word lobby is where people are confined till admission is granted them into the auditors' gallery; it is also applied to that enclosed space near farmyards where cattle are confined.

Lobby. The Hall will cross the lobbies. Be sent from the House of Commons to the House of Lords.

Lobolly, among seamen, spoon-victuals, or pap for lolls or dolts. (See LOLLITYTORS.)

Lobolly Boy (A.). A surgeon's mate in the navy. Here lob is the Welsh lob, a dolt, and lobolly boy is a dolt not yet out of his spoon-meat or baby-pap.

"Lobolly-boy is a person on board a man-of-war who attends the surgeon and his mates, but known as much about the business of a seaman as the author of this poem."—The Patron (1776).

Lobster Sauce. Died for want of lobster sauce. Died of mortification at some trifling disappointment. Died from fique, or wounded vanity. At the grand feast given by the great Conde to Louis XIV., at Chantilly, Vatel was told that the lobsters for the turbate sauce had not arrived, whereupon this chef of the kitchen retired to his private room, and, leaning on his sword, ran it through his body, unable to survive such a dire disgrace as serving up turbot without lobster sauce.

Lobsters and Tarpanlings. Soldiers and sailors. Soldiers are now popularly called lobsters, because they are turned red when enlisted into the service. But the term was originally applied to a troop of horse soldiers in the Great Rebellion, clad in armour which covered them as a shell.

"Sir William Wallace received from London (in 1642) a fresh regiment of 500 horse, under the command of Sir Arthur Haslerig, which were so prodigiously armed that they were called by the king's party 'the regiment of lobsters, because of their bright iron shells with which they were covered, being perfect curassiers, and were the first seen so armed on either side."—Clarendon: History of the Rebellion, II. 61.

Lochiel (2 syl.) of Thomas Campbell is Sir Evan Cameron, lord of Lochiel, surnamed The Black, and The Ulysses of the Highlands. His grandson Donald was called The Gentle Lochiel. Lochiel is the title of the head of the clan Cameron.

"And Cameron in the shock of steel, Die like the offering of Lochiel."—Sir W. Scott: The Field of Waterloo.

Lochinvar, being in love with a lady at Netherby Hall, persuaded her to dance one last dance. She was condemned to marry a "laggard in love and a dastard in war," but her young cavalier swung her into his saddle and made off with her, before the "bridegroom" and his servants could recover from their astonishment. (Sir Walter Scott: Marmion.)

Lock, Stock, and Barrel. The whole of anything. The lock, stock, and barrel of a gun is the complete instrument.

"The property of the Church of England, lock, stock, and barrel, is claimed by the Liberationists."—Newspaper paragraph, 1863.

Lock the Stable Door. Lock the stable door when the steed is stolen. To take precautions when the mischief is done.

Lockhart. When the good Lord James, on his way to the Holy Land with the heart of King Robert Bruce, was slain in Spain fighting against the Moors, Sir Simon Locard, of Lee, was commissioned to carry back to Scotland the heart, which was interred in Melrose Abbey. In consequence thereof he changed his name to Lock-heart, and adopted the device of a heart within a fetterlock, with this motto: "Corda serrata paudo" (Locked hearts I open). Of course, this is romance. Lockhart is Teutonic, "Strong Regulator."

"For this reason men changed Sir Simon's name from Locard to Lockheart, and all who are descended from Sir Simon are called Lockhart to this day."—Sir Walter Scott: Taina of a Grandfather, xi.

Lockit. The jailer in Gay's Beggar's Opera.

Lockitt's. A fashionable coffee-house in the reign of Charles II.

Lockman. An executioner; so called because one of his dues was a lock (or ladeful) of meal from every caskful.
Lockley. So Robin Hood is sometimes called, from the village in which he was born. (See Ivanhoe, ch. xiii.)

Lockley Hall. Tennyson has a poem so called. The lord of Lockley Hall fell in love with his cousin Amy, but Amy married a rich clown. The lord of Lockley Hall, indignant at this, declares he will marry a savage; but, on reflection, adds: "Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay."

Locksmith's Daughter. A key.

Loco Parentis (Latin). One acting in the place of a parent, as a guardian or schoolmaster.

Locofo'cos. Lucifer-matches; self-lighting cigars were so called in North America in 1834. (Latin, loco-foet, in lieu of fire.)

"In 1833 during an excited meeting of the party in Tammany Hall, New York, when the candles had been blown out to increase the confusion, they were lighted with matches then called "locofo'cos." — Gilman: The American People, chap. xxi.

Loe'sferos, Ultra-Radicals, so called in America because, at a grand meeting in Tammany Hall, New York, in 1833, the chairman left his seat, and the lights were suddenly extinguished, with the hope of breaking up the turbulent assembly; but those who were in favour of extreme measures instantly drew from their pockets their locofo'cos, and re-lit the gas. The meeting was continued, and the Radicals had their way. (See Gilman: The American People, chap. xxi.)

Locomotives, or Locomotive Engines. A steam-engine employed to move carriages from place to place. (Latin, loco moveo, to move one's place.)

Locomotive Power. Power applied to the transport of goods, in contradistinction to stationary power.

Locrin or Loerino (2 syll.), Father of Saturn, and eldest son of the mythical Britus, King of ancient Britain. On the death of his father he became king of Locrin (q. v.). (Geoffrey: Brit. Hist., ii. 5.)

Locutum Te'nens (Latin). One holding the place of another. A substitute; one acting temporarily for another; a lieutenant.

Locutus Delicti. The place where a crime was committed.

Locus in quo (Latin). The place in question, the spot mentioned.

Locus Punitentiae. (Latin). Place for repentance — that is, the licence of drawing back from a bargain, which can be done before any act has been committed to confirm it. In the interview between Esau and his father Isaac, St. Paul says that the former "found no place for repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears" (Heb. xii. 17) — i.e. no means whereby Isaac could break his bargain with Jacob.

Locus punitivus. Time to withdraw from a bargain (in Scotch law).

Locus Sigilli or L. S. The place where the seal is to be set.

Locus Standi (Latin). Recognised position, acknowledged right or claim. We say such-and-such a one has no locus standi in society.

Locust Bird. A native of Khurasan (Persia), so fond of the water of the Bird Fountain, between Shiraz and Isphahan, that it will follow wherever it is carried.

Locusts. (For food.)

"The bushmen [says Captain Stockenstrom] consider locusts a great luxury, consuming great quantities fresh, and drying abundance for future emergencies." They are eaten [says Thomas Bayne] in like manner by the Arabs of the Desert, and by other nomadic tribes in the East.

"Even the wasting locust-swarm, Which mighty nations dread, To me no terror brings, nor harm, I make of them my bread." — African Sketches. (1829.)

Locust'sta. This woman has become a byword for one who murders those she professes to nurse, or those whom it is her duty to take care of. She lived in the early part of the Roman empire, poisoned Claudius and Britannicus, and attempted to destroy Nero; but, being found out, she was put to death.

Lode. The vein that leads or guides to ore. A dead lode is one exhausted.

Lode. A ditch that guides or leads water into a river or sewer.

Leodestar. The leading-star by which mariners are guided; the pole-star.

"Your eyes are lodestar," Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 1.

Leodestone or Leadstone. The magnet or stone that guides.

Leod'sna. The Lobben, an affluent of the Thames in Windsor Forest. Pope, in Windsor Forest, says it was a nymph, fond of the chase, like Diana. It chanced one day that Pan saw her, and tried to catch her; but Lodona fled from him, Imploring Cynthia to save her from her persecutor. No sooner had she spoken than she became "a silver stream which ever keeps its virgin coolness."

Logria or Logres. England is so called by Geoffrey of Monmouth, from Logrige, eldest son of the mythical King Brute:

"His [Bruce's] three sons divide the land by consent: Logrige laid the middle part, Logria ..."—Milton: History of England, bk. i.

"Thus Cambria to her right, what would herself restore, And rather than to lose Logria, looks for more."—Dryden: Polyglossion, iv.

"Il est écrit qu'il est une heure On tout le royaume de Logres, Qui jadis fut la terre en avant, Sera détruit par cette lance."—Christien de Troyes.

Log. An instrument for measuring the velocity of a ship. It is a flat piece of wood, some six inches in radius, and in the shape of a quadrant. A piece of lead is nailed to the rim to make the log float perpendicularly. To this log a line is fastened, called the log-line (q.v.). Other terms are also used.

A king Log. A roi faissant. In allusion to the fable of the frogs asking for a king. Jupiter first threw them down a log of wood, but they grumbled at so spiritless a king. He then sent them a stork, which devoured them eagerly.

Log-board. A couple of boards shuttling like a book, in which the "logs" are entered. It may be termed the waste-book, and the log-book the journal.

Log-book. The journal in which the "logs" are entered by the chief mate. Besides the logs, this book contains all general transactions pertaining to the ship and its crew, such as the strength and course of the winds, the conduct and misconduct of the men, and, in short, everything worthy of note.

Log-line. The line fastened to the log (q.v.), and wound round a reel in the ship's gallery. The whole line (except some five fathoms next the log, called stray line) is divided into equal lengths called knots, each of which is marked with a piece of coloured tape or bunting. Suppose the captain wishes to know the rate of his ship; one of the sailors throws the log into the sea, and the reel begins to unwind. The length of line run off in half a minute shows the rate of the ship's motion per hour.

Log-roller (A). One engaged in log-rolling, that is (metaphorically) in furthering another's schemes or fads; persons who lend a friend to promote the sale of his books, etc. The allusion is to neighbours who assist a new settler to roll away the logs of his "clearing."

"The members of Congress ... make a compact by which each aids the other. This is log-rolling."—Bryce: Commonwealth, vol. ii. part iii. chap. ixxv. page 129 (1888).

Log-rolling. The combination of different interests, on the principle of "Claw me, I'll claw you." Applied to mutual admiration criticism. One friend praises the literary work of another with the implied understanding of receiving from him in return as much as he gives. The mutual admirers are called "log-rollers."

* In the last decade of the nineteenth century, it was used politically to signify if A B will help C D to pass their measures through the House, then C D will return the same favour to A B.

Of course, the term is American. If you help me to make my dinner, I will help you to roll away the logs of yours.

Log-rolling Criticism. The criticism of literary men who combine to praise each other's works in press or otherwise.

Logan or Rocking Stones, for which Cornwall is famous.

Pliny tells us of a rock near Harpsea which might be moved with a finger.

Ptolomy says the Gygonian rock might be stirred with a stalk of asphodel.

Half a mile from St. David's is a Logan stone, mounted on divers other stones, which may be shaken with one finger.

At Golcar Hill (Yorkshire) is a rocking stone, which has lost its power from being hacked by workmen who wanted to find out the secret of its rocking mystery.

In Pembroke is a rocking stone, rendered immovable by the soldiers of Cromwell, who held it to be an encouragement to superstition.

The stone called Menamber in Sithney (Cornwall) was also rendered immovable by the soldiers, under the same notion.

There are very many others.

Loggerheads. Fall to loggerheads; to squabbling and fisteuccchas.

Logget. A sweetmeat, a toffy cut into small manchetas; a little log of toffy. Common enough in Norfolk.

Logistica (in Orlando Furioso). The good fairy, and sister of Alcina the sorceress. She teaches Ruggiero to manage the hippogriff, and gives Astolpho a magic book and horn. The impersonation of reason.
Logres

(See LOGRIA.)

Lo'gria. England, so called by the old romancers and fabulous historians.

Logris, Lo'cria. Same as Locrin or Locrine (q.v.).

Loins. Gird up the loins, brace yourself for vigorous action, or energetic endurance. The Jews wore loose garments, which they girded about their loins when they travelled or worked.

"Gird up the loins of your mind."—1 Peter i. 13.

My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins (1 Kings xi. 10). My lightest tax shall be heavier than the most oppressive tax of my predecessor. The arrogant answer of Rehoboam to the deputation which waited on him to entreat an alleviation of "the yoke" laid on them by Solomon. The reply caused the revolt of all the tribes, except those of Judah and Benjamin.

Loki. The god of strife and spirit of evil. He artfully contrived the death of Balder, when Odin had forbidden everything that springs from fire, air, earth, and water to injure him. The mistletoe not being included was made into an arrow, given to the blind Höder, and shot at random; but it struck the beautiful Balder and killed him. This evil being was subsequently chained to a rock with ten chains, and will so continue till the twilight of the gods appears, when he will break his bonds; then will the heavens disappear, the earth be swallowed up by the sea, fire shall consume the elements, and even Odin, with all his kindred deities, shall perish. (See BALDER, KISSING.)

Loki's Three Children were Jörmungandr (a monstrous serpent), Fenrir (a wolf), and Hela (half corpse and half queen). His wife was Siguna.

"Loki is the personification of sin. Fenrir personifies the drawings of a guilty conscience. Both Loki and Fenrir were chained by the Æsir, but not with iron chains. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Lokman. A fabulous personage, the supposed author of a collection of Arabic fables. Like Æsop, he is said to have been a slave, noted for his ugliness.

Lollards. The early German reformers and the followers of Wickliffe were so called. An ingenious derivation is given by Bailey, who suggests the Latin word lotium (darnel), because these reformers were deemed "tares in God's wheat-field."

769

London

Gregory XI., in one of his bulls against Wickliffe, urges the clergy to extirpate this lotium.

"The name of Lollards was first given (in 1290) to a charitable society at Antwerp, who killed the suck by snaking to them."—Dr. Blair: Chronology (under the date 1300).

German lollten, to hum.

Lollipop. To lounge or idle about.

Lollipops. Sweets made of treacle, butter, and flour; any sweets which are sucked. A "lolly" is a small lump.

Lombard (A). A banker or money-lender, so called because the first bankers were from Lombardy, and set up in Lombard Street (London), in the Middle Ages. The business of lending money on pawns was carried on in England by Italian merchants or bankers as early as the reign of Richard I. By the 12 Edward I, a message was confirmed to these traders where Lombard Street now stands; but the trade was first recognised in law by James I. The name Lombard (according to Stow) is a contraction of Longobards. Among the richest of these Longobard merchants was the celebrated Medici family, from whose armorial bearings the insignia of three golden balls has been derived. The Lombard bankers exercised a monopoly in pawnbroking till the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Lombard Fever. Laziness. Pawnbrokers are called Lombard brokers, because they retain the three golden balls of the Lombard money-changers; and lazy folk will pawn anything rather than settle down to steady work.

Lombard Street to a China Orange. Long odds. Lombard Street, London, is the centre of great banking and mercantile transactions. To stake the Bank of England against a common orange is to stake what is of untold value against a mere trifle.

"If in Lombard Street to a China orange, 'quoth Uncle Jack."—Blair: Etonian: The Cautions.

Lombardic. The debased Roman style of architecture adopted in Lombardy after the fall of Rome.

London. says Francis Crossley, is Luan-dun (Celtic), City of the Moon, and tradition says there was once a temple of Diana (the Moon) where St. Paul's now stands. Greenwich he derives from Grian-richt (City of the Sun), also Celtic. It would fill a page to give a list of guesses made at the derivation of the word London. The one given above is but the best for fable and mythology.
(See Augusta, Barton, and Lud's Town.)

London Bridge built on Woolpacks. In the reign of Henry II. the new stone bridge over the Thames was paid for by a tax on wool.

* * * There was a bridge over the Thames in the tenth century. There was a new one of wood in 1014. The stone bridge (1176-1209) was by Peter of Colechurch. New London Bridge, constructed of granite, was begun in 1824, and finished in seven years. It was designed by Sir John Rennie, and cost £1,458,000. In 1894 was opened a new bridge, called the Tower Bridge, to admit of easier traffic.

London Stone. The central millarium (milestone) of Roman London, similar to that in the Forum of Rome. The British high roads radiated from this stone, and it was from this point they were measured. Near London Stone lived Fliz Aleyne, who was the first mayor of London.

London Stone was removed for security into the wall of St. Swithin's church, facing Cannon Street station, and secured from damage by an iron railing.

There are two inscriptions, one in Latin and one in English. The latter runs thus:—

"London stone. Commonly believed to be a Roman work, long placed about xxx feet hence towards the south-west, and afterwards built into the wall of this church, was for more careful protection and transmission to future ages, better secured by the churchwardens in the year of OVR LORD MCCLXIX."

Long Chalk (A) or Long Chalks. He eats me by a long chalk or by long chalks. By a good deal; by many marks. The allusion is to the game of dominoes, where the notation is made by chalk on a table.

Long Dozen (A) is 13. A long hundred is 120.

Large-headed. Clever, sharp-witted. Those who believe in the shape and bumps of the head think that a long head indicates shrewdness.

Long Home. He has gone to his long home. He is dead. The "long home" means the grave. The French equivalent is "Aller dans une maison où l'on demeurera toujours."

Long Lane. (See Lane.)

Long Meg of Westminster. A noted virago in the reign of Henry VIII. Her name has been given to several articles of unusual size. Thus, the large blue-black marble in the south cloister of Westminster Abbey, over the grave of Gervase de Blois, is called "Long Meg of Westminster." Fuller says the term is applied to things "of hop-pole height, wanting breadth proportionable thereunto," and refers to a great gun in the Tower so called, taken to Westminster in troublous times.

The large gun in Edinburgh Castle is called Mons Meg, and the bomb forged for the siege of Oudenarde, now in the city of Ghent, is called Mad Meg.

In the Edinburgh Antiquarian Magazine, September, 1769, we read of "Peter Brunan, aged 104, who was six feet six inches high, and was commonly called Long Meg of Westminster. (See Meg.)"

Long Meg and her daughters. In the neighbourhood of Penrith, Cumberland, is a circle of 67 (Camden says 77) stones, some of them ten feet high, ranged in a circle. Some seventeen paces off, on the south side, is a single stone, fifteen feet high, called Long Meg, the shorter ones being called her daughters. (Greek, megas, great.)

"This, and the Rolbrick stones in Oxfordshire, are supposed to have been erected at the instigation of some Danish kings, like the Kings of Denmark, and the Moravians in Sweden."—Camden: Britannia.

Long Odds. The odds laid on a horse which has apparently no chance of winning the race. Any similar bet.

Long Parliament. The parliament which assembled November 3rd, 1640, and was dissolved by Cromwell on April 20th, 1653; that is, 12½ years.

Long Peter. Peter Aartsen, the Flemish painter; so called on account of his extraordinary height. (1507-1573.)

Long Run. In the long run. Eventually. Here "long run" is not the correlative of a "short run," but the Latin adverb demum, ultimately; in French, "A la longue."

Long-Sword (Longue épée). William, the first Duke of Normandy. (Died 943.)

Long Tail. Cut and long tail. One and another, all of every description. The phrase had its origin in the practice of cutting the tails of certain dogs and horses, and leaving others in their natural state, so that cut and long tail horses or dogs included all the species. Master Slender says he will maintain Anne Long-tailed. How about the long-tailed beggar? A reproof given to one who is drawing the longbow too freely. The tale is that a boy who had been a short voyage pretended on his return to have forgotten everything belonging to his native home, and asked his mother what she called that "long-tailed beggar," meaning the cat.

Long Tom Coffin. A sailor of noble daring, in _The Pilot_, by Cooper.

Long Words. Agathokakological. (Southey: _The Doctor_.) Acomiroziropoulolopiloustatunipignac. The giantess. (Cruvumutaur, iii. 2.) Amoronthologophorus. (See Hair.) (The Three Hairs.) Anantachaturasivrataka. (Sanskrit work.) (See Trübner's _Literary Record_.) An tipericatametanaparagedamphicribirationes Toordicantium. One of the books in the library of St. Victor. (Rabelais: _Pantagruel_, ii. 7.) Batrachomyomachia (battle of the frogs and toads). A Greek mock heroic. Clunisfastiridisarches. (Plantius.) Deanthropomorphisation. Don Juan Nepomuceno de Buriongomatoterecagaseazoche. An employe in the finance department of Madrid (1867). Drintaldvhrichillichattan, in the Isle of Mull, Argyleshire. Honoflabilitudinitatibus, called the longest word in the (?) English language. It frequently occurs in old plays. (See Bailey's _Dictionary_.) The "quadradimensionality" is almost as long.

"They art not so long by the head as longitudinitatibus." —Shakespeare: _Love's Lost Lov_, v. 1.

Lapadotemachoeselachogaleokraniollop- sanodrimupotrimatoepiophioparaomelit- okatakelemencokchleikopsuphonephat- toperisteralektuonoptegkephalokiklop- selioagoosirobaletragenopterugon. It is one of the longest words extant (179 English and 169 Greek letters and consisting of 78 syllables). (Aristophanes: _Ekklesiazouemi_, v. 1169.) Llanfair-ar-yngylgogerychwyrn- drobwilloywysagogogoch. The name of a Welsh village in Anglesey. In the postal directory the first twenty letters only are given as a sufficient address for practical purposes, but the full name contains 59 letters. The meaning is, "The church of St. Mary in a hollow of white hazel, near to the rapid whirlpool, and to St. Tisilio church, near to a red cave."

"What, Mr. Manhound, was it not enough thus to have more ornate bezantee ererstelseeliglu com- sproundilled us all in our upper members with your sox tozzets, but you have also suf- ficed our morezumpliplateatodichamburduc- quelurinturnplements on our shrin-bones with the hard tips of your crow-billed storys?" —Rabelais, illustrated by Gustave Doré, p. 438.

They morramborizeverzengirizeque- quamorgaschakuveezevaffretting my poor eye. (Rabelais: _Pantagruel_, iv. 15.)

Nitrophenylediamine. A dye of an intense red colour.

"Dinitroamino, chloroxyrantharic acid, which may be used for colouring wool in intense red; and nitrophenylediamine of chromic brilliancy." —William Crookes: _The Times_, October 5th, 1888.

Polyphrasticontominomigegalonulaton. "Why not wind up the famous ministerial declaration with 'Kronim Ompax' or the mystic 'Ohm,' or that difficult expression 'Polyphrasticontominomigegalonulaton?' —The Star.

M. N. Rostocostojambadesse, author of _After Brief, Mustard_. (Rabelais: _Pantagruel_, iii. 7.)

Sankashathurthihratodyapanna. (Sanskrit work.) (See Trübner's _Literary Record_.) Forster gives one of 152 syllables.

Tetramethylidiamidobenzhydrols. "The general depth of modern researches in structural chemistry must be explained, even to those who are not interested in the mystery of trying inilmions, the tetramethylidiamidobenzhydrol, and other similarly intricate terms used by chemists." —Nineteenth Century (Aug., 1853, p. 294).

"Miss Burney has found the highest compound in the English tongue; the scalding hot moment—thrown from utterance—illness—of premonitoriously-expected death of Mr. Burney's wife." —De Vere.

"Zücher als zur Verbruchschluchthaltungs- verwandlung. (Inhude.)"

"Contribulactur Constantianum-juari. Lunnemersalibus solstitialibus.

"Infundamentum minuladivision Superinduces denationalisation."

Longboat. Formerly the largest boat belonging to a ship, built so as to carry a great weight. A long-boat is often from 30 to 40 feet long, having a beam from 29 to 25 of its length. It has a heavy flat floor, and is carvel built.
Longbow. To draw the longbow. To exaggerate. The force of an arrow in the longbow depends on the strength of the arm that draws it, so the force of a statement depends on the force of the speaker’s imagination. The longbow was the favourite weapon of the English from the reign of Edward II. till it was superseded by fire-arms. The “longbow” was the hand-bow, as distinguished from the crossbow or bow fitted on a stock.

Longchamps. On Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of Passion Week, the Parisians go in procession to Longchamps, near the Bois de Boulogne. This procession is made by private carriages and hired cabs, and is formed by all the smartly-dressed men and women who wish to display the spring fashions. The origin of the custom is this: There was once a famous nunnery at Longchamps, noted for its singing. In Passion Week all who could went to hear these religious women sing the Ténèbres; the custom grew into a fashion, and though the house no longer exists, the procession is as fashionable as ever.

Longcrown. A deep fellow, long-headed.

That caps Longcrown, and he capped the devil. That is a greater falsehood than the “father of lies” would tell.

Longevity. The oldest man of modern times was Thomas Carn, if we may rely on the parish register of St. Leonard’s, Shoreditch, where it is recorded that he died in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, aged 207. He was born in 1381, in the reign of Richard II., lived in the reigns of ten sovereigns, and died in 1588. Old Jenkins was only 160 when he died, and remembered going (when he was a boy of twelve) with a load of arrows, to be used in the battle of Flodden Field. Parr died at the age of 192. William Wakley (according to the register of St. Andrew’s church, Shifnal, Salop) was at least 124 when he died. He was baptised at Tidal 1590, and buried at Astlebury, November 28, 1714, and lived in the reigns of eight sovereigns. Mary Yates, of Lizard Common, Shifnal, married her third husband at the age of 92, and died in 1776, at the age of 127.

Longinus. The Roman soldier who smote our Lord with his spear. In the romance of King Arthur, this spear was brought by Joseph of Arimathea to Listenise, when he visited King Pellam, “who was nigh of Joseph’s kin.” Sir Balim the Savage, being in want of a weapon, seized this spear, with which he wounded King Pellam. “Three whole countries were destroyed,” by that one stroke, and Sir Balim saw “the people thereof lying dead on all sides.” (History of Prince Arthur, vol. i. chap. 41.) Generally called Longinus.

Longo Intervallus. Proximus sed longo intervallo. Next (it is true), but at what a vast distance! Generally quoted “Longo intervallo.”

Looby. A simpleton. (Welsh, Iob, a dolt.)

“The spendthrift and the plodding looby, The nce Sir Courtly, and the booby.”

_Hudibras: Rovinibus_ (1707).

Look Alive. Be more active and energetic; look sharp.

Look Black (To) and Black Looks. (See Black . . . )

Look Blue (To). To show signs of disappointment, disgust, or displeasure.

“Squire Brown looked rather blue at having to pay £5 6s. for the post next expenses from Oxford.”

_Hughes: Tom Brown at Oxford._

Look Daggers (To). To look very angry, as if to annihilate you. Clytus says to Alexander, “You cannot look me dead.”

“You may look daggers, but use none.”

Look as Big as Bull Beef (7b). To look stout and hearty, as if fed on bull beef. Bull beef was formerly recommended for making men strong and muscular.

Look before You Leap. Consider well before you act. “Melius est carère semper, quam pecivi semel.”

“And look before you see you leap. For, as you know, you’d like to reap.”

_Butler: Hudibras, canto ii. part ii. 96._

Look for a Needle in a Bottle of Hay (To). (See Bottle.)

Look not a Gift Horse in the Mouth. “Noli dnetes egn inspierre donati.” Do not examine a gift too critically.

Look One Way and How Another (To). “Olera spectant, tardum tollunt.” To aim apparently at one thing, but really to be seeking something quite different.

Look through Blue Glasses or Coloured Spectacles. To regard actions in a wrong light; to view things distorted by prejudice.

Lookers-on. The man on the dyke always hurts well. The man standing Looking Back. Unlucky. This arose from Lot's wife, who looked back towards Sodom and was turned to a pillar of salt (Genesis xix. 26).

Looking-glass. It is unlucky to break a looking-glass. The nature of the ill-luck varies; thus, if a maiden, she will never marry; if a married woman, it betokens a death, etc. This superstition arose from the use made of mirrors in former times by magicians. If in their operations the mirror used was broken, the magician was obliged to give over his operation, and the unlucky inquirer could receive no answer.

Looking-glass of Lao reflected the mind as well as the outward form. (Citizen of the World, xiv.)

Loom means a utensil. (Anglo-Saxon, lom.) Thus "heir-loom" means a personal chattel or household implement which goes by special custom to the heir. The word was in familiar use in Prior's time (1664-1721), for he says "a thousand maidens ply the purple loom."

Loony or Luny. A simpleton; a natural. Corruption of lunatic.

Loophole. A way of escape, an evasion; a corruption of "louvre holes." (See LOUVRE.)

Loose. Having a tile loose. Not quite of sound mind. The head being the roof of the temple called the body.

Omit on the loose. Out on the spree; out of moral bounds.

Loose-coat Field. The battle of Stamford in 1470. So called because the men under Lord Wells, being attacked by the Yorkists, throw off their coats that they might flee the faster.

"Cast off their country's coats to haste their speed away..." Which "Loose-coat Field" is called c'mon to this day." - Drayton: Poliphili, xxi.

Loose Fish (A). A dissipated man. We also speak of a "queer fish," and the word "fishy" means of very doubtful character. A loose fish is one that has made its way out of the net; and applied to man it means one who has thrown off moral restraint.

Loose-girl Boy (The). Julius Caesar was so nicknamed.

Loose-striped. Botanically called Lysimachia, a Greek compound meaning the same thing. The author of Flora Domestica tells us that the Romans put these flowers under the yokes of oxen to keep them from quarrelling with each other; for (says he) the plant keeps off flies and gnats and thus relieves horses and oxen from a great source of irritation. Similarly in Collins' Faithful Shepherdes, we read—

"Yellow Lysimachia, to give sweet rest,
To the fat sheep, killing, where it comes,
All busy gnats, and every fly that hums."

(Pliny refers the name to one of Alexander's generals, said to have discovered its virtues.)

Lorbrulgrund. The capital of Roldingmag. The word is humorously said to mean "Pride of the Universe." (Swift: Gulliver's Travels.)

Lord. A nobleman.

The word lord is a contraction of hlaftord (Saxon for "loaf-author" or "bread-earner"). Retainers were called hlaftetor, or "bread-enters." Verstegan suggests hlaftord, "bread-givers." (See LADY.)

We have in Anglo-Saxon hlaftord, hlaftord-gift (lordship), hlaftordless (lordless), hlaftorddom (dominion), and many more similar compounds.

" Lord, a hunchback (Greeck, lord-as, crooked). Generally "My lord."

Lord. Drunk as a lord. (See DRUNK.)

Lord Burleigh. As significant as the shake of Lord Burleigh's head. In The Critic, by Sheridan, is introduced a tragedy called the Spanish Armada. Lord Burleigh is supposed to be too full of State affairs to utter a word; he shakes his head, and Puff explains what the shake means.

Lord Fanny. A nickname given to Lord Hervey for his effeminate and foppish manners. He painted his face, and was as pretty in his ways as a boarding-school miss. (In the reign of George II.)

Lord Foppington. A coxcomb who considers dress and fashion the end and aim of nobility. (Vanbrugh: The Relapse.)

Lord, Lady. When our Lord falls in our Lady's lap. That is, when Good Friday falls on the same date as Lady Day. (March 25th.)

Lord Lovel. The bridegroom who lost his bride on the wedding-day. She was playing at hide-and-seek, and selected an old oak chest for her hiding-place. The chest closed with a spring lock, and many years after her skeleton... told the sad story of The Mistletoe Bough. Samuel Rogers introduces this story in his Italy (part i. 18). He says the bride was Ginevra, only child of Orsini, "an indulgent father." The bridegroom was Francesco Doria, "her playmate from her birth, and her first love." The chest in which she was buried alive in her bridal dress was an heirloom, "richly carved by Antony of Trent, with Scripture stories from the life of Christ." It came from Venice, and had "held the ducal robes of some old ancestor." Francesco, weary of his life, flew to Venice and "flung his life away in battle with the Turk." Orsini went mad, and spent the live-long day "wandering in quest of something, something he could not find." Fifty years afterwards the chest was removed by strangers and the skeleton discovered.

Lord Mayor's Day, November 9th. So called because the Lord Mayor of London enters into office on that day, and inaugurates his official dignity with a street procession, followed by a grand banquet at the Mansion House.

Lord Peter. The Pope is so called in The History of John Bull, by Dr. Arbuthnot.

Lord Stratte. Charles II. of Spain is so called in The History of John Bull, by Arbuthnot.

Lord Thomas and the Fair Annet or Elinor, had a lover's quarrel, when Lord Thomas resolved to forsake Annet for a nut-brown maid who had houses and lands. On the wedding-day Annet, in bridal bravery, went to the church, when Lord Thomas repented of his folly, and gave Annet a rose. Whereupon the nut-brown maid killed her with a "long bodkin from out her gay head-gear." Lord Thomas, seeing Annet fall dead, plunged his dagger into the heart of the murdereress, and then stabbed himself. Over the graves of Lord Thomas and fair Annet grew a "bountiful briar, and by this ye may ken right well that they were lovers dear." In some ballads the fair Annet is called the fair Elinor. (Perrv: Reciters, etc., series iiii. bk. 3.)

Lord of Creation. Man.

"Replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth... Behold, I have given you every green herb for meat... and every tree..." Gen. i. 28, 29.

Lord of Marnsea, called in Scotland Abbot of Unreason, prohibited in 1551. Stow says, "At the feast of Christmas, in the king's court, there was always appointed, on All-Hallow's eve, a master of mirth and fun," who remained in office till the Feast of Purification. A similar "lord" was appointed by the lord mayor of London, the sheriffs, and the chief nobility. Stubbs tells us that these mock dignitaries had from twenty to sixty officers under them, and were furnished with hobby-horses, dragons, and musicians. They first went to church with such a confused noise that no one could hear his own voice.

Lord of the Isles. Donald of Islay, who in 1346 reduced the Hebrides under his sway. The title had been borne by others for centuries before, and was also borne by his successors. One of Sir Walter Scott's metrical romances is so called. This title is now borne by the Prince of Wales.

Loredano (James). A Venetian patrician, and one of the "Council of Ten." (Byron: The Two Foscari.)

Lorenzo (in Edward Young's Night's Thoughts). An atheist, whose remorse ends in despair.

Lorenzo. The son of the fair Jessica, daughter of Shylock the Jew. (Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice.)

Loretto. The house of Loretto. The Santa Casa, the reputed house of the Virgin Mary at Nazareth. It was "miraculously" translated to Fiume in Dalmatia in 1291, thence to Recanati in 1294, and finally to Macerata in Italy, to a plot of land belonging to the Lady Loretto.

"Our house may have travelled through the air, like the house of Loretto, for which I care." Goldsmith: The Good-natured Man, 18.7.

* There are other Loteros: for instance, the Loretto of Austria, Mariazel (Mary in the Hill), in Styria. So called from the miracle-working image of the Virgin. The image, made of ebony, is old and very ugly. Two pilgrimages every year are made to it.

The Loretto of Bavaria (Altötting) near the river Inn, where there is a shrine of the Black Virgin.

The Loretto of Switzerland. Einsiedeln, a village containing a shrine of the "Black Lady of Switzerland." The church is of black marble and the image of ebony.

Lorrean (Harry). The hero of a novel so called, by Charles Lever.

Lose. "'Tis not I lose the Athenians, but the Athenians who lose me,' said Anaxagoras, when he was driven out of Athens.

Lose Caste (To). (See CASTE.)

Lose Heart (To). To be discouraged or despondent. Heart = courage.

Lose not a Tide. Waste no time; set off at once on the business.

Lose the Day (To). To lose the battle; to be defeated. To win (or gain) the day is to be victorious; to win the battle, the prize, or any competition.

Lose the Horse or win the Saddle. Everything or nothing. "Aut Cesar, aut nullus." A man made the bet of a horse that another could not say the Lord’s Prayer without a wandering thought. The bet was accepted, but before half-way through the person who accepted the bet looked up and said, "By-the-bye, do you mean the saddle also?"

Losing a Ship for a Ha’porth o’ Tar. Suffering a great loss out of stinginess. By mean savings, or from want of some necessary outlay, to lose the entire article. For example, to save the expense of a nail and lose the horse-shoe as the first result, then to lose the horse, and finally perhaps kill it.

Loss. To be at a loss. To be unable to decide. To be puzzled or embarrassed. As: "I am at a loss for the proper word." "Je m’y perde" or "Je suis bien embarrassé de dire."

Lost Island. Cephalonia, so called because it was only by chance that even those who had visited it could find it again. It is sometimes called "The Hidden Island."

Lothair. A novel by Benjamin Disraeli (Lord Beaconsfield). The characters are supposed to represent the following persons:—

The Oxford Professor, Goldwin Smith.
Grandison, Cardinal Manning and Wiseman.

Lothair, Marquis of Bute.

Catesby, Monseigneur Capel.
The Duke and Duchess, the Duke and Duchess of Abercorn.
The Bishop, Bishop Wilberforce.
Corisande, one of the Ladies Hamilton.

Lothario. A gay Lothario. A gay libertine, a seducer of female modesty, a debauchee. The character is from The Fair Penitent, by Rowe, and Rowe's tragedy is from Massinger's Fatal Error.

Lothian (Scotland). So named from Llew, the second son of Arthur, also called Lothus. He was the father of Modred, leader of the rebellious army that fought at Camlan, A.D. 537.

Arthur's eldest son was Urien, and his youngest was Arawn.

Lotus. The Egyptians pictured God sitting on a lotus-tree, above the watery mud. Jamblichus says the leaves and fruit of the lotus-tree being round represent "the motion of intellect;" its lowering up through mud symbolises the eminency of divine intellect over matter; and the Deity sitting on the lotus-tree implies His intellectual sovereignty. (Mysta, Egypt., sec. 7, cap. ii. p. 131.)

Lotus. Mahomet says that a lotus-tree stands in the seventh heaven, on the right hand of the throne of God.

Dryops of Echelia was one day carrying her infant son, when she plucked a lotus flower for his amusement, and was instantaneously transformed into a lotus.

Lotis, daughter of Neptune, fleeing from Priapus, was metamorphosed into a lotus.

Lotus-eaters or Lotophagi, in Homeric legend, are a people who ate of the lotus-tree, the effect of which was to make them forget their friends and homes, and to lose all desire of returning to their native land, their only wish being to live in idleness in Lotus-land. (Odyssey, xi.)

A Lotus-eater. One living in ease and luxury. Lord Tennyson has a poem called The Lotus Eaters.

* The drink is made from the Zygaphus Lotus, which grows in Jaffa, an island near Tunis.

Loud Patterns. Flashy, showy ones. The analogy between sound and colour is very striking.

Loud as Tom of Lincoln. The great church bell.

Louis (St.) is usually represented as holding the Saviour's crown of thorns and the cross; sometimes, however, he is represented with a pilgrim’s staff, and sometimes with the standard of the cross, the allusion in all cases being to his crusades.

Louis Dux-hult was nicknamed Des Huillets, because he was a great gourmet, and especially fond of oysters.

Loup. "Le loup sait bien ce que m'a dit le coq de mauvaise voix" [male = méchant]. "Un fripon reconnaît un fripon au premier coup d'œil." We judge others by ourselves. "Chacun meurt tout à son aise." We measure others in our own bushel. The wolf believes that every beast entertains the same wolfish thoughts and desires as it does itself. Plauto expresses the same idea thus: "Insane me atrim ultro cum ipi in-samvnt," and Cicero says, "Malum conscientia suspicionum factit."

Louvre [Paris]. A corruption of Lupiter, as it is called in old title-deeds. Dagobert is said to have built here a hunting-seat, the nucleus of the present magnificent pile of buildings. "He'll make your Paris Louvre shake for it."—Shakespeare, Henry V, ii. 4.

Louvre. The tower or turret of a building like a belfry, originally designed for a sort of chimney to let out the smoke. (French, Pouvert, the opening.) Louvre boards in churches. Before chimneys were used, holes were left in the roof, called loovers or lower lais. From the French Pouvert (the open boards).

Louvre of St. Petersburg (The). The Hermitage, an imperial museum.

Love (God of). (Anglo-Saxon Inf.)
Camade, in Hindu mythology.
Cupid, in Roman mythology.
Eros, in Greek mythology.
Freya, in Celtic mythology.
Kama or Cama, in Indian mythology.
(See BOWEE, etc., etc.)

† The family of love. Certain fanatics in the sixteenth century, holding tenets not unlike those of the Anabaptists.

There is no love lost. Because the persons referred to have no love for each other. What does not exist cannot be lost.

Love-Jock. A small curl gummed to the temples, sometimes called a bow or bow catcher. When men indulge in a curl in front of their ears, the love-lock is called a bell-rope—i.e., a rope to pull the belles after them. At the latter end of the sixteenth century the love-lock was a long lock of hair hanging in front of the shoulders, curled and decorated with bows and ribbons.

Love-powders or Potions were drugs to excite lust. Once these love-charms were generally believed in; thus Brabantio accuses Othello of having bewitched Desdemona with "drugs to waken motion;" and Lady Grey was accused of having bewitched Edward IV. "by strange potions and amorous charms."—Fabian, p. 495.

Love and Lordship. Love and lordship never like fellowship, French, "Amur et seigneurie ne veulent point de compaillons"; German, "Liebe und herrschaft leiden keine quellenshaft:" Italian, "Amor e dignoria non vogliono compagnia. (Neither lovers nor princes can brook a rival.)

Love in a Cottage. A marriage for love without sufficient means to maintain one's social status. However, "When poverty comes in at the door, love flies out of the window."

Love-in-Idleness. One of the numerous names of the pansy or heartsease. Originally white, but changed to a purple colour by the fall of Cupid's bow upon it.

Yet marked I where the bolt of Cupid fell. It fell upon a little Western flower. Before, white-white, now purple with love's wound:
The maidens call it Love-in-Idleness. —Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 2.

Love me, Love my Dog. St. Bernad quotes this proverb in Latin, "Quo me amat, amat et canem meum;" French, "Qui aime Bertrand, aime son chien;" Spanish, "Quien bien quiere a unival, bien quiere a un can." (If you love anyone, you will like all that belongs to him.)

Love's Girdle. (See CESTUS.)

Love's Labour's Lost (Shakespeare). Ferdinand, King of Navarre, with the three lords, Biron, Longaville, and Dumain, make a vow to spend three years in study, during which time they bind themselves to look upon no woman. Scares is the vow made when the Princess of France, with Rosaline, Maria, and Catherine are announced, bringing a petition from the King of France. The four gentlemen fall in love with the four ladies, and send them verses; they also visit them masked as Muscovites. The ladies treat the whole matter as a jest, and when the gentlemen declare their intentions to be honourable impose upon them a delay of twelve months, to be spent in works of charity. If at the expiration of that time they still wish to marry, the ladies promise to lend a favourable ear to their respective suits.

Lovell, the Dog. (See Rat, Cat, etc.)

Lovelace. The principal male character of Richardson's novel Clarissa.
Lover's Leap

Harlows. He is a selfish voluptuary, a man of fashion, whose sole ambition is to ensure female modesty and virtue. Crabbe calls him "rich, proud, and crafty; handsome, brave, and gay."

Lover's Leap. The promontory from which Sappho threw herself into the sea; now called Santa Mauria. (See Leucadia.)

Loving or Grace Cup. A large cup passed round from guest to guest at state banquets and city feasts. Miss Strickland says that Margaret Atheling, wife of Malcolm Canmore, in order to induce the Scotch to remain for grace, devised the grace cup, which was filled with the choicest wine, and of which each guest was allowed to drink ad libitum after grace had been said. (Historic Sketches.)

Loving Cup. On the introduction of Christianity, the custom of wassailing was not abolished, but it assumed a religious aspect. The monks called the wassail bowl the possum cantab'tis (loving cup), a term still retained in the London companies, but in the universities the term Grace Cup is more general. Immediately after grace the silver cup, filled with sack (spiced wine) is passed round. The master and wardens drink welcome to their guests; the cup is then passed round to all the guests. (See Grace Cup.)

A loving or grace cup should always have two handles, and some have as many as four.

Loving Cup. This ceremony, of drinking from one cup and passing it round, was observed in the Jewish paschal supper, and our Lord refers to the custom in the words, "Drink ye all of it."

"He [the master of the house] laid hold of the vessel with both hands, lifted it up, and said—'Blessed be Thou, O Lord our God, Thine King of the world, who hast given us the fruit of the vine;' and the whole assembly said 'Amen.' Then drinking first himself from the cup, he passed it round to the rest."—Kidder the Pilgrim, chap. ix.

Low-bell. Night-fowling, in which birds are first roused from their slumber by the tinkling of a bell, and then dazzled by a light so as to be easily caught. (Low, Scotch, lover, a flame, as a lowe of fyre; and bell.)

"The sound of the low-bell makes the birds lie close, so that they dare not stir whilst you are pitching the net, for the sound thereof is dreadful to them; but the sight of the fire, much more terrible, makes them fly up, so that they become instantly entangled in the net."—Gent. Recreation.

Low Church. The Times defines a Low Churchman as one "who loves a Jew and hates the Pope." We now call a Calvinistic episcopal one of the Low Church because he holds "church rituals" and the dogma of "apostolic succession" in lower esteem than personal grace and faith in the "blood of the atonement."

Low Comedian (The), in theatrical parliance, is the farceur, but must not poach on the preserves of the "light comedian." Paul Pry is a part for a "low comedian," Box and Cox are parts for a "light comedian."

Low Mass is a mass without singing. It is called low "quia submissa voces celebratur," "Missa alta" is performed musically, and alta voce, in a loud voice.

Low Sunday. The Sunday next after Easter; so called because it is at the bottom of the Easter which it closes.

Low to High. From low St. James's up to high St. Paul's (Pope: Satyres). In the Bangorian controversy, Bishop Hoadly, a great favourite at St. James's, was Low Church, but Dr. Hare, Dean of St. Paul's, was High Church.

Lower City (The). Acre, north of Zion, was so called.

Lower Empire. The Roman or Western, from removal of the seat of empire to Constantinople to the extinction of that empire by the Turks in 1453.

Lower your Sail. In French, "Celer la course," means to salute; to confess yourself submissive or conquered; to humble oneself.

Lowlanders of Attica were the gentry, so called because they lived on the plains. (Istices.)

Lowndean Professor (Cambridge University). A professor of astronomy (and geometry); the chair founded by Thomas Lowndes, Esq., in 1749.

Loy. A long, narrow spade used in cultivating stony lands.

Loyal. Only one regiment of all the British army is so called, and that is the "Loyal North Lancashire," in two battalions, No. 47 and No. 81. It was so called in 1793, and probably had some allusion to the French revolutionists.

Loys [lois]. So Louis was written in French till the time of Louis XIII.

Luath (2 syl.). Cuthullin's dog in Ossian's Fingal; also the name of the poor man's dog representing the peasantry in The Two Dogs, by Robert Bum. The gentleman's dog is called Caesar. Also Fingal's dog. (See Doc.)

Lubber (A). A dole. Seamen call an awkward sailor a land-lubber. A variant of "looby" (Welsh, lōb, with a diminutive, "somewhat of a dunce or dole.")

Lubber's Hole. A lazy cowardly way of doing what is appointed, or of evading duty. A seaman's expression. Sailors call the vacant space between the head of a lower-mast and the edge of the top, the lubber's hole, because timid boys get through this space to the top, to avoid the danger and difficulties of the "futtock shrouds."

Lubberkin or Lubrican. (Irish, Lòibhreachn or Lepreachaun.) A fairy resembling an old man, by profession a maker of brogues, who resorts to out-of-the-way places, where he is discovered by the noise of his hammer. He is rich, and while anyone keeps his eye fixed upon him cannot escape, but the moment the eye is withdrawn he vanishes.

Lubins. A species of goblins in Normandy that take the form of wolves, and frequent churchyards. They are very timorous, and take flight at the slightest noise.

"Il a peur de lubins" (Afraid of ghosts). Said of a chicken-hearted person.

Lucasian Professor. A professor of mathematics in the University of Cambridge. This professorship was founded in 1663 by Henry Lucas, Esq. M.P. for the University.

Lucasta, to whom Richard Lovelace sang, was Lucy Sacheverell, called by him lux casta, i.e., Chaste Lucy.

Lucas. Fleur de Luc. A corruption of fleur-de-lis (q.v.), more anciently written "flore delices," a corruption of floreilla, the white iris. The French messenger says to the Regent Bedford: "Cross that the flower de lucas in your arms; of England's heart one-half is cut away."

Shakespeare: Henry VI., i. 1. 1.

referring of course to the loss of France.

"The luce or lucy is a full-grown pike. Thus Justice Shallow says—"The luce is the fresh fish, the salt fish is an old cost"—i.e., Lucy is a new name, the old one was Charlecote. (Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 1.) (See FLEURS-DE-LYS.)

Lucas the full-grown pike, is the Latin luc-as, from the Greek lukos (a wolf), meaning the wolf of fishes.

Lucia di Lammermoor. Called Lucy Ashton by Sir Walter Scott, was the sister of Lord Henry Ashton of Lammermoor, who, to retrieve the fallen fortunes of the family, arranges a marriage between his sister and Lord Arthur Bucclaw (or Frank Hayston, lord of Bucclaw). Unknown to Henry Ashton, Edgardo (or Edgar), master of Ravenswood, whose family has long been in a state of hostility with the Lammermoors, is in love with Lucy, and his attachment is reciprocated. While Edgar is absent in France on an embassy, Lucy is made to believe, by feigned letters, that Edgar is unfaithful to her, and in her frenzy of indignation consents to marry the Laird of Bucclaw; but on the wedding night she stabs her husband, goes mad, and dies. (Donizetti: Lucia di Lammermoor, an opera; and Sir Walter Scott: Bride of Lammermoor.)

Luc'cian. The impersonation of the follies and vices of the age, metamorphosed into an ass. The chief character in the Golden Ass of Apuleius.

Lucifer. The morning star. Venus is both an evening and a morning star: When she follows the sun, and is an evening star, she is called Hevperus; when she precedes the sun, and appears before sunrise, she is called Lucifer (the light-bringer).

"Proud as Lucifer. Very haughty and overbearing. Lucifer is the name given by Isaiah to Nebuchadnezzar, the proud but ruined king of Babylon: "Take up this proverb against the King of Babylon, and say, . . . How art thou fallen, from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" (Isa. xiv. 4, 12). The poets feign that Satan, before he was driven out of heaven for his pride, was called Lucifer. Milton, in his Paradise Lost, gives this name to the demon of "Sinful Pride."

Lucifiers (1833). An improvement on the Congreves and Prometheus. Phosphorus was introduced into the paste; but phosphorus made the matches so sensitive that the whole box often ignited, children were killed by sucking the matches, and at Boulogne two soldiers and a woman were poisoned by drinking coffee in which a child had put a "Lucifer." The manufacture of these matches was also very deleterious, producing "jaw disease." (See PROMETHEANS, SAFETY MACHINES.)

Lucifers (Pride) lived in a splendid palace, only its foundation was of sand. The door stood always open, and the queen gave welcome to every comer. Her six privy ministers are Idleness, Gluttony, Lechery, Avarice, Envy, and Revenge. These six, with Pride herself, are the seven deadly sins. Her carriage was drawn by six different animals—viz., an ass, swine, goat, camel, wolf, and lion, on each of which rode one of her privy councillors, Satan himself being coachman. While here the Red-Cross Knight was attacked by Sansjoy, who would have been slain if Duessa had not rescued him. (Spruner: Fairy Queen, bk. i. 4.)

Luciferians. A sect of the fourth century, who refused to hold any communion with the Arians, who had renounced their "errors" and been re-admitted into the Church. So called from Lucifer, Bishop of Cagliari, in Sardinia, their leader.

Lucinian. The young prince, son of Dolopatos, the Sicilian monarch, entrusted to the care of Virgil, the philosopher. (See Seven Wise Masters, and Dolopatos.)

Lucius. (See Pudens.)

Lucil. Accidental good fortune. (Dutch, luk; German, glück, verb gliechen, to succeed, to prosper.)

Dom in one's luck. Short of cash and credit. "Not in luck's way," not unexpectedly pampered, enriched, or otherwise benefited.

Give a man luck and throw him into the sea. Meaning that his luck will save him even in the greatest extremity. Referring to Jonah and Arifon, who were cast into the sea, but carried safely to land, the one by a whale and the other by a dolphin.

Lucy for Fools. This is a French proverb: "A few fortune." And again, "Fortune est nourrice de folie."

Lucy in Odd Numbers. (See Ord.)

Lucy of Eden Hall (The). A drinking cup, said to have been given to Miss Zoe Mungrave on her marriage with Mr. Farquharson, and still in Eden Hall, Cumberland. The tale is, that it was snatched surreptitiously from the fairies, who attached this threat to it:

"If that cup either break or fall, Farewell the luck of Eden Hall."

(See Eden Hall.)

Lucy or Lucky Penny. A trifle returned to a purchaser for good luck. A penny with a hole in it, supposed to ensure good luck.

Lucky. To cut one's lucky. To decamp or make off quickly: I must cut my stick. As "luck" means chance, the phrase may signify, "I must give up my chance and be off." (See Cut . . .)

Lucky Stone (4). A stone with a hole through it. (See Lucky Penny.)

Lucrezia di Borghia, daughter of Pope Alexander VI., was thrice married, her last husband being Alfonso, Duke of Ferrara. Before her marriage with the duke she had a natural son named Gennaro, who was sent to be brought up by a Neapolitan fisherman. When arrived at man's estate he received a letter informing him that he was nobly born, and offering him a commission in the army. In the battle of Rimini he saved the life of Orsini, and they became sworn friends. In Venice he is introduced to the young nobles, who tell him of the ill deeds of Lucrezia Borgia. Each of them has had some relative put to death by her agency. Gennaro, in his indignation, mutilates the duke's escutcheon with his dagger, knocking off the "B" of his name, and changing Borgia into Orgia (orgies). Lucrezia, not knowing who has offered the insult, requests the duke that the perpetrator may be put to death, but when she discovers it to be her own son gives him an antidote to neutralise the poison he has drunk, and releases him from his confinement. Scarcely is he liberated when he and his companions are invited by the Princess Negroni to a banquet, where they are all poisoned. Lucrezia tells Gennaro he is her son, and dies herself as soon as her son expires. (Donizetti's opera.)

Lucullus sups with Lucullus. Said of a glutton who gormandises alone. Lucullus was a rich Roman soldier, noted for his magnificence and self-indulgence. Sometimes above £1,700 was expended on a single meal, and Horace tells us he had 5,000 rich purple robes in his house. On one occasion a very superb supper was prepared, and when asked who were to be his guests the "rich fool" replied, "Lucullus will sup to-night with Lucullus." (B.C. 110-57.)

Lucus a non Lucendo. An etymological contradiction. The Latin word lucus means a "dark grove," but is said to be derived from the verb lucere, to shine. Similarly our word black (the Anglo-Saxon bleær) is derived from the verb bleosan, to bleach or whiten.
Lucy

Beldam. An ugly hag. From the French belle dame.

Bellum [scar] quia min’ time bellum. (Punican.) Bellum, a beautiful thing.

Calid (hot) radically the same as the Saxon said, German Kalt (cold).

Cleave, to part, also signifies to stick together. (Saxon, ciffin, to adhere.)

Curtana (the instrument that shortens by cutting off the head; French court, Italian corto) is the blunt sword, emblematical of mercy, borne before our sovereigns at their coronation.

Devoted (attached to) is the Latin devotus (cursed).

Eumenides (the well-disposed); the Furies.

Eunyma (good name); is poisonous.

Himæa, a sword, a bully. (Gr. irëne, peace.)

Kalo-Iohannes, son of Alexius Comnæns. Called Kalos (handsome) because he was exceedingly ugly and undersized. He was, however, an active and heroic prince, and his son Manual (contemporary with Richard Cur é de Lion) was even more heroic still.

Lambs were rufians formerly employed at elections to use “physical force” to deter electors from voting for the opposition.

Laecosphere, the inner and brighter portion of the sun's corona. It is neither white nor spherical.

Lily-white, a chimney-sweep.

Religion, bond-service (re-lign), is the service of which Christ has made us free.

Speaker of House of Commons. The only member that never makes speeches.

Solomon, George III., so called by Dr. Wolcott, because he was no Solomon.

In their marriage service the Jews break a wine-glass; the symbol being “as this glass can never be rejoined, so may our union be never broken.” (See Miserere.)

Lucy (St.). Patron saint for those afflicted in the eyes. It is said that a nobleman wanted to marry her for the beauty of her eyes; so she tore them out and gave them to him saying, “Now let me live to God.” The story says that her eyesight was restored; but the rejected lover accused her of “faith in Christ,” and she was martyred by a sword thrust into her neck. St. Lucy is represented in art carrying a palm branch, and bearing a platter with two eyes on it.

Lucy and Colin. A ballad by Thomas Tickell, translated into Latin by Vincent Bourne. Colin forsook Lucy of Leinster for a bride “thrice as rich.” Lucy felt that she was dying, and made request that she might be taken to the church at the time of Colin’s wedding. Her request was granted, and when Colin saw Lucy’s corpse, “the damps of death bedewed his brow, and he died.” Both were buried in one tomb, and to their grave many a constant hind and plighted maid resort to “deck it with garlands and true-love knots.”

Lucid. A mythical king of Britain.

General Lucid. (See Luddites.)

Lud’s Bulwark. Ludgate prison. (See above.)

Lud’s Town. London; so called from Lud, a mythical king of Britain. Ludgate is, by a similar tradition, said to be the gate where Lud was buried. (See London.)

“...and on the gates of Lud’s town set your heads.” Shakespeare: Cymbeline, iv. 2.

Ludgate. Stow says, “King Lud, repairing the city, called it after his name Lud’s town; the strong gate which he built in the west part he likewise named Lud-gate. In the year 1200 the gate was beautified with images of Lud and other kings. Those images, in the reign of Edward VI., had their heads smitten off, ... Queen Mary did set new heads upon their old bodies again. The twenty-eighth of Queen Elizabeth the gate was newly and beautified built, with images of Lud and others, as before.” (Survey of London.) The more probable etymon of Lud-gate is the Anglo-Saxon Irodre (people), similar to the porta del popoli of Rome.

[Lucid built that gate of which his name is blotted.

By which he lies entombed solemnly.”

Spenser: Faerie Queene, v. x. 46]

 Ludgate was originally built by the barons, who entered London, destroyed the Jews' houses, and erected this gate with their ruins. It was used as a free prison in 1253, but soon lost that prerogative. A most romantic story is told of Sir Stephen Forster, who was lord mayor in 1654. He had been a prisoner at Ludgate, and begged at the gate, where he was seen by a rich widow, who kept his liberty, took him into her service, and afterwards married him. To commemorate this strange eventful history, Sir Stephen enlarged the prison accommodation, and added a chapel. The old gate was taken down and rebuilt in 1546. The new-built gate was destroyed in the Great Fire of London, and the next gate (used also as a prison for debtors) was pulled down in 1560, the prisoners having been removed to the London Workhouse, and afterwards to the Billingsgate Street Compter.

Luddites (2 syl.) Riotous workmen who went about the manufacturing districts breaking machines, under the notion that machinery threw men out of employ. Miss Martineau says that the term arose from Ned Lud, of Leicestershire, an imbecile who was much hounded by boys. One day he chased a set of tormentors into a house, and broke two stocking-frames, whence the leader of these rioters was called General Lud, his chief abettors Lud's wives, and his followers Ludlutes. (1811-1816.)

Ludum. (See Lazy.)

Luce. (See Luiz.)

Luff. The weather-gauge. The part of a vessel towards the wind. A sailing close to the wind. (Dutch, leef, a weather-gauge.)

To luff is to turn the head of a ship towards the wind.

Luff"—i.e. Put the tiller on the lee-side. This is done to make the ship sail nearer the wind.

Luff round! Throw the ship's head right into the wind.

Luff a-lee! Same as luff round.

A ship is said to spring her luff when she yields to the helm by sailing nearer the wind.

Keep the luff. The wind side.

Lufra. Douglas's dog, "the fleetest hound in all the North." (Sir Walter Scott: Lady of the Lake, v. 25.) (See Don.)

Luggie. The warlock who, when storms prevented him from going to sea, used to sit on "Luggie's Knoll," and fish up dressed food.

Luggmagg. An island mentioned in Gulliver's Travels, where people live for ever. Swift shows the evil of such a destiny, unless accompanied with eternal youth. (See STRULDEEBS.)

Luke (St.). Patron saint of painters and physicians. Tradition says he painted a portrait of the Virgin Mary. From Col. iv. 14 he is supposed to have been a physician.

St. Luke, in Christian art, is usually represented with an ox lying near him, and generally with painting materials. Sometimes he seems engaged painting a picture of the Virgin and infant Saviour, his descriptions of the early life of the Saviour being more minute than that of the other evangelists. Metaphrastus mentions the skill of St. Luke in painting: John of Damascus speaks of his portrait of the Virgin (p. 631: Paris, 1712). Many pictures still extant are attributed to St. Luke; but the artist was probably St. Luke, the Greek hermit; for certainly these meagre Byzantine productions were not the works of the evangelist. (See Lanzi: Storia Pictorica dell'Italia, ii. 10.)

St. Luke's Club or The Virtuosen. An artists' club, established in England by Sir Antonio Vandyke, and held at the Rose Tavern, Fleet Street. There was an academy of St. Luke founded by the Paris artists in 1391; one at Rome, founded in 1533, but based on the "Compagnia di San Luca" of Florence, founded in 1345; a similar one was established at Sienna in 1555.

St. Luke's Summer, called by the French Pété de S. Martin; hence the phrase "L'été de S. Denis à S. Martin," from October 9th to November 11th, meaning generally the latter end of autumn.

.. . St. Luke's short summer lived these men, Nearing the goal of threescore years and ten.

Morriss: Earthly Paradise (March.)

As light as St. Luke's bird (i.e. an ox), Not light at all, but quite the contrary. St. Luke is generally represented writing, while behind him is an ox, symbolical of sacrifice. The whole tableau means that Luke begins his gospel with the priest sacrificing in the Temple.

Matthew is symbolised by a man, because he begins his gospel with the manhood of Jesus as a descendant of David; Mark, by a lion, because he begins his gospel with the baptism in the wilderness; John, by an eagle, because he begins his gospel by soaring into heaven, and describing the pre-existing state of the Logos.

Luke's Iron Crown. George and Luke Doss headed an unsuccessful revolt against the Hungarian nobles in the early part of the sixteenth century. Luke (according to Goldsmith) underwent the torture of the red-hot iron crown, as a punishment for allowing himself to be proclaimed king. History says it was George, not Luke. (The Traveller.)

Lullian Method. A mechanical aid to the memory, by means of systematic arrangements of ideas and subjects, devised by Raymond Lully, in the thirteenth century.

Lumber (from Lombard). A pawnbroker's shop. Thus Lady Murray writes: "They put all the little plate they had in the lumber, which is pawning it, till the ships came home."

Lumine Sicco (It.). Disinterestedly; as a dry question to be resolved without regard to other matters.

"If physiological considerations have any meaning, it will be always impossible for women to view the subject of women's sufrage in lumine sicco."—The Seventeenth Century (The Hon. Mrs. Chapman, April, 1883).
Lump. If you don't like it, you may lump it. Whether you like to do it or not, no matter; it must be done. Here "lump it" means "to gulp it down," or swallow unwillingly, to put up with it unwillingly but of necessity. Thus we say of medicine, "lump it down," i.e. gulp it down. (Danish, gulpen, to swallow.)

Lumpkin (Tony), in She Stoops to Conquer, by Goldsmith. A sheepish, mischievous, idle, cunning lout, "with the voices of a man and the follies of a boy," fond of low company, but giving himself the airs of the young squire.

Lun. So John Rich called himself when he performed harlequin (1681-1761).

"On the one Folly sits, by song called Fun, And on the other his arch-patron Lun." Churchill.

Luna. An ancient seaport of Genoa, whence the marble quarried in the neighbourhood is called "marmo lunense." (Orlando Furioso.)

Conte di Luna. Garzia, brother of Count Luna, had two sons. One day a gipsy was found in their chamber, and being-seized, was condemned to be burnt alive. The daughter of the gipsy, out of revenge, vowed vengeance, and stole Manrico’s, the infant son of Garzia. It so fell out that the count and Manrico both fell in love with the Princess Leonora, who loved Mauroco only. Luna and Mauroco both fall into the hands of the count, and are condemned to death when Leonora promises to "give herself" to Luna, provided he liberates Mauroco. The count accepts the terms, and goes to the prison to fulfill his promise, when Leonora dies from poison which she has sucked from a ring. Soon as Mauroco sees that Leonora is dead, he also dies. (Verdi: Il Trovatore, an opera.)

Lunar Month. About four weeks from new moon to new moon.

Lunar Year. Twelve lunar months. There are 13 lunar months in a year, 13 x 4 = 52 weeks.

Lunatics. Moon-struck persons. The Romans believed that the mind was affected by the moon, and that "lunatics" were more and more frenzied as the moon increased to its full. (Sve Avertin.)

"The various mental derangements... which have been attributed to the influence of the moon, have given to this day the name lunatics to persons suffering from serious mental disorders." (Oriental: Popular Errors, chap. iv. p. 53.)

Lunchen. (Welsh, ilone or ilone, a gulp; iloneu, to swallow at a gulp.) The notion of its derivation from the Spanish once, eleven, is borrowed from the word nuncheon, i.e. non-mete, a noon repeat. Hence Hudibras:

"When, laying by their swords and truncheons, They took their breakfasts, or their nuncheons." Book I. lines 340, 846.

"In Letter Book G, folio iv. (27 Edward II.), donations of drink to workmen are called nonechonche. (Riley: Memorials of London.)

Lungs of London. The parks. In a debate, June 30th, 1806, respecting encroachments upon Hyde Park, Mr. Windham said it was the "lungs of London."

Lunford. A name used in terremot over children. Sir Thomas Lunford was governor of the Tower, a man of most vindictive temper, and the dread of everyone.

"Make children with your tunes to run forl, As bad as Bloody-hothes or Lunford." Butler: Hudibras, lit. 2.

Lu'percal (The), strictly speaking, meant the place where Romulus and Remus were suckled by the wolf (lupus). A yearly festival was held on this spot on Feb. 15, in honour of Lu'percus, the god of fertility. On one of these festivals Antony thrice offered to Julius Caesar a kingly crown, but seeing the people were only half-hearted, Caesar put it aside, saying, "Jupiter alone is king of Rome." Shakespeare makes Antony allude to this incident:

"You all did see that on the Lu'percal I thrice presented him a kingly crown, Which he did thrice refuse."

Julius Caesar, lit. 2.

Shakespeare calls the Lupercalia "the feast of Lu'percal" (act i. 1.), and probably he means the festival in Antony’s speech, not the place where the festival was held.

Lupine. He does not know a libel from a lupine. In Latin: "Ignorat quid dist ilia lupinis?" "He does not know good money from a counter of a hawk from a hamsaw." The Romans called counters lupines or leuns. A libel was a small silver coin the tenth part of a denarius = the es.

Lupus et Agnus. A mere pretence to found a quarrel on. The words are the Latin title of the well-known fable of The Wolf and the Lamb.

"Lups in fabula," answered the abbot, scornfully. "The wolf accuses the sheep of muddling the stream, when he drank in it above her." — Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, last chapter.
Lurch. To leave in the lurch. To leave a person in a difficulty. In cribbage a person is left in the lurch when his adversary has run out his score of sixty-one holes before he himself has turned the corner (or pegged his thirty-first) hole. In cards it is a slam, that is, when one of the players wins the entire game before his adversary has scored a single point or won a trick.

Lush. Beer and other intoxicating drinks; so called from Lushington the brewer.

Lusiad or The Lusiads. The adventures of the Lusians or Portuguese under Vasquez da Gama in their “discovery of India.” The fleet first sailed to Mozambique, in Africa, but Bacchus (the guardian power of the Mahometans) raised a commotion against the Lusians, and a battle ensued in which the Lusians were victorious. The fleet was next conducted by treachery to Quill’a, a harbour on the east coast of the same continent; but Venus or Divine love, to save her favourites from danger, drove them away by a tempest, and Hermes bade Gama steer for Melinda, in Africa. At Molinda the Lusians were hospitably received, and the king of the country not only vowed eternal friendship, but also provided a pilot to conduct the fleet to India. In the Indian Ocean Bacchus tried to destroy the fleet, but “the silver star of Divine love” calmed the sea, and Gama arrived at India in safety. Having accomplished his object, Gama returned to Lisbon.

N.B. Gama sailed three times to India: (1) with four vessels, in 1497, returning to Lisbon in two years and two months; he was appointed admiral of the Eastern seas. (2) In 1502, with twenty ships, when he was attacked by the Zamarin or king of Calicut, whom he defeated, and returned to Lisbon the year following; and (3) when John III. appointed him viceroy of India. He established his government at Cochin, where he died in 1525. It is the first of these voyages which is the subject of the Lusiad by Camoens.

Lusita’nia. Ancient name for Portugal, said to be so called from Lusus. (See Lusus.)

Lusita’nian Prince. Día Henry, third son of John I. “the Great,” King of Portugal—

“Who, heaven-inspired,
To love of useful glory roused mankind,
And in unbounded commerce mixed the world.”

Thomson: Summer.

Lustral Water. Water for aspersing worshippers was kept in an aspersorium, that those who entered or left the temple might dip their fingers into the water or be sprinkled by a priest. The same may be said of Indian pagodas, and the custom prevailed in ancient Egypt, and Etruria, with the Hebrews, and almost all the nations of antiquity. In Rome the priest used a small olive or laurel branch for sprinkling the people. Infants were also sprinkled with lustral water.

Lustrum. A space of five years. The word means a purification. These public expirations were made at Rome by one of the censors every fifth year, at the conclusion of the census. (Latin, lu’strum, to purify.)

Lusus. The sons or race of Lusus. Pliny (iii. 1) tells us that Lusus was the companion of Bacchus in his travels, and settled a colony in Portugal; whence the country was termed Lusitania, and the inhabitants Lusians.

Lusus Nat’ire. A freak of nature; as a man with six toes, a sheep with two heads, or a stone shaped like some well-known object, etc.

Lutestring. A glossy silk; a corruption of the French word lustrine (from lustre).

To speak in lustrestring. Flash, highly-polished oratory. The expression was first used in Junius. Shakespeare has “taffeta phrases and silken terms precise.” We call inflated speech “fustian” (q.v.) or “bombast” (q.v.); say a man talks stuff; term a book or speech made up of other men’s brains, shoddy (q.v.); sailors call telling a story “spinning a yarn,” etc. etc.

Lute’zia. Mud-hovels; the ancient name of Paris. The Romans call it Lutea Parisinum, the mud-town of the Parisii. The former word being dropped, has left the present name Paris.

Luther’s Hymn. “Great God, what do I see and hear,” and “A safe stronghold,” etc.

Lutherans. Dr. Eck was the first to call the followers of Martin Luther by this name. It was used by way of contempt.

Lut’in. A sort of goblin in the mythology of Normandy, very similar to the house-spirits of Germany and Scandinavia. Sometimes it assumes the form of a horse ready equipped, and in this shape is called Le Cheval Bayard. To litter is to twist hair into elf-locks. Sometimes these mischievous urchins so tangle the mane of a horse or head of a child that the hair must be cut off.

Le Prince Lutin, by the Countess D’Audency.

Luxemburghers. The people of Luxemburg. Similarly we have Augsburgers, Carlsburgers, Edinburghers, Friburgers, Hambourgers and many more.

Luz or Luz. The indestructible bone; the nucleus of the resurrection body.

"How doth a man revive again in the world to come?" asked Hadrian; and Joshua ben Hana-n'ah made answer, 'From luz in the backbone.' He then went on to demonstrate this to him: He took that bone from him, and put it into water, but the water had no action on it; he put it in the fire, but the fire consumed it not; he placed it in a sea, but could not grind it; and laid it on an anvil, but the hammer crushed it not."—Lightfoot.

"The learned rabbins of the Jews write there's a bone, which they call luci..."—Blair: Hudibras, ill. 2.

Lybius (Sir). A very young knight who undertook to rescue the lady of Sinadone. After overcoming various knights, giants, and enchanters, he entered the palace of the lady. Presently the whole edifice fell to pieces about his ears, and a horrible serpent coiled round his neck and kissed him. The spell being broken, the serpent turned into the lady of Sinadone, who married the knight that so gallantly rescued her. (Liber de, a romance.)

Lycoenian Tables. Excreable food. Lycan' on, desirous of testing the divine knowledge of Jove, who had honoured him with a visit, served up human flesh on his table; for which the god changed him into a wolf.

Ly'ol'das. The name under which Milton celebrates the untimely death of Edward King, Fellow of Christ College, Cambridge, who was drowned in his passage from Chester to Ireland, August 10th, 1637. He was the son of Sir John King, Secretary for Ireland.

Ly'tis'son (half-wolf, half-dog). One of the dogs of Acteon. In Latin it is a common term for a shepherd's dog; and is so used by Virgil (Eclogue iii. 18). (See Dog.)

Lycope'q'tum. Wolf's foot, from a fanciful resemblance thereto.

Lyd ford. Law is, punish first and try afterwards. Lyford, in the county of Devon, was a fortified town, in which was an ancient castle, where were held the courts of the Duchy of Cornwall. Offenders against the stannary laws were confined before trial in a dungeon so loathsome and dreary that it gave rise to the proverb referred to. The castle was destroyed by the Danes. (See Cupar Justice, Cowper's Law.)

"I oft have heard of Lyford law, how in the morn they hang and draw, and men in judgment sit."—A Devonshire Poet.

Lydia, daughter of the King of Lydia, was sought in marriage by Alcestes, a Thracian knight; his suit was refused, and he repaired to the King of Armenia, who gave him an army, with which he laid siege to Lydia. He was persuaded by Lydia to raise the siege. The King of Armenia would not give up the project, and Alcestes slew him. Lydia now set him all sorts of dangerous tasks to "prove the ardour of his love," all of which he surmounted. Lastly, she induced him to kill all his allies, and when she had thus cut off the claws of this love-sick lion she mocked him. Alcestes jined and died, and Lydia was doomed to endless torment in hell, where Astolpho saw her, to whom she told her story. (Orlando Furioso, bk. xvii.)

Lydia Languish, in The Rivals, by Sheridan.

Lydian Poet (The). Alcman of Lydia. (Florished B.C. 670.)

Lying Traveller (The). So Sir John Mandeville has been unjustly called. (1300-1372.)

Lying by the Wall. Dead but not buried. Anglo-Saxon, weli (death). He is lying with the dead.

Lying for the Whetstone. Said of a person who is grossly exaggerating or falsifying a statement. One of the Whitsun amusements of our forefathers was the lie-wage or lie-match; he who could tell the greatest lie was rewarded with a whetstone to sharpen his wit. The nature of these contests may be illustrated by the following well-known extravaganzas: One of the combatants declared he could see a fly on the top of a church-steeple: the other replied, "Oh yes, I saw him wink his eye." When Sir R. Digby declared he had seen the "philosopher's stone," Bacon quizzically replied, "perhaps it was a whetstone."

Lyme-hound and Gax-hound. The stanch Lyme-hound tracks the wounded buck over hill and dale. The fleet gazehound kills the buck at view.

"Thou art the lyme-hound. I am the gazehound.... Thou hast deep earnest and unequalling purpose, a steady, long-breathed malignity of nature, that surpasses mine. But then, I am the holder, the more ready, both at action and expedient."

"I say.... shall we hunt in couples?"—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth, chap. iv.

Lyncetus (2 syl.) was so sharp-sighted he could see through the earth, and distinguish objects nine miles off.

"That Lyncetus may be matched with Gannard's sight."

"Non possis oculo quantum contendere Lyncenas."

Horace: Epistle, 1. 58.

Lynch Law. Mob-law, law administered by private persons. According to Webster, the word Lynch refers to a Mr. James Lynch, a farmer, of Piedmont, in Virginia. The tale is that, as Piedmont, on the frontier, was seven miles from any law court, the neighbours, in 1696, selected James Lynch, a man of good judgment and great impartiality, to pass sentence on offenders for the nonce. His judgments were so just that he acquired the name of Judge Lynch, and this sort of law went by the name of Lynch law. In confirmation of this story, we are told there was a James Lynch Fitz-Stephen, who was warden of Galway in 1526; and in the capacity of warden he passed sentence of death on his own son for murder. (See Burlaw.)

"George was lynched, as he deserved."—Emerson: English Traits, chap. 14.

Lynch-pin. (Anglo-Saxon, lynis, an axe), whence club. (Qy. lynch-law.)

Lynchian, booksellers and publishers. Rabelais says they inhabit a little hamlet near Lantern-hund, and live by lanterns. (Panegyricum, v. 33.)

Lynx, proverbial for its piercing eyesight, is a fabulous beast, half dog and half panther, but not like either in character. The cat-like animal now called a lynx is not remarkable for keen-sightfulness.

Lynx-eyed. Having as keen a sight as a lynx. Some think the word lynx is a perversion of Lyncetus. (See abovr.)

Lyon, King-of-Arms. Chief heraldic officer for Scotland; so called from the lion rampant in the Scottish regal escutcheon.

Lyonnesse (3 syl.). "That sweet land of Lyonnesse"—a tract between the Land's End and the Scilly Isles, now submerged full four fathoms under water." Arthur came from this mythical country.

Lyre (Thc). That of Terpander and Olympus had only three strings; the Scythian lyre had five; that of Simonides had eight; and that of Tho-metheus: (3 syl.) had twelve. It was played either with the fingers or with a plectrum. The lyre is called by poets a "shell," because the cords of the lyre used by Orpheus (2 syl.), Amphiion, and Apollo, were stretched on the shell of a tortoise. Hercules used boxwood instead.

Amphi'on built Thebes with the music of his lyre, and when the bard was thrown overboard one of them carried him safely to Te'aurus.

Hercules was taught music by Linus. One day, being reproved, the strong man broke the head of his master with his own lyre.

Orpheus charmed savage beasts, and even the infernal gods, with the music of his lyre.

Lysander and Rosiorius, in the romance called Bibliomania, are meant for the author himself, Thomas Freg- nell Dibdin, D.D., a bibliographer, well known for his Classics—i.e. book on the Rare and Valuable Editions of the Greek and Latin Classics (1811).

Lytelton, invoked by Thomson in his Spring, was George, Lord Lyttelton, of Hagley, Worcestershire, who procured from the Prince of Wales a pension of £100 a year for the poet. Lucinda was Lucy Fortescue, daughter of Hugh For-tescue, of Devonshire.

M

M. This letter represents the wavy appearance of water, and is called in Hebrew mem (water).

M. Every word in the Materia more Magistralis begins with the letter m. (See G and P.)

M (initial of manslaughter). The brand of a person convicted of that offence, and admitted to the benefit of clergy. It was burnt on the brawn of the left thumb.

M in numerals is the initial of mille, a thousand.

"Whosoever prayeth for the soul of John Gower he shall, so oft as he doth, have a M and a D day of pardon."—Gower's Table.

M to represent the human face. Add two dots for the eyes, thus, "M." These dots being equal to O's, we get OMO (homo) Latin for man.

who reads the name.

For was upon his forehead, there the M had traced most plainly;

Biont: Pragurion, xxii

M', i.e. Mac. A Gaelic prefix meaning son. (Gothic, magus, a son; Sanskrit, mah, to grow; Welsh, magn, to breed.) The Welsh ap is Mac changed to Mep, and contracted into ap or p, as Apudum (Ap Adam), Prichard ('T Richard).

M or N in the Catechism. M. is a contraction of NN (names); N is for name. The respondent is required to give his names if he has more than one, or his name if only one.

In the marriage service, M stands for man (the man) or mer'ly (the groomsman), and N for nupts (the bride).

There are some who think M stands for Mary, the patron saint of girls, and N for Nicholas, the patron saint of boys.

M.B. Waistcoat. A clerical cassock waistcoat was so called (about 1830) when first introduced by the High Church party. M.B. means "mark of the beast."

"He smiled at the folly which stigmatised an M.B. waistcoat."—Mrs. Oliphant: Phoebe June, ii.

M.D. The first woman that obtained this degree was Elizabeth Blackwell, of the United States (1849).

M.P. Member of Parliament, but in Slang language Member of the Police.

M.S., manuscript; M.S.S., manuscripts; generally applied to literary works in penmanship. (Latin manuscriptorium, that which is written by the hand.)

Mab. The "fairies' midwife"—i.e. employed by the fairies as midwife of dreams (to deliver man's brain of dreams). Thus when Romeo says, "I dreamed a dream to-night," Mercutio replies, "Oh, then, I see Queen Mab hath been with you." Sir Walter Scott follows in the same track: "I have a friend who is peculiarly favoured with the visits of Queen Mab," meaning with dreams (The Antiquary). When Mab is called "queen," it does not mean sovereign, for Titania was Oberon's wife, but simply female; both midwives and monthy nurses were anciently called queens or queens. Queen or queen in Saxon means neither more nor less than woman; so "elf-queen," and the Danish elfqueine, mean female elf, and not "queen of the elves." Excellent descriptions of "Mistress Mab" are given by Shakespeare (Romeo and Juliet, i. 4), by Ben Jonson, by Herrick, and by Drayton in Nymphidia. (Mab, Welsh, a baby.)

MacAlpin. It is said that the founder of this famous family was named Half-penny, and lived in Dublin in the 18th century. Having prospered in business, he called himself Mr. Halpen. The family, still prospering, dropped the H, and added Mac (son of), making Mac Alpen; and Kenny MacAlpen called himself Kenneth MacAlpin, the "de-scentant of a hundred kings." True or not, the metamorphose is ingenious.

MacFarlane's Goose. The proverb is that "MacFarlane's goose like their play better than their meat." The wild goose of Inch-Tavoe (Loch Lomond) used to be called MacFarlane's Goose because the MacFarlanes had a house and garden on the isle. It is said that these geese never returned after the extinction of that house. One day James VI. visited the chieftain, and was highly amused by the gambols of the goose, but the one served at table was too tough that the king exclaimed, "MacFarlane's goose like their play better than their meat."

MacFleek'noe in Dryden's famous satire, is Thomas Shadwell, poet-laurn-ate, whose immortality rests on the not very complimentary line, "Shadwell never deviates into sense." (1610-1692.)

N.B. Flecknoe was an Irish Roman Catholic priest, doggerel sonneteer, and playwright. Shadwell, according to Dryden, was his double.

"The rest to some sliight meaning make pretence,
But Shadwell never deviates into sense."

Dryden: MacFleeknou, 19, 20.

MacGirdle's Mare, used by degrees to cat less and less, but just as he had reduced her to a straw a day the poor beast died. This is an old Greek joke, which is well known to schoolboys who have been taught the Aulpeia Minora.
(See Waverley, p. 64.)

MacGregor. The motto of the MacGregors is, "E'en do and spair nocht," said to have been given them in the twelfth century by the king of Scotland. While the king was hunting he was attacked by a wild boar, when Sir Malcolm requested permission to encounter the creature. "E'en do," said the king, "mad spair nocht." Whereupon the strong baronet tore up an oak sapling and despatched the enraged animal. For this defence the king gave Sir Malcolm permission to use the said motto, and, in place of a Scotch fir, to adopt for crest an oak-tree eradicated proper.

Another motto of the MacGregors is—"Sriogal mo dhaearn."

Rob Roy MacGregor or Robert Campbell, the outlaw. A Highland freebooter, the hero of Sir Walter Scott's Rob Roy. His wife's name is Helen, and their eldest son Hamish. In the Two Drovers MacGregor or MacCombich (Robert Oig) is a Highland drover.

MacIntyre (Captain Hector). Brother of Maria MacIntyre, the antiquary's niece, in Sir Walter Scott's Antiquary.

MacIvor (Fergus). Chief of Glen-naquioch, and brother of Flora MacIvor, the heroine of Waverley, by Sir W. Scott.

MacPherson. During the reign of David I. of Scotland, a younger brother of the chief of the powerful clan Chattan espoused the clerical life, and in due time became abbot of Kingussie. His elder brother died childless, and the chieftainship devolved on the abbot. He procured the needed dispensation from the Pope, married the daughter of the thane of Calder, and a swarm of little "Kingussies" was the result. The good people of Inverness-shire called them the Mac-Phersons, i.e. the sons of the parson.

MacTab. The Honorable Miss Lucetia MacTab. A poor Scotch relative of Emily Worthington "on her deceased mother's side, and of the noble blood of the MacTabs." She lived on the Worthingtons, always snubbing them for not appreciating the honour of such a noble hanger-on, and always committing the most ludicrous mistakes from her extravagant vanity and family pride. (George Colman: The Poor Gentleman.)

MacTurk (Captain Mungo or Hector). "The man of peace" at the Spa Hotel, and one of the managing committee. (Sir Walter Scott: St. Ronan's Well.)

Macaber. The dance macabre. The Dance of the dead (q.v.) (French, danse macabre.) A dance over which Death presides, supposed to be executed by the dead of all ages and conditions. It is an allegory of the mortality of man, and was a favourite subject of artists and poets between the 13th and 15th centuries. It was originally written in German, then in Latin, and then in French. Some think Macaber was the name of the author, but others think the word is the Arabic makabir, a cemetery. The best illustrations are those by Minden, Lucerne, Leubeck, Dresden, and Basle. Holbein's painting is very celebrated.

"What are these paintings on the wall around us? The dance macabre." Longfellow: The Golden Legend.

Macadamise (4 syl.). Using broken stones for road metal, and making the road convex instead of concave; a method introduced by Sir John L. Macadam (1756-1836).

Macaire (2 syl.). A favourite name in French plays, insomuch that Robert Macaire is sometimes used generically for a Frenchman. It is said that A. de Montdidier was murdered in the forest of Bondy in 1371. His dog conceived such a hatred against Robert Macaire that suspicion was aroused, and it was resolved to pit the man and dog together. The result was fatal to the man, who died confessing his guilt. The story is found in a chanson de geste of the 12th century, called La Reine Sibyle.

Macamut. Sultan of Cambaya, who lived upon poison, with which he was so saturated that his breath or touch carried instant death. (Purchas.)

Macare (French). The impersonation of good temper, in Voltaire's allegory of Thelème and Macarr.

Macaroni. A coxcomb (Italian, un maccherone). The word is derived from the Macaroni Club, instituted by a set of flashy men who had travelled in Italy, and introduced Italian maccheroni at Almack's subscription table. The Macaronies were the most exquisite fops that ever disgraced the name of man; vicious, insolent, fond of gambling, drinking, and duelling, they were (about 1773) the curse of Vauxhall Gardens.

"We are indebted to the Macaronies for only two things: the one is the introduction of that excellent dish, a macaroni, and the other is the invention of that useful slang word 'hare' (bear), which originally meant any element of dandyism."—Cassel's Magazine: London Legends.

An American regiment raised in Maryland during the War of Independence, was called The Macaronies from its showy uniform.

Macaronic Latin. Dog Latin, or modern words with Latin endings. The law pleadings of G. Steevens, as Daniel v. Dishelont and Bullim v. Bontum, are excellent examples. (See Dog Latin.)

Macaronic Latin is a mixture of Latin and some modern language. In Italy maccheroni is a mixture of coarse meal, eggs, and cheese.
Macaronic Verse. Verses in which foreign words are ludicrously distorted and jumbled together, as in Porson’s lines on the threatened invasion of England by Napoleon. (Lingo drawn for the Militia.) So called by Teofilo Polengo, a Mantuan monk of noble family, who published a book entitled Liber Macaronicum, a poetical rhapsody made up of words of different languages, and treating of “pleasant matters” in a comical style (1520). Polengo is generally called Merlino Coccaio, or Merlino Coccaj. (See preceding.) The Tigones of Tossa was published in 1494. The following Latin verse is an hexameter:

“Trumpeter unus erat qui custum scarlet habitatur.”

A. Cunningham published in 1801 a Delectus macaronicii carminum, a history of macaronic poetry.

Cane carmen sexpence, pera plena rye,
Do multa armi xivitus coelia in a pie
Bimulant has spectavit, cantus omnis exult.
Nonne permira bleas, quond visid ile rex?
Bidenturn rex extra, mista ad regnum
Qued callit illa, sending back cattery.

Macbeth (Shakespeare). The story is taken from Holmsted, who copied it from the History of Scotland, by Hector Boece or Boys, in seventeen volumes (1527). The history, written in Latin, was translated by John Bellenden (1591-1595).

“History states that Macbeth slew Duncan at Bothgowean, near Elgin. In 1600, and not, as Shakespeare says, at his castle of Luserness the attack was made because Duncan had usurped the throne, to which Macbeth had the better claim. As a king Macbeth proved a very just and equitable prince, but the partisans of Malcolm got head, and succeeded in deposing Macbeth, who was slain in 1022, at Lumphanian. He was slain of Cuthbert (Glamis) and afterwards of Moray (Cawdor).—Lardner: Cabinet Cyclopaedia.

Lady Macbeth. The wife of Macbeth. Ambition is her sin, and to gain the object of her ambition she hesitates at nothing. Her masterful mind sways the weaker Macbeth to “the mood of what she liked or loathed.” She is a Medora, or Catherine de’ Medici, or Cesar Borgia in female form. (Shakespeare: Macbeth.)

The real name of Lady Macbeth was (Frauch, and instead of being urged to the murder of Duncan through ambition, she was goaded by deadly injuries. She was, in fact, the granddaughter of Kenneth IV, killed in 1034, fighting against Malcolm II. Lardner: Cabinet Cyclopaedia, Vol. I, 17, etc.

Macbriar (Ephraim). An enthusiastic preacher in Sir Walter Scott’s Old Mortality. This was the young preacher Macaulay hideously tortured in the reign of Charles II. He died “in a rapture.” (See Cassell’s History of England, Charles II., vol. III, p. 422.)

Maccabeus. The Hammerer. A surname given to Judas Asmonæus; similar to “Martel,” the name given to Charles, son of Pepin Héristel, who beat down the Saracens as with a sledge-hammer. Some think the name is a notarica or acrostic: [see preceding.] Jehovah (Who is like to thee among the gods, O Lord?) (Exodus xv. 11). (See Notarica.)

Macdonald. Lord MacDonald’s breast. Parasites. Lord MacDonald (son of the Lord of the Isles) once made a raid on the mainland. He and his followers, with other plunder, fell on the clothes of the enemy, and stripping off their own rags, donned the smartest and best they could lay hands on, with the result of being overrun with parasites.

Macduff. The thane of Fife. A Scotch nobleman whose castle of Kenmore was surprised by Macbeth, and his wife and babes “savagely slaughtered.” Macduff vowed vengeance and joined the army of Siward, to dethrone the tyrant. On reaching the royal castle of Dunseine, they fought, and Macbeth was slain. (Shakespeare: Macbeth.)

History states that Macbeth was defeated at Dunseine, but escaped from the battle and was slain at Lumphanian in 1050.—Lardner: Cabinet Cyclopaedia, p. 37, etc.

Macbeth (Captain). A highwayman, hero of The Beggar’s Opera, by Gay. A fine, gay, bold-faced ruffian, game to the very last.

Macchiavelli. The Imperial Machiaelli, Tiberius, the Roman emperor. (B.C. 42 to A.D. 37.)

His political axiom was—“He who knows not how to assemble knows not how to reign.” It was also the axiom of Louis XI. of France.

Machiavellism. Political cunning and overreaching by diplomacy, according to the pernicious political principles of Niccolo del Machiavelli, of Florence, set forth in his work called The Prince. The general scope of this book is to show that rulers may resort to any treachery and artifice to uphold their arbitrary power, and whatever dishonourable acts princes may indulge in are fully set off by the insubordination of their subjects. (1469-1527.)

Mackintosh or Macintosh. Cloth waterproofed with caoutchouc, patented by Mr. Macintosh.
Macklin. The real name of this great actor was Charles M'Laughlin, but he changed it on coming to England. (1690-1797.)

Macmillaneans (4 syl). A religious sect of Scotland, who succeeded the Covenanters; so named from John Macmillan, their leader. They called themselves the "Reformed Presbytery."

Maccveyorphant (Sir Pertinax). In The Man of the World, by Charles Macklin, Sir Pertinax "bowed, and bowed, and bowed," and cringed, and fawned, to obtain the object of his ambition.

Macedon is not Worthy of Thee. is what Philip said to his son Alexander, after his achievement with the horse Buceph'ales, which he subdied to his will, though only eighteen years of age.

Edward III., after the battle of Crecy, in which the Black Prince behaved very valiantly, exclaimed, "My brave boy, go on as you have begun, and you will be worthy of England's crown."

Macdonian (The). Julius Polye- nus, author of Stratagemata, in the second century.

Macedonian Madman (The). (See MADMAN.)

Macedonians. A religious sect, so named from Macedonius, Patriarch of Constantinople, in the fourth century. They denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost, and that the essence of the Son is the same in kind with that of the Father.

Macedonians. Æmilius Paulus, conqueror of Persia. (230-160 B.C.)

Mackerel Sky (4). A sky spotted like a mackerel. (Mackerel from the Latin, macula, a spot whence the French macqueveau, German mackrel, Welsh mawrell, etc.)

Macon. Mahomet, Mahoun, or Mahound.

"Praised (quoth he) be Macon whom we serve." Fairfax: Tales, cxx. 110.

Macon. A poetical and romance name of Mecca, the birthplace of Mahomet.

Macreona. The island of the Mar- reons. Great Britain. The word is Greek, and means long-lived. Rabelais describes the persecutions of the reformers as a terrible storm at sea, in which Pantagruel and his fleet were tempest-tossed, but contrived to enter one of the harbours of Great Britain, an island called "Long life," because no one was put to death there for his religious opinions. This island was full of antique ruins, relics of decayed popery and ancient superstitions.

Macrocom (Greek, the great world). in opposition to the microcom (the little world). The ancients looked upon the universe as a living creature, and the followers of Paracelsus considered man a miniature representation of the universe. The one was termed the Macrocoem, the other the Microcom (q.v.).

Mad as a March Hare. (See HARE.) The French say, "Il est fou comme un jeune chien."

Mad Cavalier (The). Prince Rupert, noted for his rush courage and impa- tience of control. (1619-1682.)

Mad Parliament (The). The Parliament which assembled at Oxford in 1258, and broke out into open rebellion against Henry III. The king was declared deposed, and the government was vested in the hands of twenty-four councillors, with Simon de Montfort at their head.

Mad Poet (The). Nathaniel Lee, who was confined for four years in Bedlam. (1657-1690.)

Mad as a Hatter. By some said to be a corruption of "Mad as an adder" (adder): but evidence is wanting. The word adder is adder in Saxon, hatter in German.

Madame. So the wife of Philippa, Duc d’Orléans was styled in the reign of Louis XIV.; other ladies were only Madame This or That.

Madame la Princesse. Wife of the Prince de Condé, and natural daughter of Louis XIV. (See MONSEEUR.)

Mademoiselle (4 syl). The daughter of Philippe, Duc de Chartres, grandson of Philippe, Duc d’Orléans, brother of Louis XIV.

La Grande Mademoiselle. The Duchesse de Montpensier, cousin to Louis XIV., and daughter of Gaston, Duc d’Orléans.

Madge. An owl.
Madge Wildfire. The nickname of Margaret Murdochson, a beautiful but giddy girl, whose brain was crazed by seduction and the murder of her infant. (Sir Walter Scott: Heart of Midlothian.)

The brilliant madman or Madman of the North, Charles XII. of Sweden. (1689, 1697-1718.)

"Heroes are much the same, the point's agreed, From Macedonia's madman to the Swede [Charles XII.]." Pope: Essay on Man, iv.

Madness. In Perthshire there are several wells and springs dedicated to St. Fillan, which are still places of pilgrimage. These wells are held to be efficacious in cases of madness. Even recently lunatics have been bound to the holy stone at night, under the expectation that St. Fillan would release them before dawn, and send them home in their right minds.

Madoc. The youngest son of Owain Gwyneth, King of North Wales, who died in 1169. According to tradition he sailed away to America, and established a colony on the southern branches of the Missouri. About the same time the Aztecs forsook Aztlán, under the guidance of Yuhid'tilton, and founded the empire called Mexico, in honour of Mexico, their tutelary god. Southey has a poem in two parts called Madoc, in which these two events are made to harmonise with each other.

Madonna. (Italian, my lady.) Specially applied to representations of the Virgin Mary.

Mad' dor (Sir). The Scotch knight slain in single combat by Sir Launcelot of the Lake, who volunteered to defend the innocence of Queen Guinevere.

Madras System of Education. A system of mutual instruction, introduced by Dr. Andrew Bell into the institution at Madras for the education of the orphan children of the European military. Bell lived 1755-1832.

Meander. To wind like the river Meander, in Phrygia. The "Greek pattern" of embroidery is so called.

Maece'nas. A patron of letters; so called from C. Cninius Maece'nas, a Roman statesman in the reign of Augustus, who kept open house for all men of letters, and was the special friend and patron of Horace and Virgil. Nicholas Rowe so called the Earl of Halifax on his installation to the Order of the Garter (1714).

The last English Maece'nas. Samuel Rogers, poet and banker. (1763-1855.)

Maelstrom (Norwegian, whirling stream). There are about fifty maelstroms off the coast of Norway, but the one Englishman delight to tremble at is at the foot of the Lofoten Islands, between the islands of Moskenes and Mosken, where the water is pushed and jostled a good deal, and when the wind and tide are contrary it is not safe for small boats to venture near.

It was anciently thought that the Maelstrom was a subterranean abyss, penetrating the globe, and communicating with the Gulf of Bothnia.

Mee'ndes (1 syl.) or Meon'ian

Poet. Homer, either because he was the son of Meeon, or because he was born in Meonia (Asia Minor). (See Homer.)

Meviad. A merciless satire by Gifford on the Delta Cruscan school of poetry. Published 1796. The word is in Virgil's Eclogue, iii. 90. (See Bayld.)

Mag. What a mug you are! jabberer, hence to chatter like a magpie. Mag is a contraction of magpie. The French have a famous word, "caquet-bou-bec." We call a prating man or woman "a mag." (See Magpie.)

Not a mug to bless myself with—not a halfpenny.

Magalo'na. (See Maguelone.)

Magazine (3 syl.). A place for stores. (Arabic, wakkan, gazana, a place where articles are preserved.)

Mag'dalene (3 syl.). An asylum for the reclaiming of prostitutes; so called from Mary Magdalene or Mary of Mag'dala, "out of whom Jesus cast seven devils." A great profligate till she met with the Lord and Saviour.

Mag'deburg Centuries. The first great work of Protestant divines on the history of the Christian Church. It was begun at Magdeburg by Matthias Flacius, in 1552; and, as each century occupies a volume, the thirteen volumes complete the history to 1300.

Magellan. Straits of Magellan. So called after Magellan or Magalhaens, the Portuguese navigator, who discovered them in 1520, Magenta. A brilliant red color derived from coal-tar, named in commemoration of the battle of Magenta, which was fought in 1859.

Maggot, Maggoty. whimsical, full of whims and fancies. Fancy tunes used to be called maggots, hence we have "Barker's maggots," "Cary's maggots," "Draper's maggots," etc. (Dancing Master, 1721.)

When the maggot bites. When the fancy takes us, Swift tells us that it was the opinion of certain virtuosi that the brain is filled with little worms or maggots, and that thought is produced by these worms biting the nerves. "If the bite is hexagonal it produces poetry; if circular, eloquence; if conical, politics, etc. (Mechanical Operation of the Spirit.) Instead of maggots the Scotch say, "His head is full of bees;" the French, "Il a des rats dans la tête;" and in Holland, "He has a mouse's nest in his head." (See Been.)

Magi (The), according to one tradition, were Melchior, Gaspar, and Balthazar, three kings of the East. The first offered gold, the emblem of royalty, to the infant Jesus; the second, frankincense, in token of divinity; and the third, myrrh, in prophetic allusion to the persecution unto death which awaited the "man of sorrows."

Melchior means "king of light." Gaspar, or Caspar, means "the white one." Balthazar means "the lord of treasures."

Klopstock, in his Messias, book 3, gives these five names: Hadad, Sama, Zimm, Belard, and Samrah.

Magi, in Camoens' Lusiad, means the Indian "Brumhins." Annamius Marcellanus says that the Persian magi derived their knowledge from the Brahmins of India (i. 23); and Arius expressly calls the Brahmins "magi" (i. 7.).

Magic Garters. Made of the strips of a young hare's skin saturated with motherwort. Those who wore these garters excel in speed.

"Were I not for my magic garters... I should not continue the baseless chase." Longfellow. The Golden Legend.

Magic Rings. This superstition arose from the belief that magicians had the power of imprisoning demons in rings. The power was supposed to prevail in Asia, and subsequently in Salamanca, Toledo, and Italy.

* Magic circles (like magic squares) are mathematical puzzles.

Corvus' ring. This magic ring was composed of six metals, and insured the wearer success in any undertaking in which he chose to embark. (Chinese Tales: Corend and his Four Sons.)

Dame Lion's ring, given by her to Sir Gareth during a tournament. It insured the wearer from losing blood when wounded.

"This ring," said Dame lion, "increaseth my beauty... which is green it turns red, and that which is red it turns green. That which is blue it turns white, and that which is white it turns blue. Whoever heareth this ring can never lose blood, however wounded." —History of Prince Arthur, i. 126.

Fairy ring (A). Whoever lives in a house built over a fairy ring will wondrously prosper in everything. (Athenian Oracle, i. 307.)

Giges' ring. (See Gyges.) Luned's ring rendered the wearer invisible. Luned or Lynet gave the ring to Owin, one of King Arthur's knights.

"Take this ring and put it on thy finger with the stone made thy hand, and close the band upon it. As long as thou concealest the stone, the stone will answer thee." —The Silvianus (Lady of the Fountain).

Reynard's ring. The ring which Reynard pretended he had sent to King Lion. It had three gems: one red, which gave light in darkness; one white, which cured all blains and squains; and one green, which would guard the wearer from all ills, both in peace and war. (Herman van Aikwaer: Reynard the Fox.)

The steel ring, made by Seidel-Beckit. It enabled the wearer to read the secrets of another's heart. (Oriental Tales; The Four Talisman.)

The talking ring given by Tartaro, the Basque Cyclops, to a girl whom he wished to marry. Immediately she put it on, it kept incessantly saying "You there, and I here." In order to get rid of the nuisance, the girl cut off her finger, and threw both finger and ring into a pond. (Basque legends.)

* This tale appears in Campbell's Popular Tales of the West Highlands (i. to iii.), and in Grimm's Tales (The Robber and his Sons).

Magic Wand. In Jerusalem Delivered the Hermits gives Charles the Dane and Udalfo a wand which, being shaken, infused terror into all who saw it.

In the Fairie Queene, the Palmer who accompanies Sir Guyon has a staff of like virtue, made of the same wood as Mercury's caduceus.

Magician. The Great Magician or Wizard of the North. Professor Wilson calls Sir Walter Scott the Great Magician, from the wonderful fascination of his writings.
Magician of the North. The title assumed by Johann Georg Hamann, of Prussia (1730-1788).

Magliabechi. The greatest bookworm that ever lived. He never forgot what he had once read, and could even turn at once to the exact page of any reference. He was the librarian of the Great Duke Cosmo III. (1633-1714).

Magna Charta. The Great Charter of English liberty extorted from King John, 1215; called by Spelman—

"Augusta sit auctoris, liberta tum et sacra, auctoris."—

Magnanimous (The). Alfonso V. of Aragon (1385, 1416-58).

Chosroes or Khoaru, twenty-first of the Sassan'id's, surnamed Noushirwan (the Magnanimous) (531-579).

Magna. One of the leaders of the rabble that attacked Hudibras at a bear-baiting. The character is a satirist on Simeon Wait, a tinker and Independent preacher. (Hudibras, pt. i. 2.) He calls Cromwell the "archangel who did battle with the devil."

Magnet. The loadstone: so called from Magnesia, in Lydia, where the ore was said to abound. The Greeks called it magnet. Milton uses the adjective for the substantive in the line "As the magnetic hardest iron draws."

Magneto Mountain. A mountain which drew out all the nails of any ship that approached within its magnetic influence. The ship in which Prince Agib sailed fell to pieces when wind-driven towards it. (Arabian Nights; The Third Calendar.)

Magnum (French). An anonymous or fille de joie; so called from the nursery founded at Rheims in 1654, by Jeanne Canart, daughter of Nicolas Colbert, seigneur de Magneux. The word is sometimes jocosely perverted into Magni-magno.

Magnificent. To sing the Magnificant at matins. To do things at the wrong time, or out of place. The Magnificant does not belong to the morning service, but to vespers. The Magnificent is Luke i. 46-55 in Latin.

Magnificent (The). Khoaru or Chosroes I. of Persia (*, 531-579). The golden period of Persian history was 550-628.

Lorenzo de Medici (1448-1492).

Robert, Duc de Normandie, also called Le Diable (*, 1028-1035).

Soliman I., greatest of the Turkish sultans (1493, 1520-1566).

Magnifique . . . Guerre. "C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la guerre." Admirable, but not according to rule. The comment of Marshal Canrobert on the charge of the Light Brigade at Balaklava.

"It is because the clergy, as a class, are animated by a high ideal . . . that as a class they are incomparably better than they need be . . . C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la guerre."—Nineteenth Century, April, 1886.

Magnolia. A flower so called from Pierre Magnol, professor of medicine at Montpellier. (1638-1715.)

Magnum Opus. Chief or most important of a person's works. A literary man says of his most renowned book it is his Magnum opus.

Magnum of Fort (A), or other wine, a double bottle.

Magnus Apollo (My), or Mens Magnus Apollo. My leader, authority, and oracle.

Mago the Carthaginian, says Aristotle, crossed the Great Desert twice without having anything to drink.

Magophoria. A festival observed by the Persians to commemorate the massacre of the Magi. Smerdis usurped the throne on the death of Cambyses; but seven Persians, conspiring together, slew Smerdis and his brother; whereupon the people put all the Magi to the sword, and elected Darius, son of Hystaspes, to the throne. (Greek, magus, the magi-slaughter.)

Magot (French). Money, or rather a mass of secreted money; a corruption of image, the "image and superscription" of coined money.

"La clé vous de monne, revient a Paris avec un bon magot."—La Gazette Frâne, 1764, p. 279.

Magpie. A contraction of magpite, or mag'ata-pie. "Mag" is generally thought to be a contraction of Margaret; thus we have Robin red-breast, Tom-tit, Philip—i.e. a sparrow, etc.

"Augurs and understood relations have (by magpieing, and choughing, and rooks) brought forth the secret's man of blood."—Shakespeare: Macbeth, i. i. 4.

Magpie. Here is an old Scotch rhyme:

"One's sorrow, two's mirth.

Three's a wedding, four's a birth,

Five's a christening, six a death,

Seven's a heavens, eight is hell,

And nine's the devil his own cell."
Magricio. The champion of Isabella of Portugal, who refused to do homage to France. The brave champion vanquished the French chevalier, and thus vindicated the liberty of his country.

Magdelone or Magdolna (the fair). Heroine of the romance called The History of the Fair Magdalena, Daughter of the King of Naples, etc. Originally written in French. Cervantes alludes to it in Don Quixote. (See Peter of Provence.)

Magus. (See Simon.)

Mahabadean Dynasty (The). The first dynasty of Persian mythological history. Mah Abad (the great Abad) and his wife were the only persons left on the earth after the great cycle, and from them the world was populated. Azer Abad, the fourteenth and last of this dynasty, left the earth because "all flesh had corrupted itself," and a period of anarchy ensued.

Mahabharata. One of the two great epic poems of ancient India. Its story is the contests between descendants of Kuru and Pandu. (See Kuru.)

Mahadi or Takeam. The Khalif who reigned about 400 years after Mahomet. In one pilgrimage to Mecca he expended six million gold dinars.

Mahatma. Initiates who have proved their courage and purity by passing through sundry tests and trials. It is a Hindu word applied to certain Buddhists. They are also called "Masters." According to Theosophists, man has a physical, an intellectual, and a spiritual nature, and a Mahatma is a person who has reached perfection in each of these three natures. As his knowledge is perfect, he can produce effects which, to the least learned, appear miraculous. Thus, before the telegraph and telephone were invented it would have appeared miraculous to possess such powers; no supernatural power, however, is required, but only a more extensive knowledge.

"Mahatma is a well-known Sanskrit word applied to men who have retired from the world, who, by means of a long ascetic discipline, have subdued the passions of the flesh, and gained a reputation for sanctity and knowledge. That these men are able to perform most startling feats, and to suffer the most terrible tortures, is perfectly true."—Max Muller: Nineteenth Century, May, 1863, p. 775.

Mahdi (The). The supreme pontiff of the Shites (2 syl.) Only twelve of these imams have really appeared—viz. Ali, Hassan, Hosein, and the nine lineal descendants of Hosein. Mohammed, the last Mahdi, we are told, is not really dead, but sleeps in a cavern near Bagdad, and will return to life in the fulness of time to overthor Dejal (anti-Christ).

The Mahdi which has of late been disturbing Egypt is hailed by the Persians as the Sunnites (2 syl.); but even the Turks and Persians are looking out for a Mahdi who will stamp out the infidels.

Mahmond of Ghizni, the conqueror of India in the 11th century, kept 400 greyhounds and bloodhounds, each of which wore a jewelled collar taken from the necks of captive sultanas.

Mahmut. The name of the famous Turkish spy (q.v.).

Mahomet or Mohammed, according to Deutsch, means the Prophesied Messiah. (Hag. ii. 7.) It is the titular name taken by Hahabi, founder of Islam. (570-632.)

Angel of. When Mahomet was transported to heaven, he says: "I saw there an angel, the most gigantic of all created beings. It had 70,000 heads, each had 70,000 faces, each face had 70,000 mouths, each mouth had 70,000 tongues, and each tongue spoke 70,000 languages; all were employed in singing God's praises."

*: This would make more than 31,000 trillion languages, and nearly five billion mouths.

Bob. Caturn (q.v.).

Camel (Swiftest). Adha (q.v.).

Cave. The cave in which Gabriel appeared to Mahomet was Hija.

Coffin. It is said that Mahomet's coffin, in the Hadd'gir'a of Medi'in, is suspended in mid-air without any support. Many explanations have been given of this phenomenon, the one most generally received being that the coffin is of iron, placed midway between two magnets. Burckhardt visited the sacred enclosure, and found the ingenuity of science useless in this case, as the coffin is not suspended at all.

Curass. FADIA (q.v.).

Daughter (His favourite). Fadima.

Died at Medina, Monday, June 8th, 632, age of seventy-two. The 10th of the Hed'jrah.

Dove. Mahomet had a dove which he used to feed with wheat out of his ear. When the dove was hungry it used to light on the prophet's shoulder, and thrust its bill into his ear to find its meal. Mahomet thus induced the Arabs to believe that he was inspired by the Holy Ghost in the semblance of Father. Abdall, of the tribe of Koreish. He died a little before or little after the birth of Mahomet.

Father-in-law (father of Ayesha). Abu-Bekr. He succeeded Mahomet and was the first calif.

Flight from Mecca (called the Hidjra), A.D. 622. He retired to Medinah.

Grandfather (paternal). Abd-el-Muttallib, who adopted the orphan boy, but died in two years.

Heir (adopted). Said or Zaid.

Horse. Al Borak [The Lightning]. It conveyed the prophet to the seventh heaven. (See Borak.)

Borak was a fine-limbed, high-standing horse, strong in frame and with a coat as glossy as nacre. His colour was saffron, with one hair of gold for every three of grey; his ears were wantless and pointed like a reed; his eyes large and full of fire; his nostrils wide and streaming; he had a white star on his forehead, a neck graciously arched, a mane soft and silky, and a thick tail that swept the ground. — Crociandoluce, II, 9.

Miracles. Chadin mentions several, but some say he performed no miracle. The miracle of the moon is best known.

Moon (The). Habib the Wise told Mahomet to prove his mission by clearing the moon in two. Mahomet raised his hands towards heaven, and in a loud voice summoned the moon to do Habib’s bidding. Accordingly, it descended to the top of the Cuaba (q.v.), made seven circuits, and, coming to the ‘prophet,’ entered his right sleeve and came out of the left. It then united the collar of his robe, and descended to the skirt, clove itself into two plaits, one of which appeared in the east of the skies and the other in the west; and the two parts ultimately reunited and resumed their usual form.

Mother of. Aimin, of the tribe of Koreish. She died when Mahomet was six years old.

Mule. Fadda (q.v.).

Pond. Just inside the gates of Paradise. It was white as milk, and he who drank thereof would never thirst again. (Al Koran.)

Relation made when he was forty years old by Gabriel, on Mount Hora, in Mecca.

Standard. Baj’ura.

Stepping-stone. The stone upon which the prophet placed his foot when he mounted the beast Al Borak on his ascent to heaven. It rose as the beast rose, but Mahomet, putting his hand upon it, forbade it to follow him, whereupon it remained suspended in mid-air, where the true believer, if he has faith enough, may still behold it.

Swords. Dhul Fakar (the lustrous), Al Battar (the beater), Medham (the keen), and Hafet (the deadly). (See Swords.)

Successor. (See above, Father-in-law.)

Tribe. On both sides, the Koreish.

Uncle, who took charge of Mahomet at the death of his grandfather, Abu Taleb.

Wives. Ten in number, viz. (1) Khadijah, a rich widow of the tribe of Koreish, who had been twice married already, and was forty years of age. For twenty-five years she was his only wife, but at her death he married nine others, all of whom survived him.

Mahomet loved Mary, a Coptic saint, and in order to justify the amours, added a new chapter to the Koran, which may be found in Gagner’s Notes upon Audsfield, p. 151.

The nine wives. (1) Ayesha, daughter of Abu Bekr, only nine years old on her wedding-day. This was his youngest and favourite wife.

(2) Sauda, widow of Sokran, and nurse to his daughter Fatima.

(3) Hafsah, a widow twenty-eight years old, who also had a son. She was daughter of Omayy.

(4) Zeinab, wife of Zaid, but divorced in order that the prophet might take her to wife.

(5) Barra, wife of a young Arabi and daughter of Al Hareth, chief of an Arab tribe. Both father and husband were slain in a battle with Mahomet. She was a captive.

(6) Rehana, daughter of Simeon, and a Jewish captive.

(7) Safiya, the espoused wife of Kena’an. Kena’an was put to death. Safiya outlived the prophet forty years.

(8) Omm Habiba—i.e. mother of Habiba; the widow of Abu Sofian.

(9) Maimuna, fifty-one years old, and a widow, who survived all his other wives.

Also ten or fifteen concubines, chief of whom was Maryyeh, mother of Ibrahim, the prophet’s son, who died when fifteen months old.

Year of Deputations. A.D. 630, the 8th of the Hidjra.
Mahound (2 syl.). Name of contempt for Mahomet, a Moem, a Moor. In Scotland it was used to mean devil.

"There's the son of the renegade—spawn of Mahound (son of the Moorish princess)."—Vengeance of Maldoror.

Mahound (2 syl.). Mahomet. (See MACON.)

"Ofttimes by Termansent and Mahound swore."—Shakespeare: Falstaff, viii. 47.

Mahu. The fiend-prince that urges to theft.

"Five fiends have been in poor Tom at once: of lust, an Oldbent: Robbidityance, prince of dumness: Mahu, of stinking: Mato, of murder: Gilberntittle, of mourning and mourning."—Shakespeare: King Lear, iv. 1.

Maid Marian. A moris dance, or the boy in the moris dance, called Mad Morian, from the "morion" which he wore on his head. (See MORRIS DANCING.) Maid Marian is a corruption first of the words, and then of the sex. Having got the words Maid Marian, etymologists have puzzled out a suitable character in Matilda, the daughter of Fitz-Walter, baron of Bayard and Dunmow, who eloped with Robert Fitz-Oooth, the outlaw, and lived with him in Sherwood Forest. Some refine upon this tale, and affirm that Matilda was married to the outlaw (commonly called Robin Hood) by Friar Tuck.

"A set of morris dancers danced a maidmorian with a labor and pipe."—Tennyson.

"Next I as agreed That fair Matild and henceforth change her name, And while she lived in Sherwood... She by maid marian's name he only called."—Donnafford of Robert, Earl of Huntingdon.

Maid of Athens, immortalised by Byron, was Theresa Mucri. Some twenty-four years after this poem was written the maid was in dire poverty, without a single vestige of beauty. She had a large family, and lived in a hovel.

Maid of Norway. Margaret, daughter of Eric II. and Margaret of Norway. On the death of Alexander III. she was acknowledged Queen of Scotland, and was betrothed to Edward, son of Edward I. of England, but she died on her passage to Scotland.

Maid of Orleans. Jeanne d'Arc (1412-1431).

Maid of Perth (Fair). Catherine Glover, daughter of Simon Glover, the old gloves of Perth. She kisses Smith while asleep on St. Valentine's morning, and ultimately marries him. (See SMITH.)—(Scott: Fair Maid of Perth.)

Maid of Saragossa. Augustina Zaragoza, distinguished for her heroism when Saragossa was besieged in 1808 and 1809. Byron refers to her in his Child Harold.

Maiden. A machine resembling the guillotine for beheading criminals in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; brought to Scotland by the Regent Morton from Halifax, in Yorkshire, for the purpose of beheading the laird of Pennycuick. It was also called "the widow."

He who invented the maiden first hanged it. Referring to Regent Morton, who introduced this sort of guillotine into Scotland, erroneously said to have been the first to suffer by it. Thomas Scott, one of the murderers of Rizzio, was beheaded by it in 1566, fifteen years before Morton's execution.

Maiden Assize (A). One in which there is no person to be brought to trial. We have also the expressions maiden tree, one never stopped: maiden fortress, one never taken: maiden speech, etc. In a maiden assize, the sheriff of the county presents the judge with a pair of white gloves. White gloves symbolise innocence. Maiden primarily means unspotted, unpolluted, innocent; thus Hubert says to the king—

"This hand of mine Is yet a maiden and innocent hand. Not painted with the crimson spot of blood."—Shakespeare: King John, iv. 2.

Maiden King (The). Malcolm IV. of Scotland. (1141, 1153-1165.)

"Malcolm...son of the brave and generous Prince Henry...was so kind and gentle in his disposition, that he was usually called Malcolm the Maiden."—Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, iv.

Maiden Lane (London). So called from an image of the Maiden or Virgin Mary, which stood there before the Reformation.

Maiden or Virgin Queen. Elizabeth, Queen of England, who never married. (1533, 1558-1603.)

Maiden Town, i.e. a town never taken by the enemy. Edinburgh. The tradition is that the maiden daughters of a Pictish king were sent there for protection during an intestine war.

Maiden of the Mist. Anne of Geierstein, in Sir Walter Scott's novel called Anne of Geierstein.

Maidenhair (a fern, so-called from its hair-like stalks) never takes wet or moisture.

"His skin is like the beard called true Maiden's hair, which never takes wet or moisture, but still keeps dry, though laid at the bottom of a river as long as you please. For this reason it is called Atlantis."—Herbelot: Flandres, iv. 24.
Main-brace. Splice the main-brace, in sea language, means to take a draught of strong drink to keep the spirits up, and give strength for extra exertion. The main-brace is the rope by which the mainyard of a ship is set in position, and to splice it, in a literal sense, when the rope is broken or injured, is to join the two ends together again.

Main Chance (The). Profit or money, probably from the game called hazard. To have an eye to the main chance, means to keep in view the money to be made out of an enterprise.

* In the game of "hazard," the first throw of the dice is called the main, which must be between four and nine, the player then throws his chance, which determines the main.

Mainote (2 syl.). A pirate that infests the coast of Attica.

"... Like boat
Of island-pirate or Mainote."

Byron: The Giaour.

Maintain is to hold in the hand; hence, to keep; hence, to clothe and feed. (French, main tenir; Latin, manus tenere.)

Mainland Club (The) of literary antiquities, instituted at Glasgow in 1828. It published a number of works.

Maine (1 syl.). According to American superstition, if a year finds a blood-red ear of maize, she will have a suitor before the year is over.

"Even the blood-red ear to Evangeline brought not her lover.
Longfellow: Evangeline.

Majesty. Henry VIII. was the first English sovereign who was styled "His Majesty." Henry IV. was "His Grace," Henry VI., "His Excellent Grace;" Edward IV., "High and Mighty Prince;" Henry VII., "His Grace," and "His Highness;" Henry VIII., in the earlier part of his reign, was styled "His Highness." "His Sacred Majesty" was a title assumed by subsequent sovereigns, but was afterwards changed to "Most Excellent Majesty."

Majesty, in heraldry. An eagle crowned and holding a sceptre is "an eagle in his majesty."

Majolica Ware. A pottery originally made in the island of Majorca or Majorica, and lately revived by Mr. Minton.

Majority. He has joined the majority. He is dead. Blair says, in his Grave, "'Tis long since Death had the majority."

"Abiit ad plures;" "Quin prius me ad plures penetravi" (Plautus: Trinumnum, line 14). "Beatos eos fore, quando cum pluribus habitarent." (See Polybius, viii. xxx. 7.)

Make.

What make you here? What do you want? What are you come here for? A French phrase: "¿Que faites-vous ici?"

"Now, sir, what make you here?"—Shakespeare: As You Like It, i. 1.

Make a hand of or on (To). To slay, destroy, waste, or spoil.

"So when I came to myself again, I ered him mercy; but he said, 'I know not to show mercy; and with that knocks me down again. He had, doubtless, made a hand of me, but that one came by, and bid him forbear.'"—Byron: Pilgrim's Progress, p. 93 (first edition).

Make a Hit (To). To succeed unexpectedly in an adventure or speculation, (See Hrr.)

Make a Virtue of Necessity (To). See Chaucer's poem of the Knight's Tale, line 3,044; also The Two Gentlemen of Verona and Dryden's poem of Talmion and Arctie.

Make away with (To). To squander; to put out of the way; to murder. The French verb défaire is used sometimes in a similar way; as, "Il tâche de se défaire secrètement de ses pursers."

Make away with Oneself (To). To commit suicide.

Make Bricks without Straw (To). To attempt to do something without having the necessary material supplied. The allusion is to the Israelites in Egypt, who were commanded by their taskmasters so to do. (Exodus v. 7.)

Make Eyes at (To). To flirt with the eyes. "Oculis venâriti." (See Casr.)

Make Mountains of Molehills (To). To make a difficulty of trifles. "Arrem ex elercâ furvé;" "The corresponding French proverb is, 'Faire d'un monche un éléphant.'"

Make one's Bread (To). To earn one's living.

Make the Door (To). To make it fast by shutting and bolting it. We still say, "Have you made my room?" —i.e. made it tidy. Similarly, to "make the bed" is to arrange it fit for use.

"Why at this time the doors are made against you." Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, iv. 1.

"Make the door upon a woman's wit, and it will out at the casement."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, iv. 1.

Make the Ice (To). To near the whale-fishing ground. To make for the ice is to steer in that direction.

"About the end of April we neared the fishing-ground, or, to be more technical, 'made the ice.'" C. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 128.
Male Sapphires

Male Sapphires. Deep indigo-coloured sapphires. The pale blue are Clavillé'no. (Cervantes: Don Quixote, part ii. book iii. chap. xiv.)

Malaprop (Mrs.), in The Rivals, by Sheridan. (French, mal à propos.)

Noted for her blunders in the use of words. “As headstrong as an allegory on the banks of the Nile” is one of her famous similes. (See Partington.)

Malbecco. A “cankered, crabbed ear,” very wealthy, but miserly and meek. He seems to be the impersonation of self-inflicted torments. He married a young wife named Helenore, who set fire to his house, and eloped with Sir Paridel. Malbecco cast himself over a high rock, and all his flesh vanished into thin air, leaving behind nothing but his ghost, which was metamorphosed into Jealousy. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iii.)

Malbrouk or Marlborough (Marl- bro'), does not date from the battle of Malplaq'quet (1709), but from the time of the Crusades, 600 years before. According to a tradition discovered by M. de Châteaubriand, the air came from the Arabs, and the tale is a legend of Mambrun, a crusader. It was brought into fashion during the Revolution by Mme. Poitrine, who used to sing it to her royal foster-child, the son of Louis XVI. M. Ar'ago tells us that when M. Monge, at Cairo, sang this air to an Egyptian audience, they all knew it, and joined in it. Certainly the song has nothing to do with the Duke of Marlborough, as it is all about feudal castles and Eastern wars. We are told also that the band of Captain Cook, in 1770, was playing the air one day on the east coast of Australia, when the natives evidently recognised it, and seemed enchanted. (Moniteur de l'Armée.)

"Malbrouk f’sen va-t’en guerre,
Miroton, miroton, miroton ;
Malbrouk s’en va-t’en guerre,
Nul sait quand reviendra.
Il reviendra à paques—
Miroton, miroton, miroton..."

On a la Trinité.”

The name Malbrouk occurs in the Chansons de Gestes, and also in the Basque Pastoralis.

Malcolm. Eldest son of Duncan, King of Scotland. He was called Cun-More (Great-head), and succeeded Macbeth (1038). (Shakespeare: Macbeth.)

Maldine (French). School. So called because at school "on dine assez mal."

Male. (See Sex.)

Male Sapphires. Deep indigo-coloured sapphires. The pale blue are the female sapphires. (Emmanuel: Diamonds and Precious Stones [1867].)

Male suada Fames. Hunger is a bad counsellor. The French say, "Fain aux, demi enrage ."

Malebolge (4 syll). The eighth circle of Dante's Inferno, which contained in all ten bolgi or pits.

"There is a place within the depths of hell called Malebolge." Dante: Inferno, xiii.

Malecasa. The impersonation of lust. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, ii. 1.)

Maleger [wretchedly thin]. Captain of the rabble rout which attack the castle of Temperance. He was "thin as a rake," and cold as a serpent. Prince Arthur attacks him and flings him to the ground, but Maleger springs up with renewed vigour. Arthur now stabs him through and through, but it is like stabbing a shadow; he then takes him in his arms and squeezes him as in a vice, but it is like squeezing a piece of sponge; he then remembers that every time the earl touches the earth his strength is renewed, so he squeezes all his breath out, and tosses the body into a lake. (See ANTELOS.) (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book ii. 11.)

Malecing [guile]. On his back he carried a net "to catch fools." Being attacked by Sir Artega and his iron man, he turned himself first into a fox, then to a bush, then to a bird, then to a hedgehog, then to a snake; but Talus was a match for all his deceits, and killed him. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, v. 9.)

Malepardsus. The castle of Master Reynard the Fox, in the tale so called.

Malherbe's Canons of French Poetry.

1. Poetry is to contain only such words as are in common use by well-educated Parisians.

2. A word ending with a vowel must in no case be followed by a word beginning with a vowel.

3. One line in no wise is to run into another.

4. The caesura must always be most strictly observed.

5. Every alternate rhyme must be feminine.

Mallet. Mahomet is so called in some of the old romances.

"Send five, send six against me. By Mahomet I swear, I'll take them all."—Pierides Malkin. The nickname of Mary, now called Molly. Hence the Maid Marian is so termed.

Malkin. A kitchen wench, now called a Molly, is by Shakespeare termed "the kitchen Malkin. (Coriolanus, ii. 1.)

Malkin. A scarecrow or figure dressed like a scullion; hence, anything made of rags, as a mop.

Malkin. A Moll or female cat, the male being a "Tom." When the cat-mews, the witch in Macbeth calls out, "I come, Grimalkin" (i. 1).

Mall or Pall Mall (Londin). From the Latin palliare maltos (to strike with a mallet or bat); so called because it was where the ancient game of pell-mall used to be played. Cotgrave says:

"Pale mall's a space wherein a round ball is struck with a mallet through a high arch of iron. He that can do this most frequently wins."

It was a fashionable game in the reign of Charles II., and the walk called the Mall was appropriated to it for the king and his court.

Mallows. Abatain from mallows. This is the thirty-eighth symbol in the Protreptics. Pythagoras tells us that mallow was the first messenger sent by the gods to earth to indicate to man that they sympathised with them and had pity on them. To make food of mallows would be to dishonour the gods. Mallows are cathartic.

Malmesbury (William of). Eleventh century; author of numerous chronicles. His Gesta Regum Anglorum is a resume of English history from the arrival of the English in 440 to the year 1120. His Historia Norvegas gives a retrospect of the reign of Henry I., and terminates abruptly with the year 1143. His third work is called Gesta Pontificalum. All the three are included in the SCRIPTORES POST BEDAM.

Malmesbury Monastery, Founded by Maldulf, Meuldulf, or Meldun, an Irishman.

Malmsey Wine is the wine of Malvasia, in Candia.

"Thine grapes unspaying thy spendidu there, sity, Malvesse and muscadelle, these merveyous drunikes." Morte darthur.

(See DROWNED IN A BUTT OF ...)
famous exposition of the Ten Commandments. A Puritan divine. (1547-1646.)

Malt . . . Meal. When the malt gets about the meal. When persons, after dinner, get more or less fuddled.

"When the malt begins to get about the meal, they'll begin to speak about government in kind and state."—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. 11.

Malteese Cross. Made thus: X

Malthus'ian Doctrine. That population increases more than the means of increasing subsistence does, so that in time, if no check is put upon the increase of population, man must starve or all be ill-fed. Applied to individual nations, like Britain, it-intimated that something must be done to check the increase of population, as all the land would not suffice to feed its inhabitants.

Malum, in Latin, means an apple; and "malus, malus, malum" means evil. Southey, in his Commonplace Book, quotes a witty etymology given by Nicholson and Burn, making the noun derived from the adjective, in allusion, I suppose, to the apple eaten by Eve. Of course, malum (an apple) is the Greek melon or melon (an apple-tree).

Malum in Se (Latin). What is of itself wrong, and would be so even if no law existed against its commission, as lying, murder, theft.

Malum Prohibitum (Latin). What is wrong merely because it is forbidden, as eating a particular fruit was wrong in Adam and Eve, because they were commanded not to do so. Doing secular work on the Sabbath.

Malvolio. Steward to Olivia, in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

Mamamouchi. A mock honour. Better be a country gentleman in England than a foreign Mamamouchi. The honour is conferred on M. Jourdain. (Molière: Bourgeois Gentilhomme.)

Mambrino's Helmet was of pure gold, and rendered the wearer invulnerable. It was taken possession of by Rinaldo (Orlando Furioso). Cervantes tells us of a barber who was caught in a shower, and to protect his hat clapped his brazen basin on his head. Don Quixote insisted that this basin was the enchanted helmet of the Moorish king.

Mam'elon (2 syl., French). A mound in the shape of a woman's breast. These artificial mounds were common in the siege of Sebastopol. (Latin, mamma, a breast.)

Mamelukes (2 syl.) or Mamalukes (Arabic, mameh, a slave). A name given in Egypt to the slaves of the boys brought from the Caucasus, and formed into a standing army. In 1254 these military "slaves" raised one of their body to the supreme power; and Nour-eddin Ali, the founder of the Baharites, gave twenty-three sultans; in 1832 the dynasty of the Borjites, also Mamaluks, succeeded, and was followed by twenty-one successors. Selim I., Sultan of Turkey, overthrew the Mamluke kingdom in 1517, but allowed the twenty-four boys to be elected from their body. In 1811, Mohammed Ali by a wholesale massacre annihilated the Mamelukes, and became viceroy of Egypt.

Mamma, Mother. The former is Norman-French, and the latter Anglo-Saxon. (See PAPA.)

Mammet. A puppet, a favourite, an idol. A corruption of Mahomet. Mahometanism being the most prominent form of false religion with which Christendom was acquainted before the Reformation, it became a generic word to designate any false faith; even idolatry is called mammals.

Mammon. The god of this world. The word in Syriac means riches. (See Milton: Paradise Lost, bk. i. 674.) His speech in the council is book ii. 229, etc.

Mammon. In Spenser's Faerie Queene. Mammon says if Sir Guyon will serve him he shall be the richest man in the world; but the knight says money has no charm for him. Mammon then takes him to his smithy, and tells him he may make what orders he likes, but Guyon declines to make any. The god then offers to give him Philomet to wife, but Guyon will not accept the honour. Lastly, he takes him to Teresopsis's bower, and tells him to pluck the golden fruit, and rest on the silver stool; Sir Guyon again refuses, and after three days' sojourn in the infernal regions is led back to earth. (ii. 7.)

Mammon of Unrighteousness (The). Money. A Scripture phrase (Luke xvi. 9). Mammon was the Syrian of the body resolves itself into (1) the Manes; (2) the Anima or Spirit; (3) the Umbra. The Manes went either to Elysium or Tartarus; the Anima returned to the gods; but the Umbra hovered about the body as unwilling to quit it.

According to the Jews, man consists of body, soul, and spirit.

Man in Black (The). Supposed to be Goldsmith's father. (Citizen of the World.) Washington Irving has a tale with the same title.

Man in the Iron Mask (The). (See Iron Mask.)

Man in the Moon (The). Some say it is a man leaping on a fork, on which he is carrying a bundle of sticks picked up on a Sunday. The origin of this fable is from Num. xv. 32-36. Some add a dog also; thus the prologue in Midsummer Night's Dream says, "This man with lantern, dog, and bush of thorns, presenteth moonshine;" Chaucer says "he stole the bush" (Test. of Crosseide). Another tradition says that the man is Cain, with his dog and thorn-bush; the thorn-bush being emblematical of the thorns and briars of the fall, and the dog being the "soul fiend." Some poets make out the "man" to be Endymion, taken to the moon by Diana.

Man in the Moon. The nameless person at one time employed in elections to negotiate bribes. Thus the rumour was set flying among the electors that "the Man in the Moon had arrived."

I know no more about it than the man in the moon. I know nothing at all about the matter.

Man of Belial. Any wicked man. Shimei so called David (2 Sam. xvi. 7). The ungodly are called "children of Belial," or "sons of Belial." The word Belial means worthless one.

Man of Blood. David is so called (2 Sam. xvi. 7). The Puritans applied the term to Charles I, because he made war against his Parliament. Any man of violence.

Man of Blood and Iron (The). Otto von Bismarck (Prince Bismarck), called "man of blood" from his great war policy, and "iron" from his indomitable will. Many years Chancellor of Prussia and Germany. (Born September 1st, 1815.)

Man of Brass (The). Talos, the work of Hephaestus (Vulcan). He traversed Crete to prevent strangers from... setting foot on the island, and threw rocks at the Argonauts to prevent their landing. Talus used to make himself red-hot, and hurled intruders to death.

"That portentous Man of Brass

Held at Αρής made in days of yore,

Who stalked about the Cretan shore..."—Longfellow: The Wayside Inn.

Man of December. Napoleon III. He was made President of the French Republic December 11, 1848; made his coup d'état December 2, 1851; and was made Emperor December 2, 1852.

Man of Destiny (The). Napoleon I. (1761, 1804–1814, died 1821). He looked on himself as an instrument in the hands of destiny.

"The Man of Destiny... had power for a time to bind kings with chains, and nobles with fetters of iron."—Sir Walter Scott.

Man of Feeling. The title of a novel by Henry Mackenzie. His "man of feeling" is named Harley—a sensitive, bashful, kind-hearted, sentimental hero.

Man of Letters (A). An author.

Man of Remnants (A). A tailor.

Man of Ross. John Kyrie, of Ross, in Herefordshire, immortalised by Pope in his epistle On the Use of Riches.

Man of Salt. A man like Ανίφιας, always "melting into salt tears," called "drops of salt."

"This would make a man a man of salt.

To use his eyes for garden waterpots."—Shakespeare: King Lear, iv. 6.

Man of Sedan. Napoleon III, was so called, because he surrendered his sword to William, King of Prussia, after the battle of Sedan (September 2, 1870).

Man of Silence (The). Napoleon III. (1808, 1852–70, died 1873.)

"France? You must know better than I your position with the Man of Silence."—For Neptre and Town, chap. 1.

Man of Sin (The) (2 Thess. ii. 3). The Roman Catholics say the Man of Sin is Antichrist. The Puritans applied the term to the Pope of Rome; the Fifth Monarchy men to Cromwell; many modern theologians apply it to that "wicked one" (identical with the "last horn" of Dan. vii.) who is to immediately precede the second advent.

Man of Straw (A). A person without capital. It used to be customary for a number of worthless fellows to loiter about our law-courts to become false witnesses or surety for anyone who would buy their services; their badge was a straw in their shoes.

---

Man of the Hill (The). A tedious "hermit of the vale," which encumbers the story of Tom Jones, by Fielding.

Man of the Sea. (See OLD, etc.)

Man of the Third Republic (The). Napoleon III. (1802, reigned 1852–70, died 1873). (M. Gambetta; 1838–1882.)

Man of the World (A). One "knowing" in world-craft; no greenhorn. Charles Macklin brought out a comedy (1764), and Henry Mackenzie a novel (1773) with the same title.

Man of Three Letters. (See HOMO.)

Man-of-War (A). A Government fighting-ship. (Not now often used.)

Man-of-war, or, Portuguese man-of-war. A floating hydrozoan (Physalia physalis).

"Frank went to the captain and told him that Tom had given him leave to have the man-of-war if he could get it."—Golding: Adventures of the Young Mariner, 17.

Man-of-war bird. The frigate-bird.

Man of Wax. A model man; like one fashioned in wax. Horace speaks of the "waxen arms of Telephus," meaning model arms, or of perfect shape and grace; and the nurse says of Romeo, "Why, he's a man of wax" (1.3), which she explains by saying, "Nay, he's a flower, i' faith a very flower."

Man of Whipcord (A). A coachman. The reference is to his whip.

"He would not have suffered the coachman to proceed while the horses were unfit for service... Yet the man of whipcord escaped some severe reproach."—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, i.

Manche (French). Aimer mieux la manche qui le bras. Cupboard love. Manche is a slang word; a gratuity given to a cicerone, calman, or porter. It is the Italian mano encourage.

Jeter le manche apres la cocuée. To throw the helve after the hatchet. To abandon what may be useful, out of caprice, because a part of what you expected has not been realised. A horse is stolen, and the man, in ill-temper, throws away saddle and bridle.

Manchester. The first syllable is the Frisian man (a common); and the word means the Roman encampment on the common.

Manchester Poet. Charles Swain (1803–1874).

Manœuvre (A). A purveyor of food, a clerk of the kitchen. Chaucer has a "manœuvre" in his Canterbury Tales (Latin manœvps, manœvpsis).
Mandamus (Latin). A writ of King's Bench, commanding the person named to do what the writ directs. The first word is "Mandamus" (We command...).

Mandana. A stock name in heroic romance, which generally represents the fate of the world turning on the caprice of some beautiful Mandana or Statira.

Mandarin is not a Chinese word, but one given by the Portuguese colonists at Macao to the officials called by the natives Khiangping (3 syl.) It is from the verb mandar (to command).

The nine ranks of mandarins are distinguished by the button in their cap:—
1. ruby; 2. coral; 3. sapphire; 4. an opaque blue stone; 5. crystal; 6. an opaque white shell; 7. wrought gold; 8. plain gold; and 9. silver.

"The whole body of Chinese mandarins consists of twenty-seven members. They are appointed for (1) impertinent birth; (2) long servitude; (3) innumerable deeds; (4) knowledge; (5) ability; (6) zeal; (7) capacity; and (8) aristocratic birth."—Hunting.

Mandeville (Bernard de). A licentious Deistical writer, author of The Virgin Unmasked, and Ever Thoughts on Religion, in the reign of George III.

Mandosians. Very short swords. So called from a certain Spanish nobleman of the house of Mendosa, who brought them into use. (See Swords.)

Mandrabul. From gold to nothing, like Mandrabul's offspring, Mandrabul, having found a gold-mine in Samos, offered to Juno a golden ram for the discovery; next year he gave a silver one, then a brazen one, and in the fourth year nothing. The proverb "to bring a noble to nienepence, and ninepence to nothing," carries the same meaning.

Mandrake. The root of the mandragora often divides itself in two, and presents a rude appearance of a man. In ancient times human figures were often cut out of the root, and wonderful virtues ascribed to them. It was used to produce fecundity in women (Gen. xxx, 14-16). Some mandrakes cannot be pulled from the earth without producing fatal effects, so a cord used to be fixed to the root, and round a dog's neck, and the dog being chased drew out the mandrake and died. Another superstition is that when the mandrake is uprooted it utters a scream, in explanation of which Thomas Newton, in his Herbal to the Bible, says, "It is supposed to be a creature having life, engendered under the earth of the seed of some dead person put to death for murder."

"Shrinks like mandrakes turn out of the earth."—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, iv. 3.

Mandrakes called love-apples. From the old notion that they excited amorous inclinations; hence Venus is called Mandragoritiss, and the Emperor Julian, in his epistles, tells Calix'tem that he drank its juice nightly as a love-potion.

He has eaten mandrake. Said of a very indolent and sleepy man, from the narcotic and stupefying properties of the plant, well known to the ancients.

"Give me to drink mandragora... That I much sleep out this great gap of time... My Antony is away."—Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, i. 5.

Mandrake. Another superstition connected with this plant is that a small dose makes a person vain of his beauty, and concocted: but that a large dose makes him an idiot.

Mandricardo. King of Tartary, or Scythia, son of Agrician. He wore Hector's cuirass, married Doralis, and was slain in single combat by Rogero. (Orlando Innamorato, and Orlando Furioso.)

Mandue (2 syl.). The idol Gluttony, venerated by the Gastrolaters, people whose god was their belly.

"It is a monstrous... figure, fit to frighten little children; its eyes are larger than its belly, and its head larger than all the rest of its body... having a deadly pair of wide jaws, lined with two rows of teeth, which, in the manner of a small twine... are made to clash, chatter, and rattle against the other, as the jaws of St. Clement's dragon (called granulo) on St. Mark's procession at Metz."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, iv. 30.

Manes. To appease his Manes. To do when a person is dead what would have pleased him or was due to him when alive. The spirit or ghost of the dead was by the Romans called his Manes, which never slept quietly in the grave so long as survivors left its wishes unfilled. The 19th February was the day when all the living sacrificed to the shades of dead relations and friends.

Manes (2 syl.) from the old word manes, i.e. "souls," quod eos venerantias manes vorarent, ut timent Christum." (See Lucan's, ii. 42.) It cannot come from meneo, to remain (because this part of man remains after the body is dead), because the a is long.

In the Christian Church there is an All Souls' Day.

Manfred. Count Manfred, son of Count Sigismund, sold himself to the Prince of Darkness, and had seven spirits bound to do his bidding, viz. the spirits of "earth, ocean, air, night, mountains, winds," and the star of his own destiny. He was wholly without human sympathies, and lived in splendid solitude among the Alpine mountains. He once loved the Lady As'tarte (2 syl.) who died, but Manfred went to the hall of Arima'næ to see and speak to her phantom, and was told that he would die the following day. The next day the Spirit of his Destiny came to summon him; the proud count scornfully dismissed it, and died. (Byron: Manfred.)

Manger or Manger le Morœau. To betray, to impeach, to turn king's evidence. The allusion is to the words of Jesus to the beloved disciple—he will be the traitor "to whom I shall give a sop when I have dipped it," etc. (John xiii. 26.)

Manheim, in Scandinavian mythology, is the abode of Man. Vanirheim is the abode of the Vanir. Jötunheim is the abode of the giants. Gladsheim is the abode of Odin. Helheim is the abode of Hela (goddess of death). Muspellheim is the abode of elemental fire. Nifheim is hell. Svartalheim is the abode of the dwarfs.

Man'ni. The son of Mundilfor; taken to heaven by the gods to drive the moon-car. He is followed by a wolf, which, when time shall be no more, will devour both Mani and his sister Sol.

Mani, Manes, or Manichea. The greatest Persian painter, who lived in the reign of Shah-pour (Sapor I.). It is said he produced rivalled nature. (226-274.)

Manichea'ns or Manichees. A religious sect founded by Mani or Manichaeus, the Persian painter. It was an amalgamation of the Magian and Christian religions, intermixed with a little Buddhism. In order to enforce his religious system, Mani declared himself to be the Paraclete or Comforter promised by Jesus Christ.

Man'itou. The American Indian fetish.

Manlian Orders. Overstrained severity. Manlius Torqu'atus, the Roman consul, gave orders in the Latin war that no Roman, on pain of death, should engage in single combat; but one of the Latins provoked young Manlius by repeated insults, and Manlius slew him. When the young man took the spoils to his father, Torqu'atus ordered him to be put to death for violating the commands of his superior officer.

Manly, in the Plain Dealer, by Wycherly. He is violent and uncouth, but presents an excellent contrast to the hypocritical Olivia (q.v.).

Mr. Manly, in The Provoked Husband, by Vanbrugh and Cibber.

Manna (Exodus xvi. 15), popularly said to be a corrupt form of man-lh (What is this?) The marginal reading gives—"When the children of Israel saw it [the small round thing like hoarfrost on the ground], they said to one another, What is this? for they wist not what it was.

"And the house of Israel called the name thereof manna. It was like coriander seed, white: and the taste of it was like wafers made with honey." (Verse 31.)

Manna of St. Nicholas of Bari. The name given to a colourless and tasteless poison, sold in phials by a woman of Italy named Tofani, who confessed to having poisoned six hundred persons by this liquid.

Man'nering. Colonel or Guy Manner:ing: Mrs. Mannering, née Sophia Wellwood, his wife; Julia Mannering, their daughter, who married Captain, Bertram; Sir Paul Mannering, the colonel's uncle. In Sir Walter Scott's novel of Guy Mannering.

Mannington (George). A criminal executed at Cambridge in 1476. It is said that he could cut off a horse's head at a single blow.

"It is in imitation of Mannington—be that was hanged at Cambridge—that cut off the horse's head at a blow,"—Eastward Ho!

Manningtree (Essex). Noted for its Whitsun fair, where an ox was roasted whole. Shakespeare makes Prince Henry call Falstaff "a roasted Mannington ox. with the pudding in his belly." (1 Henry IV, ii. 4.)

"You shall have a slave cut more at a mea-sel than ten of the guard; and drink more in two days than all Mannington does in a Wiltshire."—Shakespeare.

Mano'a. The fabulous capital of El Dorado, the houses of which city were said to be roofed with gold.

Manon Lescaut. A novel by the Abba Prevost. It is the history of a young man possessed of many brilliant and some estimable qualities, but, being intoxicated by a fatal attachment, he is hurried into the violation of every rule of conduct, and finally prefers the life of a wretched wanderer, with the worthless object of his affection, to all the advantages presented by nature and fortune.

Manor, Demene. "Demene land" is that near the demeuse or dwelling (domus) of the lord, and which he kept for his own use. Manor land was all that remained (manoe), which was let to tenants for money or service.

In some manors there was common land also, i.e. land belonging in common to two or more persons in the whole village, or to certain natives of the village.

Mansard Root, also called the curb roof. A roof in which the rafters, instead of forming a T, are broken on each side into an elbow. It was devised by François Mansard, the French architect, to give height to attics. (1698-1686.)

Mansfield. The Miller of Mansfield. Henry II. was one day hunting, and lost his way. He met a miller, who took him home to his cottage, and gave him a bed with his son Richard. Next morning the courtiers tracked the king to the cottage, and the miller discovered the rank of his guest. The king, in merry mood, knighted his host, who thus became Sir John Cockle. On St. George's Day, Henry II. invited the miller, his wife and son to a royal banquet, and after being amused with their rustic ways, made Sir John "overseer of Sherwood Forest, with a salary of £300 a year." (Percy: Reliques.)

Mansion. The Latin mansion was simply a tent pitched for soldiers on the march; and, hence, a "day's journey." (Pliny, xii. 14). Subsequently the word was applied to a roadside house for the accommodation of strangers. (Suetonius: Tit. 10.)

Mantuacini. A charlatan who professed to restore the dead to life.

Mantellini (Madame). A fashionable milliner near Cavendish Square. Her husband, noted for his white teeth, minced oaths, and gorgeous morning gown, is an exquisite man-miller, who lives on his wife's earnings. (Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby.)

Mantelpiece. (A). A shelf over a fire-place, originally used for drying clothes.

"Around the spacious cupola, over the Italian fire-places, is a ledge to which are affixed pegs, on which the milliner hung their wet clothes to dry. We call the shelves over the fire-places 'mantelpieces;' but we no longer hang our mantles on them to dry." (Memoir of W. Mountjoy.)

Mantible (Bridge of) consisted of thirty arches of black marlde, and was guarded by a fearful huge giant," slain by Sir Fierabras.

Mantar. An heraldic monster, having a tiger's body, and the head of an old man with long spiral horns.

Mantle of Fidelity (The). A little boy one day presented himself before King Arthur, and showed him a curious mantle, "which would become no wife that was not leal." Queen Guinever tried it, but it changed from green to red, and red to black, and seemed rent into shreds. Sir Kay's lady tried it, but fared no better; others followed, but only Sir Cradock's wife could wear it. (Percy: Reliques.) (See CHASTITY.)

Mantra or Mintra (Persian mythology). A spell, a talisman, by which a person holds sway over the elements and spirits of all denominations. (Wilford.)

Man'tuan Swain, Swan, or Bard (The). Virgil, a native of Mantua, in Italy. Besides his great Latin epic, he wrote pastorals and Georgics.

Man'nuodita (The). An old name for a bird of paradise. It is a corruption of the Malay mantu-ne-devata, the bird of the gods.

"Less pure the footless fowl of heaven, that never rests upon earth, but on the wing for ever. Hovering o'er flowers, their fragrant food inhale. Drink the descending dew upon the way; and sleep aloft while floating on the gale." (Rouchet: Curne of Relkamo, xxv. 6.)

Man'umit. To set free; properly "to send from one's hand" (e manumitter). One of the Roman ways of freeing a slave was to take him before the chief magistrate and say, "I wish this man to be free." The lictor or master then turned the slave round in a circle, struck him with a rod across the cheek, and let him go.

Manure (2 syl.) means hand-work (French, main-œuvre), tillage by manual labour. It now means the dressing applied to lands. Milton uses it in its original sense in Paradise Lost, iv. 628:

"You flowery arbours... with branches over-grown That mark our scant manuring."

"In book xi. 26 he says, the repentant tears of Adam brought forth better fruits than all the trees of Paradise that his hands manured in the days of innocence.

Many. (See Too Many.)

Many a Mickle makes a Muckle, or Many a little makes a mickle. Little and often fills the purse. (See LITTLE.)

French: "Les petits ruisseaux font de grandes rivières;" "Plusieurs peu font un beaucoup."

Greek:

"Εἰ γάρ κεν καὶ σμικρὰν ἐπὶ σμικρᾶς καταθέο, Καὶ θαῦμα τεύχει ἐρωμά, τὰκεν μέγα καὶ τὸ γένος." Hiero: Works and Days, 295, etc.
Many Men, Many Minds.

Latin: "Quot homines tot sententiae" (Terence).

French: "Autant d'hommes, autant d'avis"; "Tant de gens, tant de guises"; "Autant de testes, autant d'opinions."

Mao'ri (The). The indigenous inhabitants of New Zealand. It is a New Zealand word, meaning natives. (Plur., Mao'ris.)

Mara. A goblin that seized upon men asleep in their beds, and took from them all speech and motion.

Mar'abou Feathers. Feathers of the bird so called, used by ladies for head-gear. There are two species of marabou stork, which have white feathers beneath their wings and tail especially prized. The word "marabou" means "devoted to God," and the stork is a sacred bird. (See Marabuts.)

Marabout (in French). A big-bellied kettle; a very large sail; an ugly baboon of a man; also a sort of plume at one time worn by ladies. The "marabout hat" was a hat adorned with a marabou feather.

Marabuts. An Arab tribe which, in 1075, founded a dynasty, put an end to by the Almobads. They form a priestly order greatly venerated by the common people. The Great Marabut ranks next to the king. (Arabic, marabath, devoted to God.)

Marana'tha (Syriac, the Lord will come—i.e. to execute judgment). A form of anathematising among the Jews. The Romans called a curse or imprecation a devotion—i.e. given up to some one of the gods.

Maravedi (4 syl.). A very small Spanish coin, less than a farthing.

Marbles. The Arundelian Marbles. Some thirty-seven statues and 128 busts with inscriptions, collected by W. Petty, in the reign of James I., in the island of Paros, and purchased of him by Lord Arundel, who gave them to the University of Oxford in 1627.

The Elgin marbles. A collection of basso-relievo and fragments of statuary from the Parthenon of Athens (built by Phidias), collected by Thomas, Lord Elgin, during his mission to the Ottoman Porte in 1802. They were purchased from him by the British Government, in 1816, for £35,000, and are now in the British Museum. (The gin of "Elgin" is like the -gin of "begin.")

Money and marbles. Cash and furniture.

Marca'assin (The Prince). From the Italian fairy-tales by Straparola, called Nights, translated into French in 1586.

Marcella. A fair shepherdess whose story forms an episode in Don Quixote.

Maroch'ina. The daughter of Rocco, jailor of the state prison of Seville. She falls in love with Fidelio, her father's servant, who turns out to be Leonora, the wife of the state prisoner Fernando Florestan. (Beethoven: Fidelio.)

Marcellus (in Dibdin's Bibbomania, a romance,) is meant for Edmund Malone, the well-known editor of Shakespeare's works (1811).

March. He may be a rogue, but he's no fool on the march. (French, sur la marche likewise.)

March borrows three days from April. (See Borrowed Days.)

March Dust. A bushel of March dust is worth a king's ransom. According to the Anglo-Saxon laws, the fine of murder was a sliding scale proportioned to the rank of the person killed. The lowest was £10, and the highest £60; the former was the ransom of a churl, and the latter of a king.

March Hare. Mad as a March hare. Hares in March are very wild; it is their rutting time. (See Hare.)

Marches (boundaries) is the Saxon meaw; but marsh, a meadow, is the Saxon meaw, anciently written marus, the French marais, and our meares. The other march is the origin of our marquis, the lord of the march. The boundaries between England and Wales, and between England and Scotland, were called "marches."

Riding the marches—i.e. beating the bounds of the parish (Scotch).

Marchaunder's Tale (in Chaucer) is substantially the same as the first Latin metrical tale of Adolphus, and is not unlike a Latin prose tale given in the appendix of T. Wright's edition of Asop's Fables. (See January and May.)

Marching Watch. A splendid pageant on Midsummer Eve, which Henry VIII. took Jane Seymour to Mercers' Hall to see. In 1647 Sir John Gresham, the Lord Mayor, restored the pageant, which had been discontinued on account of the sweating sickness.
Marchington (Staffordshire). Famous for a crumbling short cake. Hence the saying that a man or woman of crusty temper is "as short as Marchington wake-cake."

Marthomess (Ther). The half-starved girl-of-all-work in The Old Curiosity Shop, by Charles Dickens.

Marchpane. A confection of pistachio-nuts, almonds, and sugar; a corruption of the French masne-pain. (Italian, marzapane.)

M'c'Clintos (3 syl.). An ascetic Gnostic sect, founded by Marcion in the second century.

Mack (William de la), or "The Wild Boar of Ardennes," A French nobleman, called in French history Sauveur des Ardennes, introduced by Sir Walter Scott in Quentin Durward (1446-1485).

Marley Hill (Herefordshire), on February 7th, 1571, at six o'clock in the evening, "it roused itself with a roar, and by seven next morning had moved forty paces." It kept on the move for three days, carrying with it sheep in their cotes, hedge-rows, and trees; overthrew Kinnaston chapel, and diverted two high roads at least 200 yards from their former route. The entire mass thus moved consisted of twenty-six acres of land, and the entire distance moved was 400 yards. (Speed: Herefordshire.)

Marcos de Obregon. The model of Gil Blas, in the Spanish romance entitled Relaciones de la Vida del Escuadero Marcos de Obregon.

Marcosiana. A branch of the Gnostics; so called from the Egyptian Marcus. They are noted for their apocryphal books and religious fables.

Mardi Gras. The last day of the Lent carnival in France, when the prize ox is paraded through the principal streets of Paris, crowned with a fillet, and accompanied with mock priests and a band of tin instruments in imitation of a Roman sacrificial procession.

Mardle. To waste time in gossip. (Anglo-Saxon, mæthel-tan, to talk; mæthel, a discourse.)

Mardonius (Captain), in A King or No King, by Beaumont and Fletcher.

Mare. The Cromlech at Gorwel, Dorsetshire, is called the White Mare; the barrows near Hambleton, the Grey Mare.

Away the mare—i.e. Off with the blue devils, good-bye to care. This mare is the incubus called the nightmare.

To cry the mare (Herefordshire and Shropshire). In harvesting, when the in-gathering is complete, a few blades of corn left for the purpose have their tops tied together. The reapers then place themselves at a certain distance, and fling their sickles at the "mare." He who succeeds in cutting the knot cries out "I have her!" "What have you?" "A mare." "Whose is she?" The name of some farmer whose field has been reaped is here mentioned. "Where will you send her?" The name of some farmer whose corn is not yet harvested is here given, and then all the reapers give a final shout.

To win the mare or lose the halter—i.e. to play double or quits.

The grey mare is the better horse. (See Grey Mare.)

The two-legged mare. The gallows.

Shanks's mare. One's legs or shanks.

Money will make the mare to go.

"Will you lend me your mare to go a mile?"
"No, she is lame bearing: over a mile:
"But if you will her to me spare,
You shall have money for your mare:
"Oh, ho! say you so?
Money will make the mare to go." — Old Green and Cottenas.

Whose mare's dead? What's the matter? Thus, in 2 Henry 7th., when Sir John Falstaff sees Mistress Quickly with the sheriff's officers, evidently in a state of great discomposure, he cries, Mare's Nest. To find a mare's nest is to make what you suppose to be a great discovery, but which turns out to be all moonshine.

"Are we to believe that the governor, executive council, the officers, and merchants have been finding mare's nests only?"—The Times.

N.B. In some parts of Scotland they use instead a skate's nest. In Gloucestershire a long-winded tale is called a Horse-nest. In Cornwall they say you have found a weas' nest, and are laughing over the eggs. In Devon, nonsense is called a blind mare's nest. Holinshed calls a gallow a fonl's nest (iii.). In French the corresponding phrase is Mareotic Luxury

"Huit de lapin; Huit d’une souris dans l’oselle d’un chat." (See Chat.)

Mareotic Luxury. The Arva Mareotica mentioned by Ovid (Metamorphoses, ix. 73) produced the white grapes, from which was made the favourite beverage of Cleopatra, and mention of which is made both by Horace (Odes, i. 37) and Virgil (Georgics, ii. 91). The Arva Mareotica were the shores of Lake Moris, and "Mareotic luxury" is about equal to "Sybaritic luxury."

Margaret. Name of an Indian queen in Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato, and in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso.

Marto'rio. A pasquinade (q.v.).

Margan Monastery (Register of), 1066 to 1292, published in Gale, 1687.

Margaret, Queen of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, called the "Northern Semiramis" (1353, 1387-1412).

Margaret. A simple, uncultured girl of wonderful witchery, seduced, at the age of fifteen, by Faust. She drowned in a pool the infant of her shame, was sent to prison, where she lost her reason, and was ultimately condemned to death. Faust (whom she calls Henry) visits her in prison, and urges her to make her escape with him; but she refuses, dies, and is taken to heaven; but Mephistophelis carried off Faust to the Inferno. (Goethe: Faust.)

Ladye Margaret. "The Flower of Teviot," daughter of the Duchess Margaret and Lord Walter Scott, of Branksome Hall. She was beloved by Baron Henry of Cranstown, whose family had a deadly feud with that of Scott. One day the eldin page of Lord Cranstown inveigled the heir of Branksome Hall, then a lad, into the woods, where he fell into the hands of the Southerners: whereupon 3,000 of the English marched against the castle of the widowed duchess; but, being told by a spy that Douglas with 10,000 men was coming to the rescue, they agreed to decide by single combat whether the boy was to become King Edward's page, or be delivered up to his mother. The champions to decide this question were to be Sir Richard Musgrave on the side of the English, and Sir William Deloraine on the side of the Scotch. In the combat the English champion was slain, and the boy was delivered to the widow; but it then appeared that the antagonist was not William of Deloraine, but Lord Cranstown, who claimed and received the hand of fair Margaret as his reward. (Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel)

Lady Margaret's preacher. A preacher who has to preach a Consec ad eisenum before the University, on the day preceding Easter Term. This preachership was founded in 1563 by Lady Margaret, mother of Henry VII.

Lady Margaret professor. A professor of divinity in the University of Cambridge. This professorship was founded in 1562 by Lady Margaret, mother of Henry VII. These lectures are given for the "voluntary theological examination," and treat upon the Fathers, the Liturgy, and the priestly duties. (See Norrisian.)

Margaret (St.). The chosen type of female innocence and meekness.

In Christian art she is represented as a young woman of great beauty, bearing the martyr's palm and crown, or with the dragon as an attribute. Sometimes she is delineated as coming from the dragon's mouth, for the legend says that the monster swallowed her, but on making the sign of the cross he suffered her to quit his maw.

St. Margaret and the dragon. Olyb'ins, Governor of Antioch, captivated by the beauty of St. Margaret, wanted to marry her, and, as she rejected him with scorn, threw her into a dungeon, where the devil came to her in the form of a dragon. Margaret held up the cross, and the dragon fled.

St. Margaret is the patron saint of the ancient borough of Lynn Regis, and on the corporation seal she is represented as standing on a dragon and wounding it with the cross. The inscription of the seal is "SVR MARGARETA TERTIV DRACO STAT CRUCE LEBEL."

Margaret. A magpie.

Margarine Substitute (A). A mere imitation. Just as margarine is an imitation and substitute of butter.

"Between a real itching and that margarine substitute a pen-and-ink drawing: the difference is this, the margarine substitute is essentially flat... but true itching is in sensuous relief."—Nineteenth Century, May 1891, p. 790.

Margate (Kent), is the sea-gate or opening. (Latin, mare; Angle-Saxon, mara, etc.)
Marines

Marl's (2 syl.). The female Marine. Hannah Snell, of Worcester, who took part in the attack on Pondicherry. She ultimately left the service and opened a public-house in Wapping (London), but retained her male attire (born 1723). * Doubts exist respecting the fact stated above. (See Notes and Queries, Dec. 3, 1892.)

Marines (2 syl.). Empty bottles. The marines were at one time looked down upon by the regular seamen, who

Marines di Valois married Henri the Béarnais, afterwards Henri IV. of France. During the wedding solemnities, Catherine de Medicis devised the massacre of the French Protestants, and Margerita was at a ball during the dreadful enactment of this device. (Meyerbeer: Giulio Cesare, an opera.)

Margin. In our all ancient English books, the commentary is printed in the margin. Hence Shakespeare:

"His face's own margin did quote such amazons."

(Love's Labour's Lost, iv. 1.)

"I knew you must be called by the margin."—Hamlet, v. 2.

"Blow... could pick no meaning... Writ in the glassy margin of such books."

*Shakespeare: Bay of Locrus, stanza 15.

Margrét. The first dunces whose name has been transmitted to fame. His rivals are Codrus and Flecknoe.

"Marguerita was the name... whom Antiquity recorded... to have been dunces in the first...— Pope: Dunciad (Margiana Scriblerus).

Marguerite des Marguerites [the pearl of pearls]. So François called his sister (Margarita de Valois), authoress of the Heptameron. She married twice: first, the Duc d'Alençon, and then Henri d'Albret, king of Navarre, and was the mother of Henry IV. of France. Henri [IV.] married a Marguerite, but this Marguerite was the daughter of Henri II. and Catherine de Medicis. The former befriended the Huguenots, the latter was a rigid Catholic, like her mother.

Margute (3 syl.). A giant ten feet high, who died of laughter on seeing a monkey pulling on his boots. (Pulci: Margante Maggiore. (See DEATH FROM STRANGE CAUSES.)

Maria. Heroine of Donizetti's opera La Figlia del Reginamento. She first appears as a vivandière or French sutler-girl, for Sulpiro (the sergeant of the 11th regiment of Napoleon's Grand Army) had found her after a battle, and the regiment adopted her as their daughter. Tonio, a Tyrolean, saved her life and fell in love with her, and the regiment agreed to his marriage provided he joined the regiment. Just at this juncture the marchioness of Berkenfield claims Maria as her daughter; the claim is allowed, and the vivandière is obliged to leave the regiment for the castle of the marchioness. After a time the French regiment takes possession of Berkenfield Castle, and Tonio has risen to the rank of field officer. He claims Maria as his bride, but is told that her mother has promised her hand to the son of a duchess. Maria promises to obey her mother, the marchioness relent, and Tonio becomes the accepted suitor.

Maria. A fair, quick-witted, amiable maiden, whose bans were forbidden by the curates who published them; in consequence of which she lost her reason, and used to sit by the roadside near Moulins, playing vespers hymns to the Virgin all day long. She led by a ribbon a little dog named Silvio, of which she was very jealous, for she had first made a goat her favourite, but the goat had forsaken her. (Sterne: Sentimental Journey.)

Maria Theresa. Wife of Sancho Panza. She is sometimes called Maria, sometimes Teresa Panza. (Don Quixote.)

Marianites (4 syl.). Worshippers of Mary, the mother of Jesus. They said the Trinity consisted of God the Father, God the Son, and Mary the mother of God.

Marian. One of the most lovable of Shakespeare's characters. Her pleading for Angelo is unrivalled. (Measure for Measure.)

Tennyson has two Marianas among his poems.

Mariana. Daughter of the king of Sicily, beloved by Sir Alexander, one of the three sons of St. George, the patron saint of England. Sir Alexander married her, and was crowned king of Thessaly. (Seven Champions of Christendom, iii. 3.)

Marigold. So called in honour of the Virgin Mary, and hence the introduction of marigold windows in lady chapels. (See MARYGOLD.)

"This riddle, Cuddy, if thou canst explain... What flower is that which bears the Virgin's name? The richest metal added to the same?"

Gay: Pastoral.

Marina. Wife of Jacopo Foscaro, son of the doge. (Byron: The Two Foscaris.)

Marinda or Marida. The fair mistress of Haroun-al-Raschid.

Marine (2 syl.). Empty bottles. considered them useless, like empty bottles. A marine officer was once dining at a mess-table, when the Duke of York said to the man in waiting, "Here, take away these marines." The officer demanded an explanation, when the duke replied, "They have done their duty, and are prepared to do it again."

Tell that to the marines. Tell that to greenhorns, and not to men who know better. Marines are supposed by sailors to be so green that they will swallow the most extravagant story.

"Tell that to the marines, the sailors won't believe it."—Sir W. Scott: Bodtandiel, chap. xiii.

Mariner's Compass. The fleur-de-lis which ornaments the northern radius of the mariner's compass was adopted out of compliment to Charles d'Anjou, whose device it was. He was the reigning king of Sicily when Flavio Gioja, the Neapolitan, made his improvements in this instrument.

Marino Faliero. The forty-ninth doge or chief magistrate of the republic of Venice, elected 1534. A patrician named Michel Steno, having behaved indecently to some of the women assembled at the great civic banquet given by the doge, was kicked off the solajo by order of the Duke. In revenge he wrote upon the duke's chair a scurrilous libel against the dogaressa. The insult was referred to the Forty, and the council condemned the young patrician to a month's imprisonment. The doge, furious at this inadequate punishment, joined a conspiracy to overthrow the republic, under the hope and promise of being made a king. He was betrayed by Bertram, one of the conspirators, and was beheaded on the "Giant's Staircase," the place where the dogs were wont to take the oath of fidelity to the republic. (Byron: Marino Faliero.)

Mariotte's Law. At a given temperature, the volume of a gas is inversely as the pressure. So called from Ed. Mariotte, a Frenchman, who died 1684.

Maritornes (Spanish, bad wench). A vulgar, ugly, stout-faced servant-wench, whom Don Quixote mistakes for a lord's daughter, and her "hair, rough as a horse's tail," his diseased imagination fancies to be "silken threads of finest gold." (Cervantes: Don Quixote.)

Marivaudage (4 syll.). An imitation of the style of Marivaux (1688-1763). He wrote several comedies and novels. "Il tombe souvent dans une métaphysique ambiguëe [far-fetched, over-strained] pour laquelle on a créé le nom de marivaudage."

"Ce qui constitue le marivaudage, c'est une recherche affectée dans le style, une grande subtilité dans les arguments, ou une grande complication d'intrigues."—Bouillet: Dict. Universal, etc.

Marjoram. As a pig loves marjoram. Not at all. Lucretius tells us (vi. 974), "Amaricum fugitat ens," swine shun marjoram. The proverb is applied in somewhat this way: "How did you like so-and-so?" Aus.: "Well, as a pig loves marjoram."

Mark. God bless the mark! An ejaculation of contempt or scorn. (See Save the Mark.)

"To be ruled by my conscience, I should stay with the Jew my master, who, God bless the mark! is a kind of devil."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, ii. 2.

To make one's mark. To distinguish oneself. He has written his name (or made his mark) on the page of history.

Up to the mark. Generally used in the negative; as, "Not quite up to the mark," not good enough, not up to the standard fixed by the Assay office for gold and silver articles; not quite well.

Mark (Sir), in Christian art, is represented as being in the prime of life: sometimes habited as a bishop, and, as the historian of the resurrection, accompanied by a winged lion (q.v.). He holds in his right hand a pen, and in his left the Gospel. (See Luke.)

Mark (Sir). A mythical king of Cornwall, Sir Tristram's uncle. He lived at Tintagel Castle, and married Isolde the Fair, who was passionately enamoured of his nephew, Sir Tristram. The illicit loves of Isolde and Tristram were proverbial in the Middle Ages.

Mark Banco. An hypothetical quantity of fine silver, employed as a money-valuer in the old Bank at Hamburg, and used by the Hanseatic League. Deposits in gold and silver coins were credited in Marco Banco, and all banking accounts were carried on in Marco Banco. The benefit was this: Marco Banco was invariable, but exchange varies every hour. The bank not only credited deposits by this unvarying standard, but paid withdrawals in the same way; so that it was a matter of no moment how exchange varied. I put £1,000 into the bank; the money is not entered to my credit as £1,000, but so much Marco Banco. The same process was adopted on withdrawals also.

Mark Tapley. Ever jolly, who recognises nothing creditable unless it is overclouded by difficulties. (Charles Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit.)

Mark Time! Move the feet alternately as in marching, but without advancing or retreating from the spot.

Mark of the Beast (The). To set the "mark of the beast" on an object or pursuit is to denounce it, to run it down as unhorthodox. Thus, many persons set the mark of the beast on theatres, some on dancing, and others on gambling, races, cards, dice, etc. The allusion is to Revelation xvi. 2; xix. 23.

Mark's Eve (St.). On St. Mark's Eve all persons fated to be married or to die pass, in procession, the church porch.

"...Thus now," replied the village belle,
'St. Mark's mysterious eve, ...
The ghost of all whom Death shall doom
Within the coming year
In pale procession walk the gnomes,' ...
J. Montgomery.

Marks in Grammar and Printing.
Printers' marks on the first page of a sheet are called Signature. (See Letters at Foot of Page.)

Serfs are the strokes which finish off Roman letters, top and bottom. A, B, C, are "block" letters, or "sans serifs," over the second of two vowels, as arial, is called "diaeresis," and in French, trena.

An acute accent. In Greek it indicates a rise in the voice. It was not used till Greek became familiar to the Romans.

A grave accent. In Greek it indicates a fall of the voice. It was not used till Greek became familiar to the Romans.

over a vowel, as ô, û, is called in German zerrimnet.

over a vowel, as ü, is called in Danish wannlaf.

A circumflex over the letter n (as Òñor), in Spanish, is called a tilde (2 syl.). A circumflex in French indicates that a letter has been abstracted, as ètre for "être."

t between two hyphens in French, as parle-t-il?, is called "t euphonic." (See N.)

& The Tironian sign (q.v.). (See And.)

- Hyphen, as horse-guards.
- joining a pronoun to its verb in French, as ina-tjr, donnait-on, is called le trait d'union.

under the letter c in French, is called a cedilla, and indicates that the letter = s. (See Printers' Marks.)

An index-hand, to call attention to a statement.

[ ] A blind M, marks a new paragraph indirectly connected with preceding matter.

( ) Called parentheses, and [ ] Called brackets, separate some explanatory or collateral matter from the real sequence.

, is a comma; : is a semicolon; ; is a colon; … is a point or full stop.

— or . . . , in the middle or at the end of a sentence is a break, and shows that something is suppressed.

Marks of Gold and Silver.
The date—mark on gold or silver articles is some letter of the alphabet indicating the year when the article was made. Thus, in the Goldsmith's Company of London:—From 1716 to 1755 it was Roman capitals, beginning from A and following in succession year after year: from 1756 to 1775 it was Roman small letters, a to u; from 1776 to 1796, Roman black letters, small, a to u; from 1796 to 1815, Roman capitals, A to U; from 1815 to 1835, Roman small letters; from 1835 to 1855, Old English capitals; from 1855 to 1875, Old English, small; 1876 to 1895, Roman capitals.
The duty—mark on gold and silver articles is the head of the reigning sovereign, and shows that the duty has been paid. This mark is not now placed on watch-cases, etc.
The Hall-mark, stamped upon gold and silver articles, is a leopard's head crowned for London; three lions and a cross for York; a castle with two wings for Exeter; three wheat sheaves or a dagger for Chester; three castles for Newcastle; an anchor for Birmingham; a crown for Sheffield; a castle and lion for Edinburgh; a tree, salmon, and ring for Glasgow; Hibernia for Dublin. (See Hall Mark, Silver.)
The Standard—mark of gold or silver is a lion passant for England; a thistle for Edinburgh; a lion rampant for Glasgow; and a harp crowned for Ireland.

Market-penny (A). Money for refreshments given to those who go to market. Now, however, it means a toll surreptitiously exacted by servants sent out to buy goods for their master.

Markham (Mrs.). A nom de plume of Elizabeth Cartwright, afterwards Mrs. Penrose.
Marl 811  Marphisa

Marl. Latin, argil'; German, mär-gel; Spanish and Italian, marga; Armoric, marrg, marrl; Welsh, murl.

Marlborough. Statutes of Marlborough. Certain laws passed in the reign of Henry III., by a parliament held in Marlborough Castle. (See Marlborough [Seu va-t-l'en guerre].)

Marlborough Dog. (See Blenheim Dog.)

Marlow. Both Sir Charles Marlow and his son Young Marlow are characters in She Stoops to Conquer, by Goldsmith. Young Marlow is bashful before ladies, but easy enough before women of low degree.

Mar'mion. Ralph de Wilton, being charged with treason, claimed to prove his innocence by the ordeal of battle, and, being overthrown by Lord Marmion, was supposed to be dead, but was picked up by a beardsman, who nursed him carefully; and, being restored to health, he went on a pilgrimage to foreign lands. Now, Lord Marmion was betrothed to Constance de Beverley; and De Wilton to Lady Clare, daughter of the Earl of Gloucester. When De Wilton was supposed to be dead, Lord Marmion proved faithless to Constance, and proposed to Clare, having an eye especially to her rich inheritance. Clare rejected his suit, and took refuge in the convent of St. Hilda, in Whity; Constance, on the other hand, took the veil in the convent of St. Cuthbert, in Holy Isle. In time, Constance elapsed from the convent, but, being overtaken, was buried alive in the walls of a deep cell. In the meantime Lord Marmion was sent by Henry VIII. with a message to James IV. of Scotland, and stopped at the hall of Hugh de Heron for a night. Sir Hugh, at his request, appointed him a guide to conduct him to the king, and the guide wore the dress of a palmer. On his return, Lord Marmion hears that Lady Clare is in Holy Isle, and commands the abbess of Hilda to release her, that she may be placed under the charge of her kinsman, Fitz Clare, of Tantallon Hall. Here she meets De Wilton, the palmer-guide of Lord Marmion. Lord Marmion being killed at the battle of Flodden Field, De Wilton married Lady Clare. (See Walter Scott.)

Lord Marmion. The hero of Scott's poem so called is a purely fictitious character. There was, however, an historic family so called, descendants of Robert de Marmion, a follower of the Conqueror who obtained the grant of Tamworth, and the manor of Scrivelsby, in Lincolnshire. He was the first royal champion, and his male issue ceased with Philip Marmion in the reign of Edward I. Sir John Dymoke, who married Margery, daughter of Joan, the only surviving child of Philip, claimed the office and manor in the reign of Richard II.; they have remained in his male line ever since.

Marmo Lunense. (See Luna.)

M'aro. Virgil, whose name was Publius Virgilius Maro, was born on the banks of the river Mincio, at the village of Andes, near Mantua. (B.C. 70-19.)

"Sweet Maro's muse, sunk in iniquious rest,
Had silent sleep among the Munchen reeds."—Thomson: Castle of Indolence.

Maroon or Marron (French). A cat's-paw (g.v.). "Se servir de la gaffe du chat pour terrer les marrons du feu!" in Italian, "Curare i marroni dal fuoco colla zampa del gatto."

"C'est un se point comme tre à faire de l'oeuf.
Et terrer les marrons de la patte du chat."—L'Étoumi, ill. 7.

Mar'ontes (3 syl.). A Christian tribe of Syria in the eighth century; so called from the monastery of Maron, on the slopes of Lebanon, their chief seat; so called from John Maron, Patriarch of Antioch, in the sixth century.

Maroon. A runaway slave run to the Calabouco, or place where such slaves were punished, as the Maroons of Brazil. Those of Jamaica are the offspring of runaways from the old Jamaica plantations or from Cuba, to whom, in 1738, the British Government granted a tract of land, on which they built two towns. The word is from the verb "maroon," to set a person on an inhospiitable shore and leave him there (a practice common with pirates and buccaneers). The word is a corruption of Cumarion, a word applied by Spaniards to anything unruly, whether man or beast. (See Scott: Pirate, xxii.)

Maroon (2b). To set a man on a desert island and abandon him there. This marooning was often practised by pirates and buccaneers. (See above.)

Mar'ozia, daughter of Theodora. The infamous offspring of an infamous mother, of the ninth century. Her intrigues have rendered her name proverbial. By one she became the mother of Pope John XI. (See Messalina.)

Marphisa (in Orlando Furioso). Sister of Rogero, and a female knight of amazing prowess. She was brought up by a magician, but, being stolen at the age of seven, was sold to the king of Persia. The king assoiled her virtue when she was eighteen, but she slew him, and seized the crown. She came to Gaul to join the army of Agramant, but hearing that Agramant’s father had murdered her mother Galacella, she entered the camp of Charlemagne, and was baptised.

Marque. (See Letters of . . .)

Marriage Knot (The). The bond of marriage effected by the legal marriage service. The Latin phrase is nodus Herculius, and part of the marriage service was for the bridegroom to loosen (solutre) the bride’s girdle, not to tie it. In the Hindu marriage ceremony the bridegroom hangs a ribbon on the bride’s neck and ties it in a knot. Before the knot is tied the bride’s father may refuse consent unless better terms are offered, but immediately the knot is tied the marriage is indissoluble. The Parsees bind the hands of the bridegroom with a sevenfold cord, seven being a sacred number. The ancient Carthaginians tied the thumbs of the betrothed with leather lace. See Nineteenth Century, Oct., 1893, p. 610. (A. Roger.)

“Around her neck they leave / The marriage knot alone.”

Nortley: Churf of Kehawa.

“When first the marriage knot was tied / Between my wife and me, / Her age did mine as much exceed / As three times-three does three; / But when ten years and half ten years / We man and wife had been, / Her age came then as near to mine / As eight is to sixteen.”

Ans.: 15 and 45 at marriage, 50 and 60 fifteen years afterwards.

* The practice of throwing rice is also Indian.

“Handicraft desired to unite them immediately by an indissoluble bond. In Salambo’s hands was a lance, which she offered to Narr Havas. Their thumbs were then tied together by a leather lace, and corn was thrown over their heads.”— Flaubert: Salambo, chap. xi.

Marriage Plates. Sacred plates with a circular well in the centre to hold sweetmeats. They were painted for bridal festivities by Maestro Georgio, Orazio Fontane, and other artists of Urbino and Gubbio. Posaro and Pavia, Castelli and Savona, Faenza and Ferrara, and all the other art towns of Italy. These plates were hung upon the walls, and locked on with superstitious awe as household gods. They were painted in polychrome, and the chief design was some scriptural subject, like Rebecca and Isaac.

Marriages. Carrier’s republican marriages. A device of wholesale slaughter, adopted by Carrier, proconsul of Nantes, in the first French Revolution. It consisted in tying men and women together by their hands and feet, and casting them into the Loire. (1794.)

Marriages. Close times of marriages in the Catholic Church.

(1) Ab Adventu usque ad Epiphaniam (from Advent to Epiphany).
(2) A Septuagesima usque ad octavus Pasche inclusive (from Septuagesima to the eighth Easter).
(3) A secunda feria in Rogationibus usque ad primam dominicam post Pentecosten (from the second feast in Rogation to the first Sunday after Pentecost exclusive).

(Liber Sacerdotalis . . . Secundum Ritus Sanctæ Romææ et Apostolicae Ecclesiae; 1537.)

Marriages are Made in Heaven. This does not mean that persons in heaven “marry and are given in marriage,” but that the partners joined in marriage on earth were foreordained to be so united. As the French proverb more definitely expresses the idea, “Les marriages se font au ciel et se consomment sur la terre.” And again, “Les mariages sont créés dans le ciel.” E. Hall (1499-1547) says, “Consider the old proverb to be true that saith: Marriage is divine,” Prov. xix. 14 says, “A prudent wife is from the Lord.”

Marriages of Men of Genius. (See Wives of . . .)

Married Women take their husband’s surname. This was a Roman custom. Thus Julia, Octavia, etc., married to Pompey, Cicero, etc., would be called Julia et Pompey, Octavia et Cicero. Our married women are named in the same way, omitting “et.”

Marrow (Scotch) a mate, companion, friend. “Not marrow”—that is, not a pair. The Latin word medulla (marrow) is used in much the same way as “mihi aures in medullis” (Cicero); (very dear, my best friend, etc.).

“Busk ye, busk ye, my bonnie bonnie bride, / Busk ye, busk ye, my winsome marrow.”

The Braes of Yarrow.

“One glove [or shoe] is not marrow to the other.”—Bundeanes Mz.

Marrow-bones. Down on your marrow-bones, i.e. knees. That marrow in this phrase is not a corruption of "Mary," meaning the Virgin, is palpable from the analogous phrase, the narrow-bone stang—walking. The leg-bone is the narrow-bone of beef and mutton, and the play is on Marylebone (London).

Marrow Controversy (The). A memorable struggle in Scotland between Puritanism and Presbyterianism; so called from a book entitled The Marrow of Modern Divinity, condemned by the General Assembly in 1720. Abell, Bishop of Rhodes, wrote the Medulla Theologica.

Marrow-men. The twelve ministers who signed the remonstrance to the General Assembly for condemning the evangelical doctrines of the "Marrow." (See Marrow Controversy.)

Marry! An oath, meaning by Mary, the Virgin.

"Yea, marry! you say true."—Poza: Book of Martyrs.

Marry Come Up! An exclamation of disapproval, about equal to "Draw it mild!" May Mary come up to my assistance, or to your discomfort!

"Marry come up, you saucy jade!"—Nineteenth Century, November, 1852, p. 916.

Mar's Year. The year 1715, noted for the rebellion of the Earl of Mar.

"Aud uncle John who wedlock's joys.
Sin Mar's year did desire."—Burns: Halloween, 37.

Mars, with the ancient alchemists, designated iron.

Mars. Under this planet "is borne thieves and robbers... nyght walkers and quarell pykers, hosters, mockers, and skoffers; and these men of Mars canseth warre, and mutryr, and batnyle. They wyll be glady smythes or workers of yron... lyers, gret swerers. He is red and angry... a great walker, and a maker of swords and knyves, and a sheder of mannes blode... and good to be a barseboure and a blode letter, and to drawe tothe." (Compost of Tholomene.)

Mars, in Camoín's Lusasid, is "divine fortitude" personified. As Bacchus, the evil demon, is the guardian power of Mahometanism; so Mars or divine fortitude is the guardian power of Christianity.

The Mars of Portugal, Alfonso de Albuquerque, Viceroy of India. (1452-1615.)

Marseillaise (3 syl.). The grand song of the French Revolution. Claude Joseph Rouget de Lisle, an artillery officer in garrison at Strasbourg, composed both the words and the music for Dietrich, mayor of the town. On July 30th, 1792, the Marseillaise volunteers, invited by Barbaroux at the instance of Madame Roland, marched to Paris singing the favourite song; and the Parisians, enchanted with it, called it the Hymne des Marseillais. (Rouget born 1760, died 1835.)

Marseilles' Good Bishop. In 1730 and 1722 the plague made dreadful havoc at Marseilles. The Bishop, H. F. Xavier de Belsunce, was indefatigable in the pastoral office, and spent his whole time visiting the sick. During the plague of London, Sir John Lawrence, the then Lord Mayor, was no less conspicuous in his benevolence. He supported 40,000 dismissed servants so long as his fortune lasted, and, when he had spent his own money, collected and distributed the alms of the nation. Darwin refers to these philanthropists in His Forces of the Plante, ii, 433. (See Borromeo.)

Marsh [Le Marais]. The pit of the National Convention, between Mountain benches on one side, and those occupied by the ministerial party and the opposition on the other. These middle men or "flats" were "swamped," or enfozé dans un marais by those of more decided politics. (See Plain.)

Marshal means an ostler or groom. His original duty was to feed, groom, shoe, and physic his master's horse. (British, marr; a marr: scale, a servant.)

Marshal Forward. Blucher; so called for his dash and readiness in the campaign of 1813.

Marshal of the Army of God, and of Holy Church. The Baron Robert Fitz-walter, appointed by his brother Henry to lead their forces in 1215 to obtain from King John redress of grievances. Magna Charta was the result.

Marsham (Men of). Those who committed the offence of felling the thorns, etc., in 1646, upon Marsham Heath, Norfolk. The inhabitants of Marsham and tenants of the manor petitioned against the offenders.

Marsiglio or Marsillia. A Saracen king who plotted the attack upon Roland, under "the tree on which Judas hanged himself." With a force of 600,000 men, divided into three armies, he attacked the paladin and overthrew him, but was in turn overthrown by Charlemagne, and hanged on the very tree beneath which he had arranged the attack. (Turpin: Chroniclers.)

Martel. The Phrygian flute-player who challenged Apollo to a contest of skill, and, being beaten by the god, was slain alive for his presumption. From his blood arose the river so called. The flute on which Martas played was one of the Sirens' that had thrown away, and, being filled with the breath of the goddess, discovered most excellent music. The interpretation of this fable is as follows: A contest long existed between the flute-players and the flautists as to the superiority of their respective instruments. The Dorian mode, employed in the worship of Apollo, was performed on lutes; and the Phrygian mode, employed in the rites of Cybele, was executed by flutes, the reeds of which grew on the banks of the river Marsyas. As the Dorian mode was preferred by the Greeks, they said that Apollo beat the flute-player.

Martello towers. These were so-called from a tower at the entrance of St. Martello, in Corsica. The towers were common all along the Mediterranean coast as a defence against pirates. They were erected in the low parts of Sussex and Kent in consequence of the powerful defence made (February 8th, 1784) by Le Tellier at the tower of Martello, with only thirty-eight men, against a simultaneous sea and land attack—the former led by Lord Hood, and the latter by Major-General Dundas.

Martian laws. Laws compiled by Martin, wife of Guithelin, great-grandson of Mulmutius, who established in England the Mulmutian Laws. Alfred translated both these codes into Saxon-English.

“Gunstine... whose queen, to show her upright mind, To wise Mulmutius laws her Martian threat frame.” (Drayton: Polyolbion, vili.)

Martin. One of the swallow tribe. Dies derives the word from St. Martin, but St. Martin's bird is the raven.

Martin, an ass, a hobby-horse. M. Hilaire le Gai says, but gives no authority, “Cette expression nous vient des Italiens, car en Italien martello signifie proprement 'jalousie.'”

“It is said that Martell's, the capriches.”—Brandome: Des Dames Gallantes.

“Telle fin... pourroient bien donner de bons martels a leurs mains.”—Brandome: Des Dames Gallantes.

Martello towers. Round towers about forty feet in height, of great strength, and situated on a beach or river; so called from the Italian towers built as a protection against pirates. As the warning was given by striking a bell with a martello, or hammer, the towers were called Torri da Martello.

Some say that these towers were so-called from a tower at the entrance of St. Fiorenzo, in Corsica. Similar towers were common all along the Mediterranean coast as a defence against pirates. They were erected in the low parts of Sussex and Kent in consequence of the powerful defence made (February 8th, 1784) by Le Tellier at the tower of Martella, with only thirty-eight men, against a simultaneous sea and land attack—the former led by Lord Hood, and the latter by Major-General Dundas.

Martext (Sir Oliver). The hedge-priest in As You Like It (iii. 3).

Martha (St.). Patron saint of good housewives, is represented in Christian art as clad in homely costume, bearing at her girdle a bunch of keys, and holding a lute or pot of water in her hand. Like St. Margaret, she is accompanied by a dragon hound, but has not the palm and crown of martyrdom. The dragon is given to St. Martha from her having destroyed one that ravaged the neighbourhood of Marseilles.

Martial. Pertaining to Mars, the Roman god of war.

Martian laws. Laws compiled by Martin, wife of Guithelin, great-grandson of Mulmutius, who established in England the Mulmutian Laws. Alfred translated both these codes into Saxon-English.

“Gunstine... whose queen, to show her upright mind, To wise Mulmutius laws her Martian threat frame.” (Drayton: Polyolbion, vili.)

Martin. One of the swallow tribe. Dies derives the word from St. Martin, but St. Martin's bird is the raven.

Martin. The ape. In the tale of Reynard the Fox.
Martin. A jackass is so called from its obstinacy. "Il y a plus d'un an qui s'appelle Martin."

"Martinus, qui annu aceris quam par est optimus, tueat; cujus modi fuit Martinus juris consiliorum, sub Fredegerico L., ad qui circumstant, Ac I. (1533) in vulgare proverbium ejus duritiae in banc usque diem perpetuam, ut Martinus, expleatus quibus cessas sonatae singuliari pertinaci studio, in horoscop. Fuit et Martinus Gregas, ezeug professor in academia Romana. - Du Cange (Art. Martinus.)"

Martin. (See ALL My EYE.)

Martin, in Dryden's allegory of the Hind and Panther, means the Lutheran party; so called by a pun on the name of Martin Luther.

"Perle d'autre Martin. There are more fools than one in the fair. This phrase is very common. (See Bauduin de Sebourou: Romanus, ch. viii, line 855; Codefroid de Bouillon, p. 537: La branche des voyages lyrique, line 11,419; Le Mysterie de S. Crispin et S. Crispinien [2nd day], p. 43; Reynard the Fox, vol. ii, p. 17, line 10,098, vol. iii, p. 23, line 20,409, etc.)"

"Another phrase is "Perle d'autre Bernart," from bernart—a jackass or fool.

"En va mon trent et cinq la va, Puimp parlez d'autre Bernart."

"Vous parlez d'autre Martin."

Duot, p. 58.

For a hair Martin lost his ass. The French say that Martin made a bet that his ass was black; the bet was lost because a white hair was found in its coat. Girt like Martin of Cambrai—in a very ridiculous manner. Martin and Martine are the two figures that strike with their marteaux the hours on the clock of Cambrai. Martin is represented as a peasant in a blouse girt very tight about the waist.

St. Martin. Patron of drunkards, to save them from falling into danger. This is a mere accident, arising thus: The 11th November (St. Martin's Day) is the Vina'Tia or feast of Bacchus. When Bacchus was merging by Christians into St. Martin, St. Martin had to bear the ill-repute of his predecessor.

St. Martin's bird. A cock, whose blood is shed "sacrifically" on the 11th of November, in honour of that saint.

St. Martin's cloak. Martin was a military tribune before conversion, and, while stationed at Amiens in midwinter, divided his military cloak with a naked beggar, who craved alms of him before the city gates of Amiens. At night, the story says, Christ Himself appeared to the soldier, arrayed in this very garment.

St. Martin's goose. The 11th of November, St. Martin's Day, was at one time the great goose feast of France. The legend is that St. Martin was annoyed by a goose, which he ordered to be killed and served up for dinner. As he died from the repent, the goose has been ever since "sacrificed" to him on the anniversary. The goose is sometimes called by the French St. Martin's bird.

St. Martin's jewellery. Counterfeit gems. Upon the site of the old collegiate church of St. Martin's le Grand, which was demolished upon the dissolution of the monasteries, a number of persons established themselves and carried on a considerable trade in artificial stones, beads, and jewellery. These Brummagem ornaments were called St. Martin's beads, St. Martin's lace, or St. Martin's jewellery, as the case might be.

St. Martin's lace. A sort of copper lace for which Blowbland stroll, St. Martin's, was noted. (Stow.)

St. Martin's rings. Imitation gold ones. (See above.)

St. Martin's tree. St. Martin planted a pilgrim's staff somewhere near Utopia. The staff grew into a large tree, which Gargantua pulled up to serve for a mace or club, with which he dislodged King Picrochole from Clermont Rock. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel.)

Faire la St. Martin or Martinier. To feast; because the people used to begin St. Martin's Day with feasting and drinking.

Martin Drunk. Very intoxicated indeed; a drunken man "sobered" by drinking more. The feast of St. Martin (November 11) used to be held as a day of great debauch. Hence Baxter uses the word Martin as a synonym of a drunkard:

"The language of Martinus is there [in heaven] a stranger."—Saint's Best.

Martin of Bullions (St.). The St. Swithin of Scotland. His day is July 4, and the Scotch say, if it rains then, rain may be expected for forty days.

"By St. Martin of Bullion—
'And what last thou to do with St. Martin?'
'Thas seen enough, sir, unless which he sends such many days that we cannot fly a hawk.'—Scott: The Abbott, xvi.

Martin's Running Footman (St.). The devil, assigned by legend to St. Martin for a running footman on a certain occasion.

"Who can tell but St. Martin's running footman may still be lurking us some further mischief."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, v. 24.

Martin's Summer (St.) (See under Summer.)
Martine. A sword. (Italian.)

“Quiconque aura affaire à mort, il faut qu’il ait affaire à Martine que me voyez au coute appareillant son épée ‘Martine’.”—Brutusse: Remonstrance Espagnolero, vol. II, p. 15.

Martinet. A strict disciplinarian; so called from the Marquis of Martinet, a young colonel in the reign of Louis XIV., who remodelled the infantry, and was slain at the siege of Doebourg, in 1672 (Voltaire, Louis XIV., c. 10). The French still call a cat-o’nine-tails a “martinet.”

The French martinet was a whip with twelve leather thongs.

Martinmas. The feast of St. Martin is November 11. His Martinmas will come, as it does to every hog—i.e., all must die.

November was the great slaughter-time of the Anglo-Saxons, when beves, sheep, and hogs, whose store of food was exhausted, were killed and salted. Martinmas, therefore, was the slaying time, and the proverb intimates that our slaying-time or day of death will come as surely as that of a hog at St. Martin’s-tide.

Martyr (Greek) simply means a witness, but is applied to one who witnesses a good confession with his blood.

The martyr king. Charles I. of England, beheaded January 30th, 1649. He was buried at Windsor, and was called “The White King.”

Martyr to science. Claude Louis, Count Berthollet, who determined to test in his own person the effects of carbolic acid on the human frame, and died under the experiment. (1748-1822.)

Marvedie (A). A maravedi (q.v.), a small obsolete Spanish copper coin of less value than a farthing.

“What a trusting, foolish girl you are, Edith, to send me by express a letter crammed with nonsense about books and flowers, and to slate the only thing I cared a maravedi about into the postscript.”—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. xi.

Marvellous. The marvellous boy. Thomas Chatterton, the poet, author of a volume of poetry entitled Rowley’s Poems, professedly written by Rowley, a monk. (1752-1770.)

Mary.

As the Virgin, she is represented in Christian art with flowing hair, emblematical of her virginity.

As Mater Dolorosa, she is represented as somewhat elderly, clad in mourning, head draped, and weeping over the dead body of Christ.

As Our Lady of Dolours, she is represented as seated, her breast being pierced with seven swords, emblematic of her seven sorrows.

As Our Lady of Mercy, she is represented with arms extended, spreading out her mantle, and gathering sinners beneath it.

As The glorified Madonna, she is represented as bearing a crown and sceptre, or a ball and cross, in rich robes and surrounded by angels.

Her seven sorrows. Simeon’s Prophecy, the Flight into Egypt, Christ Missed, the Betrayal, the Crucifixion, the Taking Down from the Cross, and the Ascension, when she was left alone.

Mary, of Lord Byron’s poetry, is Miss Chaworth, who was older than his lordship. Both Miss Chaworth and Lord Byron were under the guardianship of Mr. White, Miss Chaworth married John Musters, generally called Jack Musters; but the marriage was not a happy one, and the parties soon separated. The Dream of Lord Byron refers to this love affair of his youth.

Mary, of Robert Burns. (See Highland Mary.)

“Tis it may be added to what is said under Highland Mary that of Mary Morison the poet wrote:

'These smiles and genial days;
That make the miser’s circuits less.”

And in Highland Mary we have—“Still o’er those scenes my memory wakes,

And fondly broods with miser’s care.”

A statue to her has been recently erected in Edinburgh.

Marys. The four Marys. Mary Beaton (or Bethume), Mary Livingston (or Leunson), Mary Fleming (or Fleming), and Mary Seaton (or Sclaton); called the “Queen’s Marys,” that is, the ladies of the same age as Mary, afterwards Queen of Scots, and her companions. Mary Carmichael was not one of the four, although introduced in the well-known ballad.

“T’erren the queen had four Marys,
This night she’ll lie but three:
There was Mary Beaton, and Mary Seaton,
Mary Carmichael, and me.”

Mary Anne or Marianne. A slang name for the guillotine. (See below.)

Mary Anne Associations. Secret republican societies in France. The name comes about thus: Ravaillac was instigated to assassinate Henri IV. by reading the treatise De Rege at Regio Institutiones, by Mariana, and as Mariana inspired Ravaillac "to deliver France," the republican party was called the Mary-Anne.

"The Mary Annes, which are essentially republicans, are scattered about all the French provinces."—Duras (22: Loflair.

Mary Magdalene (St.). Patron saint of penitents, being herself the model penitent of Gospel history.

In Christian art she is represented (1)
as a patron saint, young and beautiful, with a profusion of hair, and holding a box of ointment; (2) as a penitent, in a sequestered place, reading before a cross or skull.

Mary Queen of Scots. Shakespeare being under the patronage of Queen Elizabeth, and knowing her jealousy, would not, of course, praise openly her rival queen; but in the Midsummer Night's Dream, composed in 1602, that is, five years after the execution of Mary, he wrote those exquisite lines:

"Then rememberest
Since once I sat upon a promontory,
And heard a mermaid (1) on a dolphin's back (2)
Uttering such dulce harmonious breath,
That to the Tune I grew civil at her song;
And certain stars (4) shot madly from their spheres (3),
To hear the sea-maid's music."—Act II. 1.

(1) Mermaid and sea-maid, that is, Mary; (2) on the dolphin's back, she married the Dolphin or Dauphin of France; (3) the rude sea (3) grew civil at her song; (4) shot madly from their spheres, that is, revolted from Queen Elizabeth, bewitched by the sea-maid's sweetness.

Marybuds. The flower of the marigold (q.v.). Like many other flowers, they open at daybreak and close at sunset.

"And winking marybuds begin
To move their golden eyes."—Shakespeare: Cymbeline, I. 3.

Marygold or Marigold. A million sterling. A plan is £100,000. (See MARIGOLD.)

Maryland (U.S. America) was so named in compliment to Queen Henrietta Maria. In the Latin charter it is called Terra Maria.

Marylebone (London) is not a corrupition of Marie la bonne, but "Mary on the bourn" or river, as Holborn is:
"Old Bourne."—

Mas (plural, Masse). Master, Mr.,
Messrs.; as, Mas John King, Masse
Fleming and Stebbing.

Masaniello. A corruption of TomMASO ANIELLO, a Neapolitan fisherman, who led the revolt of July, 1647. The great grievance was a new tax upon fruit, and the immediate cause of Masaniello's interference was the seizure of his wife (or deaf and dumb sister) for having in her possession some contraband flour. Having surrounded himself with 150,000 men, women, and boys, he was elected chief of Naples, and for nine days ruled with absolute control. The Spanish viceroy flattered him, and this so turned his head that he acted like a maniac. The people betrayed him, he was shot, and his body flung into a ditch, but next day it was interred with a pomp and ceremony never equalled in Naples (1647).

Auber has an opera on this subject called La Muette de Portici (1828).

Maschere-croute [or muse-croute]. A hideous wooden statue carried about Lyons during Carnival. The nurses of Lyons frighten children by threatening to throw them to Maschere-croute.

Mascotte. One who brings good luck, and possesses a "good eye." The contrary of Jettatore, or one with an evil eye, who always brings bad luck.

"On envoyé du paradis,
Sont des Mascottes, mes amis,
Heureux celui que le ciel dote d'une Mascotte."—
The opera called La Mascotte (1858).

"I tell you, she was a Mascotte of the first water."—The Ludgate Monthly, No. 1, vol. II.; Tippinischutz, Nov. 1891.

Masdeu (Catalan for God's field).
The vineyard not far from Perpignan was anciently so called.

Masotto. A rustic engaged to Zerlina; but Don Giovanni intercepts them in their wedding festivities, and induces the foolish damsel to believe he meant to make her his wife. (Mozart: Don Giovanni, an opera.)

Mashacker-ing and Misguggling.
Mauling and disfiguring.

"I humbly protest against mauling and disfiguring this work; amongst what the great Walter Scott would, I think, have called mashackering and misguggling, after the manner of Nicola Minnulz in The Heart of Midlothian, when he put an end to his wife Ardie at the spot afterwards called by his name."—W. E. Gladstone:
Nineteenth Century, November, 1865.

Masher. A dude (q.v.): an ex-quise; a lardy-dardy swell who dresses aesthetically, behaves killingly, and thinks himself a Romeo. This sort of thing used to be called 'crushing' or killing, and, as mashing is crushing, the synonym was substituted about 1890. A lady-killer, a crusher, a masher, all mean the same thing.

"The prattle of the masher between the acts."—
Daily Telegraph, Oct. 10, 1883.
Mask a Fleet

Mask a Fleet (To). To look up an enemy's fleet if it cannot put to sea.

Mason and Dixon's Line. The southern boundary-line which separated the free states of Pennsylvania from what were at one time the slave states of Maryland and Virginia. It lies in 39° 43' 26" north latitude, and was run by Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, two English mathematicians and surveyors (between November 15th, 1763, and December 26th, 1767).

Mass.

High Mass or "Grand Mass" is sung by choristers, and celebrated with the assistance of a deacon and sub-deacon.

Low Mass is simply read without singing; there is one between these two called the "chanted mass," in which the service is chanted by the priest.

Besides these there are a number of special masses, as the mass of the Beatitudes, mass of the Holy Ghost, mass of the dead, mass of a saint, mass of scarcity, dry mass, votive mass, holiday mass, Ambrosian mass, Gallic mass, mass of the presanctified for Good Friday, messa Moserabum, etc. etc.

Mass (The).

"Pope Celestine ordered the introit and the prayer to be repeated nine times, and introduced the prayer.

"Pope Gregory the Great ordered the kine to be repeated nine times, and introduced the prayer.

"Pope Gelasius ordered the Epistle and Gospel.

"Pope Damasus introduced the Credo.

"Pope Alexander put into the canon the following clause: Quod pridet quaesum aedificantur.

"Pope Sixtus introduced the Creed.

"Pope Innocent the War.

"Pope Leo the Oracle Fretus, and the words in the canon: Sanctum Sacerdum et amam nostram Pontificem.

Massachusetts was so named from the bay massa [great], wadekwhash [mountain], et [near]. The bay-near-the-great-mountain.

Massacre of the Innocents. The slaughter of the babes of Bethlehem "from two years old and under," when Jesus was born. This was done at the command of Herod the Great in order to cut off "the babe" who was destined to become "King of the Jews."

Micah 1. 2 speaks of Bethlehem as a little place, a small village, probably containing about five hundred inhabitants. It will be easy to calculate the probable number of infants under two years of age in such a village. It would be about ten.

Massacre of the Innocents (The), in parliamentary phraseology, means the withdrawal at the close of a session of the bills which time has not rendered it possible to consider and pass. The phrase was so used in The Times, 1809.

"If the secretarial M.P. is to be condemned for voting against the Miner's Eight Hours Bill, he is equally unsavourable if he does not support the numerous... reforms which get the sanction of the Congress during the massacre of the innocents at the close of the sitting."—Nineteenth Century, October, 1892, p. 619.

Mass'amore (3 syl.) or Massy More. The principal dungeon of a feudal castle. A Moorish word.

"Proximus est carcer substantie, sine ut Mundi appellant 'Mamorra.'"—Old Latin Itinerary.

Mast. (See Before the Mast.)

Master Humphrey. Narrator of the story called The Old Curiosity Shop, by Charles Dickens.

Master Leonard. Grand-master of the nocturnal orgies of the demons. He is represented as a three-horned goat, with black human face. He marked his novitiates with one of his horns. (Middle Age demonology.)

Master Magna. The dog which won the Waterloo Cup for three successive years, and was introduced to the Queen. "Waterloo" is on the banks of the Mersey, about three miles north of Liverpool.

Master of Sentences. Pierre Lombard, author of a work called Sentences, a compilation from the fathers of the leading arguments, pro and con, bearing on the hair-splitting theological questions of the Middle Ages. (1100-1164.)

Master of the Mint. A punning term for a gardener.

Master of the Rolls. A punning term for a baker.

Mastic. A tonic which promotes appetite, and therefore only increases the misery of a hungry man.

"Like the starved wretch that hunger mystic chews.
But chews himself and fosters his disease."

First: Triumphs of the Ghost (Juvenal).

Matador (3 syl.). In the game of Ombre, Spadille (the ace of spades), Manille (the seven of trumpets), and Basto (the ace of clubs), are called "Matadores."

"Now move to war her able Matador... Spadille first, uncountable lord.
Led off two captive trumpets, and swept the board.
As many more Manille forced to yield.
And marched a victor from the verdant field."

Bust: Hope of the Lock, canto iii.

Matamoros. Mexicans or savages.

Mat'amore (3 syl.). A poltroon, a swaggerer, a Major Bobadil (q.v.). A French term composed of two Spanish words, mater-Moros (a slayer of Moors.)

"Your followers... must handy and draw in the world... like so many Matamoros." — Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth, chap. xvi.

Mate. A man does not get his hands out of the tar by becoming second mate. A second mate is expected to put his hands into the tar bucket for turning the rigging, like the men below him. The first mate is exempt from this dirty work. The rigging is tarred by the hands, and not by brushes.

Maté (2 syll.) Paraguay tea is so called from maté, the vessel in which the herb is in Paraguay infused. These vessels are generally hollow gourds, and the herb is called yerba de maté.

Materialism. The doctrines of a Materialist, who maintains that the soul and spirit are effects of matter. The orthodox doctrine is that the soul is distinct from the body, and is a portion of the Divine essence breathed into the body. A materialist, of course, does not believe in a "spiritual deity" distinct from matter. Tertullian contended that the Bible proves the soul to be "material," and he charges the "spiritual" view to the heretical doctrines of the Platonic school.

Matfolon. Villa better Matar de Matfolon. Whitechapel, dedicated to Mary the Mother.

Matthew (Father), 1799-1856, called The Apostle of Temperance. His success was almost miraculous.

Math'isen. One of the three Anabaptists who induced John of Leyden to join their rebellion. (See John of Leyden.)

Math'urin (St.) Patron saint of idiots and fools. A pun on his name. (See below.)

Maturin, in French argot, means daze, and "maturin plat," a dunce.

"Ceux deux objets doivent leur nom à leur ressemblance avec le costume des Trinitaires (vul dument appelés Maturins), qui, chez nous, portent une manton de serge blanche sur qu'elle, quand ils sont nés, le petit ou mat leur noir." — Fransisco Michel.

Matilda. Daughter of Lord Robert Fitzwalter. Michael Drayton has a poem of some 670 lines so called.

Matilda. Daughter of Rokey by, and niece of Mortham. She was beloved by Wilfrid, son of Oswald, but loved Redmond, her father's page, who turns out to be Mortham's son. (Scott: Rokeyby.)

Matilda. Sister of Gessler; in love with Arnold, a Swiss, who had saved her life when threatened by the fall of an avalanche. After the death of Gessler, who was shot by William Tell, the marriage of these lovers is consummated. (Rossini: Giugelhno Tell, an opera.)

Matilda. (See Gifford's Bariard and Merviad.)

Matriculate means to enroll oneself in a society. The University is called our alma mater (propitious mother). The students are her alumni (foster-children), and become so by being enrolled in a register after certain forms and examinations. (Latin, matricula a roll.)

Material-ism. Unvarnished truth, prosaic, unimaginative. Whyte Melville speaks of "a matter-of-fact Swain."

Material's afoot (Thy). In a train, is stirring. It marche bien, it goes well; de vie.

"Now let it work. Machine, thou art afoot; Take thou what course thou wilt." Shakespeare: Julius Cesar, III. 2.

Matterhorn. The matrimonial Matterhorn. The leap in the dark. The Matterhorn is the German name for Mont Cervin, a mountain of the Pennine Alps, about 40 miles east-north-east of Mont Blanc. Above an unbroken glacier-line of 11,000 feet high, it rises in an inaccessible obelisk of rock more than 3,000 feet higher. The total elevation of the Matterhorn is 14,836 feet. Figuratively any danger, or desperate situation threatening destruction.

Matthew (St.) in Christian art is represented (1) as an evangelist—an old man with long beard: an angel generally stands near him dictating his Gospel. (2) As an apostle, in which capacity he bears a purse, in reference to his calling as a publican; sometimes he carries a spear, sometimes a carpenter's rule or square. (See Luke.)

In the last of Matthew. At the last gap, on one's last legs. This is a German expression, and arose thus: A Catholic priest said in his sermon that Protestantism was in the last of Matthew, and, being asked what he meant, replied, "The last five words of the Gospel of St. Matthew are these: 'The end of this dispensation.'" Of course he quoted the Latin version; ours is less correctly translated "the end of the world."

Matthew Bramble, in Smollett's Humphry Clinker, is Roderick Random grown old, somewhat cynical by experience of the world, but vastly improved in taste. Chambers says, "Smollett took some of the incidents of the family tour from Anstey's New Bath Guide." (English Literature, vol. ii.)

Matthew Parker's Bible, 1572. The second edition of the "Great Bible," with corrections, etc., by Archbishop Parker.

Matthew's Bible, 1537. A version of the Bible in English, edited by John Rogers, superintendent of the English Church in Germany, and published by him under the fictitious name of Thomas Matthews.

Matthew (St.) in Christian art is known by the axe or halberd in his right hand, the symbol of his martyrdom. Sometimes he is bearing a stone, in allusion to the tradition of his having been stoned before he was beheaded.

Maudlin. Stupidly sentimental. Maudlin drunk is the drunkenness which is sentimental and inclined to tears. Maudlin slip-slop is sentimental chat. The word is derived from Mary Maudalen, who is drawn by ancient painters with a lackadaisical face, and eyes swollen with weeping.

Maugis. The Nestor of French romance, like Hildebrand in German legend. He was one of Charlemagne's paladins, a magician and champion.

Maugis d'Aygremont. Son of Duke Bevis of Ayegremont, stolen in infancy by a female slave. As she rested under a white-thorn a lion and a leopard devoured her, and then killed each other in dispute for the infant. The babe cried lustily, and Oriaide la Fée, who lived at Rosseleur, hearing it, went to the white-thorn and exclaimed, "By the Powers above, this child is mal gis (badly placed)," and ever after he was called maugis'. Oriaide took charge of him, and was assisted by her brother Bandris, who taught him magic and sorcery. When grown a man Maugis achieved the adventure of gaining the enchanted horse Bayard, which understood like a human being all that was said, and took from Anthenor, the Saracen, the sword Flambeur or Floberge. Subsequently he gave both the horse and sword to his cousin Renaud. In the Italian romances Maugis is called "Malagigi" (q.v.); Renaud is called "Renaldo" (q.v.); Bevis is called "Buo'vo;" the horse is called "Bayardo;" and the sword, "Fusberta." (Romance of Maugis d'Aygremont et de Vivian son frère.)

Maugrabin (Heyraddin). Brother of Zamet Maugrabin the Bohemian. He appears disguised as Rouge Sangleur, and pretends to be herald from Liege. (Sir Walter Scott: Quentin Durward.)

Maugyra. A giant who keeps a bridge leading to a castle by a riverside, in which a beautiful lady is besieged. Sir Lybius, one of Arthur's knights, does battle with the giant; the contest lasts a whole summer's day, but terminates with the death of the giant and liberation of the lady. (Laiheux, a romance.)

Maul. To beat roughly, to batter. The maul was a bludgeon with a leaden head, carried by ancient soldiery. It is generally called a "mull."

Maul (The Giant). A giant who used to spoil young pilgrims with sophistry. He attacked Mr. Greatheart with a club, and the combat between them lasted for the space of an hour. At length Mr. Greatheart pierced the giant under the fifth rib, and then cut off his head. (Dunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. ii.)

Maul of Monks (The). Thomas Cromwell, visitor-general of English monasteries, many of which he summarily suppressed (1490-1540).

Maunciple's Tale. A mediaeval version of Ovid's tale about Coro'nis (Met. ii. 543, etc.). Phoebus had a crow which he taught to speak; it was downy white, and as big as a swan. He had also a wife whom he dearly loved, but she was faithless to him. One day when Phoebus came home his bird 'gan sing "Cuckoo! cuckoo! cuckoo!" Phoebus asked what he meant, and the crow told him of his wife's infidelity. Phoebus was very angry, and, seizing his bow, shot his wife through the heart; but no sooner did she fall than he repented of his rashness and cursed the bird. "Nevermore shalt thou speak," said he; "henceforth thy offspring shall be black." Moral—"Lordlings, by this example, take heed what you say; be no tale-bearers, but—

'Where-so thou comest amongst high or low,
Keep well thy tongue and think upon the crow.'

Chaucer. Canterbury Tales.

Maunds (Royal). Gifts distributed to the poor on Maundy Thursday (q.v.). The number of doles corresponds to the number of years the monarch has been regnant, and the doles used to be distributed by the Lord High Almoner. Since 1883 the doles have been money payments distributed by the Clerk of the Almonry Office. The custom began in Maundrel 831 Maximum

1368, in the reign of Edward III. James I. distributed the doles personally.

"Entries of 'a manner of things verily revi by my lorde of his Maundy, and my lady, and his lordship's children." Household Book of the East of Northumberland, 1312.

Maundrel. A foolish, vapouring gossip. The Scotch say, "Hand your tongue, maundrel." As a verb it means to babble, to prate. In some parts of Scotland the talk of persons in delirium, in sleep, and in intoxication is called maundrel. The term is from Sir John Mandeville, the traveller, who published an account of his travels, full of idle gossip and most improbable events.

* There is another verb, munnder (to mutter, to vapour, or wander in one's talk). This verb is from maund (to beg). (See Maundy Thursday.)

Maundy Thursday. The day before Good Friday is so called from the Latin dies maundy (the day of Christ's great mandate). After He had washed His disciples' feet, He said, "A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another" (St. John xiii. 34).

Spelman derives it from maund (a basket), because on the day before the great fast all religious houses and good Catholics brought out their broken food in maunds to distribute to the poor. This custom in many places gave birth to a fair, as the Tomland fair of Norwich, held on the plain before the Cathedral Close.

Mauri-gasima. An island near Formosa, said to have been sunk in the sea in consequence of the great crimes of its inhabitants. (Kempfer.)

Mauritania. Morocco and Algiers, the land of the ancient Mauri or Moors.

Mausoleum. One of the seven "wonders of the world" so called from Mausolus, King of Caria, to whom Artemisia (his wife) erected at Halicarnassos a splendid sepulchral monument A.D. 333. Parts of this sepulchre are now in the British Museum.

The chief mausoleums, besides the one referred to above, are: the mausoleum of Augustus; that of Hadrian, now called the castle of St. Angelo, at Rome; that erected in France to Henry II. by Catherine de Medicis; that of St. Peter the Martyr in the church of St. Eustatius, by G. Balduccio in the fourteenth century; and that erected to the memory of Louis XVI.

Maunt gets abone the Meal (Ther), malt liquor or drink gets more potent than the food eaten—that is, when men get heady or boozey.

"If the maunt gets abone the meal with you, it is time for me to take myself away; and you will come to my route, gentleman, when you want a cup of tea."—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet.

Maunthe Dog. A "spectre hound" that for many years haunted the ancient castle of Peel town, in the Isle of Man. This black spaniel used to enter the guard-room as soon as candles were lighted, and leave it at day-break. While this spectre-dog was present the soldiers forebore all oaths and profane talk. One day a drunken trooper entered the guard-house alone out of bravado, but lost his speech and died in three days. Scott refers to it in his Lay of the Last Minstrel, vi. stanza 26.

* For the legend, see a long note at the beginning of Scott's Peveril of the Peak, chapter xv.

Mauvais Ton (French). Bad manners. Ill-bred; vulgar ways.

Mauvais Honte (French). Bad or silly shame. Bashfulness, sheepishness.

Mauvaise Plaisanterie (A). A rude or ill-mannered jest; a jest in bad taste.

Mavournin. Irish for darling. Erin mavournin = Ireland, my darling: Erin go bragh = Ireland for ever!

"Land of my forefathers, Erin go bragh... Erin mavournin, Erin to bragh!"—Campbell: Exile of Erin.

Mawther. (See Morter.)

Mawworm. A vulgar copy of Dr. Cantwell, the hypocrite, in The Hypocrite, by Isaac Bickerstaff.

Max. A huntsman, and the best marksman in Germany. He was betrothed to Agatha, who was to be his bride if he obtained the prize in the annual trial-shot. Having been unsuccessful in his practice for several days, Caspar induced him to go to the wolf's glen at midnight and obtain seven charmed balls from Sa'miel the Black Huntsman. On the day of contest, the prince bade him shoot at a dove. Max aimed at the bird, but killed Caspar, who was concealed in a tree. The prince abolished in consequence the annual fête of the trial-shot. (Weber: Der Freischütz, an opera.)

Max O'Rell. The pen name of M. Blouet, author of John Bull and his Island, etc.

Maxim'um and Minimum. The greatest and the least amount; as, the maximum profits or exports, and the minimum profits or exports; the maximum and minimum price of corn during the year. The terms are also employed in mathematics.

Maximus or Maxime (2 syl.) Officer of the prefect Alma'schius, and his cornicular. Being ordered to put Valerian and Tiburce to death because they would not worship the image of Jupiter, he took pity on his victims and led them to his own house, where Cecilia was instrumental in his conversion; whereupon he and "all his" house were at once baptised. When Valerian and Tiburce were put to death, Maximus declared that he saw angels come and carry them to heaven, whereupon Alma'schius caused him to be beaten with whips of lead "til he his lif gan lete." (Chaucer: Second Nouns Tale.)

May. A lovely girl who married January, an old Lombard baron, sixty years of age. She had a liaison with a young squire named Damyán, and was detected by January; but she persuaded the old fool that his eyes were to blame and that he was labouring under a great mistake, the effect of senseless jealousy. January believed her words, and "who is glad but he?" for what is better than "a fruitful wife, and a confiding spouse?" (Chaucer: The Marchamundes Tale. Pope: January and May.)

May (the month) is not derived from Maia, the mother of Mercury, as the word existed long before either Mercury or Maia had been introduced. It is the Latin Máius—i.e., Máius, from the root mag same as the Sanscrit mah, to grow; and means the growing or shooting month.

May unlucky for weddings. This is a Roman superstition. Ovid says, "The common people profess it is unlucky to marry in the month of May." In this month were held the festivals of Roma Dea (the goddess of chastity), and the feasts of the dead called Lemuralia.

Here we go gathering nuts of May. (See Nuts of May.)

May-day. Polydore Virgil says that the Roman youths used to go into the fields and spend the calends of May in dancing and singing in honour of Flora, goddess of fruits and flowers. The early English consecrated May-day to Robin Hood and the Maid Marian, because the favourite outlaw died on that day. Stow says the villagers used to set up May-poles, and spend the day in archery, Morris-dancing, and other amusements.

Evel May-day (1517), when the London apprentices rose up against the foreign residents, and did incaulable mischief. The riot lasted till May 22nd.

May-duke Cherries. Medoc, a district of France, whence the cherries first came to us.

May Meetings. A title applied to the annual gatherings, in May and June, of the religious and charitable societies, to hear the annual reports and appeals for continued or increased support. The chief meetings are the British Asylum for Deaf and Dumb Females, British and Foreign Bible Society, British and Foreign Schools, Children's Refuge, Church Home Mission, Church Missionary Society, Church Pastoral Aid Society, Clergy Orphan Society, Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy, Destitute Sailors' Asylum, Field Lane Refuge, Government's Benevolent Institution, Home and Colonial School Society, Irish Church Missionary Society, London City Mission, Mendicity National Temperance League, Propagation of the Gospel among the Jews, Ragged School Union, Religious Tract Society, Royal Asylum of St. Anne's, Sailors' Home, Sunday School Union, Thames Church Missionary Society, United Kingdom Band of Hope, Wesleyan Missionary Society, with many others of similar character.

May Molloch, or The Maid of the Harry Arms. An elf who condescends to mingle in ordinary sports, and even to direct the master of the house how to play dominoes or draughts. Like the White Lady of Avenel, May Molloch is a sort of banshee.

May-pole, May-queen, etc. Dancing round the May-pole on May-day, "going a-Maying," electing a May-queen, and lighting bonfires, are all remnants of Sun-worship, and may be traced to the most ancient times. The chimney-sweeps used to lead about a Jack-i'-the-green, and the custom is not yet quite extinct (1893).

May-pole (London). The races in the Duncock take place "where the tall May-pole overlooked the Strand." On the spot now occupied by St. Mary-le-Strand, anciently stood a cross. In the place of this cross a May-pole was set up by John Clarges, a blacksmith, whose daughter Ann became the wife of Monk, Duke of Albermarle. It was taken down in 1713, and replaced by a new one erected opposite Somerset House. This second Maypole had two gilt balls and a vane on its summit. On holidays the pole was decorated with flags and garlands. It was removed in 1718, and sent by Sir Isaac Newton to Wanstead Park to support the largest telescope in Europe. (See UNDERSHAFT.)
Mayeur

"Captain Billy...employed four hackney coaches, with drivers in livery, to pick up the Maypole in the Strand, fixing his own rates about the year 1731. Bailey's coaches seem to have been the first of what are now called hackney coaches."—Note 1. The Tatler, iv, p. 413.

Maypole. The Duchess of Kendal, mistress of George I.; so called because she was thin and tall as a May-pole.

Mayeur. The stock name in French plays for a man deformed, vain and licentious, brave and witty.

"Mayflower" (The). A ship of 180 tons, which, in December, 1620, started from Plymouth, and conveyed to Massachusetts, in North America, 102 Puritans, called the "Pilgrim Fathers." They called their settlement New Plymouth.

Mayonnaise. A sauce made with pepper, salt, oil, vinegar, and the yolk of an egg beaten up together. A "may" in French is a cullender or strainer, also a "fort plancheur sur lequel on met les râpas qui on rent fouler."

Mayor. The chief magistrate of a city, elected by the citizens, and holding office for twelve months.

The chief magistrate of London is The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor, one of the Prerogative Council. Since 1886 the chief magistrate of York has been a Lord Mayor, and in 1410 those of Liverpool and Manchester.

There are two Lord Mayors of Ireland; one, of Dublin (1662) and of Belfast, and four of Scotland—Glasgow, Edinburgh, Aberdeen and Dundee.

At the Conquest the sovereign appointed the chief magistrates of cities. That of London was called the Port-reeve, but Henry II. changed the word to the Norman nautre (mayor). John made the office annual; and Edward III. (1351) conferred the title of "The Right Hon. the Lord Mayor of London."

The first Lord Mayor's Show was 1458, when Sir John Norman went by water in state, to be sworn in at Westminster; and the cap and sword were given by Richard II. to Sir William Walworth, for killing Wat Tyler.

Mayor of Garratt. (See GARRATT.)

Mayor of the Bull ring (Old Dublin). This official and his sheriffs were elected on May-day and St. Peter's Eve "to be captain and gardian of the batchelers and the unwedded youth of the civitie." For the year the Mayor of the Bull-ring had authority to punish those who frequented brothels and houses of ill-fame. He was termed Mayor of the Bull-ring from an iron ring in the Corn Market, to which bulls for bull-baiting were tied, and if any bachelor happened to marry he was conducted by the Mayor and his followers to the market-place to kiss the bull-ring.

MAYORS OF THE PALACE (MAIRE DU PALAIS). Superintendents of the king's household, and stewards of the royal revenues or companies of France before the accession of the Carolingian dynasty.

Mazarinades (4 syl.). Violent publications issued against Mazarin, the French minister (1630, etc.).

Mazarine Bible (The). The earliest book printed in movable metal type. It contains no date, but a copy in the Bibliothèque Mazarine contains the date of the illuminator Cremer (1456), so that the book must have been printed before that date. Called "Mazarine" from Cardinal Mazarin, who founded the library in 1683.

In 1723, at the Perkin's sale, Lord Ashburnham gave £2,000 for a copy in vellum, and Mr. Quaritch, bookseller, gave £2,500 for one on paper. At the Thorold sale, in 1843, Mr. Quaritch gave £3,000 for a copy. In 1857 he bought one for £2,000; and in 1860 he gave £2,500 for a copy slightly damaged.

Mazeppa (Jan), historically, was hetman of the Cossacks. Born of a noble Polish family in Podolia, he became a page in the court of Jan Casimir, King of Poland. Here he intrigued with Theresa, the young wife of a Podolian count, who had the young page lashed to a wild horse, and turned adrift. The horse dropped down dead in the Ukraine, where Mazeppa was released by a Cossack family, who nursed him in their own hut. He became secretary to the hetman, and at the death of the prince was appointed his successor. Peter I. admired him, and created him Prince of the Ukraine, but in the wars with Sweden Mazeppa deserted to Charles XII., and fought against Russia at Pultowa. After the loss of this battle, Mazeppa fled to Valencia, and then to Bender. Some say he died a natural death, and others that he was put to death for treason by the Czar. Lord Byron makes Mazeppa tell his tale to Charles after the battle of Pultowa. (1640-1709.) Measur. A cup; so called from the British measure (maple); Dutch, maasur. Like our cups-cups in Cambridge, and the loving-cup of the London Corporation.

"A measure wrought of the maple ware."—Spenser: Calendar (August).

"Brung biter, he said, the mazer four My noble fathers loved of yore."—Sir Walter Scott: Lord of the Isles.

Maz'tikeen or Shedeem. A species of beings in Jewish mythology exactly resembling the Arabian Jinn or genii, and said to be the agents of magic and enchantment. When Adam fell, says the Talmud, he was excommunicated for 130 years, during which time he begat demons and spectres; for, it is written, "Adam lived 130 years and (i.e. before he) begat children in his own image" (Genesis v. 3). (Rabbi Jeremiah ben Eleazar.)

"And the Mazikeen shall not come nigh thy tents."—Psalm xcv. 5 (Chaldee version).

Swells out like the Mazikeen ass. The allusion is to a Jewish tradition that a servant, whose duty it was to rouse the neighbourhood to midnight prayer, found one night an ass in the street, which he mounted. As he rode along the ass grew bigger and bigger, till at last it towered as high as the tallest edifice, where it left the man, and whose next morning he was found.

Mazz'ni-ism. The political system of Giuseppe Mazzini, who filled almost every sovereign and government in Europe with a panic-terror. His plan was to establish secret societies all over Europe, and organise the several governments into federated republics. He was the founder of what is called "Young Italy," whose watchwords were "Liberty, Equality, and Humanity," whose motto was "God and the People," and whose banner was a tricolour of white, red, and green. (Born at Genoa, 1808.)

Meal or Malt (In). In meal or in malt. Directly or indirectly, some sort of subsidy. If much money passes through the hands, some profit will be sure to accrue either "in meal or in malt."

"When other interests in the country (as the cotton trade, the iron trade, and the coal trade) had been depressed, the Government had not been called upon for assistance in meal and malt."—Sir William Harcourt: On Agricultural Depression, 18th April, 1894.

He must pay either in meal or malt. In one way or another. A certain percentage of meal or malt is the miller's perquisite.

"If they [the Tories] wish to get the working-class vote, they have got to pay for it either in meal or in malt."—Nineteenth Century, August, 1852, p. 314.

Meal-tub Plot. A plot by Dangerfield against James, Duke of York, in 1679; so called because the scheme was kept in a meal-tub in the house of Mrs Cellier. Dangerfield subsequently confessed the whole affair was a forgery, and was both whipped and condemned to stand in the pillory.

Meals. In the fourteenth century breakfast hour was five; dinner, nine; supper, four. (Chaucer's Works).

In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the breakfast hour was seven; dinner, eleven; supper, six. (Wright: Domestic Manners).

Towards the close of the sixteenth century dinner advanced to noon.

In Ireland the gentry dined at between two or three in the early part of the eighteenth century. (Swift: Country Life).

Mealy-mouthed is the Greek meli'-muthos (honey-speech), and means velvet-tongued, afraid of giving offence.

Meander (3 syl.). To wind; so called from the Meander, a winding river of Phrygia. The "Greek pattern" in embroidery is so called.

Measure. Out of all measure. "Outre mesure." Beyond all reasonable degree. "Over (or supra) modum."

"Thus out of measure sad."—Shakespeare: Much Ado About Nothing, i. 3.

To take the measure of one's foot. To ascertain how far a person will venture; to make a shrewd guess of another's character. The allusion is to "Ex pede Herculem."

Measure Strength (To). To wrestle together; to fight, to contest.

Measure Swords (To). To fight a duel with swords. In such cases the seconds measure the swords to see that both are of one length.

"So we measured swords and parted."—Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona, iv. 4.

Measure for Measure (Shakespeare). The story is taken from a tale in G. Whetstone's Heptameron, entitled Promos and Cassandra (1578). Promos is called by Shakespeare, "Lord Angelo;" and Cassandra is "Isabella." Her brother, called by Shakespeare "Claudio," is named Andrus'g in the story. A similar story is given in Giovanni Giraldi Cinthio's third decade of stories.
Measure One's Length on the Ground (Prov. 22). To fall flat on the ground; to be knocked down.

"If you will measure your master's length, tarry."—Shakespeare: King Lear, i. 4.

Measure Other People's Corn. To measure other people's corn by one's own bushel. To judge of others by oneself. In French, "Mesurer les autres à son anneau;" in Latin, "Alios uno modulo metris.

Meat, Bread. These words tell a tale; both mean food in general. The Italians and Asiatics eat little animal food, and with them the word bread stands for food; so also with the poor, whose chief diet it is; but the English consume meat very plentifully, and this word, which simply means food, almost exclusively implies animal food. In the banquet given to Joseph's brethren, the viceroy commanded the servants "to set on bread" (Genesis xliii. 31). In Psalm cix. 27 it is said of fishes, creeping things, and crocodiles, that God giveth them their meat in due season.

To carry off meat from the graver—i.e., to be poor as a church mouse. The Greeks and Romans used to make feasts at certain seasons, when the dead were supposed to return to their graves. In these feasts the fragments were left on the tombs for the use of the ghosts.

Meo (French). Slang for king, governor, master; maitre, a commander; mäquier, to command. All these are derived from the fourbesque word maggius, which signifies God, king, pope, doctor, seigneur, and so on, being the Latin major. (There are the Hebrew words melach and melki also.)

Meoc's Three Idols. Lata, Alo'za, and Menat, all of which Mahomet overthrew.

Meche (French). "Il y a mèche," the same as "Il y a moyen;" so the negative "Il n'y a pas mèche" (there is no possibility). The Dictionnaire du Bas-langage says:

"Dans le langage jargonistique, lorsque des ouvriers rendent proposer leurs services dans quelque imprimerie, ils demandent 'il y a mèche'—i.e., si l'on peut les prendre. Les compositeurs demandent 'il y a mèche pour la presse,' et les pressiers demandent 'il y a mèche pour la place.'"—Vol. ii. p. 129.

"Soit mis dedans cette caverne
De nul honneur il n'y a mèche."— Moralité de la Vendition de Joseph.

Medam'othi (Greek, never in any place). The island at which the fleet of Pantagruel landed on the fourth day of their voyage, and where they bought many choice curiosities, such as the picture of a man's voice, echo drawn to life, Plato's ideas, the atoms of Epicure, a sample of Philome'n's needlework, and other objects of vertu which could be obtained in no other portion of the globe. (Rabelais: Pantagruel, iv. 3.)

Médard (St.). Master of the rain. St. Médard was the founder of the rose-prize of Salency in reward of merit. The legend says, he was one day passing over a large plain, when a sudden shower fell, which wetted everyone to the skin except himself. He remained dry as a toast, for an eagle had kindly spread his wings for an umbrella over him, and ever after he was termed maître de la pluie.

"Il pleut le jour de St. Médard (6th June) Il pleut quarante jours plus tard."

Medea. A sorceress, daughter of the King of Colchis. She married Jason, the leader of the Argonauts, whom she aided to obtain the golden fleece.

Medea's Kettle or Caldron, to boil the old into youth again. Médée, the sorceress, cut an old ram to pieces, and, throwing the pieces into her caldron, the old ram came forth a young lamb. The daughters of Pelias thought to restore their father to youth in the same way; but Medea refused to utter the magic words, and the old man ceased to live.

"Get thee Medea's kettle and be hale at once."—Pope.

Medham (the keen). One of Mahomet's swords, taken from the Jews when they were expelled from Medîna. (See Swords.)

Medieval or Middle Ages begin with the Council of Chalcedon (451), and end with the revival of literature in the fifteenth century, according to the Rev. J. T. Duling. According to Hallam, they begin from the downfall of the Western Empire, in 476, to the Italian expeditions of Charles VIII. of France (1491-1496).

Median Apples. Pome-citrons.

Median Stone (Th). Said to cure blindness, and, if soaked in ewe's milk, to cure the gout.

Medicine, in alchemy, was that agent which brought about the transmutation of metals, or renewed old age; the philosopher's stone, and the elixir of life.

"How much unlike art thou, Mark Antony! Yet, coming from him, that great medicine hath With his tinct gilded thee."—Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, i. 6.
Medicinal Days. The sixth, eighth, tenth, twelfth, sixteenth, eighteenth, etc., of a disease; so called because according to Hippocrates, no "crisis" occurs on these days, and medicine may be safely administered. (See Crisis.)

Medicinal Hours. Hours proper for taking medicine, viz. morning fasting, an hour before dinner, four hours after dinner, and bed-time. (Quincy.)

Medina. (Economy, Latin medium, the golden mean.) Step-sister of Elisash and Perissa, who could never agree upon any subject. (Spenser: Faerie Queen, book ii.)

Medina means in Arabic "city." The city so called is "Medinat al Nabi" (city of the prophet).

Mediterranean (Key of the). The fortress of Gibraltar, which commands the entrance.

Medium (adj.), in the language of spirit-rappers, etc., is some one possessed of "'dylic force," who puts the question of the interrogator to the "spirit" consulted.

Medora. The betrothed of the Corsair. (Byron: The Corsair.)

Medoro (in Orlando Furioso). A Moorish youth of extraordinary beauty; a friend of Dardinello, King of Zuma'ra. After Dardinello was slain, Medoro is wounded by some unknown spear. Angelica dresses his wounds, falls in love with him, marries him, and they retire to India, where he becomes King of Cathay in right of his wife.

Medusa. Chief of the Gorgons. Her head was cut off by Perseus (2 syl.), and Minerva placed it in her regis. Everyone who looked on this head was instantly changed into stone.

"The tale is that Medusa, famous for her hair, presumed to set her beauty above that of Minerva: so the jealous goddess converted her rival's hair into snakes, which changed to stone anyone who looked thereon.

The most famous painting of Medusa is by Leonardo da Vinci; it is called his chef d'œuvre.

Moerschaum (2 syl., German, sea-froth.) This mineral, from having been found on the sea-shore in rounded white lumps, was ignorantly supposed to be sea-froth petrified; but it is a compound of silica, magnesia, lime, water, and carbonic acid. When first dug it lathers like soap, and is used as a soap by the Tartars.

Meg. Mons Meg. An old-fashioned piece of artillery in the castle of Edinburgh, made at Mons, in Flanders. It was considered a palladium by the Scotch. (See Long Meg.)

"Set on our crown, and our sword, and our sceptre, and Mons Meg to be kept by the English ... In the Tower of London (N.R. it was removed in 1529)."—Scott: Rob Roy, chap. xxvii.

A roaring Meg. A cannon given by the Fishmongers of London, and used in 1380. Burton says, "Music is a roaring Meg against melancholy.

Megg Dods. An old landlady in Scott's novel called St. Roman's Well.

Meg Merrilies (in Sir W. Scott's Guy Mannering). This character was based on that of Jean Gordon, an inhabitant of the village of Kirk Yetholm, in the Cheviot Hills, in the middle of the eighteenth century. A sketch of Jean Gordon's life will be found in Blackwood's Magazine, vol. i. p. 54. She is a half-crazed sibyl or gipsy.

Mega'rian School. A philosophical school, founded by Euclid, a native of Megara, and disciple of Socrates.

Mega'rians (The). A people of Greece proverbial for their stupidity; hence the proverb, "Wise as a Megarian"—i.e. not wise at all; yet see above.

Megath'e'rium (Greek, great-beast). A gigantic extinct quadruped of the sloth kind.

Meg'rima. A corruption of the Greek hemi-ranna (half the skull), through the French migraine. A nervous affection generally confined to one brow, or to one side of the forehead; whims, fancies.

Megl'ie (in Strathmore). The place where Guinever, Arthur's queen, was buried.

Meiny (2 syl.). A company of attendants. (Norman, meingal and mesnie, a household, our menial.)

"With that the smiling Kriemhild forth stepped a little grace. And Brunhild and her meiny greeted, with gentle grace."—Lieders's Nithawen's Lied, stanza 604.

Meissonier-like Exactness. Jean Louis Ernest Meissonier, R.A., a French
Melibesus. Certain heretics in the early Christian Church, who entertained strange notions about Melchisedec. Some thought him superior to Christ, some paid him adoration, and some believed him to be Christ Himself or the Holy Ghost.

Melankees. Distinguished for throwing the javelin. He slew the Calydonian boar. It was declared by the fates that he would die as soon as a piece of wood then on the fire was burnt up; whereupon his mother snatched the log from the fire and extinguished it; but after Melankees had slain his maternal uncle, his mother threw the brand on the fire again, and Melankees died.

The death of Melankees was a favourite subject in an old Latin legend. The famous picture of Charlebois's in the Musee Imperial of Paris.

Melosigones. So Homer is sometimes called, because one of the traditions fixes his birthplace on the banks of the Meles, in Ionia. In a similar way we call Shakespeare the "Bard of Avon." (See Homer.)

Meleager. A brave, honest soldier, who believes everything to be true and honest till convicted of crime, and then he is a relentless punisher. (Beaumont and Fletcher: The Maid's Tragedy.)

Melancholely. Lowness of spirits, supposed at one time to arise from a redundance of black bile. (Greek, melas cholē.)

Melancholely Jacques (1 syl.). So Jean Jacques Rousseau was called for his morbid sensibilities and unhappy spirit. (1712-1778.) The expression is from Shakespeare, As You Like It, ii. 1.

Melancthon is merely the Greek for Schwärzerde (black earth), the real name of this amiable reformer. (1497-1560.) Similarly, Ecolampado’s is the Greek version of the German name Hansschen, and Desiderius Erasmus is one Latin and one Greek rendering of the name Gerard Gisbert.

Melanthius. A brave, honest soldier, who believes everything to be true and honest till convicted of crime, and then he is a relentless punisher. (Beaumont and Fletcher: The Maid's Tragedy.)

Melanuvas, Abstain from the Melanuvas. This is the sixth symbol in the Protepites. Melanuvas means the "black-tailed." Pythagoras told his disciples to abstain from that which has a black tail, in other words, from such pleasures and pursuits as end in sorrow, or bring grief. The Melanuvas is a fish of the perch family, sacred to the terrestrial gods.

Melchior, Kaspar, and Balthasar. The three magi, according to Cologne tradition, who came from the East to make offerings to the "Babe of Bethlehem, born King of the Jews."
trespassed to Him in this wretched world." (Chaucer: Canterbury Tales.)

N.B. This prose tale of Meliboeus is a literal translation of a French story, of which there are two copies in the British Museum. (MS. Reg. 19, c. vii.; and MS. Reg. 19, c. xi.)

Melibœan Dye. A rich purple. Meliboea, in Thessaly, was famous for the ostrum, a fish used in dyeing purple.

A military vest of purple flowed, Lovelier than Melibœan.

Melicertês. (4 syl.) Son of Ino, a sea deity. Athamas imagined his wife to be a lioness, and her two sons to be lion's cubs. In his frenzy he slew one of the boys, and drove the other (named Melicertês) with his mother into the sea. The mother became a sea-goddess, and the boy the god of harbours.

Melior. A lovely fairy, who carried off Parthen'opex of Blois to her secret island in her magic bark (French romance called Parthenopex de Blois, 12th cent.)

Meliscandra. Charlemagne's daughter, married to his nephew Don Gwyfè-ros. She was taken captive by the Moors, and confined seven years in a dungeon, when Gwyfè-ros rescued her. (Don Quixote.)

Melissa (in Orlando Furioso). The prophetess who lived in Merlin's cave. Brad'mamt gave her the enchanted ring to take to Roger'ro; so, assuming the form of Atlantis, she went to Alc'na's island, and not only delivered Roger'ro, but disenchanted all the forms metamorphosed in the island. In book xix. she assumes the form of Rodomont, and persuades Agramant to break the league which was to settle the contest by single combat. A general battle ensues.

Mell Supper. Harvest supper; so called from the French meler (to mix together), because the master and servants sat promiscuously at the harvest board.

Melilinous Doctor (The). St. Bernard, whose writings were called a "river of Paradise." (1091-1153.)

Melon. The Mahometans say that the eating of a melon produces a thousand good works. So named from Melos.

Étir un melon. To be stupid or dull of comprehension. The melon-pumpkin or squash is soft and without heart, hence "être un melon" is to be as soft as a squash. So also "avoir un cœur de melon (or de citrouille)" means to have no heart at all. Tertullian says of Marcion, the heresiarch, "he has a pumpkin [pup'tonem] in the place of a heart [cordis foro]." It will be remembered that Thersitèes, the tailor, calls the Greeks "pumpkins" (pup'tonës).

Melons (French). Children sent to school for the first time; so called because they come from a "hot-bed," and are as delicate as exotics. At St. Cyr, the new-comers are called in school-slang "Les melons," and the old stages "Les anciens,"

Melons. There are certain stones on Mount Carmel called Stone Melons. The tradition is that Elijah saw a peasant carrying melons, and asked him for one. The man said they were not melons but stones, and Elijah instantly converted them into stones.

A like story is told of St. Elizabeth of Thuringia. She gave so bountifully to the poor as to crippled her own household. One day her husband met her with her lapful of something, and demanded of her what she was carrying. "Only flowers, my lord," said Elizabeth, and to save the lie God converted the leaves into flowers. (The Schönberg-Cotta Family, p. 19.)

Melpomène (4 syl.). The muse of tragedy. The best painting of this muse is by Le Brun, at Versailles.

Melrose Abbey (Register of) from 735 to 1270, published in Fulman (1684).

Melusîna. The most famous of the sârs of France. Having enclosed her father in a high mountain for offending her mother, she was condemned to become every Saturday a serpent from her waist downward. When she married Raymond, Count of Lusignian, she made her husband vow never to visit her on a Saturday; but, the jealousy of the count being excited, he hid himself on one of the forbidden days, and saw his wife's transformation. Melusîna was now obliged to quit her mortal husband, and was destined to wander about as a spectre till the day of doom. Some say the count immured her in the dungeon of his castle. (See Undine.)

Cîte de Melusîne. A sudden scream; in allusion to the scream of despair uttered by the fairy when she discovered the indiscreet visit of her beloved husband. (See above.)

Mélusines (3 syl.). Gingerbread cakes bearing the impress of a beautiful woman "bien coiffe," with a serpent's tail; made by confectioners for the May fair in the neighbourhood of Lusignan, near Poitiers. The allusion is to the transformation of the fairy Melus'na every Saturday. (See above.)

Melyhalt (Lady). A powerful subject of King Arthur, whose domains Galiot invaded. She chose Galiot as her lover.

Memento Mori (A). Something to put us in mind of the shortness and uncertainty of life.

"I make as good use of it [Hardolph's face] as many a man does of a death's head or a memento mori."—Shakespeare: Henry IV, iii. 3.

Memnon. Prince of the Ethiopians, who went to the assistance of his uncle Priam, and was slain by Achilles. His mother Eos was inconsolable for his death, and wept for him every morning.

The Greeks used to call the statue of Am'euoph'is III., in Thebes, that of Memnon. This image, when first struck by the rays of the rising sun, is said to have produced a sound like the snapping asunder of a chord. Poetically, when Eos (morning) kisses her son at daybreak, the hero acknowledges the salutation with a musical murmur. The word is the Egyptian met-amun, beloved of Ammon.

"Memnon bending o'er his broken lyre."—Darwin: Economy of Vegetation, i. 7.

Memnon. One of Voltaire's novels, designed to show the folly of aspiring to too much wisdom.

Memnon's sister. Himera, mentioned by Dictys Cretensis.

"Black, but such an as in esteem Prince Memnon's sister might be seem."—Milton: II Penseroso.

The legend given by Dictys Cretensis (book vi.) is that Himera, on hearing of her brother's death, set out to secure his remains, and encountered at Paphos a troop laden with booty, and carrying Memnon's ashes in an urn. Pallas, the leader of the troop, offered to give her either the urn or the booty, and she chose the urn.

Probably all that is meant is this: Black so delicate and beautiful that it might seem a sister of Memnon the son of Aurora or the early day-dawn.

Memorable. The ever memorable. John Hales, of Eton (1584-1656).

Memory. Magliabechi, of Florence, the book-lover, was called "the universal index and living cyclopaedia." (1633-1714.) (See Woodfall.)

Bard of Memory. Samuel Rogers, author of Pleasures of Memory. (1762-1855.)

Men in Buckram. Hypothetical men existing only in the brain of the imaginer. The allusion is to the vaunting tale of Falstaff to Prince Henry. (Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 4.)

Men of Kent. (See Kent.)

Men of Lawn. Bishops of the Anglican Church. (See Man.)

Men are but Children of a Larger Growth. (Dryden: All for Love, iv. 1.)

Menah. A large stone worshipped by certain tribes of Arabia between Mecca and Medi'a. This stone, like most other Arabian idols, was demolished in the eighth year of "the flight." The "menah" is simply a rude large stone brought from Mecca, the sacred city, by certain colonists, who wished to carry with them some memento of the Holy Land.

Menal'cas. Any shepherd or rustic. The name figures in the Eclogues of Virgil and the Idylle of Theocritus.

Men'mam. A river of Siam, on whose banks swarms of fire-flies are seen.

Menam'ber. A rocking-stone in the parish of Sithney (Cornwall) which a little child could move. The soldiers of Cromwell thought it fostered superstition, and rendered it immovable.

Mendicants. The four orders are the Jacobins, Franciscans, Augustinians, and Carmelites (3 syl.).

Mendo'sa (Daniel), the Jew. A prize-fighter who held the belt at the close of the last century, and in 1791 opened the Lyceum in the Strand to teach "the noble art of boxing." (1719-1791.)

"When Humphrey's stood up to the Israelite's thumps In hermaphrodite breeches and touch-me-not pumps."—Mendoza the Jew.

"The Odiad (1798) is a mock heroic on the battle between Mendoza and Humphreys. The Art of Boxing (1799) was written by Mendoza. Memoirs of the Life of Daniel Mendoza (1816). See also Fugitive, vol. i. (1880.)

Menech'mians. Persons exactly like each other, as the brothers Dromio. So called from the Menach'mi of Plautus.

In the Comedy of Errors Dromio, not only the two Dromios are exactly like each others, but also Antiphilus of Ephesus is the facsimile of his brother, Antiphilus of Syracuse.
Menocrates. A physician of Syracuse, of such unbounded vanity that he called himself Jupiter. Philip of Macedon invited him to a banquet, but served him with incense only.

"Such was Menocrates of little worth, who lived, the saviour, to be called presum'd, To whom of incense Philip made a feast."

Lord Broke: Inquisition upon Fines, etc.

Menevia. St. David's (Wales). Its old British name was Henomenic.

Meng-te. The fourth of the sacred books of China: so called from its author, Latinised into Mencius. It is by far the best of all, and was written in the fourth century B.C. Confucius or Kong-foo-te wrote the other three: viz. Ta-heo (School of Adults), Chong-yong (The Golden Mean), and Lun-yu (or Book of Maxims).

Mother of Meng. A Chinese expression, meaning "an admirable teacher." Meng's father died soon after the birth of the sage, and he was brought up by his mother. (Died B.C. 317.)

Menile (2 syl.). A contraction of Marianne.

"And man I still on Menile dort, And hear the story that's in her ear."—Burns.

Menip'pos, the cyne, called by Lucian "the greatest snarer and snapper of all the old dogs" (cynics).

Varro wrote in Latin Satyrae Menippeae.

The Menippian Satire is a political pamphlet, partly in verse and partly in prose, designed to expose the pernicious intentions of Spain in regard to France, and the criminal ambition of the Tusc family. The chief writers were Leroy (who died 1589), Phitou (1514-1596), Passerat (1534-1602), and Rupin, the poet (1540-1609).

Menonites (3 syl.). The followers of Simon Menno, a native of Friesland, who modified the fanatical views of the Anabaptists. (1496-1561.)

Men'struum means a monthly dissolvent (Latin, menstrum), from the notion of the alchemists that it acted only at the full of the moon.

"All liquors are called menstrua which are used as dissolvents, or to extract the virtues of ingredients by infusion or decoction."—Quaey.

Mental Hallucinations. The mind informing the senses, instead of the senses informing the mind. There can be no doubt that the senses may be excited by the mind (from within, as well as from without). Macbeth saw the dagger of his imagination as distinctly as the dagger which he held in his hand. Malebranche declared that he heard the voice of God. Descartes thought he was followed by an invisible person, telling him to pursue his search for truth. Goethe says that, on one occasion, he met an exact counterpart of himself. Sir Walter Scott was fully persuaded that he had seen the ghost of the deceased Byron. All such hallucinations (due to mental disturbances) are of such stuff as dreams are made of.

Mentor. A guide, a wise and faithful counsellor; so called from Mentor, a friend of Ulysses, whose form Minerva assumed when she accompanied Telemaochus in his search for his father. (Fenelon: Telemachus.)

Menu. Son of Brahma, whose institutes are the great code of Indian civil and religious laws.

Mee Peric'tule (Latin). On my responsibility; I being bond. "I will vouch for Edie Oriltree, mee peric'tule, ... said Oldbuck."—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xxxviii.

Mephibosheth in Abraun and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Pordage, a poetaster (ii. 403).

Mephistoph'ele, Mephistoph'illus. Mephistophilus. A sneering, jeering, leering tempter. The character is that of a devil in Goethe's Faust. He is next in rank to Satan.

Mercador Amante—the basis of our comedy called The Curious Impertinent—was by Gaspar de Avila, a Spaniard.

Mercur'or's Projection is Mercator's chart or map for nautical purposes. The meridian lines are at right angles to the parallels of latitude. It is so called because it was devised by Gerhard Kauflmann, whose surname Latinised is Mercator (Merchant). (1512-1594.)

Merchant of Venice. A drama by Shakespeare. A similar story occurs in the Gezta Romana'rum. The tale of the bond is chapter xlviii., and that of the caskets is chapter xci. Shakespeare, without doubt, is also indebted for his plot to the novellata II Pecorone of Ser. Giovanni. (Fourteenth century.)

Loki made a wager with Broek and lost. He wagered his head, but saved it on the plea that Broek could not take his head without touching his neck. (Simroch's Edda, p. 308.)
Mercia. The eighth and last kingdom of the Heptarchy, between the Thames and the Humber. It was the more or boundary of the Anglo-Saxons and free Britons of Wales.

Mercurial. Light-hearted and gay, like those born under the planet Mercury. (Astronomical notion.)

Mercurial Finger (Ths.). The little finger.

"The thumb, in chivalry, we gave to Venus.
The forefinger to Love, the wrist to Saturn.
The ring to Sol, the least to Mercury."—Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, 1. 1.

"If pointed it denotes eloquence, if square it denotes sound judgment.

Mercuriale (4 syl., French). An harangue or rebuke; so called from Mercuriale, as the first Wednesday after the great vacation of the Parliament under the old French régime used to be called. On this day the house discussed grievances, and reprimanded members for misconduct.

Mercury. Images of Mercury, or rather, shapeless posts with a marble head of Mercury on them, used to be erected by the Greeks and Romans where two or more roads met, to point out the way. (Jurewitz, viii. 53.)

"There are two famous statues of this god in Paris: one in the garden of Versailles, by Lemire, and another in the Tuileries, by Mellem.

You cannot make a Mercury of every boy. Pythagoras said: "Non est quisque homo Mercurium sit." That is, "Not every mind will answer equally well to be turned into a scholar." The proper wood for statue of Mercury was boxwood—"vel quod homines puellorum pra se ferat, vel quod materies sit omnium maxime eternas." (Kronius.)

Mercury, in astrology, "significeth subtile men, ingenious, inconstant: rymers, poets, advocates, orators, philosophers, arithmeticians, and base fellows."

Mercury Fig. (In Latin Ficus ad Mercurium). The first fig gathered off a fig-tree was by the Romans devoted to Mercury. The proverbial saying was applied generally to all first fruits or first works, as the "Guido de Scremer was my Mercury fig."

Mercurio. A kind-hearted, witty nobleman, kinsman to the Prince of Verona, in Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet. Being mortally wounded by Tybalt, he was asked if he were hurt, and replied, "A scratch, a scratch; marry, 'tis enough."

The Mercutio of actors. Lewis, who displayed in acting the combination of the top and real gentleman. (1748-1811.)

Mercy. A young pilgrim who accompanied Christiana in her pilgrimage to Mount Zion. She married Matthew, Christian's son. (Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, part ii.)

Mercy. The seven works of mercy are:—

(1) To feed the sick.
(2) To feed the hungry.
(3) To give drink to the thirsty.
(4) To clothe the naked.
(5) To house the homeless.
(6) To visit the fatherless and the afflicted.
(7) To bury the dead.

Mat. xxv, 35-40

Meridian (J.). A noonday drum of spirits.

"He received from the hand of the water the merciun, which was placed ready at the bar."—Sir Walter Scott: Redgauntlet, chap. 1.

Merino Sheep. A Spanish breed of sheep, very valuable for their wool.

Merioneth (Wales) is macronmaeth (a dairy farm).

Merlan (French). A whitening, or a hairdresser. Perruquiers are so called because at one time they were covered with flour like whitening prepared for the frying-pan.

"M'adressait un merlanum huit une perruque sur un Saint Mart."—Chat d'Amour: Memoires d'un Tourneur.

Merlin. Prince of Enchanters; also the name of a romance. He was the son of a damsel seduced by a fiend, but Bhaísòs baptized the infant, and so rescued it from the power of Satan. He died spell-bound by his mistress Vivian in a hawthorn-bush. (See Spencer's Ennoir Queen. Tennyson's Idylls of the King, and Ellis's Specimens of Early English Merivial Romances.)

The English Merlin. Lilly, the astrologer, who published two tracts under the assumed name of "Merlinus Anglicus."

Merlin Chair (A). A three-wheeled invalid chair, with a double tyre to the two front wheels, the outer tyre being somewhat smaller than that on which the chair rests, so that by turning it with the hand the chair can be propelled. Named after the inventor.

Merlo or Mele (Juan de). Born at Castile in the 15th century. A dispute Mermaids. Sir James Emerson Tennent, speaking of the dugong, a cetacean, says, “Its head has a rude approach to the human outline, and the mother while suckling her young holds it to her breast with one flipper, as a woman holds her infant in her arm. If disturbed she suddenly dives under water, and tosses up her fish-like tail. It is this creature which has probably given rise to the tales about mermaids.”

Mermaid’s Glove [Chalina ocelata], the largest of British sponges, so called because its branches resemble fingers.

Mermaids’ Purses. The empty cases of fishes’ eggs, frequently cast up by the waves on the sea-beach.

Mer’øpæ. One of the Pleiads; dimmer than the rest, because she married a mortal.

Merops’ Son or A son of Merops. One who thinks he can set the world to rights, but can only set it on fire. Agitators and stump orators, demagogues and Nihilists, are sons of Merops. The allusion is to Phaeton, son of Merops, who thought himself able to drive the car of Phoebus, but, in the attempt, nearly set the world on fire.

Merovin’gian Dynasty. The dynasty of Merovius, a Latin form of Merwig (great warrior). Similarly Louis is Clovis, and Clovis is Clot-urig (noted warrior).

Merrie Eng’land may probably mean “illustrious,” from the old Teutonic mer. (Anglo-Saxon, mære, famous.) According to R. Ferguson, the word appears in the names Merry, Merry, Merick; the French Mère, Mèreau, Merry, Méri; and numerous others. (Teutonic Name-System, p. 368.) (See below Merry.)

Merry. A mermaid, believed by Irish fishermen to forebode a coming storm. There are male merrows, but no word to designate them. (Irish, Murradh or Murraghach, from mur, the sea, and oigh, a maid.)

“it was rather annoying to Jack, that, though living in a place where the merrows were as plentiful as lizards, he never could get a right view of one.”—W. B. Yeats: Fairy and Folk Tales, p. 63.

Merry. The original meaning is not mirthful, but active, famous; hence gallant soldiers were called “merry men”; favourable weather, “merry weather”; brisk wind, “a merry gale;” London was “merry London;” England, “merry England;” Chaucer speaks of the “merry organ at the mass;” Jane Shore is called by Pembant the “merry consumine of Edward IV.” (Anglo-Saxon, mære, illustrious, great, mighty, etc.). (See Merry-Men.)

“Tis merry in hall, when beards wag all (2 Henry IV., act v. 3). It is a sure sign of mirth when the beards of the guests shake with laughter.

Merry Andrew. So called from Andrew Borde, physician to Henry VIII., etc. To vapid learning he added great eccentricity, and in order to instruct the people used to address them at fairs and other crowded places in a very ad captandum way. Those who imitated his wit and drollery, though they possessed not his genius, were called Merry Andrews, a term now signifying a clown or buffoon. Andrew Borde Latinised his name into Andreas Perfordius. (1549.) Prior has a poem on “Merry Andrew.”

“T’ the above is the usual explanation given of this phrase; but Andrew is a common name in old plays for a varlet or manservant, as Abigail is for a waiting gentlewoman.

Merry Dancers. The northern lights, so called from their undulatory motion. The French also call them chèvres dan-santes (dancing goats).

Merry Dun of Dover. A large mythical ship, which knocked down Calais steeples in passing through the Straits of Dover, and the pennant, at the same time, swept a flock of sheep off Dover cliffs into the sea. The masts were so lofty that a boy who ascended them would grow grey before he could reach deck again. (Scandinavian mythology.)
Merry Men (My). A chief calls his followers his merry men. (See above.)

Merry Men of May. An expanse of broken water which boils like a caldron in the southern side of the Stroma channel.

Merry Monarch. Charles II. (1630-1685).

Merry-thought. The furcula or wishing-bone in the breast of a fowl; sometimes broken by two persons, and the one who holds the larger portion has his wish, as it is said.

Merry as a Cricket, or as a Lark, or as a Grig. The French say, "Fou (or Folle) comme le branlegai," and more commonly "Cai comme un poison" (a chaffinch). "Branlegai" is a dance, but the word is not in use now.

Morse. Berwickshire was so called because it was the mere or frontier of England and Scotland.

Mersenne (2 syl.). The English Mersenne. John Collins, mathematician and physicist, so called from Marin Mersenne, the French philosopher (1624-1680).

Merton (Tommy). One of the chief characters in the tale of Sandford and Merton, by Thomas Day.

Merton College. Founded by Walter de Merton, Bishop of Rochester, and Lord High Chancellor in 1264.

Meru. A fabulous mountain in the centre of the world, 80,000 leagues high, the abode of Vishnu, and a perfect paradise. It may be termed the Indian Olymps.

Mervellousse (3 syl., French). The sword of Doolin of Mayence. It was so sharp that when placed edge downwards it would cut through a slab of wood without the use of force. (See Swoons.)

Also a term applied to the 18th century French ladies' dress.

Mesmerism. So called from Friedrich Anton Mesmer, of Merseburg, in Saxen, who introduced the science into Paris in 1778. (1734-1815.)

Mesopotamia. The true "Mesop-otamia" ring (London Review)—i.e., something high-sounding and pleasing, but wholly past comprehension. The allusion is to the story of an old woman who told her pastor that she "found great support in that comfortable word Mesopotamia."

Mess = 4. Nares says because "at great dinners . . . the company was usually arranged into fours." That four made a mess is without doubt. Lyly expressly says, "Foure makes a messe, and we have a messe of masters" (Mother Bombie, ii. 1). Shakespeare calls the four sons of Henry his "messen of sons" (2 Henry VI., act i. 4); and "Latine," English, French, and Spanish are called a "messe of tongues" (Vocabulary, 1617). Again, Shakespeare says (Love's Labour's Lost, iv. 3), "You three fools lacked me . . . to make up the mess." Though four made a mess, yet it does not follow that the "officer's mess" is so called, as Nares says, because "the company was arranged into fours," for the Anglo-Saxon mess, like the Latin messa = table, mes Gothic = dish, whence Benjamin's mess, a mess of pottage, etc.

Mess, meaning confusion or litter, is the German mischen, to mix; our word mash.

Messalina. Wife of the Emperor Claudius of Rome. Her name has become a byword for lasciviousness and incontinency. Catherine II. of Russia is called The Modern Messalina (1729-1796). (See MAROZIA.)

Messalina of Germany (The). Barbary of Cilley, second wife of Kaiser Sigismund (15th century).

Metallicus, by John of Salisbury, the object of which is to expose the absurdity and injurious effects of "wrangling," or dialectics and metaphysics. He says, "Prattling and quibbling the masters call disputing or wrangling, but I am no wiser for such logic."

Metals. The seven metals in alchemy.

Gold, Apollo or the sun.

Silver, Diana or the moon.

Quicksilver, Mercury.

Copper, Venus.

Iron, Mars.

Tin, Jupiter.

Lead, Saturn.

Metamorphic Rocks. Those rocks, including gneiss, mica-schist, clay-slate, marble, and the like, which have become more or less crystalline.

Metamorphic Words. Obsolete words slightly altered, and made current again—as "chestnut" for catnut, from Castana, in Thessaly; "court-cards" for coat-cards; "currants" for corinths; "frontispiece" for frontisplate (Latin...
1. The French, negotiating in 1836, received it notably. (dei) physicians in Greek:

2. Metaphysics (Greek, after-physics). The disciples of Aristotle thought that matter or nature should be studied before mind. The Greek for matter or nature is physics, and the science of its causes and effects is called physics. Meta-physics is the Greek for "after-physics," Sir James Mackintosh takes a less intentional view of the case, and says the word arose from the mere accident of the compilers who sorted the treatises of Aristotle, and placed that upon mind and intelligence after that upon matter and nature. The science of metaphysics is the consideration of things in the abstract—that is, of divested of their accidents, relations, and matter.

3. Metastasio. The real name of this Italian poet was Trapassi (death). He was brought up by Gravina, who Greecised the name. (1698-1782.)

4. Metathesis. A figure of speech in which letters or syllables are transposed, as "You occupew my pie [py]," instead of "You occupy my pie;" "draggle-tail," etc.

5. Methodical. Must methodical doctor, John Bassol, a disciple of Duns Scotus. (1347.)

6. Methodists. A name given (1729) by a student of Christ Church to the brothers Wesley and their friends, who used to assemble on given evenings for religious conversations.

7. "This word was in use many centuries before the birth of Wesley and of Whitfield. Gale (1678) speaks of a religious sect called "the New Methodists." (Court of the Genteels.) John Spencer uses the word as one familiarly known in Cromwell's time. Even before the birth of Christ, Celsius tells us that those physicians were called "Methodists" (methodici) who followed medical rules rather than experience. Modern Methodism dates no farther back than 1729.

9. Methuen Treaty. A commercial treaty between England and Portugal, negotiated by Paul Methuen, in 1703, whereby the Portuguese wines were received at a lower duty than those of France. This treaty was abandoned in 1836.

10. Metonic Cycle (The). A cycle of nineteen years, at the end of which period the new moons fall on the same days of the year, and eclipses recur. Discovered by Meton, c. 432 B.C.

11. Metra. Que'n dit Metra (Louis XVI.)? Metra was a noted news-vendor of Paris before the Revolution—a notability with a cocked hat, who went about with his hands folded behind his back.

12. Metropol'itan (A). A prelate who has suffragan bishops subject to him. The two metropolitanates of England are the two archbishops, and the two of Ireland the archbishops of Armagh and Dublin. In the Roman Catholic Church of Great Britain, the four archbishops of Armagh, Dublin, Cashel, and Tuam are metropolitans. The word does not mean the prelate of the metropolis in a secular sense, but the prelate of a "mother city," in an ecclesiastical sense—i.e., a city which is the mother or ruler of other cities. Thus, the Bishop of London is the prelate of the metropolis, but not a metropolitan. The Archbishop of Canterbury is metropoli'tanus et primus to'tius Anglica, and the Archbishop of York primus et metro-poli'tanus Anglica.

13. Mettre de la Paille dans ses Souliers, or Mettre du Foin dans ses Bottes. To amass money, to grow rich, especially by illicit gains. The reference is to a practice, in the sixteenth century, followed by beggars to extort alms.

15. Meum and Tu'un. That which belongs to me and that which is another's. Meum is Latin for "what is mine," and tuum is Latin for "what is thine." If a man is said not to know the difference between meum and tuum, it is a polite way of saying he is a thief.

17. Meus. Stables, but properly a place for hawks on the moat. The meute was an edifice in a park where the officers of venery lodged, and which was fitted up with dog-kennels, stables, and hawkeries. They were called meutes from meue, the slough of anything; the antlers shed by stags were collected and kept in these enclosures. (Lacombe: Dictionnaire Portatif des Beaux-Arts.)

18. Mexit'il. Tutelary god of the Aztecs, in honour of whom they named their empire Mexico. (Southey.)
Mozentius, king of the Tyrrenians, noted for his cruelties and impiety. He was driven from his throne by his subjects, and fled to Turnus, King of the Rutuli. When Æneas arrived he fought with Mozentius, and slew both him and his son Lausus. Mozentius put his subjects to death by tying a living man to a dead one.

"He stretches out the arm of Mozentius, and places the dead to the living."—C. Broole: Shirley, chap. xxxi.

"This is like Mozentius in Virgil. . . . Such critics are like dead souls: they may[recken, but cannot burn."—Brooke: Preface to Poems.

Mozzo Relievo. Moderate relief (Italian). This is applied to figures which project more than those of basso relievo (g.r.), but less than those of alto relievo (g.r.).

Mozzo Tinto (Italian, medium tint). So engravings in imitation of Indian-ink drawings are called.

Mososa'mia. An earthly paradise somewhere in Africa, but accessible by only one narrow road. Gaudentio di Lucca discovered this secret road, and resided in this paradise for twenty-five years. (Simon Berington: Gaudentio di Lucca.)

Micah Rood's Apples. Apples with a spot of red (like blood) in the heart. Micah Rood was a prosperous farmer at Franklin. In 1693 a pedlar with jewellery called at his house, and next day was found murdered under an apple-tree's bough in an orchard. The crime was never brought home to the farmer, but next autumn all the apples of the fatal tree bore inside a red blood-spot, called "Micah Rood's Curse," and the farmer died soon afterwards.

Micawber (Mr. Wilkins). A great speechifier and letter-writer, projector of bubble schemes sure to lead to fortune, but always ending in grief. Notwithstanding his ill success, he never despaired, but felt certain that something would "turn up" to make his fortune. Having failed in every adventure in the old country, he emigrated to Australia, where he became a magistrate. (Dickens: David Copperfield.)

Micawberism. Conduct similar to that of Mr. Micawber's. (See above.)

Micha'el. Prince of the celestial armies, commanded by God to drive the rebel angels out of heaven. Gab'r'el was next to him in command. (See Seven Spirits.)

Longfellow, in his Golden Legend, says he is the presiding spirit of the planet Mercury, and brings to man the gift of prudence.

"The planet Mercury, whose place is nearest to the sun in space, is my allotted sphere; And with celestial ardor swifl I bear upon my hands the gift Of heavenly prudence here."—The Miracle Play, ii.

St. Michael, in Christian art, is sometimes depicted as a beautiful young man with severe countenance, winged, and either clad in white or armour, bearing a lance and shield, with which he combats a dragon. In the final judgment he is represented with scales, in which he weighs the souls of the risen dead.

St. Michael's chair. It is said that any woman who has sat on St. Michael's chair, Cornwall, will rule the roost as long as she lives.

Michael Angelo. The celebrated painter, born 1474, died 1563. The Michael-Angelo of battle-scenes. Michael-Angelo Cerquozzi, a native of Rome, famous for his battle-scenes and shipwrecks. (1560-1560.)

Michel-Ange des Bamboches. Peter van Laar, the Dutch painter. (1613-1673.)

Michael-Angelo of music. Johann Christoph von Gluck, the German musical composer. (1714-1787.)

Michaelmas Day, September 29th, one of the quarter-days when rents are paid, and the day when magistrates are elected. Michel the archangel is represented in the Bible as the general of the celestial host, and as such Milton represents him. September 29th is dedicated to Michael and All Angels, and as magistrates were once considered "angels" or their representatives, they were chosen on the day of "All Angels."

"I saw another sign in heaven . . . seven angels (magistrates, or executors of God's judgment), having the seven last plagues . . . . filled with the wrath of God." (Rev. xiv.) Those ministers of religion who acted as magistrates were also called angels. "There is no power but of God. The powers that be are ordained of God."

Micha'il, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Queen Catherine, wife of Charles II. As Charles II. is called David in the satire, and Micha'il was David's wife, the name is appropriate.

Michae'l or Cousin Michael. A Ger- man. Micha'il means a dolt; thus the French call a fool who allows himself to be taken in by thimble-rigs and card tricks mikel. In Old French the word mice occurs, meaning a fool. (See MICHON.)

“L’Anglais aime à être représenté comme un John Bull; pour nous, notre type est l’Allemand Michel, qui regoit une tape par derriure et qui demande encore, ’Qu’y a-t-il pour votre service?’”—Dr. Weber: De l’Allemagne, etc.

MICHING MALICHO. Secret or under-hand mischief; a veiled rebuke; a bad deed probed by disguised means. To mich or mcheel means to skulk or shrink from sight. Michers are poachers or secret pilferers. Malicho is a Spanish word meaning an “evil action;” as a personified name it means a malefactor. (Hamlet, iii. 2.)

The “quarto” reads munching malto; the “folio” has miching malicho. Qy. The Spanish macheo mathecho (much mischief)?

MICHON, according to Cotgrave, is a “block, dunce, dolt, joker, dulard, duffer, logghead.” Probably michon, Mike (an ass), mikel, and cousin Michel, are all from the Italian micco, an ass. (See MIKE.)

MICKLETON JURY (The). A corruption of mickle-tourn (magnus turnus). The jury of court leets. These leets were visited Easter and Michaelmas by the county sheriffs in their towns.

MICROMOUS. (Greek, little world.) So man is called by Paracelsus. The ancients considered the world as a living being; the sun and moon being its two eyes, the earth its body, the ether its intellect, and the sky its wings. When man was looked on as the world in miniature, it was thought that the movements of the world and of man corresponded, and if one could be ascertained, the other could be easily inferred; hence arose the system of astrology, which professed to interpret the events of a man’s life by the corresponding movements, etc., of the stars. (See DIAPASON.)

MID-LENT SUNDAY. The fourth Sunday in Lent. It is called dominica refectioinis (refection Sunday), because the first lesson is the banquet given by Joseph to his brethren, and the gospel of the day is the miraculous feeding of the five thousand. In England it used to be called MOTHERING SUNDAY, from the custom of visiting the mother or cathedral church on that day to make the Easter offering.

MIDAS. Like Midas, all he touches turns to gold. Midas, King of Phrygia, requested of the gods that everything he touched might be turned to gold. His request was granted, but as his food became gold the moment he touched it, he prayed the gods to take their favour back. He was then ordered to bathe in the Pactolus, and the river ever after rolled over golden sands.

MIDAS-EARED. Without discrimination or judgment. Midas, King of Phrygia, was appointed to judge a musical contest between Apollo and Pan, and gave judgment in favour of the satyr; whereupon Apollo in contempt gave the king a pair of ass’s ears. Midas hid them under his Phrygian cap; but his servant, who used to cut his hair, discovered them, and was so tickled at the “joke,” which he durst not mention, that he dug a hole in the earth, and relieved his mind by whispering in it “Midas has ass’s ears.” Budaeus gives a different version. He says that Midas kept spies to tell him everything that transpired throughout his kingdom, and the proverb “that kings have long arms” was changed in his case to “Midas has long ears.” “Est eo in proverbium venit, quod multis otiaeras—I.e., auriculaurus habebat.” (St. Asse.) (See Pope: Prologues to Satire.)

DOMENICINHO (1581-1661) has a painting on the Judgment of Midas.

MIDAS has ass’s ears. An exact parallel of this tale is told of Portzmax, King of a part of Brittany. It is said Portzmax had all the barbers of his kingdom put to death, lest they should announce to the public that he had the ears of a horse. An intimate friend was found willing to shave him, after swearing profound secrecy; but not able to contain himself, he confided his secret to the sands of a river bank. The reeds of this river were used for pan-pipes and hautbois, which repeated the words “Portzmax—King Portzmax has horse’s ears.”

MIDDEN. The kitchen midden. The dust-bin. The farmer’s midden is the dunghill. The word is Scotch. (Danish, midding; Norwegian, mudder; Welsh, mydlo (to wet), our mud and mire.) Better marry over the midden than over the mire. Better seek a wife among your neighbours whom you know than among strangers of whom you know nothing. The midden, in Scotland, is the domestic rubbish heap.

ILKA COCK CRAWS LOUDEST ON ITS SIN MIDDEN. In English, “Every cock crowed loudest on his own dunghill.” A midden is an ash-pit, a refuse-heap.
Middle Ages

A term of no definite period, but varying a little with almost every nation. In France it was from Clovis to Louis XI. (481 to 1601). In England, from the Heptarchy to the accession of Henry VII. (409 to 1485). In universal history it was from the overthrow of the Roman Empire to the revival of letters (the fifth to the fifteenth century).

Middlesex. The Middle Saxons—that is, between Essex, Sussex, and Wessex.

Midgard. The abode of the first pair, from whom sprang the human race. It was made of the eyebrows of Ymer, and was joined to Asgard by the rainbow bridge called Bifrost. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Asgard is the abode of the celestial.

Utgard is the abode of the giants.

Midgard is between the two—better than Utgard, but inferior to Asgard.

Midgard Sormen (earth's monster). The great serpent that lay in the abyss at the root of the celestial ash. (Scandinavian mythology.) Child of Loki.

Mid. Chercher midi à quatorze heures. To look for knots in a bulrush; much ado about nothing; to explain prosily what is perfectly obvious.

"There is a variant of this location:

Chercher midi ou il n'est qu'onze heures,
To look for a needle in a bottle of hay;
To give oneself a vast lot of trouble for nothing.
At one time, hundreds of persons looked for the millennium and end of the world on fixed dates, and to them the proverb would apply.

Midlothian. Sir Walter Scott's Heart of Midlothian is a tale of the Porteous riot, in which are introduced the interesting incidents of Effie and Jeanie Deans. Effie is seduced while in the service of Mrs. Suddetree, and is imprisoned for child-murder; but her sister Jeanie obtains her pardon through the intercession of the queen, and marries Reuben Butler.

Midnight Oil. Late hours.

Burning the midnight oil. Sitting up late, especially when engaged on literary work.

Smells of the midnight oil. Said of literary work, which seems very elaborate, and has not the art of concealing art. (See lamp.)

Midsummer.

A Midsummer banquet. Brand mentions nine alle- feasts: "Bride-ales, church-ales, clerk- ales, give-ales, lamb-ales, leet-ales, Midsummer-ales, Scot-ales, Whitens- ales, and several more." Here "ale" does not mean the drink, but the feast in which good stout ale was supplied. The Cambridge phrase, "Will you wine with me after half?" means, "Will you come to my rooms for dinner, when wines, fruits, and cigars will be prepared, with coffee to follow?"

Midsummer Madness. Olivia says to Malvolio, "Why, this is very mid- summer madness" (Twelfth Night, iii. 4). The reference is to the rabies of dogs, which is generally brought on by Midsummer heat.

Midsummer Men. The plants called Orpine or Live-long, one of the Sedum tribe. Stonecrop is another variety of the same species of plants. Orpine is the French word for stonecrop. Live-long, so called because no plant lives longer after it is cut. It will live for months if sprinkled once a week with a little water. Sedum means the plant sedens in rupibus (sitting or growing on stones). It is called midsummer men because it used to be set in pots or shells on midsummer eve, and hung up in the house to tell damsels whether their sweethearts were true or not. If the leaves bent to the right, it was a sign of fidelity; if to the left, the true-love's heart was cold and faithless."

Midsummer-Moon Madness. 'Tis midsummer-moon with you. You are stirk mad. Madness is supposed to be affected by the moon, and to be aggravated by summer heat; so it naturally follows that the full moon at midsummer is the time when madness is most outrageous.

"What's this midsummer moon? Is all the world gone mad mad?"

_i. e._: Amphitryon, iv. 1.

Midsummer Night's Dream. Some of the most amusing incidents of this comedy are borrowed from the Dana of Montemayor, a Spanish writer of pastoral romance in the sixteenth century; and probably the Knights Tale in Chaucer may have furnished hints to the author.

Midsummer Night's Dream. Egeus of Athens went to Theseus, the reigning duke, to complain that his daughter Hermia, whom he had commanded to marry Demetrius, refused to obey him, because she loved Lysander. Egeus demanded that Hermia should be put to death for this disobedience, according to the law. Hermia pleaded that Demetrius loved Helena, and that his affection was reciprocated. Theseus had no power to alter the law, and gave Hermia four days’ respite to consider the matter, and if then she refused the law was to take its course. Lysander proposed flight, to which Hermia agreed, and told Helena her intention; Helena told Demetrius, and Demetrius, of course, followed. The fugitives met in a wood, the favourite haunt of the fairies. Now Oberon and Titania had had a quarrel about a changeling boy, and Oberon, by way of punishment, dropped on Titania’s eyes during sleep some love-juice, the effect of which is to make the sleeper full in love with the first thing seen when waking. The first thing seen by Titania was Bottom the weaver, wearing an ass’s head. In the meantime King Oberon dispatched Puck to pour some of the juice on the eyes of Demetrius, that he might love Helena, who, Oberon thought refused to requite her love. Puck, by mistake, anointed the eyes of Lysander with the juice, and the first thing he saw on waking was not Hermia but Helena. Oberon, being told that Puck had done his bidding, to make all sure, dropped some of the love-juice on the eyes of Demetrius, and the first person he beheld on waking was Hermia looking for Lysander. In due time the eyes of all were disenchanted. Lysander married Hermia, Demetrius married Helena, and Titania gave the boy to her lord, King Oberon.

Midwife ( Anglo-Saxon, mid, with; wif, woman). The nurse who is with the mother in her labour.

Midwife of men’s thoughts. So Socrates termed himself; and, as Mr. Grote observes, “No other man ever struck out of others so many sparks to set light to original thought.” Out of his intellectual school sprang Plato and the Dialectic system; Euclid and the Megarics; Aristippos and the Cyrenians; Anisthenes and the Cynics; and his influence on the mind was never equalled by any teacher but One, of whom it was said, “Never man spoke like this man.”

Midge (Miss). Mrs. Varden’s maid, and the impersonation of an old shrew. (Dickens: Barnaby Rudge.)

Mignon. The young Italian girl who fell in love with Wilhelm Meister’s apprentice, her protector. Her love not being returned, she became insane and died. (Goethe: Wilhelm Meister.)

Mikado (Japan, mi, exalted; kado, gate), is not a title of the emperor of Japan, but simply means the person who lives in the imperial palace.

Mike. To loiter. A corruption of miche (to skulk); whence, micher (a thief), and mischief (theft). (Old Norse, nak, leisure; Swedish, maka; Saxon, nyanjan, to creep.) (See Moment.)

"Shall the blessed sun of heaven prove a micer (loiterer)?"—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, iv, 4.

Milan Decree (The). A decree made by Napoleon I., dated “Milan, Dec. 27, 1807,” declaring ‘‘the whole British Empire to be in a state of blockade, and forbidding all countries either from trading with Great Britain or from even using an article of British manufacture.’’

This very absurd decree was killing the goose which laid the golden eggs, for England was the best customer of the very countries thus restricted from dealing with her.

Milan Steel. Arm’d in Milan steel. Milan was famous in the Middle Ages for its armoury. (Froissart, iv, 597.)

Milanese (3 syll.). A native of Milan—i.e. mi-lan-o. (Old Italian for middleland, meaning in the middle of the Lombardian plain.)

Mildenho. The metropolis of Lilliput, the wall of which was two feet and a half in height, and at least eleven inches thick. The city was an exact square, and two main streets divided it into four quarters. The emperor’s palace, called Belfàb’orac, was in the centre of the city. (Gulliver’s Travels: Voyage to Lilliput, iv.)

Mildew has nothing to do with either milds or der. It is the Gaelic meil-thuar (injurious or destructive blight).

Milesian Fables. The romances of Antonius Diogenes, described by Photius, but no longer extant. They were greedily read by the luxurious Sybarites, and appear to have been of a very coarse didactic character. They were compiled by Aristides, and translated into Latin by Sien’nà, about the time of the civil wars of Marius and Sylla.

The tales of Parthenius Nicenus were borrowed from them. The name is from the Milesians, a Greek colony, the first to catch from the Persians their rage for fiction. Parthenius taught Virgil Greek.
Milesian Story or Tale (A). One very wanton and ludicrous. So called from the Milesiae Fabula, the immoral tendency of which was notorious. (See above.)

Milesians (The). The ancient Irish. The legend is that Ireland was once peopled by the Firbolgs, who were subdued by the Milesians, called the “Gael of Ireland.”

“My family, by my father's side, are all the true old Milesians, and related to the O'Flaherty, and O'Shaunessy, and the McLaughlin, the O'Donnaghans, O'Callaghans, O'Geogaghans, and all the thick blood of the nation; and I myself am an O'Breaghana, which is the uilleon of them all.”—Maclin: Love o'the Muse.

Milk. To cry over spilt milk. (See under CRY.)

Milk and Honey. A land of milk and honey. That is, abounding in all good things, or of extraordinary fertility. Joel iii, 18 speaks of “the mountains flowing with milk and honey.” Figuratively used to denote all the blessings of heaven.

“Jerusalem the golden, With milk and honey blest.”

Milk and Water. Insipid, with: at energy or character; baby-pap (literature, etc.).

Milk of Human Kindness (The). Sympathy, compassion.

Milkman (A). An effeminate person; one without energy, one under petticoat government. The allusion is to very young children, who are fed on bread and milk.

Milky Way (The). A great circle of stars entirely surrounding the heavens. They are so crowded together that they appear to the naked eye like a “way” or stream of faint “milky” light. The Galaxy or Via Lactae.

“A broad and ample road, whose dust is gold And pavement stars, as stars to thee appear, Seen in the galaxy—that Milky Way Thine arms, as a circling zone, thou seest Powdered with stars.”

Mills. To fight: not from the Latin miles, a soldier, but from the noun mill. Grinding was anciently performed by pounding with a stone or pounding with the hand. To mill is to beat with the fist, as persons used to beat corn with a stone.

The word is Gaelic, in which there are numerous derivatives, meaning to ravage, destroy, etc.

Mills of God grind slowly (The). “Die pedes tanatos habent” (Petronius).

Vengeance may be delayed, but it will come when least expected.

“The mills of God grind slowly: yet they grind exceeding small: Though with patience He stands waiting, with exactness He grinds all.”

Longfellow: Retribution.

Millen’ium means simply a thousand years. (Latin, mille annus.) In Rev. xx. 2 it is said that an angel bound Satan a thousand years, and in verse 4 we are told of certain martyrs who will come to life again, and “reign with Christ a thousand years.” If this, says St. John, “is the first resurrection;” and this is what is meant by the millennium.

Miller. To drown the miller. (See Brown, etc.)

To give one the miller is to engage a person in conversation till a sufficient number of persons have gathered together to set upon the victim with stones, dirt, garbage, and all the arms which haste supplies a mob with. (See Mill.)

Morrow water glideth by the mill than wroth the miller of (Titus Andronicus, ii. 1). Many things are done in a house which the master and mistress never dream of.

Miller. A Joe Miller. A stale jest. John Mottley compiled a book of facetiae in the reign of James II., which he entitled Joe Miller's Jests, from a witty actor of farce during the time that Congreve's plays were in vogue. A stale jest is called a “Joe Miller,” implying that it is stolen from Mottley's compilation. (Joe Miller, 1681-1738.)

Miller's Eye (A). Lumps of unleavened flour in bread; so called because they are little round lumps like an eye.

“To put the miller's eye out. To make broth or pudding so thin that the miller's eye would be put out or puzzled to find the flour.

Miller's Thumb (A). A small fish, four or five inches long, so called from its resemblance to a miller's thumb. The fish is also called Bullhead, from its large head.

Milliner. A corruption of Millinier; so called from Milan, in Italy, which at one time gave the law to Europe in all matters of taste, dress, and elegance.

“Milliner was originally applied to the male sex; hence Ben Jonson, in Every Man in His Humour, i. 3, speaks of a "milliner's wife." The French have still une modiste and un modiste.
Millstone. To look (or see) through a millstone. To be wonderfully sharp-sighted.

"Then . . . since your eyes are so sharp that you can not only look through a millstone, but chase through the minds . . ."—Lady: Sapho, etc.

Millstone used for a Ferry (A). The saint who crossed the Irish Sea on a millstone was St. Piran, patron saint of tanners.

Millstones. To weep millstones. Not weep at all.

"Bid Glosier think on this, and he will weep—
Aye, millstones, as he leseoned us to weep.
Shakespeare: Richard III., i. 6.

Millstones of Montisoli (The). They produce flour of themselves, whence the proverb, "Grace comes from God, but millstones from Montisoli." (Boccacio: Decameron, day viii. novel 3.

Millwood (Sarah). The courtane who enticed George Barnwell to robbery and murder. (See Barnwell.)

Milo. An athlete of Crotona. It is said that he carried through the stadium at Olympia a heifer four years old, and ate the whole of it afterwards. When old he attempted to tear in two an oak-tree, but the parts closed upon his hands, and while held fast he was devoured by wolves. (See Polydameus.)

Milton borrowed from St. Avitus his description of Paradise (book i.), of Satan (book ii.), and many other parts of Paradise Lost. He also borrowed very largely from Du Bartas (1544-1591), who wrote an epic poem entitled, The Week of Creation, which was translated into almost every European language. St. Avitus wrote in Latin hexameters The Creation, The Fall, and The Expulsion from Paradise. (460-253).

Milton. "Milton," says Dryden, in the preface to his Fables, "was the poetical son of Spenser . . . Milton has acknowledged to me that Spenser was his original."

"Milton of Germany. Friedrich G. Klopstock, author of The Messiah, (1724-1803) Coleridge says he is a very German Milton indeed."

Mim. The Scandinavian god of wisdom, and most celebrated of the giants. The Vanir, with whom he was left as a hostage, cut off his head. Odin embalmed it by his magic art, pronounced over it mystic runes, and ever after consulted it on critical occasions. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Mim's Well. A well in which all wisdom lay concealed. It was at the root of the celestial ash-tree. Mimer drank thereof from the horn Gljallar. Odin gave one of his eyes to be permitted to drink of its waters, and the draught made him the wisest of the gods. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Mimosa. Niebuhr says the Mimosa "droops its branches whenever anyone approaches it, seeming to salute those who retire under its shade."

Mince (French). A bank-note. The assignats of the first republic were so called, because the paper on which they were printed was exceedingly thin. (Dictionnaire du Bas-Langage, ii. 139.)

Mince Pies at Christmas time are emblematical of the manger in which our Saviour was laid. The paste over the "offering" was made in form of a catch or hay-rack. (See Plum Pudding.)

Mince pies. Slang for "the eyes." (See Chivy.)

Mince the Matter. Not to mine the matter. To speak outright; not to palliate or gloss over the matter. Terence has "Rem profer palam" (Heautontimoroumenos, v, 2, 41). The French say, "Je ne le lui ai point mensonge." About the same is the phrase "Not to put too fine a point on the matter."

Mincemeat. To make mincemeat of. Utterly to demolish; to shatter to pieces. Mincemeat is meat cut up very fine.

Minc-house (A). A nunnery. (Anglo-Saxon, minicem, a nun.) Sometimes it means an ale- or road-house.

Mincing Lane (London). A cor-rupation of Mychen Lane; so called from the tenements held there by the mycens or nuns of St. Helen's, in Bishopsgate Street. (Minceem, Anglo-Saxon for a nun; minchery, a nunnery.)

Mincio or Min'tio. The birthplace of Virgil. The Clitunnum, a river of Umbria, was the residence of Proper-tius; the Anio is where Horace had a villa; the river Meles, in Ionia, is the supposed birthplace of Homer. Littleton refers to all these in his Monody on Miss Fortescue.

Mind your Eye. Be careful or vigilant; keep a sharp look out; keep your eyes open to guard against mischief. School-boy's. "Mens tuus ego."

"Perhaps it may be so" (says T.); "but mind your eye, and take care you don't put your foot in it."—Steele.

"You must mind your eye, George; a good many tents are robbed every week."—C. Reade, Mind your Own Business. "Seek thou a man diligent in his business, he shall stand before kings" (Prov. xxii. 29).

"He who doeth his own business defileth not his fingers" (Fielding's Proverbs). Let every tub stand on its own bottom. Never meddle with what does not concern you.

"Bon homme, garde la vache. Chacun son métier, et les vaches son bien garder. Chacun ses affaires."

"Qui fa le faiti mi, non sembrat le mani."

"Tu quid nihil referis ne cures. Suma cura negatione. Tu ne quæsitis extra."—Hence.

Minen Boys. The 20th Foot; so called from their noted bravery at Minden, in Prussia, August 1, 1759. Now called "The Lancashire Fusiliers."

Minerva (in Greek, Athénè). The most famous statue of this goddess was by Phidias, the Greek sculptor. It was wood encased with ivory; the drapery, however, was of solid gold. It represented the goddess standing, clothed with a tunic reaching to the ankles, a spear in her left hand, and an image of Victory (four cubits high = about six feet) in her right. She is girded with the regia, has a helmet on her head, and her shield rests by her side on the ground. The entire height was nearly forty feet. This statue was anciently one of the "Seven Wonders of the World." A superb statue of the goddess was found at Velletri, but whether this was the famous statue of Phidias is not known. It is preserved in the Imperial Museum.

Minerva. Invita Minerva, without sufficient ability; against the grain. Thus, Charles Kean acted comedy invita Minerva, his forte lying another way. Sir Philip Sidney attempted the Horatian metres in English verse invita Minerva.

Minerva Press (The). A printing establishment in Leadenhall Street, London, famous about a century ago for its trashy, ultra-semitical novels. These novels were remarkable for their complicated plots, and especially for the labyrinths of difficulties into which the hero and heroine got involved before they could get married to each other.

Miniature (3 syl.). Paintings by the Miniato'ri, a set of monks noted for painting with minium or red-lead. The first miniatures were the initial letters of rubrics, and as the head of the Virgin or some other saint was usually introduced into these illuminated letters, the word came to express a small likeness.

The best miniature-painters have been Holbein, Nicholas Hilliard, Isaac Oliver and his son Peter, Samuel Cooper and his brother Alexander, etc.

Minnie Ride. (See GUN.)

Minima (Latin, Fratres Minoris, least of the brethren). A term of self-abasement assumed by an order of monks founded by St. Francis of Paula, in 1458. The order of St. Francis of Assisi had already engrossed the "humble" title of Fratres Minores (inferior brothers). The superior of the minims is called corrector.

Minister means an inferior person, in opposition to magister, a superior. One is connected with the Latin minus, and the other with magis. Our Lord says, "Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister," where the antithesis is well preserved. The minister of a church is a man who serves the parish or congregation; and the minister of the Crown is the sovereign's servant.

Minister. Florimond de Remond, speaking of Albert Babinot, one of the disciples of Calvin, says, "He was a student of the Institutes, read at the hall of the Equity school in Poitiers, and was called la Minister." Calvin, in allusion thereto, used to call him "Mr. Minister," whence not only Babinot but all the other clergy of the Calvinistic church were called ministers.

Minna Troll. Eldest daughter of Magnus Troll, the old Udaller of Zetland. Captain Clement Cleveland (Vaughan) the pirate loved her, and Minna reciprocated his affection, but Cleveland was killed by the Spaniards in an encounter on the Spanish main. (Sir Walter Scott: The Pirate.)

Minneeha [Laughing-water]. The lovely daughter of the old arrow-maker of the Daco'tahs, and wife of Hiawatha. She died of famine. Two guests came unwinvited into Hiawatha's wigwam, and the foremost said, "Behold me! I am Famine;" and the other said, "Behold me! I am Fever;" and Minneeha shuddered to look on them, and hid her face, and lay trembling, freezing, burning, at the looks they cast upon her. "Ah!" cried Laughing-water, "the eyes of Pauguk [death] glare upon me, I can feel his icy fingers clasping mine amidst the darkness," and she died crying, "Hiawatha! Hiawatha!" (Long-fellow: Hiawatha.)

Minne'singers. Minstrels. The earliest lyric poets of Germany were so called, because the subject of their lyrics was minne-sang (love-ditty). These poets lived in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

Minories (3 syl.) (London). The cloister of the Minims or, rather, Minoresses (nuns of St. Clare). The Minims were certain reformed Franciscans, founded by St. Francis de Paula in the fifteenth century. They went bare-footed, and wore a coarse, black woollen stuff, fastened with a woollen girdle, which they never put off, day or night. The word is derived from the Latin minimus (the least), in allusion to the text, "I am less than the least of all saints" (Eph. iii. 8).

Minos. A king and lawgiver of Crete, made at death supreme judge of the lower world, before whom all the dead appeared to give an account of their stewardship, and to receive the reward of their deeds.

Minotaur [Minos-bull]. The body of a man and head of a bull. Theseus slew this monster.

Minot'ti. Governor of Corinth, then under the power of the doge. In 1715 the city was stormed by the Turks, and during the siege one of the magazines in the Turkish camp blew up, killing 600 men. Byron says it was Minotti himself who fired the train, and leads us to infer that he was one of those who perished in the explosion. (Byron: Siege of Corinth.)

Minstrel simply means a servant or minister. Minstrels were kept in the service of kings and princes for the entertainment of guests. James Beattie has a poem in Spenserian verse, called The Minstrel, divided into two books.

The last minstrel of the English stage, James Shirley, with whom the school of Shakespeare expired. (1594-1660.)

Mint. So called from the nymph Minthe, daughter of Cocytus, and a favourite of Pluto. This nymph was metamorphosed by Pluto's wife (Proserpine) out of jealousy, into the herb called after her name. The fable is quite obvious, and simply means that mint is a capital medicine. Minthe was a favourite of Pluto, or death, that is, was sick and on the point of death; but was changed into the herb mint, or was cured thereby.

"Could Pluto's queen, with jealous fury storm
And Minit to a fragrant herb transform?"

Minuit (2 syl.). "Enfants de la messe de minuit," pickpockets. Colgrave gives "night-walking rakeshells, such as haunt these nightly rites only to rob and play the knaves."

Min'ute. Make a minute of that. Take a note of it. A law term; a rough draft of a proceeding taken down in minute or small writing, to be afterwards engrossed, or written larger.

Min'ute Gun. A signal of distress at sea, or a gun fired at the death of a distinguished individual; so called because a minute elapses between each discharge.

Mi'ol'nier (3 syl.) [the crusher]. The magic hammer of Thor. It would never fail to hit a Troll; would never miss to hit whatever it was thrown at; would always return to the owner of its own accord; and became so small when not in use that it could be put into Thor's pocket. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Mir'abel. A travelled, dissipated fellow, who is proof against all the wiles of the fair sex. (Beaumont and Fletcher: Wildgoose Chase.)

Miracles (Latin, miracidum). Tremusian, the Roman emperor, is said to have cured a blind man and a cripple by his touch during his stay in Alexandria.

Mahomet's miracles. He took a scroll of the Koran from the horn of a bull; a white dove came from heaven to whisper in his ear a message from God; he opened the earth and found two jars, one of honey and one of milk, as emblems of abundance; he brought the moon from heaven, made it pass through his sleeve, and return to its place in heaven; he went to heaven on his horse Al Borak; was taught the Koran by the angel Gabriel, etc. And yet we are told that he laid no pretensions to miracles.

The Abbé Parish, or more correctly François de Paris, the deacon, buried at the cemetery of St. Mélard. The numberless cures performed at his tomb are said by Paley to be the best authenticated of any, except those of the Bible.

Edward the Confessor and all our sovereigns up to the time of Queen Anne are said to have cured scorbutic diseases by their touch. (See THAUMATURGS.)

Miramolin. The title of the Emperor of Morocco. A miraman is a temporary Turkish officer.
Miramont. An ignorant, sturdy old man, an ultra-admirer of learning. (Fletcher: The Elder Brother.)

Miranda. Daughter of Prospero. (Shakespeare: Tempest.)

Mirror of Human Salvation. An extended "Biblia Pauperum" (q.v.) with the subject of the picture explained in rhymes. Called in Latin "Speculum humanae salutationis."

Mirror of King Eyence (The). This mirror was made by Merlin, and those who looked in it saw whatever they wished to see. (Spenser: Faerie Queen, bk. i.)

Mirror of Knighthood (The). One of the books in Don Quixote's library, a Spanish romance at one time very popular. Butler calls Iturbas "the Mirror of Knighthood" (book i. 15).

"The longer, taking another book, said, 'This is the Mirror of Knighthood.'"—Part 1, book i. a.

Mirrors. Altham's mirror. The "touchstone of virtue," showed if the lady belove was chaste as well as beautiful. (Arabian Nights: Prince Zeyn Altham.)

Camhuscan's mirror. Sent to Cambuskain by the King of Araby and Ind; it warned of the approach of ill-fortune, and told if love was returned. (Chaucer: Canterbury Tales: The Squire's Tale.)

Lao's mirror reflected the mind and its thoughts, as an ordinary mirror reflects the outward seeming. (Goldsmith: Citizen of the World, xlv.)

Merlin's magic mirror, given by Merlin to King Eyence. It informed the king of treason, secret plots, and projected invasions. (Spenser: Faerie Queen, iii. 2.)

Reynard's wonderful mirror. This mirror existed only in the brain of Master Fox; he told the queen-fox that whoever looked in it could see what was done a mile off. The wood of the frame was not subject to decay, being made of the same block as King Crampert's magic horse. (Reynard the Fox, ch. xii.)

Tulcan's mirror showed the past, the present, and the future. Sir John Davies tells us that Cupid gave the mirror to Autinous, and Antinous gave it to Penelope, who saw therein "the court of Queen Elizabeth."

Mirs. Emir Zadah [prince's son]. It is used in two ways by the Persians; when prefixed to a surname it is simply a title of honour; but when annexed to the surname, it means a prince of the blood royal.

Mis'creant (3 syl.) means a false believer. (French, mis'-creance.) A term first applied to the Mahometans. The Mahometans, in return, call Christians infidels, and associate with the word all that we mean by "miscreants."

Mise-money. An honorarium given by the people of Wales to a new "Prince of Wales." On his entrance upon his principality. At Chester a mise-book is kept, in which every town and village is rated to this honorarium.

Littleton (Dick.) says the usual sum is £500. Bailey has the word in his Dictionary.

Misers. The most renowned are:

(1) Baron Aguilar or Ephiarm Lopes Pereira d'Aguilar, born at Vienna and died at Islington, worth £200,000. (1740-1802.)

(2) Daniel Dancer. His sister lived with him, and was a similar character, but died before him. (1716-1794.)

(3) Colonel O'Daghetty, though owner of large estates, lived in a windowless hut, which he entered by a ladder that he pulled up after him. His horse was mero skin and bone. He wore an old night-cap for wig, and an old brimless hat. His clothes were made up of patches, and his general appearance was that of extreme destitution.

(1) Sir Harvey Elwes, who died worth £250,000, but never spent more than £110 a year.

His sister-in-law inherited £100,000, but actually starved herself to death.

Her son John, M.P., an eminent brewer in Southwark, never bought any clothes, never suffered his shoes to be cleaned, and grudged every penny spent in food. (1714-1789.)

(6) Boswell, farmer-general of Langedge, who hoarded his money in a secret cellar, where he was found dead.

(10) William Jennings, a neighbour and friend of Elwes, died worth £200,000. (1701-1797.)

(12) John Little left behind him £40,000, 180 wigs, 173 pairs of breeches, and an endless variety of other articles of clothing. His physician ordered him to drink a little wine for his health's sake, but he died in the act of drawing the cork of a bottle.
(13) Ostervald, the French banker, who died of starvation in 1790, possessed of £120,000.

(14) John Overs, a Southwark ferryman.

(15) The King of Palterdale, whose income was £800 a year, but his expenses never exceeded £20. He lived at the head of Lake Ullswater. His last words were, "What a fortune a man might make if he lived to the age of Methuselah!" He died at the age of eighty-nine.

(16) Guy Wilrocks, a female miser.

(See Eucilce, Harpagon, etc.)

Miserere (4 syl). Our fifty-first psalm is so called. One of the evening services of Lent is called miserere, because this penitential psalm is sung, after which a sermon is delivered. The under side of a folding-seat in choir-stalls is called a miserere; when turned up it forms a ledge-seat sufficient to rest the aged in a kneeling position.

"Misfortune will never Leave Me till I Leave It," was the expression of Charles VII., Emperor of Germany. (1742-1745.)

Mishna. Instruction. A word applied by the Jews to the oral law. It is divided into six parts: (1) agriculture; (2) Sabbaths, fasts, and festivals; (3) marriage and divorce; (4) civil and penal laws; (5) sacrifices; (6) holy persons and things. The commentary of the Mishna is called the Gemara. (Hebrew, shanah, to repeat.)

Mismomers.

Abalones means a Father's Power, a fatal name for David's rebellious son.

Aclid (sour) applied in chemistry to a class of bodies to which sourness is only accidental and by no means a universal character,—thus, rock-crystal, quartz, flint, etc., are chemical acids, though no particle of acidity belongs to them.

America. So called from Amerigo Vespucci, a naval astronomer of Florence. He wrote an account of his discoveries, which were very popular in Germany, but certainly he did not discover the New World.

Ant. Go to the ant, thou sluggard. (See Ants, Honeycomb.)

Antelope is a hopeless absurdity for the Greek anthos-ops, beautiful eye.

Arabic figures were not invented by the Arabs, but by the Indians.

Baffin's Bay is no bay at all.

Blacklead is a compound of carbon and iron.

Blind-worms are no more blind than moles are; they have very quick and brilliant eyes, though somewhat small.

Brazilian grass does not come from Brazil, or even grow in Brazil, nor is it a grass at all. It consists of strips of a palm-leaf (Chamaerops argentata), and is chiefly imported from Cuba.

Bridegroom has nothing to do with groom. It is the old English gymna, a man, byrda-gymna.

Burgundy pitch is not pitch, nor is it manufactured or exported from Burgundy. The best is a resinous substance prepared from common frankincense, and brought from Hamburg; but by far the larger quantity is a mixture of resin and palm-oil.

Canopy, as if from Canopus (the star in the southern hemisphere), is the Greek konopion (from konops, a gnat), and means a cloth to keep off gnats.

Catgut is not the gut of cats, but of sheep.

Celandine should be chelidon, Greek and Latin for a swallow; so called because it was at one time supposed that swallows cured with it the blindness of their young. (Pliny, xxv. 60.)

China, as a name for porcelain, gives rise to the contradictory expressions British china, Serres china, Dresden china, Dutch china, Chelsea china, etc.; like wooden milestones, iron milestones, brass shoe-horns, iron pens, etc.

Cemery, for a cemetery, should be "Cinery." Cinerary is a woman's tailor.

Cuttle-bone is not bone at all, but a structure of pure chalk embedded loosely in the substance of a species of cuttlefish. It is enclosed in a membranous sac, within the body of the "fish," and drops out when the sac is opened, but it has no connection whatever with the sac or the cuttlefish.

Cleopatra's Needles were not erected by Cleopatra, or in honour of that queen, but by Thothmes III.

Crawfish for craps (Latin carabun, a lobster, French crevisse).

Cullender, a strainer, should be "colanter" (Latin colans, colantis, straining).

Custard, the food, is from the Welsh for curded milk; but "custard," for a slap on the hand, should be custid, from the Latin custis, a club.

Down for adown (the preposition) is a strange instance of caprice, in which the omission of the negative (a) utterly perverts the meaning. The Saxon dun is an upland or hill, and a-dun is its opposite—i.e. a lowland or descent. Going down stairs really means “going upstairs,” of ascending; and for descending we ought to say “going down.”

Dutch clocks are not of Dutch but German (Deutsch) manufacture.

Elements. Fire, air, earth, and water, called the four elements, are not elements at all.

Fish, a counter, should be farce (a five-sou piece), used at one time in France for card-counters. One of them, given “for the rub,” was called la farce de consolation.

Frog’s glove is not the glove of the fox, but of the fays, called folk—the little folk’s glove; or else from foco, red.

Frontispiece. A vile corruption of frontispice (Latin frontispicium, a view on the front page). The “piece” is spectrum. Frontispiece is an awful hybrid.

 Fusiliers. These foot-soldiers now carry Enfield rifles, and not fusils.

Galvanised iron is not galvanised. It is simply iron coated with zinc, and this is done by dipping it in a zinc bath containing muriatic acid.

German silver is not silver at all, nor was the metallic mixture invented by a German, but has been in use in China time out of mind.

Gothic architecture is not the architecture of the Goths, but the ecclesiastical style employed in Eingland and France before the Renaissance.

Gnutapei. A blunder for Guiana, South America. Not a pig but a rodent.

Honeydew is neither honey nor dew, but an animal substance given off by certain insects, especially when hunted by ants.

Honey soap contains no honey, nor is honey in any way employed in its manufacture. It is a mixture of palm-oil soap and olive soap, each one part, with three parts of curd soap or yellow soap, scented.

Greyhound has no connection with the colour grey. It is the grayhound, or hound which hunts the grey or hagard.

Humble pie, for umbil pie. The umbil of venison were served to inferior retainers and servants.

Hydrophobia (Greek, dread of water) applied to mad dogs is incorrect, as they will lap water and even swim in it.

Indians (American). A blunder of geography on the part of the early discoverers of the New World, who set their faces westward from Europe to find India, and believed they had done so when they discovered Cat’s Island, off the south coast of America.

Irish stew. A dish that is unknown in Ireland.

Iron-mask was made of velvet.

Japan lacquer contains no lac at all, but is made from the resin of a kind of nut-tree called Anacardiaceae.

Jerusalem artichoke has no connection with Jerusalem, but with the sunflower, girasole, which it resembles.

Kensington Palace is not in Kensington at all, but in the parish of St. Margaret, Westminster.

Kid gloves are not kid at all, but are made of lamb-skin or sheep-skin.

Laudanum should be laudanum, originally made from the leaves of the lads. (Pliny, xxvi. 47.)

Longitude and latitude, the great dimension and little or broad dimension of the earth. According to the ancient notion, the world was bounded on the west by the Atlantic, but extended an indefinite length eastward. It was similarly terminated on the south by the Tropic of Cancer, whence it extended northwards, but this extent being much less than that east and west, was called the breadth or latitude.

Louis de Bourhan, Bishop of Liége, is made by Sir Walter Scott, in Quentin Durward, an “old man,” whereas he was only eighteen, and a scholar at Louvain. He made his entry into his see in a scarlet jerkin and cap set jauntily on one side. (A. Innus: Charles the Bold.)

Lunnar cautic is not a substance from the moon, but is simply nitrate of silver, and silver is the astrological symbol of the moon.

Lunatics are not affected by the changes of the moon more than other invalids. No doubt their disorder has its periodicities, but it is not affected by the moon.

Merschasm. (See Merschasham.)

Mosaic gold has no connection with Moses or the metal gold. It is an alloy of copper and zinc, used in the ancient museum or tessellated work.

Mother of pearl is the inner layer of several sorts of shell. It is not the mother of pearls, as the name indicates, but in some cases the matrix of the pearl.

Natives. Oysters raised in artificial beds. Surely oysters in their own natural beds ought to be called the natives.

Oxygend means the generator of acids, but there are acids of which it is not the base, as hydrochloric acid. Indeed, chemists now restrict the term acid to compounds into which hydrogen enters, and oxy-acids are termed salts.

Pen means a feather. (Latin, penna, a wing.) A steel pen is not a very choice expression.

Philipp VI. of France was called “Le bien fortuné,” but never was name more inappropriate. He was defeated at Sluys [Sluys], and again at Cresey; he lost Calais; and a fourth of all his subjects were carried off by the plague called the “Black Death.”

Pompey’s Pillar, in Alexandria, was erected neither by nor to Pompey. It was set up by the Emperor Diocletian, according to its inscription.

Prussian blue does not come from Prussia, but is the precipitate of the salt of protoxide of iron with red prussiate of potash.

Rice paper is not made from rice, but from the pith of Tung-tseu, or hollow-plant, so called because it is hollow when the pith has been pushed out.

Salt is not salt at all, and has long been wholly excluded from the class of bodies denominated salts. Table-salt is “chloride of sodium.”

Salt of lemon is in reality a binoxalate of potash, with a little of the quadroxalate.

Salts. The substance of which junk bottles, French mirrors, window-panes, and opem-glasses are made is placed among the salts, but is no salt at all.

Sand-blind is a mere corruption of sun (half) blind.

Scuttle, to open a hole in a ship, means really to bolt or bar. (See Scuttle.)

Sealing-wax is not wax at all, nor does it contain a single particle of wax. It is made of shellac, Venice turpentine, and cinnamon.

Shrew-mouse is no mouse (mus), but belongs to the genus sperus.

Slew means noble, illustrious (slavi), but is now applied to the most ignoble accursed. (See Baron.)

Sovereign. The last syllable of this word is incorrect. The word should be souverain (Latin, superare; French, sou-rain). It has no connection with “reign” (Latin, regnare).

Sperm oil properly means “seed oil,” from the notion that it was the spawn or melt of a whale. It is chiefly taken from the head, not the spawn, of the “spermaceti” whale.

Titmouse (plur. titmice) is no mouse, but a bird. (Anglo-Saxon, tite-mace, little hedge-sparrow.)

Toadflax has nothing at all to do with toads. It is tod flax, i.e. flax with tods or clusters.

Tonquin beans. A geographical blunder for tonka beans, from Tonka, in Guinea, not Tonquin, in Asia.

Turkeys do not come from Turkey, but North America, through Spain, or India. The French call them “dindon,” i.e. d’Inde or cog d’Inde, a term equally incorrect.

Turkey rhubarb neither grows in Turkey, nor is it imported from Turkey. It grows in the great mountain chain between Tartary and Siberia, and is a Russian monopoly.

Turkish baths are not of Turkish origin, nor are they baths, but hot-air rooms or thermae.

Vallombrosa. Milton says:—

“Thick an autumnal leaves that strew the brooks
In Vallombrosa.”

But the trees of Vallombrosa, being pines, do not shed thickly in autumn, and the brooks are not strewed with their leaves.

Ventiloquism is not voice from the stomach at all, but from the mouth.

Well-beloved. Louis XIII. A most inappropriate title for this most detestable and detested of all kings.

Whalebone is no bone at all, nor does it possess any properties of bone. It is a substance attached to the upper jaw of the whale, and serves to strain the water which the creature takes up in huge mouthfuls.

Wolf’s-bane. A strange corruption. Bane is the Teutonic word for all poisonous herbs. The Greeks, mistaking banes for beans, translated it kuamos, as they did hen-bane (huos-kuamos). Now wolf’s-bane is an aconite, with a pale-yellow flower, and therefore called white-bane to distinguish it from the blue aconite. The Greek for white is leukos, hence “leukos-kuamos;” but lukos is the Greek for wolf, and by a blunder leukos-kuamos (white-bean) got muddled into lukos-kuamos (wolf-bean). Botanists, seeing the absurdity of calling aconite a bean, restored the original word “bane,” but retained the corrupt word lukos (a wolf), and hence we get the name wolf’s-bane for white aconite. (H. Fox Talbot.)

Wormwood has nothing to do with worms or wood; it is the Anglo-Saxon torn mod, man-inspiriting, being a strong tonic.

Mispris’om. Concealment, neglect of. (French, mepris.
Mistress, Mrs. (masteress, lady-master). Missus used to be written Mis, and is the first syllable of Mistress; Mrs. is the contraction of mistress, called Mis’sess. Even in the reign of George II. unmarried ladies used to be styled Mrs.; as, Mrs. Lepel, Mrs. Bellenden, Mrs. Blount, all unmarried ladies. (See Pope’s Letters.)

Early in Charles II.’s reign, Evelyn tells us that “lew women began to be styled Misse;” now Mistress is more frequently applied to them. (See Lad.)

Miss is as Good as a Mile (4). A failure is a failure be it ever so little, and is no more be it ever so great; a narrow escape is an escape, and a more easy one is no more. If I miss the train by one minute, I miss it as much as if it had run a mile from the station; and if I escape an evil by the skin of my teeth, I escape, and lie who escapes it easily does no more.

Missing Link (The). According to Darwin, the higher animals are developed from the lower ones. The lowest form of animal life is protozoa, which develops into amoeba (cell life), and thence, successively, into sponges, grastula, hydra, medusa, worms, hematoga, ascidians, fish, amphibians, birds and reptiles, monotremata, marsupials, placental mammals, lemurs, monkeys [missing link], man.

Mississipi Bubble. The French “South-Sea Scheme,” and equally disastrous. It was projected by John Law, a Scottishman, and had for its object the payment of the National Debt of France, which amounted to 208 millions sterling, on being granted the exclusive tr’ye of Louisiana, on the banks of the Mississippi. (1717-1720. See Sour. &c.)

Mistletoe. Shakespeare calls it “the baleful mistletoe” (Titus Andronicus, ii. 3), in allusion to the Scandinavian story that it was with an arrow made of mistletoe that Balder was slain. (See Kissing Under the Mistletoe.)

The word mistletoe is a corruption of mistel-te, where mist is the German for “dung,” or rather the “droppings of a bird,” from the notion that the plant was so propagated, especially by the mistel-thrush. Ts is for tan, Old Norse tein, meaning “a plant” or “shoot.”

Mistletoe Bough. The tale referred to in this song, about Lord Lovel’s daughter, is related by Rogers in his Italy, where the lady is called “Giuvna.” A similar narrative is given by Collet in his Relies of Literature, and another is among the Cames Clébres.

Marwell Old Hall, once the residence of the Seymour, and afterwards of the Dacre family, has a similar tradition attached to it, and (according to the Post Office Directory) “the very chest became the property of the Rev. J. Haygarth, a rector of Upham.”

Mistress Roper. The Maries, or any one of them; so called by the regular sailors, because they handle the ropes like girls, not being used to them.

Mistress of the Night (The). The tuberose is so called because it emits its strongest fragrance after sunset. Sometimes, on a sultry evening, when the atmosphere is highly electrified, the fading flowers of the tuberose emit sparks of lurid flame.

(In the language of flowers, the tuberose signifies “the pleasures of love.”)

Mistress of the World. Ancient Rome was so called, because all the known world gave it allegiance.

Mita. Sister of Aule, surnamed “the Little Knight of Pearls,” in love with Sir Miton de Rennes, Roland’s friend. Charlemagne greeted her after a tournament with the Saracens at Fronzac, saying, “Rise, Countess of Rennes.” Mitá and Sir Miton were the parents of Mitaine (q.v.). (Croque- montaine, XV.)

Mitaine. Godchild of Charlemagne; her parents were Mitá and Miton, Count and Countess of Rennes. She went in search of Fear fortress, and found that it only existed in the minds of the fearful, vanishing into thin air as it was approached by a bold heart and clear conscience. Charlemagne made her for this achievement Roland’s squire, and she followed him on her horse Vaillant to Spain, and fell in the attack at Roncesvalles. (Croquemontaine, pt. iii.)

Mite. Sir Matthew Mite. A pure-proud East Indian merchant, who gives his servants the most costly exoticks, and overpowers everyone with the profusion of his wealth. (S. Foote: The Nabob.)

Lady Oldham says: “He comes amongst us preceded by all the pomp of Asia. Profusely scattering the spoils of conquered provinces, corrupting the virtue, and alienating the affections of all the old friends of the family.”
Mithra or Mith'ras. The highest of the twenty-eight second-class divinities of the ancient Persians, and the ruler of the universe. Sometimes used as a synonym for the sun. The word means friend, and this deity is so called because he befriends man in this life, and protects him against evil spirits after death. He is represented as a young man with a Phrygian cap, a tunic, a mantle on his left shoulder, and plunging a sword into the neck of a bull. (Sanskrit, mitra, a friend.) (See Thebais, i.)

Mithridate (3 syl.). A consecration said to be invented by Mithridates, King of Pontus and Bithynia, as an antidote to poison. It contains seventy-two ingredients.

"What brave spirit could be content to sit in his shop . . . selling Mithridatum and dragon's water to infected houses?"—Knight of the Burning Pestle. (Chap.)

Mitra. The episcopal mitre symbolises the clavon tongues of fire which descended on the apostles on the day of Pentecost. (Acts ii. 1-12.) Greek and Latin, mitra, a turban.

Mitre Tavern (The). A place of resort in the time of Shakespeare; it was in Bread Street, Cheapside.

Mitlen. The Parson's mitten. Whoever put this mitten on would be sure to thrive in all things.

"He that has bonest put in this mitten,
He shall have multiplying of his acres,
When he hath sown, he it whereof doth grow.
Sing all ye gods [hence] or elves good and."
Chaucer: Prologue to The Parson's Tale.

To give one the mitten. To reject a sweetheart; to jilt. (Latin, mitto, to send [about your business], whence dismissal; to get your dismissal.) Some says, it is to get the mitten instead of the hand.

"There is a young lady I have set my heart on, though whether she is going to love me here, or give me the mitten, I ain't quite satisfied."—Sam Slick: Human Nature, p. 90.

"I don't believe but what that Hammond cut's given him the mitten, else he wouldn't come. I wouldn't play second fiddle for any fellow."—M. E. Wilkins: A Tardy Thanksgiving (American).

Mittimus (Latin). A command in writing to a gaoler, to keep the person named in safe custody. Also a writ for removing a record from one court to another. So called from the first word of the writ, "Mittimus" (i.e. We send . . . ).

Milton. The Chapter of Milton. So the battle of Mitton was called, because so many priests took part therein. Hailes says that "three hundred ecclesiastics fell in this battle, which was fought September 20th, 1319."

"So many priests took part in the fight that the Scots called it the Chapitre of Mitton—a meeting of the clergymen belonging to a cathedral being called a chapter."—Sir Walter Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, x.

Mixon. Better weed over the Mixon than over the Moor. (See MiddeN.)

Mizentop, maintop, foretop. Service in these masts has nothing whatever to do with age or merit. A "top" is a platform fixed over the head of a lower mast, resting on the tr套装-trees, to spread the rigging of the topmast.

The mixenmast is the aftermost mast of a ship; the foremost is in the forward part of a ship; the mainmast is between these two.

"He was put into the mixentop, and served three years in the West Indies; then he was transferred to the maintop, and served five years in the Mediterranean; and then he was made captain of the foretop, and served six years in the East Indies; and lastly he was rated captain's ensign in the Dreadnought."—Cpt. Merryat: Poor Jack, chap. 1.

Mjölnir (pron. youl-ner). Thor's hammer. (See MIOLNER.)

Mnemosyne (4 syl.). Goddess of memory and mother of the nine Muses. (Classical mythology.) The best representation of this goddess is by A. R. Mengs, the "Raphael of Germany" (1720-1779).

Moabitc Stone (The). Presented to the British Museum by the museum of the Louvre. It was discovered by the Rev. F. Klein at Diibhan in August, 1868, and is 3 feet 10 inches high, 2 feet broad, and 141 inches thick. The Arabs resented its removal, and splintered it into fragments, but it has been restored. The inscription, consisting of forty-four lines, gives an account of the war of Mesha, King of Moab, against Omri, Ahab, and other kings of Israel. Mesha sacrificed his eldest son on the city wall in view of the invading Israelites. He set up this stone at Kermost a.c. 900.

Moalkkat. A class of angels, according to the Mahometan mythology. Two angels of this class attend every child of Adam from the cradle to the grave. At sunset they fly up with the record of the deeds done since sunrise. Every good deed is entered ten times by the recording angel on the credit or right side of his ledger, but when an evil deed is reported the angel waits seven hours, "if haply in that time the evil-doer may repent." (The Koran.)

Meat. (See under Battle.)
Mob. A contraction of the Latin mobile vulgus (the fickle crowd). The term was first applied to the people by the members of the Green-ribbon Club, in the reign of Charles II. (Northern Examiner, p. 574.)

Mob-cap (A). Is a plain cap, from Dutch mob = a cap. Probably map is another form of the same word, and all come from the Latin mappa (a clot), whence our word map (a drawing on cloth), in contradistinction to a cartoon (a drawing on paper).

Mobiliary. To render soldiers liable to be moved on service out of the town where they live; to call into active service men enrolled but not on the war establishment. (Latin, mobilia.)

Mock-beggar Hall or Manor. A grand, ostentatious house, where no hospitality is afforded, neither is any charity given.

"No visitor observed, nor charitable leave. The poor receive their answer from the daws. Who, in their own language, call it plain Mock-beggar Manor, for they come in name." - Taylor: Works.

Mockery. "It will be a delusion, a mockery, and a snare." - Thomas, Lord Denman, in his judgment on the case of O'Connell v. The Queen.

Modality, in scholastic philosophy, means the mode of which anything exists. Kant divides our judgment into three modalities: (1) Problematic, touching possible events; (2) Assertoric, touching real events; (3) Apodictic, touching necessary events.

Modish (Lady Betty), in The Careless Husband, by Cibber. The name explains the character. This was Mrs. Oldfield's favourite character, and The Tatler (No. 10) accordingly calls this charming actress "Lady Betty Modish." (See Narcissa.)

Mo'do. The fiend that urges to murder, and one of the five that possessed "Poor Tom." (See MAHU.) (Shakespeare: King Lear, iv. 1.)

Modred. In the romance of The Round Table, is represented as the treacherous knight. He revolted from his uncle Arthur, whose wife he seduced, was mortally wounded in the battle of Camlan, in Cornwall, and was buried in the island of Avalon.

Sir Modred. The nephew of King Arthur. He hated Sir Lancelot, sowed discord amongst the Knights of the Round Table, and tampered with the "lords of the White Horse," the brood that Hengist left. When the king went to chastise Sir Lancelot for tampering with the queen, he left Sir Modred in charge of the kingdom. Modred raised a revolt, and the king was slain in his attempt to quash it. (Tennyson: Idylls of the King; Guinevere.)

Modus Operandi (Latin). The mode of operation; the way in which a thing is done or should be done.

Modus Vivendi (A). A mutual arrangement whereby persons not at the time being on friendly terms can be induced to live together in harmony. This may apply to individuals, to societies, or to peoples (as the South Africans and the Boers).

Mofussul (East Indies). The subordinate divisions of a district; the seat of government being called sudder. Provincial.

"To tell a man that fatal charges have been laid against him and refuse him an opportunity for explanation, this is not even Modussul justice." — The Times.

Mogul Cards. The best playing-cards were so called because the wrapper, or "duty card" (when cards were subject to excise duty) contained the portrait of the Great Mogul. Those cards which contained some mark, speck, or other imperfection, were called "Harrys."

Moha'dil [Mohammed]. The twelfth Imam, who is said to be living in concealment till Antichrist appears, when he will come again and overthrow the great enemy.

Mohair. (Probably the Arabic mukhayyar, goat's-hair cloth.) It is the hair of the Angora goat, introduced into Spain by the Moors, and thence brought into Germany.

Mohakabad' (Af). Abu-Rihan, the geographer and astronomer in the eleventh century.

Mohocks. A class of ruffians who in the 18th century infested the streets of London. So called from the Indian Mohawks. One of their "new inventions" was to roll persons down Snow Hill in a tub; another was to overturn coaches on rubbish-heaps. (See Gay: Trivia, iii.)

A vivid picture of the misdoings in the streets of London by these and other brawlers is given in The Spectator, No. 324.

"You sent your Mobocks next abroad,
With razors armed, and knives;
Who on night-walkers made inroad,
And scared our maids and wives;
They scared the watch, and windows broke..."

(Moby-Dick) "Plot upon Plot (About 1713).

Mohun. Captain Hill and Lord Mohun made a dastardly attack on an actor named Mountford, on his way to Mrs. Bracegirdle's house in Howard Street. Hill was jealous of the actor, and induced the "noble lord" to join him in this "vain quarrel." Mountford died next day. Hill fled, and was never heard of more; Mohun was tried for his life, but acquitted. (See ISAAC CHAR.) (Hewell: State Trials, vol. xii. p. 947.)

Moby-dick (Edricus). Said to cure wounds by sympathy. He did not apply his powder to the wounds, but to a cloth dipped in the blood.

Moiré Antique (French) is silk, etc., moiré (watered) in the antique style, or to resemble the material worn in olden times. The figuring of tin like frost-work or scales is called moré métallique.

Mokana. [See KHRASSAN.]

Mo'nism. The system of grace and election taught by Louis Molina, the Spanish Jesuit (1535-1600).

Moll (Kentish). Mary Carlson, commonly known as the German Princess. She was sentenced to transportation, but, being found at large, was hanged at Tyburn in 1672.

Moll Cutpurse. Mary Frith, a woman of masculine vigour, who not unfrequently assumed man's attire. She was a notorious thief and cutpurse, who once attacked General Fairfax on Hounslow Heath, for which she was sent to Newgate. She escaped by bribery, and died at last of dropsy in the seventy-fifth year of her age. (Time of Charles I.)

Moll Flanders. A woman of extraordinary beauty, born in the Old Bailey. She was twelve years a courtesan, five times a wife, twelve years a thief, eight years a transport in Virginia; but ultimately grew rich, lived honestly, and died a penitent. (Charles II.'s reign.) (See Daniel Defoe's Moll Flanders.)

Moll Thomson's Mark. As "Take away this bottle, it has Moll Thomson's mark on it." Moll Thomson is M. T. (empty).

Molly. He's a regular Molly. Said of a man or big boy who betties or interferes with women's work, such as kitchen business, dressmaking, personal decoration, and so on.

Molly Coddle (A). A pampered creature, afraid that the winds of heaven should visit him too roughly; though a male, a Molly; not a valetudinarian, but ever fearing lest he should be so.

Molly Maguires. An Irish secret society organized in 1843. Stout, active young Irishmen, dressed up in women's clothes, blackened faces, and otherwise disguised, to surprise those employed to enforce the payment of rents. Their victims were ducked in bog-holes, and many were beaten most unmercifully.

"The judge who tried the murderer was elected by the Molly Maguires; the jurors who assisted him were themselves Molly Maguires. A score of Molly Maguires came forward to swear that the assassin was sixty miles from the spot on which he had been seen to fire at William Dunn... and the jurors returned a verdict of Not Guilty."—W. Hepworth Dixon: New America, ii. 28.

Molly Mog. This celebrated beauty was an innkeeper's daughter, at Oakingham, Berks. She was the toast of all the gay sparks, in the former half of the eighteenth century, and died in 1765, at an advanced age. Gay has a ballad on this Fair Maid of the Inn.

Molly Mog died at the age of sixty-seven, a spinster; Mr. Stadden, of Arborfield, the enamoured swain alluded to in the ballad, died 1780. It is said that Molly's sister Sally was the greater beauty. A portrait of Gay still hangs in the inn.

Molmu'tius. A mythical king of Britain, who promulgated the laws called the Molmu'tine, and established the privilege of sanctuary. He is alluded to in Cymbeline, iii. 1 (Shakespeare).

Moloch. Any influence which demands from us the sacrifice of what we hold most dear. Thus, war is a Moloch, king mob is a Moloch, the guillotine was the Moloch of the French Revolution, etc. The allusion is to the god of the Am'monites, to whom children were "made Money

Moly. Wild garlic, called sorcerer’s garlic. There are many sorts, all of which flower in May, except “the sweet moly of Montpelier,” which blooms in September. The most noted are “the great moly of Homer,” the Indian moly, the moly of Hungary, serpent’s moly, the yellow moly, Spanish purple moly, Spanish silver-capped moly, and Dioscorides’s moly. Pope describes it and its effects in one of his odes, and Milton refers to it in his Comus. (Greek, moly.)

That Hermes once to wise Ulysses gave.

Mome (French), says Cotgrave, is a Momus, find-fault, carping fellow. So called from Momus, the god of railery.

Or consent donques les monomes,

J. du Belloy : A. P. de Bonnard.

Momiers (French, men of mumery). An Evangelical party of Switzerland, somewhat resembling our Methodists. They arose in 1818, and made way both in Germany and France.

Mommur. The realm of O’eron. (Middle Age romancer.)

Momus. One who carps at everything. Momus, the sleepy god, was always railing and carping.

Momus, being asked to pass judgment on the relative merits of Neptune, Vulcan, and Minerva, failed at them all. He said the horns of a bull ought to have been placed in the shoulders where they would have been of much greater force than for man, he said Jupiter ought to have made him with a window in his breast, whereby his real thoughts might be revealed. Hence Dr. Gray says that every unreasonable carper is called a “Momus.”

Momus’s Lattice or Window. Momus blamed Vulcan because he did not set a window or lattice in the human breast for discerning secret thoughts.

Men Momus lattice in our breasts.

Boyne: Trojans, 11. 1. 1.

Mo'nciello [little monk]. A sort of incubus in the mythology of Naples. It is described as a thick little man, dressed in a monk’s garment and broad-brimmed hat. Those who will follow when he beckons will be led to a spot where treasure is concealed. Sometimes, however, it is his pleasure to pull the bed-clothes off, and sometimes to sit perched on a sleeper.

Monarchians. A theological party of the third century who maintained that God is one, immutable and primary. Their opponents turned upon them, and nicknamed them Patrigissians (q.v.), saying that according to such a doctrine God the Father must have suffered on the cross.

Monarchy. Fifth-monarchy men. Those who believed that the second coming of Christ was at hand, and that at His second coming He would establish the fifth universal monarchy. The five are these: the Assyrian, the Persian, the Macedonian, the Roman, and the Millennium.

Monday Pops. A contraction of “Monday Populars,” meaning popular concerts for classical music, introduced at St. James’s Hall by Mr. Arthur Chappell in 1858. There are Saturday Pops also.

Money. Shortly after the Gallic invasion, Lucius Furius built a temple to Juno Moneta (the Monitress) on the spot where the house of Manlius Capitolinus stood. This spot of the Capitol was selected because Manlius was the first man alarmed by the cackling of the sacred geese. This temple was subsequently converted into a mint, and the “uses” there coined were called moneus.

Juno is represented on medals with instruments of coinage, as the hammer, anvil, pincers, and die. (See Livy, vii. 28, and Cicero, De Divinat., i. 15.)

The oldest coin of Greece bore the impress of an ox. Hence a bribe for silence was said to be an “ox on the tongue.” Subsequently each province had its own impress:

Athena, an owl (the bird of wisdom)

Bacchus, the vineyard of Greece.

Dolphin, a dolphin.

Macedonian, a buckler (from its love of war)

Rhodes, the disc of the sun (the Columns was an image to the sun)

Rome had a different impress for each coin.

For the 1s, the head of Janus, on one side, and the prow of a ship on the reverse.

The Semeli, the head of Jupiter and the letter S.

The Thura, the head of a woman (? Rome or Minerva; and four points to denote thefour quarters.

The Quadrans, the head of Hercules and three points to denote three quarters.

The Zecchino, the head of Mercury, and two points to denote two ounces.

Boned money. Bent coin, given as a pledge of love.

“Taketh forth a bowed grant and an old penny bow’d he gave it [sic] her.” — Penny-catcher. (Tune, Elizabeth.)

Money makes the Mare to go.

(See Mare.)
Monism’s, in Otway’s tragedy of The Orphan. Sir Walter Scott says, “More tears have been shed for the sorrows of Monism, than for those of Juliet and Desdemona.”

Monism. The doctrine of the oneness of mind and matter, God and the universe. It ignores all that is supernatural, and the dualism of mind and matter, God and creation; and, as this is the case, of course, there can be no opposition between God and the world, as unity cannot be in opposition to itself. Monism teaches that “all are but parts of one stupendous whole, whose body nature is, and God the soul;” hence, whatever is, only conforms to the cosmosical laws of the universal All.

Haeckel, of Jena, in 1866, revived this theory, and explains it thus: “Monism (the correlative of Dualism) denotes a, unitary conception, in opposition to a supernatural one. Mind can never exist without matter, nor matter without mind.” As God is the same “yesterday, to-day, and for ever,” creation must be the same, or God would not be unchangeable.

Monitor. So the Romans called the nursery teacher. The Military Monitor was an officer to tell young soldiers of the faults committed against the service. The House Monitor was a slave to call the family of a morning, etc.

Monitor. An ironclad with a flat deck, sharp stern, and one or more movable turrets.

Monk, in printing, is a black smear or blotch made by leaving too much ink on the part. Caxton set up his printing-press in the scriptorum of Westminster Abbey; and the associations of this place gave rise to the slang expressions monk and friar for black and white defects. (See Friar, Chapel.)

Give a man a monk (French, “Lui bâiller le nez.”) To do one’s mischief. Rabelais says that Grangouvier (after the battle of Picrochole) asked “what was become of Friar John;” to which Gargantua replied, “No doubt the enemy has the monk,” alluding to the pugnacious feats of this wonderful churchman, who knocked men down like ninepins. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel, book i. 46.)

Monk Lewis. Matthew Gregory Lewis is so called from his novel entitled The Monk. (1773-1818.)

Monk Listening to a Bird. (See Felix, Hildesheim.)

Monk of Westminster. Richard of Cirencester, the historian. (Fourteenth century.)

Monkey (A). £500. (See Marygold.)

Monkey = the Devil; an imp of mischief. Hence, a meddlesome child is spoken to as “you little monkey;” and is called “a regular imp,“ or “imp of mischief.” The allusion is to the old drawings of devils, with long tails and monkey ugliness.

To get (or have) one’s monkey up. To be riled. Here the allusion is also to the devil or evil spirit in man; he will be “in a devil of a temper.” Even taken literally, monkeys are extremely irritable and easily provoked.

Monkey, in sailor language, is the vessel which contains the full allowance of grog. Halliwell (Archæa Dictionary) has—

“Moncorn, ’Beere corn, barley houre, or moncorn.”” (1523.)

To suck the monkey. Sailors call the vessel which contains their full allowance of grog “a monkey.” Hence, to “suck the monkey” is surreptitiously to suck liquor from a cask through a straw. Again, when the milk has been taken from a coconaut, and rum has been substituted, “sucking the monkey” means drinking this rum. Probably “monkey” in all such cases is a corruption of moncorn (ale or beer). (See Marryat’s Peter Simple.) (See Monkey Spoons.)

Monkey Board. The step behind an omnibus on which the conductor stands, or rather skips about like a monkey.

Monkey Boat. A long, narrow boat.

Monkey Jacket. A coat with no more tail than a monkey, or, more strictly speaking, an ape.

Monkey-puzzle. The name given to a Chilian pine, whose twisted and prickly branches puzzle even a monkey to climb.

Monkey Spoons. Spoons at one time given in Holland at marriages, christenings, and funerals. They may still be picked up occasionally at curiosity shops. The spoon at weddings was given to some immediate relative of the bride, and just below the monkey on the handle was a heart. At funerals the spoon was given to the officiating clergyman. Among the Dutch, drinking is called “sucking the monkey” (swinging de monky), and one fond of drink was called "a monkey sucker." The Dutchman began the day with an appetiser—i.e. rum, with a pinch of salt, served in a monkey spoon (monky lépel); and these appetisers were freely used at weddings, christenings, and funerals.

Monkey with a Long Tail (A). A mortgage. A monkey (g.v.) is slang for £500.

Monkey's Allowance. More kicks than halfpence. The allusion is to the monkeys carried about for show; they pick up the halfpence, but carry them to the master, who keeps kicking or ill-treating the poor creatures to urge them to incessant tricks.

Monkey's Money. I will pay you in monkey's money ("en monnaie de singe")—in goods, in personal service, in mumbled and grumose. The French had a law that when a monkey passed the Petit Pont, of Paris, if it was for sale it was to pay four dœurs (two-thirds of a penny) for toll; but if it belonged to a showman and was not for sale, it should suffice if the monkey went through his tricks.

"It was an original by Master Charles Charnois, principal painter to King Mejanus [of France], paid for in court fashion with monkey's money."—Religious Drama. "DRAMAS..."

Monk'ir and Nak'ir, according to Mahometan mythology, are two angels who interrogate the dead immediately they are buried. The first two questions they ask are, "Who is your Lord?" and "Who is your prophet?" Their voices are like thunder, their aspects hideous, and those not approved of they lash into perdition with whips half-iron and half-flame. (See MUNKAR.)

"Do you not see those spectres that are stirring the burning coals? They are Monkir and Nakir."—Beckford: Vathek.

Monmouth. The town at the mouth of the Monnow.

Monmouth. The surname of Henry V. of England, who was born there.

Monmouth Cap. A soldier's cap.

"The soldiers that the Monmouth wear, On can'ton' tope their emissa rear."

"The best caps were formerly made at Monmouth, where the coppers' chapel doth still remain."—Fuller: Worthies of Wales, p. 12.

Monmouth Street (London) takes its name from the unfortunate son of Charles II., executed for rebellion in 1685. Now Dudley Street.

Monnaie de Basoch. Worthless coin; coin not current; counter.

"Brummagem halfpennies." Coins were at one time made and circulated by the lawyers of France, which had no currency beyond their own community. (See BASOCHIAN.)

Mon'onia (3 syl.) Munster.

"Remember the glories of Brian the Brave Though the days of the hero are o'er. Though loath to Mononia, and cold in the grave, He returns to Kincora [his palace] no more."

T. Moore: Irish Melodies, No. 1.

Monophagous. The eater of one sort of food only. (Greek, monos phagein.)

Monophyses. A religious sect in the Levant, who maintained that Jesus Christ had only one nature, and that divine and human were combined in much the same way as the body and soul in man. (Greek, monos phusis, one nature.)

Monoth'elism consisted in the doctrine that, although Christ has two distinct natures, He never had but one will. His human will being merged in the divine. (Greek, monos-thelema, one single will.)

Monroe Doctrina. The American States are never to entangle themselves in the broils of Europe, nor to suffer the powers of the Old World to interfere in the affairs of the New; and they are to account any attempt on the part of the Old World to plant their systems of government in any part of North America dangerous to American peace and safety. James Monroe was twice president of the United States. (1816 and 1820.)

Monsieur. Philippe, Duc d'Orléans, brother to Louis XIV., was called Monsieur; other gentlemen were only Monsieur This or That. (1674-1723.)

"Monsieur le Conduteur. Paul de Gondi, afterwards Cardinal de Retz (Ross). (1616-1679.)

"Monsieur le Duc. Henri-Jules de Bourbon, eldest son of the Prince de Condé. (1669-1740.)

"Monsieur le Grand. The Great Equerry of France."

"Monsieur le Prince. Prince de Condé (1621-1686)." (See Madame.)

Monsieur de Paris. The public executioner or Jack Ketch of France.

"Riccardo de Albertes was a personal friend of all the 'Monsieur de Paris,' who served the Republic. He attended all capital executions, and possessed a curious library."—Newspaper Paragraph, January 25th, 1686.

Monsoon is a corruption of the Malay word mônsoem (year or season). For six is a mountain with sharply-peaked crest (mont-agu or acu).

Montagnards. The extreme democratic politicians in the French Revolution; so called because they occupied the highest tier of benches in the hall of the National Convention. The opposite party sat on the level of the floor, called the "plain."

Montague (3 syll.). The head of a faction in Verona (Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet). The device of the family

...
Montezuma's Realm. Mexico. Montezuma, the last emperor, was seized by Cortes, and compelled to acknowledge himself a vassal of Spain (1519).

Montezuma's Watch. A curious stone, weighing twenty-four tons, of basaltic porphyry, in Mexico. This immense stone is cut into figures denoting the Mexican division of time, and may be termed their calendar.

Montesaucon Watch. "Le guet de Montesaucon." A man hanged. Montesaucon is an eminence near Paris, once used as the Tyburn or place of execution. At one time it was crowded with gibbets, but at the Revolution they were destroyed, and it became the dust-bin of the city, "Une voirie pour les immundies de Paris et l'escorciage des chevaux." In 1841 this sink of corruption and infection was moved to "La plaine des Tertres," surely a strange satire on the word.

Montgomery, in North Wales: so called from Roger de Montgomery, Earl of Shrewsbury, who won the castle of Baldwyn, lieutenant of the marches to William the Conqueror. Before this time it was called "Tre Falwyn."

Montgomery's division, all on one side. This is a French proverb, and refers to the Free Companies of the sixteenth century, of which Montgomery was a noted chief. The booty he took was all given to his banditti, and nothing was left to the victims. (See Lion's Share.)

Month of Sundays. "A month of Sundays: never. (See Never.)"

"Such another chance might never turn up in a month of Sundays."—Goldswod: Robbery Under Arms, chap. xi.

Month's Mind. "An irresistible longing (for something); a great desire."

I see you have a month's mind for them"—Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona, i. 2.

Months.
January. So called from "Janus," the Roman deity that kept the gates of heaven. The image of Janus is represented with two faces looking opposite ways. One face is old, and is emblematical of time past; the other is young, as the emblem of time future. The Dutch used to call this month Lauw-maand (frosty-month); the Saxons, Wulf-monath, because wolves were very troublesome then from the great scarcity of food. After the introduction of Christianity, the name was changed to Sc after geola (the after-yule): it was also called Forma-monath (first month). In the French Republican calendar it was called Nivose (snow-month, December 20th to 20th January).

February. So called from "Februa," a name of Juno, from the Sabine word februa (to purify). Juno was so called because she presided over the purification of women, which took place in this month. The Dutch used to term the month Spokkel-maand (vegetation-month); the ancient Saxons, Sprute-cal (from the sprouting of pot-wort or kele); they changed it subsequently to Sol-monath (from the returning sun). In the French Republican calendar it was called Fluviose (rain-month, 20th January to 20th February).

March. So called from "Mars," the Roman war-god and patron deity. The old Dutch name for it was Leni-maand (lengthening-month), because the days sensibly lengthen; the old Saxon name was Hrith-monath (rough month, from its boisterous winds); the name was subsequently changed to Length-monath (lengthening month); it was also called Hylid-monath (boisterous-month). In the French Republican calendar it was called Lentise (windy-month, February 20th to March 20th).

April. So called from the Latin aperio (to open), in allusion to the unfolding of the leaves. The old Dutch name was Gras-maand (grass-month); the old Saxon, Easter-monath (orient or paschal-month). In the French Republican calendar it was called Germain (the time of budding, March 21st to the 19th of April).

May is the old Latin magius, softened into maus, similar to the Sanskrit mah (to grow), that is, the growing month. The old Dutch name was Bloem-maand (blossoming month); the Old Saxon, Tiv-meleki (three milch), because cows were milked thrice a day in this month. In the French Republican calendar the month was called Floraal (the time of flowers, April 20th to May 20th).

June. So called from the "Juno'sres" or soldiers of the state, not from Juno, the queen-goddess. The old Dutch name was Zomer-maand (summer-month); the old Saxon, Sex-monath (dry-month), and Lida-err (joy-time). In the French Republican calendar the month was called Priural (meadow-month, May 20th to June 18th).

July. Mark Antony gave this month the name of Julius, from Julius Caesar, who was born in it. It had been previously called Quintilis (fifth-month).
The old Dutch name for it was Hooy-maand (hay-month); the old Saxon, Mid-monath (because the cattle were turned into the meadows to feed), and Lida afterw (the second mild or genial month). In the French Republican calendar it was called Mercidor (harvest-month, June 19th to July 18th).

August. So called in honour of Augustus Caesar; not because it was his birth-month, but because it was the month in which he entered on his first consulship, celebrated three triumphs, received the oath of allegiance from the legions which occupied the Janiculum, reduced Egypt, and put an end to the civil wars. He was born in September. The old Dutch name for August was Goest-maund (harvest-month); the old Saxon, Wood-monath (weed-month, where weed signifies vegetation in general. In the French Republican calendar it was called Ther-midor (hot-month, July 19th to August 17th).

September. The seventh month from March, where the year used to commence. The old Dutch name was Herst-maand (autumn-month); the old Saxon, Gorst-monath (barley-month), or Herfest-monath; and after the introduction of Christianity Halig-monath (holy-month, the nativity of the Virgin Mary being on the 8th, the exaltation of the Cross on the 14th, Holy-Rood Day on the 26th, and St. Michael's Day on the 29th). In the French Republican calendar it was called Fruitidor (fruit-month, August 18th to September 21st).

October. The eighth month of the Alban calendar. The old Dutch name was Wyn-maand; the old Saxon, Win-monath (wine-month, or the time of vintage); it was also called Tre-monath (tenth-month), and Winter-fylfe (winter full-moon). In the French Republican calendar it was called Vendémiaire (time of vintage, September 22nd to October 21st).

November. The ninth Alban month. The old Dutch name was Slacht-maand (slaughter-month, the time when the beasts were slain and salted down for winter use); the old Saxon, Wind-monath (wind-month, when the fishermen drew their boats ashore, and gave over fishing till the next spring); it was also called Blot-monath—the same as Slacht-maand. In the French Republican calendar it was called Brumaire (fog-month, October 22nd to November 21st).

December. The tenth month of the old Alban calendar. The old Dutch name was Winter-maand (winter-month); the old Saxon, Mid-winter-monath (mid-winter-month); whereas June was Midsummer-monath. Christian Saxons called December Se uwa godla (the anti-yule). In the French Republican calendar it was called Frimaire (harrow-frost month, from November 22nd to December 20th).

Montbwal (47), [the destroyer]. One of Mahmotes's lances, confiscated from the Jews when they were exiled from Medy'na.

Montjoie St. Denis. The war-cry of the French. Montjoie is a corruption of Mons Juves, as the little mounds were called which served as direction-posts in ancient times; hence it was applied to whatever showed or indicated the way, as the banks of St. Denis, called the Oriflamme. The Burgundians had for their war-cry, "Montjoie St. Andv;" the dukes of Bourbon, "Montjoie Notre Dame;" and the kings of England used to have "Montjoie St. George." There seems no sufficient reason to suppose that Montjoie St. Denis is a corruption of "St. Denis mon joie"—i.e. "St. Denis is my hope!"

Montjoie. The cry of the French heralds in the ancient tournaments; and the title of the French king-of-arms.

Montrognon (Baron of), Lord of Bourglastie, Tortebesse, and elsewhere. A huge mass of muscle, who existed only to eat and drink. He was a descendant of Esau on his father's side, and of Gargantua on his mother's. He once performed a gigantic feat—he killed six hundred Saracens who happened to get in his way as he was going to dinner. He was bandy-legged, could lift immense weights, had an elastic stomach, and four rows of teeth. In Croquemitaine he is made one of the paladins of Charlemagne, and was one of the four knights sent in search of Croquemitaine and Fear-fortress.

Montserrat. The Catalonians aver that this mountain was riven and abistered at the Crucifixion. Every rift is filled with evergreens. Similar legends exist with regard to many other mountains. (Latin, mons serr'atus, the mountain jagged like a saw.)

Monumental City. Baltimore, U.S., is so called because it abounds in monuments: witness the obelisk, the 104 churches, etc.

Monumental Effigies. In the age of chivalry the woman in monumental brasses and effigies is placed on the man's right hand; but when chivalry declined she was placed on his left hand.

Monumental Figures. No. 1.

(1) Those in stone, with plain sloping roofs, and without inscriptions, are the oldest.

(2) In 1150 these plain prismatic roofs began to be ornamented.

(3) In the same century the sloping roofs gave place to armorial bearings.

(4) In the thirteenth century we see flat roofs, and figures carved on the lids.

(5) The next stage was an arch, built over the monument to protect it.

(6) The sixth stage was a chapel annexed to the church.

(7) The last stage was the head bound and feet tied, with children at the base, or cherubims at the feet.

Monumental Figures. No. 2.

Figures with their hands on their breasts, and chalices, represent priests.

Figures with crosier, mitre, and pontificals, represent prelates.

Figures with armour represent knights.

Figures with legs crossed represent either crusaders or married men.

Female figures with a mantle and large ring represent nuns.

Monumental Figures. No. 3.

Those in scale armour are the most ancient (time, Henry II.).

Those in chan armour or ring-mail come next (time, Richard I. to Henry III.).

Those with children or cherubims, between the fourteenth and seventeenth centuries.

- Brasses are for the most part subsequent to the thirteenth century.

Monumental Figures. No. 4.

Saints lie to the east of the altar, and are elevated above the ground; the higher the elevation, the greater the sanctity. Martyrs are much elevated.

Holy men not canonised lie on a level with the pavement.

Founders of chapels, etc., lie with their monument built into the wall.

Monumental Inscriptions.

Capital letters and Latin inscriptions are of the first twelve centuries.

Lombardic capitals and French inscriptions, of the thirteenth century.

German text, of the fourteenth century.

English and Roman print, subsequent to the fourteenth century.

Tablets against the wall came in with the Reformation.

Moon. A Jew whose office it is to circumcise the young Jewish boys.

Moon means "measurer" of time (Anglo-Saxon, mōnā, masc. gen.). It is masculine in all the Teutonic languages; in the Eddas, the son of Mundillfi or Mání (moon), and daughter Sol (sun); so it is still with the Lithuanians and Armenians, and so was it with the ancient Mexicans, Slavs, Hindus, etc.; so that it was a most unlucky dictum of Harris, in his Heurica, that all nations ascribe to the Sun a masculine, and to the Moon a feminine gender. (Gothic, mēna; Sanskrit, mā, masc. from mād, to measure.) The Sanskrit mātrah is an instrument for measuring; hence Greek metron: French, metre: English, meter.

The Germans have Frau Sonne (Mrs. Sun) and Herr Mond (Mr. Moon).

Moon, represented in five different phases: (1) new; (2) full; (3) crescent or decrescent; (4) half; and (5) gibbous, or more than half.

Moon, in pictures of the Assumption of the Virgin, is represented as a crescent under her feet; in the Crucifixion it is eclipsed, and placed on one side of the cross, the sun being on the other; in the Creation and Last Judgment it is also introduced by artists.

Hecate. The moon before she has risen and after she has set.

Astarte. The crescent moon, "the moon with crescent horns."

Diana. The moon in the open vault of heaven, who "hunts the clouds."

Cynthia. Same as Diana.

Selene or Luna. The moon poisoned, properly the full moon, who loved the sleeping Endymion.

Endymion. Moonlight on a bank, field, or garden.

"How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank!" Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, v. i.

Phoeb. The moon as the sister of the sun. (See Astarte, Ashtaroth, etc.)

Moon. Astolpho found treasure in the moon everything wasted on this earth, such as misspent time and wealth, broken vows, un答案ed prayers, fruitless tears, abortive attempts, unfulfilled desires and intentions, etc. All bribes were hung on gold and silver hooks; prince's favours were kept in bellows; wasted talent was kept in vases, each marked with the proper name; etc. Orlando Furioso, bk. xviii. (See Rape of the Lock, c. v.)

Moon. (See under Mahomet.)

The moon is called "triform," because it presents itself to us either round, or Moon-calf is an inanimate, shapeless mass (Pliny: Natural History, x. 64). This abscission was supposed to be produced by the influence of the moon. The primary meaning of calf is not the young of a cow, but the issue arising "from throwing out," as a push, a protruberance; hence the calves of the legs.

"A false conception, called moala, i.e. moon-calf, a lump which without shape or life."—Randall: Pliny, vili. 18.

Moon-drop. In Latin, virus lunare, a vaporous drop supposed to be shed by the moon on certain herbs and other objects, when influenced by incantations.

"Upon the corner of the moon,
There hangs a vaporous drop profound;
I'll catch it ere it come to ground."—Shakespeare: Macbeth, iii. 5.

Moon-maker [Sagendeh Nak], a surname given to the Veiled Prophet (q.v.), who caused a moon to issue from a deep well, so brilliant that the real moon was eclipsed by it.

Moon-rakers. The people of Wiltshire are so called. In the "good old times" they were noted smugglers, and one day, seeing the coastguard on the watch, they sunk in the sea some smuggled whisky. When they supposed the coast was clear they employed rakes to get their goods in hand again, when lo! the coastguard reappeared and demanded of them what they were doing. Pointing to the reflection of the moon in the water, they replied, "We are trying to rake out that cream-cheese yonder."

Moon's Men. Thieves and highwaymen who ply their trade by night.

"The fortune of us that are but Moon's-men doth ebb and flow, like the sea."—Shakespeare: Henry IV., i. 2.

Moonlight Fitting (A). A clandestine removal of one's furniture during the night, to avoid paying one's rent or having the furniture seized in payment thereof.

Moonstone. A mineral so called on account of the play of light which it exhibits. Wilkie Collins has a novel called The Moonstone.

"The moonstone contains blush-white spots, which, when held to the light, present a... milvery play of colour not unlike that of the moon."—Ves: Chemical Dictionary.

Moon-slayer or Mata-moros. A name given to St. James, the patron-saint of Spain, because in almost all encounters with the Moors he came on his white horse to the aid of the Christians. So, at least, it is said.

Moors. In the Middle Ages, the Europeans called all Mahometans Moors, in the same manner as the Eastern nations called all inhabitants of Europe Franks. Camoens, in the Lusiad, terms the Indians "Moors." (Bk. viii.)

Moore (Thomas), called "Anacreon Moore," because the character of his poetry resembles that of Anacreon, the Greek poet of love and wine. He also translated Anacreon's Odes. (1779-1852.)

Moot Point (A). A doubtful or unsettled question. The Anglo-Saxon mot- tain is "to debate," and a moot point is one sub judex, or under debate.

Moots were debates which formerly took place in the halls and libraries of Inns of Court. The benchers and the barristers, as well as the students, took an active part in these moots. Sir Simonds D'Ewes, in his Diary (1620-1629), says:

"I had lived moost in law French before I was called to the bar."—Nineteenth Century, November, 1892, p. 775.

Mop. In many places statute fairs are held, where servants seek to be hired. Carters fasten to their hats a piece of whipcord; shepherds, a lock of wool; grooms, a piece of sponge, etc. When hired they mount a cockade with streamers. Some few days after the statute fair, a second, called a Mop, is held for the benefit of those not already hired. This fair mops or wipes up the refuse of the statute fair, carrying away the drags of the servants left.

Mop. One of Queen Mab's attendants. All mops and brooms. Intoxicated.

Mora-stone, near Upsala, where the Swedes used anciently to elect their kings.

Moral. The moral Gower. John Gower, the poet, is so called by Chaucer. (1320-1402.)

Father of moral philosophy. Thomas Aquinas (1227-1274).

Moralist. The great moralist of Fleet Street. Dr. Johnson (1709-1784).

Moran's Collar which strangled the wearer if he deviated from the strict rules of equity. Moran was the wise councillor of Feredach the Just, an early king of Ireland, before the Christian era. Of course, the collar is an allegory of obvious meaning.

Morasteen [great stone]. The ancient Danes selected their king from the sacred line of royalty. The man chosen was taken to the Landsting, or local court, and placed on the morasteen, while the magnates ranged themselves around on stones of inferior size. This was the Danish mode of installation.

Morat. Morat and Marathon twin names shall stand (Childe Harold, iii. 64). Morat, in Switzerland, is famous for the battle fought in 1476, in which the Swiss defeated Charles le Téméraire of Burgundy.

Moratorium. A legal permission to defer for a stated time the payment of a bond, debt, cheque, or other obligation. This is done to enable the creditor to pull himself round by borrowing money, selling effects, or otherwise raising funds to satisfy obligations. The device was adopted in 1891 in the Argentine Republics during the money panic caused by the Baring Brothers' "difficulty," a default of some twenty millions sterling.

Morav'ians or Bohemian Brethren. A religious community tracing its origin from John Huss, expelled by persecution from Bohemia and Moravia in the eighteenth century. They are often called The United Brethren.

Morblen! (French). A corruption of Mort de J'en. (See VENDES ST. GIRIS.)

More. To be no more. To exist no longer: to be dead.

"Casino is no more." Shakespeare : Julius Caesar.

More Kicks than Ha'pence. Like the monkey which plays tricks for his master. The monkey gets the kicks and the master the ha'pence.

More Last Words. When Richard Baxter lost his wife, he published a broadsheet, headed Last Words of Mrs. Baxter, which had an immense sale. The printer, for his own profit, brought out a spurious broadsheet, headed More Last Words; but Baxter issued a small handbill with this concise sentence: "Mrs. Baxter did not say anything else."

More of More Hall. A legendary hero who armed himself with an armour of spikes; and, concealing himself in the cave where the dragon of Wantley dwelt, slew the monster by kicking it on the mouth, where alone it was mortal.

More the Merrier (The). The author of this phrase was Henry Parrot.

More one has, the More he Desires (The). In French, Plus il en a, plus il en veut. In Latin, Quo plus habet, eo plus cupiunt.

"My more having would be a source
To make me hunger more." Shakespeare : Macbeth, iv. 3.

More'no (3 syll.). Don Antonio Moreno, a gentleman of Barcelo'na, who entertained Don Quixote with mock-heroic hospitality.

Morestone. Would you remove Morestone? (See Mortstone.)

Morgan le Fay. (See below.) W. Morris, in his Earthly Paradise (August), makes Morgan the bride of Ogier the Dane, after his earthly career was ended.

Morgan le Fay, Morgaine la Fée, or Morgana the Fairy. Daughter of Queen Igrayne, and half-sister of King Arthur, who revealed to him the intrigues of Sir Lancelot and Guinever.
Morganatic Marriage (4). A marriage in which the wife does not take the husband's rank, because legally, or according to court by-laws, the marriage is not recognised. This sort of marriage is effected when a man of high rank marries a woman of inferior position. The children in this case do not inherit the title or entails of the father. The word is based on the Gothic morganjan, “to curtail” or “limit;” and the marriage settlement was called morgen-gabe or morgengnade, whence the Low Latin matrimonium ad legem morganaticam, in which the dowry is to be considered all the portion the wife will receive, as the estates cannot pass to her or to her children.

A morganatic marriage is called “left-handed,” because a man pledges his troth with his left hand instead of his right. The “hand-fasted” marriages of Scotland and Ireland were morganatic, and the “hand-fasted” bride could be put away for a fresh union.

Morgane (2 syl.). A fay to whose charge Zephyr committed young Panselyon and his cousin Benuac. Panselyon fell in love with Morgane’s daughter, and the adventures of these young lovers are related in the romance of Freerfose, vol. iii. (See MORGAN.)

Morgans. A Stock Exchange term, signifying the French 6 per cents., which were floated by the Morgans.

Morgante. A ferocious giant, converted by Orlando to Christianity. After performing the most wonderful feats, he died at last from the bite of a crab. (See below.)

Morganto Maggioré. A serio-comic romance in verse, by Pulci, of Florence (1494). He was the inventor of this species of poetry, called by the French bernache, from Berni, who greatly excelled in it. Translated by Byron.

Morgiana. The clever, faithful, female slave of Ali Baba, who pries into the forty jars, and discovers that every jar, but one, contains a man. She takes oil from the only one containing it, and, having made it boiling hot, pours enough into each jar to kill the thief concealed there. At last she kills the captain of the gang, and marries her master’s son. (Arabian Nights: Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves.)

Morglay. A sword (glave de la mort, the sword of Sir Bevis of Southampton), a generic name for a sword. (See Sword.)

"Had I been accompanied with my Toledo or Morgany."—Every Woman in her Humour.

"Carrying their morays in their hands."—Beaumont and Fletcher: Honest Man.

Morgue, a dead-house, is generally associated with mors (death); but this is a blunder, as the word means viage, and was first applied to prison vestibules, where new criminals were placed to be scrutinised, that the prison officials might become familiar with their faces and general appearance.

"On me conduisit donc au petit châtelet, en du morgue cantant passa dans la morgue, un homme d'un, court, et carre, vint a moi."—Anonymous: Le Prison de M. Dauvouc (1674), p. 35.

"Morgue, endroit où l'on tient quelque temps ceux que l'on écoute, afin que les gendarmes ont une meilleure estime de l'homme oublé."—Fleming and Tibbits, vol. ii. p. 688.

Morgue la Faye, who watched over the birth of Ogier the Dane, and after he had finished his earthly career, restored him to perpetual youth, and took him to live with her in everlasting love in the isle and castle of A'valon.

Moribund. Declining; in a dying state; on its last legs. Turkey is called a moribund state. Institutions on the decline are called moribund. Applied to institutions, commercial companies, states, etc. (Latin, moribundus, ready to die.)

Morisonianism. The religious system of James Morison, the chief peculiarities being the doctrines of universal atonement, and the ability of man unaided to receive or reject the Gospel. James Morison, in 1841, separated from the "United Seccession," now merged into the "United Presbyterian." The Morisonians call themselves the "Evangelical Union."

Morley (Mrs.). The name under which Queen Anne corresponded with Mrs. Freeman (the Duchess of Marlborough).

Morma, in Pepys's Diary, is Elisabeth, daughter of John Dickens, who died October 22nd, 1692.

Mormon. The last of a pretended line of Hebrew prophets, and the pretended author of The Book of Mormon, or Golden Bible, written on golden plates. This work was in reality written by the Rev. Solomon Spalding, but was claimed by Joseph Smith as a direct revelation to him by the angel Mormon. Spalding died in 1816; Smith, 1844.

Mormon.
Mormon Creed. (1) God is a person with the form and flesh of man. (2) Man is a part of the substance of God, and will himself become a god. (3) Man was not created by God, but existed from all eternity, and will never cease to exist. (4) There is no such thing as original or birth sin. (5) The earth is only one of many inhabited spheres. (6) God is president of men made gods, angels, good men, and spirits waiting to receive a tabernacle of flesh. (7) Man's household of wives is his kingdom not for earth only, but also in his future state. (8) Mormonism is the kingdom of God on earth. (W. Hepworth Dixon: New America, 1. 24.)

Mormonism. The religious and social system of the Latter-day Saints; so called from their gospel, termed The Book of Mormon. Joe Smith, the founder of the system, was born in Sharon, Windsor county, Vermont; his partner was Rigdon. The manuscript, which he declared to be written on gold plates, was a novel written by Spalding. He was cited thirty-nine times into courts of law, and was at last assassinated by a gang of riffraff, who broke into his prison at Carthage, and shot him like a dog. His wife's name was Emma; he lived at Nauvoo, in Illinois; his successor was Brigham Young, a carpenter by trade, who led the "Saints" (as the Mormons are called), driven from home by force, to the valley of the Salt Lake, 1,500 miles distant, generally called Utah, but by the Mormons themselves Deseret (Bee-country), the New Jerusalem. Abraham is their model man, and Sarai their model woman, and English their language. Young's house was called the Bee-hive. Every man, woman, and child capable of work has work to do in the community.

Morning. The first glass of whisky drunk by Scotch fishermen in salutation to the dawn. Thus one fisherman will say to another, "Hae ye had your morning, Tam?" or "I hae nae had my morning, yet, Jock."

"Having declined Mr. Fluckhart's compliment of a mornin', . . . he made his excuses." - Sir W. Scott. Waterlow, chap viii.

Morroco. The name of Banks's bay horse. (See Banks and Horse.)

Morocco. Strong ale made from burnt malt, used in the annual feast at Sevenhalls, Westmoreland (the seat of the Hon. Mary Howard), on the opening of Milnthorpe Fair. This liquor is put into a large glass of unique form, and the person whose turn it is to drink is called the "colt." He is required to stand on one leg, and say "Luck to Sevens as long as Kent flows," then drain the glass to the bottom, or forfeit one shilling. The act is termed "drinking the constable." The feast consists of radishes, eaten cake, and butter.

Morocco Men (Tha). Public-house and perambulating touts for lottery insurances. Their rendezvous was a tavern in Oxford Market, on the Portland estate, at the close of the eighteenth century. In 1796 the great Stato lottery employed 7,500 Morocco men to dispose of their tickets.

Moros. The fool in the play entitled The Longer Than Liveth the More Fool Thou Art, by William Wager.

Morpheus (2 syl., the Sleeper). Son of Sleep, and god of dreams: so called because he gives these airy nothings their form and fashion.

Morrel. One of the shepherds in the Shepherd's Calendar, by Spenser.

Morrice (Gil or Child). The natural son of an earl and the wife of Lord Barnard or John Stewart. "brought forth in her father's house wi' mickie sin and shame," and brought up "in the gude grene wode." One day he sent Willie to the baron's hall, requesting his master to come without delay to Greenwood, and by way of token sent with him a "gay mantle" made by herself. Willie went into the dinner-hall, and blurted out his message before all who were present, adding, "and there is the salken sarke your ain hand sewd the sleeve." Lord Barnard, thinking the Child to be a paramour of his wife, forbade her to leave the hall, and, riding himself to Greenwood, slow Morrice with a broadsword, and setting his head on a spear, gave it to "the meanest man in a' his train" to carry it to the lady. When the baron returned Lady Barnard said to him, "Wi' that same spear, O pierce my heart, and put me out o' pain," but the baron replied, "Enough of blood by me's bin spilt, sair, sair I rew the deed," adding-

"I'll say lament for Gil Morcie, As sin he was mine ain. I'll near forget the dreary day On whilk the youth was slain." Reliques of Ancient English Poetry, ser. iii. 1.

Dr. Percy says this pathetic tale suggested to Home the plot of Douglas (a tragedy).
Morris Dance

Morris Dance, brought to England in the reign of Edward III., when John of Gaunt returned from Spain. In the dance, bells were jingled, and staves or swords clashed. It was a military dance of the Moors or Moriscos, in which five men and a boy engaged; the boy wore a morion or head-piece, and was called Mad Morion. (See Maid Marian.)

Morse Alphabet (Thee). An alphabet used in telegraphic messages, invented by Professor Samuel F. B. Morse, of Massachusetts. The right-hand deflection of the electric needle corresponds to a dash, and the left-hand to a dot; and by means of dashes and dots every word may be spelt at length. Military signalling is performed in England by short and long flashes of a flag or some other instrument; the short flash corresponds with the dot, and the long with the dash. The following ten varieties will show how these two symbols are capable of endless combinations.

Mort-safe. A wrought-iron frame to prevent dead bodies from being exhumed by resurrectionists. (See Notes and Queries, March 14th, 1891, p. 210.)

Mortal. I saw a mortal lot of people — i.e. a vast mortal. Mortal is the French à mort, as in the sentence, "Il y avait du monde à mort." Legonidéc says, "Ce mot [mort] ne s'emploie jamais au propre, mais seulement au figuré, avec la signification de multitude, grand nombre, foule."

Mortar-board. A college cap. A corruption of the French mortier, the cap worn by the ancient kings of France, and still used officially by the chief justice or president of the court of justice. As a college cap has a square board on the top, the mortar-board was soon transformed into mortar-board.

Mortars differ from guns, in having their trunions placed behind the vent. They are short pieces, intended to project shells at high angles (45°), and the shells thus projected fall almost vertically on the object struck, forcing in the strongest buildings, and (bursting at the same time) firing everything around. Their splinters are very destructive.

Morte d'Arthur, compiled by Sir Thomas Malory, from French originals; edited by Southey, the poet-laurate. The compilation contains —

The Prophesies of Merlin.

---

Moscow.

So called from the river Moscowa, on which it is built. The monarch of Moscow. A large bell weighing 193 tons, 21 feet high, and 21 feet in diameter. [So-and-so was my Moscow. The turning-point of my good fortune, leading to future stalls and misery. The...}
Mosen

reference is to Napoleon's disastrous expedition, when his star hastened to its setting.

"Juan was my Moscow [the ruin of my reputation]." Byron: Don Juan, st. 48.

Mosen (Spanish). A corruption of Mio Senor, corresponding to the Castilian Don.

Moses' Horns. Exodus xxxiv. 30, "All the children of Israel saw Moses, and the skin of his face shone," translated in the Vulgate, "Cornuta esat facies sua." Rays of light were called horns. Hence in Habakkuk (iii. 4) we read of God, "His brightness was as the light, and He had horns [rays of light] coming out of His hand." Michel Angelo depicted Moses with horns, following the Vulgate.

The French translation of Habakkuk, iii. 4 is—"So spicaert deuit corno la lumiere même, et des rayons sortent de sa main."

Moses' Rod. So the divining-rod was usually called. The divining-rod was employed to discover water or mineral treasure. In Blackwood's Magazine (May, 1850) we are told that nobody sinks a well in North Somersetshire without consulting the jouaser (as the rod-diviner is called). The Abbé Richard is stated in the Monde to be an extremely expert diviner of water, and amongst others discovered the "Christmas Fountain" on M. de Metternich's estate, in 1863. In the Quarterly Review (No. 44) we have an account of Lady Noel's divining skill. (See World of Wonders, pt. ix. p. 283.)

Moses Slow of Speech. The account given in the Tacum (vi.) is as follows:—Pharaoh was one day sitting on his throne with Moses on his lap, when the child took off the king's crown and put it on his own head. The "wise men" tried to persuade the king that this was treason, for which the child ought to be put to death; but Jethro, priest of Midian, replied, "It is the act of a child who knows no better. Let two plates" (he continued) "be set before him, one containing gold and the other red-hot coals, and you will readily see he will prefer the latter to the former." The experiment being tried, the little boy snatched up the live coal, put it into his mouth, and burst his tongue so severely that he was ever after "heavy or slow of speech."

Moses Primrose. Son of the Rev. Dr. Primrose, very green, and with a good opinion of himself. He is chiefly known for his wonderful bargain with a Jew at the neighbouring fair, when he gave a good horse in exchange for a gross of worthless green spectacles, with copper rims and shagreen cases. (Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield.)

Moselem or Moslem. Plural of Mussulman, sometimes written Musulmans. The word is Turkish, and means true believer.

Moses. Napping, as Moses took his nap. Wilbraham says Moses took his nap napping, because he could not catch her when awake. "Till day come, catch him as Moses his grey mare, napping."—Christmas Prince.

Mosstrooper. A robber, a bandit. The marauders who infested the borders of England and Scotland were so called because they encamped on the moseses.

Mote and Beam (Matt. vii. 3-5). In ali pediculum video, in te viexium non videt (Petronius). Here pediculum means a house, and viexium a tyke.

Moth. Page to Don Adrian de Arma'do, all jest and playfulness, dicing and versatile. (Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost.)

Mother. Mother and Head of all Churches. So is St. John Lateran of Rome called. It occupies the site of the splendid palace of Planius Lateranus, which eschewed to the Crown from treason, and was given to the Church by the Emperor Constantine. From the balcony of this church the Pope blesses the people of the whole world.

Mother Ann. Ann Lee, the "spiritual mother" of the Shakers. (1735-1784.)

Mother Bunch. (1) Mother Bunch whose fairy tales are notorious. These tales are in Pasquil's Jests, with the Merriments of Mother Bunch. (1653.)

(2) The other Mother Bunch is called Mother Bunch's Closet newly Broken Open, containing rare secrets of art and nature, tried and experienced by learned philosophers, and recommended to all ingenious young men and maids, teaching them how to get good wives and husbands. (1790.)

Mother Carey's Chickens. Stormy petrels. Mother Carey is Mater Cara. The French call these birds mésaux de Notre Dame or axes Sainte Marie. Chickens are the young of any fowl, or any small bird.

"They are called the 'sailor's' friends, come to warn them of an approaching storm; and it is most unlucky to kill them. The legend is that each bird contains the soul of a dead seaman."
Mother County

(See Captain Marryat: Poor Jack, where the superstition is fully related.)

Mother Carey's Goose. The great Black Petrel or Fulmar of the Pacific Ocean.

Mother Carey is plucking her goose. It is showing. (See Hulda.)

Mother Country. One's native country, but the term applies specially to England, in relation to America and the Colonies. The inhabitants of North America, Australia, etc., are for the most part descendants of English parents, and therefore England may be termed the mother country. The Germans call their native country Fatherland.

Mother Douglas. A noted procuress, introduced in The Minor by Foote. She also figures in Hogarth's March to Finchley. Mother Douglas resided at the north-east corner of Covent Garden; her house was superbly furnished and decorated. She grew very fat, and with pious up-turned eyes used to pray for the safe return of her "babes" from battle. She died 1761.

Mother Earth. When Junius Brutus (after the death of Lucretia) formed one of the deputation to Delphi to ask the Oracle which of the three would succeed Tarquin, the response was, "He who should first kiss his mother." Junius instantly threw himself on the ground, exclaiming, "Thus, then, I kiss thee, Mother Earth," and he was elected Consul.

Mother Goose. A name associated with nursery rhymes. She was born in Boston, and her eldest daughter Elizabeth married Thomas Fleet, the printer. Mrs. Goose used to sing the rhymes to her grandson, and Thomas Fleet printed the first edition in 1719.

Mother Hubbard. The old lady whose whole time seems to have been devoted to her dog, who always kept her on the trot, and always made game of her. Her temper was proof against this willfulness on the part of her dog, and her politeness never forsook her, for when she saw Master Doggie dressed in his fine clothes—

"The dame made a fancy, the dog made a bow; The dame said, 'Your servant,' the dog said, 'Bow-wow.'"

Mother Huddle's Oven. Where folk are dried up so that they live for ever. (Howard Pyle: Robin Hood, 211.)

Mother Shipton lived in the reign of Henry VIII., and was famous for her prophecies, in which she foretold the death of Wolsey, Lord Percy, etc., and many wonderful events of future times. All her "prophecies" are still extant.

Mother-sick. Hysterical.

Mother-wit. Native wit, a ready reply; the wit which "our mother gave us." In ancient authors the term is used to express a ready reply, courteous but not profound. Thus, when Louis XIV. expressed some anxiety lest Polignac should be inconvenienced by a shower of falling rain, the mother-wit of the cardinal replied, "It is nothing, I assure your Majesty; the rain of Marly never makes us wet."

Mother of Believers. Ay-š-šah, the second and favourite wife of Mahomet; so called because Mahomet being the "Father of Believers," his wife of wives was Mother of Believers.

Mother of Books. Alexandria was so called from its library, which was the largest ever collected before the invention of printing.

Mother of Cities [Ann-al-Bulul]. Balkh is so called.

Mother of Pearl. The inner iridescent layers of the shells of many bivalve molluscs, especially that of the pearl oyster.

Mother of the Graochi. A hard, strong-minded, rigid woman, without one soft point or effeminate weakness. Always in the right, and maintaining her right with the fortitude of a martyr.

Mother's Apron Strings. (See Tied . . .)

Mothering Sunday is Sunday in Mid-Lent, a great holiday, when the Pope blesses the golden rose, and children go home to their mothers to feast on "mothering cakes." It is said that the day received its appellation from the ancient custom of visiting their "mother church," and making offerings on the altar on that day. Used by school-children it means a holiday, when they went home to spend the day with their mother or parents.

Motion. The laws of motion, according to Galileo and Newton.

1. If no force acts on a body in motion, it will continue to move uniformly in a straight line.

2. If force acts on a body, it will produce a change of motion proportionate to the force, and in the same direction (as that in which the force acts).
(3) When one body exerts force on another, that other body reacts on it with equal force.

Motley. Men of motley. Licensed fools; so called because of their dress.

"Motley is the only wear."--Shakespeare: As You Like It, i. 7.

Motu Pro'prico. A law brought in by Consal'vi, to abolish monopolies in the Papal States (1557).

Mouch (To). To live as a vagrant.

Mouchard (French). A spy, "qui fait comme les mouches, qui voit et si bien sans en avoir l'air." At the close of the seventeenth century, those petits-maîtres who frequented the Tuileries to see and be seen were called mouchards (fly-men). (Dictionnaire Étymologique de Ménage.)

Moulds. In the mounds. In the grave.

"... After Sir John and her [the minister's wife] were ... bought in the mounds."--Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (Letter xi.).

Mound. The largest artificial mound in Europe is Silbury Hill, near Avebury (Wiltshire). It covers 5 acres, 34 perches, and measures at the base 2,027 feet; its diameter at top is 120 feet; its slope is 316 feet; perpendicular height, 107 feet; and it is altogether one of the most stupendous monuments of human labour in the world.

Alyattes, in Asia Minor, described by Herodotus, is somewhat larger than Silbury Hill.

Mount Zion. The Celestial City or Heaven. (Runyan: Pilgrim's Progress.)

"I am come from the City of Destruction, and am going to Mount Zion." (Part l.)

Mount (The) or Montagnards. The extreme democratical party in the first French Revolution: so called because they seated themselves on the highest benches of the hall in which the National Convention met. Their leaders were Danton and Robespierre, but under them were Marat, Couthon, Thuriot, St. André, Legendre, Camille-Descoulins, Carnot, St. Just, and Collot d'Herbois, the men who introduced the "Reign of Terror." Extreme Radicals are still called in France the "Mountain Party," or Montagnards.

Old Man of the Mountain. Imaum Hassan ben Saluh el Homairi. The Sheik Al Jebal was so called, because his residence was in the mountain fastnesses of Syria. He was the prince of a Mahometan sect called Assassins (q.r.), and founder of a dynasty in Syria, put an end to by the Moguls in the twelfth century. In Rymer's Fosse (vol. i.) two letters of this sheik are inserted. It is not the province of this Book of Fables to dispute their genuineness.

"If the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet must go to the mountain. If what I seek will not come to me without my stir, I must exert myself to obtain it; if we cannot do as we wish, we must do as we can." When Mahomet first announced his system, the Arabs demanded supernatural proofs of his commission. "Moses and Jesus," said they, "wrought miracles in testimony of their divine authority; and if thou art indeed the prophet of God, do so likewise." To this Mahomet replied, "It would be tempting God to do so, and bring down His anger, as in the case of Pharaoh." Not satisfied with this answer, he commanded Mount Safa to come to him, and when it stirred not at his bidding, exclaimed, "God is merciful. Had it obeyed my words, it would have fallen on us to our destruction. I will therefore go to the mountain, and thank God that He has had mercy on a stiff-necked generation."

The mountains in labour. A mighty effort made for a small effect. The allusion is to the celebrated line of Horace, "Partunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus," which Creech translates, "The travailing mountain yields a silly mouse;" and Boileau, "La montagne en travant enfante une souris."

Mountain Ash (The), or "Rowan-tree," botanically called Pyrus aucuparia, which does not belong to the same family of plants as the frankincense, or Common Ash. The Mountain Ash is sassafras, but the Common Ash is dianthus. The Mountain Ash is pentagyna, but the Common Ash is monogyna. The Mountain Ash is of the Natural Order rosacea; but the common Ash is of the Natural Order sapindace; yet the two trees resemble each other in many respects. The Rowan or Rowan-tree is called in Westmoreland the "Wiggen-tree." It was greatly venerated by the Druids, and was called the "Witchen" by the early Britons, because it was supposed to ward off witches.

"... Their spells were vain The leeks returned To their queen in sorrowful mood, Crying that witches have no power Where thrives the Rowan-tree wood."--Laidley Wort's Spurious Heads (a ballad).

Mountain-dew. Whisky.

Mountains of Mole-hills. To make mountains of mole-hills. To make a great fuss about trifles. "Ex oloca arvo fæcère" (Cicero).

Mountebank. The bank or bench was the counter on which shopkeepers of yore displayed their goods. Street-vendors used to mount on their bank to pander to the public. The French word is "salim bancu"; and the Italian word "Costambanco" (i.e. canta in banco, one who patters from his bank).

* In Italian, montambanco (a quack-doctor) is also in use.

... So disant entre qu'elle tribre, ou quelque Jui qui convend, se seigneur médecin du roi de Perse, et commetit il montrant la banque. C'est que, pour donner ses drogues, il etait dans de sa banque toute l'assemblée." - Histoire Générale des Lorrains, book 5, chap. xxix.

There were temporary mountebanks as well as more regular merchants. In Attica, the names of Boleyn and the patron of the banks are distinguished, in Pruss, Tabarn, Taraburn, Gtouches, Garvergone, Gros-Œuvxhame, Guinot-Guus, Boleyn, Gascon, and the Muscaraile (a valuable number of G's). In Rusland, Andrew Barde, and some few others of inferior note.

Mourning.

Black. To express the privation of light and joy, the midnight gloom of sorrow for the loss sustained. The colour of mourning in Europe. It was also the colour of mourning in ancient Greece and in the Roman Empire.

Black and white striped. To express sorrow and hope. The mourning of the South-Sea Islanders.

Greyish brown. The colour of the earth, to which the dead return. The colour of mourning in Ethiopia.

Pale brown. The colour of withered leaves. The mourning of Persia.

Sky-blue. To express the assured hope that the deceased has gone to heaven. The colour of mourning in Syria, Cappadocia, and Armenia.

Deep blue, in Bokhara, is the colour of mourning (Han-say). The Romans in the Republic wore dark blue for mourning.

Purple and violet. To express royalty, "kings and priests to God." The colour of mourning for cardinals and the kings of France. The colour of mourning in Turkey is violet.

White. Emblem of "white-handed hope." The colour of mourning in China. Henry VIII. wore white for Anne Boleyn. The ladies of ancient Rome and Sparta wore white for mourning. It was the colour of mourning in Spain till 1498. In England it is still customary in some of the provinces to wear white silk hat-bands and white gloves for the unmarried.

Yellow. The scar and yellow leaf. The colour of mourning in Egypt and in Burmah, where also it is the colour of the monastic order. In Brittany, widows' caps among the paysannes are yellow. Anne Boleyn wore yellow mourning for Catherine of Aragon. Some say yellow is in token of exaltation.

Mournival. Four cards albalanced, as four aces, four kings, etc., in a game of cards called Gleek. Gleek is three cards alike.

"A mournival of aces, gleek of knives, Just nine a-piece." - Alphonse, iii. 5.

Poole in his English Pavanesus called the four elements Nature's first mournival.

Mouse. The soul or spirit was often supposed in olden times to assume a zolectic form, and to make its way to death through the mouth of man in a visible form, sometimes as a pigeon, sometimes as a mouse or rat. A red mouse indicated a pure soul; a black mouse, a soul blackened by pollution; a pigeon or dove, a finely soul.

Exorcists used to drive out evil spirits from the human body, and Hursonnet gives several instances of such expulsions in his Popular Impositions (1604).

No doubt pigeons were at one time trained to represent the departing soul, and also to represent the Holy Ghost.

Mouse, Mousie, terms of endearment. Other terms of endearment from animals are, bird or birdie (as "My bonnie bird"); puss, pussy; lamb, lambkin; "You little monkey" is an endearing reproof to a child. Dog and pig are used in a bad sense, as "You dirty dog;" "You filthy pig." Brace as a lion, surly as a bear, crafty as a fox, proud as a peacock, fleet as a hare, and several phrases of a like character are in common use.

"God bless you, mousie, the landgemen and, And smelt her on the lips." - Wren's. Alb. Eng., p. 17.

Mouse Tower (The), on the Rhine, said to be so called because Bishop Hatto (g.r.) was there devoured by mice. The tower, however, was built by Bishop Siegfried, two hundred years after the death of Bishop Hatto, as a tall-house for collecting the duties upon all goods which passed by. The word mous or mauch means "toll," and the toll collected on corn being very unpopular, gave rise to the tradition referred to. The catastrophe was fixed on Bishop Hatto, a noted statesman and councillor of Otho the Great, proverbial for his cunning perfidy. (See Hatro.)

Moussa.
Moussali. A Persian musician.
Haroun al Raschid was going to divorce his late favourite Marijah or Marinda, but the poet Moussali sang some verses to him which so touched his heart, that he went in search of the lady and made peace with her. (D'Herbelot.)

Mouth. Down in the mouth. (See under Down.)

His mouth was made, he was trained or reduced to obedience, like a horse trained to the bit.

"At first, of course, the firework showed night... but in the end 'his mouth was made,' his jaws formed, and he became a very serviceable and willing animal."—La Fonte: House in the Churchyard, ch. xix.

Mouth Waters. That makes my mouth water. "Cela fait venir l'eau à la bouche." The fragrance of appetising food excites the salivary glands. The phrase means—that makes me long for or desire it.

Moutons. Revérons à nos moutons. Return we to our subject. The phrase is taken from an old French play, called L'Arocet, by Patelin, in which a woollen draper charges a shepherd with stealing sheep. In telling his grievances he kept for ever running away from his subject; and to throw discredit on the defendant's attorney, accused him of stealing a piece of cloth. The judge had to pull him up every moment with, "Monsieur ami, revérons à nos moutons" (What about the sheep, tell me about the sheep, now return to the story of the sheep).

Movable. The first movable. Sir Thomas Browne (Relics of Medicine, p. 36, 27) uses the phrase, "Beyond the first movable," meaning outside the material creation. According to Pliney the Elder, "mobile" (the first movable and first mover of all things) was the bournary of creation, above which came the Empyrean heaven, or seat of God.

Moving the Adjourment of the House. This is the only method which the rules of the house leave to a member for bringing up suddenly, and without notice, any business which is not on the order paper.

Moving the Previous Question. A parliamentary dodge for burking an obnoxious bill. The method is as follows:—A "question," or bill, is before the house, an objector does not wish to commit himself by moving its rejection, so he moves "the previous question," and the Speaker moves, from the chair, "that the question be not put"—that is, that the house be not asked to come to any decision on the main question, but be invited to pass to the "orders of the day." In other words, that the subject be shelved or burked.

N.B. A motion for "the previous question" cannot be made on an amendment, nor in a select committee, nor yet in a committee of the whole house. The phrase is simply a method of avoiding a decision on the question before the House.

Moving the World. Give me where to stand, and I will move the world. So said Archimedes of Syracuse; and the instrument he would have used is the lever.

Mow, a heap, and Mow, to cut down, are quite different words. Mow, a heap, is the Anglo-Saxon mowre; but mow, to cut down, is the Anglo-Saxon mair-an.

There is a third Mow (a wry face), which is the French mone, as "Faire la mone à quelqu’un," to make faces at someone, and "Faire la mone," to pout or sulk. (Dutch, muren.)

Mowis. The bridgroom of snow, who (according to American Indian tradition) woosed and won a beautiful bride; but when morning dawned, Mowis left the wigwam, and melted into the sunshine. The bride hunted for him night and day in the forests, but never saw him more.

Mozzard (2 syl.) or Mouzalda. The "Moor," settled in Calicut, who befriended Vasco da Gama when he first landed on the Indian continent.

"The Moor extremis, Mozadla, quosdam genios rare, To da Gama's eyes revealed such treacherous sure,"

Much or Mudge. The miller's son, in Robin Hood dances, whose great feat was to bang with a blunder of peas the heads of the gaping spectators. Represents the Fool.

Much Ado about Nothing. The plot is from a novel of Bellesforet, copied from one by Bundelle (18th vol., vi.). There is a story resembling it in Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, bk. v., another in the Genevra of G. Turberville, and Spenser has a similar one in the Faerie Queene, book ii., canto iv.

"Much Ado about Nothing. After a war in Messina, Claudio, Benedick, and some other soldiers went to visit Leonato, the governor, when the former fell in love with Hero, the governor's daughter; but Benedick and Beatrice, being great rattle-pates, fell to jesting, and each positively disliked the other. By a slight artifice their hatred was converted into love, and Beatrice was betrothed to the Paduan lord. In regard to Hero, the day of her nuptials was fixed; but Don John, who hated Claudia and Leonato, induced Margaret, the lady's maid, to dress up like her mistress, and to talk familiarly with one Borachio, a servant of Don John's; and while this chit-chat was going on, the Don led Claudia and Leonato to overhear it. Each thought it to be Hero, and when she appeared as a bride next morning at church, they both denounced her as a light woman. The friar, being persuaded that there was some mistake, induced Hero to retire, and gave out that she was dead. Leonato now challenged Claudia for being the cause of Hero's death, and Benedick, urged on by Beatrice, did the same. At this crisis Borachio was arrested, and confessed the trick; Don John flod, the mystery was duly cleared up, and the two lords married the two ladies.

Muciana Caúto. A law-quirk, so called from Mu'ciius Scaevola, a Roman pontifex, and the most learned of jurists.

Mucklebackit. Elspeth Mucklebackit, mother of Saunders.

Maggie Mucklebackit. Wife of Saunders.

Saunders Mucklebackit. The old fisherman at Muselacrag.

Stemne Mucklebackit. Eldest son of Saunders (drowned). (Sir Walter Scott: The Antiquary.)

Mucklewrath. Habakkuk Mucklewrath, a fanatic preacher. (Sir Walter Scott: Old Mortality.)

John Mucklewrath. Smith at Cairnvreckan village. Dame Mucklewrath, his wife, is a perfect virago. (Sir Walter Scott: Waverley.)

Mud-honey. So Tennyson calls the dirty pleasures of men-about-town. (Maud.)

Mudar're. Son of a Moorish princess and Gonçalo Bustos de Salas de Lara, who murdered his uncle Rodrigo, while hunting, to avenge the death of his seven half-brothers. (See LARA, The seven infants of Lara.)

Muff. A dull, stupid person. Sir Henry Muff, one of the candidates in Dudley's interlude, called The rival Candidates (1774), is a stupid, blundering doit. He is not only unsuccessful in his election, but he finds that his daughter has engaged herself during his absence.

Muffins and Crumpets. Muffins is pain-moufflet. Du Cange describes the pain moufflet as bread of a more delicate nature than ordinary, for the use of prebends, etc., and says it was made fresh every day. Crumpets in crumple-cakes, cakes with little crumples.

Muffed Cats catch no Mice. (In Italian, "Catta guantata non piglia sorice.") Said of those who work in gloves for fear of soiling their fingers.

Mufti. We went in mufti—out of uniform, incog.

The French say en pêkin, and French soldiers call civilians pêkims. An officer who had kept Talleyrand waiting, said he had been detained by some pêkims. "What are they?" asked Talleyrand. "Oh," said the officer, "we call everybody who is not militaire a pêkin." "And we," said Talleyrand, "call everybody military that is not civil." Mufti is an Eastern word, signifying a judge.

Mug-house. An ale-house was so called in the eighteenth century. Some hundred persons assembled in a large tap-room to drink, sing, and spout. One of the number was made chairman. A servant was sent to the guests in their own mugs, and the place where the mug was to stand was chalked on the table.

Mugello. The giant slain by Averardo de Medici, a commander under Charlemagne. The tale is interesting, for it is said that the Medici took the three balls of this giant's mace for their device. Everyone knows that pawnbrokers have adopted the three balls as a symbol of their trade. (See under Balls for another account.)

Muggins. A small borough magnate, a village leader. To mung is to drink, and Mr. Muggins is Mr. Drinker.

Muggletonian. A follower of one Lodovic Muggleton, a journeyman tailor, who, about 1651, set up for a prophet. He was sentenced to stand in the pillory, and was fined £500.

Mugwump. A word borrowed from the Algonquin, meaning one who acts and thinks independently. In Eliot's Indian Bible the word "cen- turion" in the Acts is rendered mugwump. Those who refuse to follow the dictum of a caucus are called in the United States mugwumps. The chief of the Indians of Esopus is entitled the Mugwump. Turncoats are mugwumps, and all political Pharisees whose party vote cannot be relied on.

"I suppose I am a political mugwump," said the Englishman. "Not yet," replied Mr. Reed. "You will be when you have returned to your allegiance."—The Liverpool Echo, July 27th, 1882.

Mugwump Press (The). Those newspapers which are not organs of any special political party, but being "neither hot nor cold," are disliked by all party men.

"The Mugwump Press, whose function it is to enlighten the feeble-minded."—The New York Tribune, 1862.

Mulatto (Spanish). A mule, a mongrel; applied to the male offspring of a negress by a white man. A female offspring is called a "Mulatta." (See CREOLE.)

Mulberry. The fruit was originally white, and became blood-red from the blood of Pyramus and Thisbé. The tale is, that Thisbé was to meet her lover at the white mulberry-tree near the tomb of Ninus, in a suburb of Babylon. Being scared by a lion, Thisbé fled, and, dropping her veil, it was besmeared with blood. Pyramus, thinking his lady-love had been devoured by a lion, slew himself, and Thisbé, coming up soon afterwards, stabbed herself also. The blood of the lovers stained the white fruit of the mulberry-tree into its present colour.

The botanical name is Morus, from the Greek morus (a fool); so called, we are told in the Hortus Austriacus, because "it is reputed the wearest of all flowers, as it never buds till the cold weather is just and gone."

In the New Champions (pt. 1, chap. iv.) we are told that Excalint, daughter of the King of Thessaly, was transformed into a mulberry-tree.

Mulciber—i.e. Vulcan. It is said that he took the part of Juno against Jupiter, and Jupiter hurled him out of heaven. He was three days in falling, and at last was picked up, half-dead and with one leg broken, by the fishermen of the island of Lemnos. (See Milton:
Paradise Lost, book 1, 740, etc.)

Mule. Mahomet's favourite white
Mule was Daldah. (See FADD.)

To show one's mule. To appropriate part of the money committed to one's trust. This is a French location—

"Ferrer la mule—i.e. l'action d'un domestique qui trompe son maître sur le prix de ses choses qu'il a achetées en son nom. Elle doit son origine au pretexte facile à employer; de la dispens faire pour ferter la mule."—Encyclopedia des Proverbes Français.

"He had the keeping and disposal of the moneys, and yet shod not his own mule."—History of France (1595).

Mull. To make a mull of a job is to fail to do it properly. The failure of a pig-top to spin is called a mull, hence also any blunder or failure. (Scotch, mull, dust, or a contraction of middle.)
The people of Madras are called "Mulls," because they are in a less advanced state of civilization than the other two presidencies, in consequence of which they are held by them in low estimation. (Anglo-Saxon, myl, dust.)

Mulla. A tributary of the Blackwater, in Ireland, which flowed close by Spenser's home. Spenser is called by Shenstone "the bard of Mulla's silver stream."

Mul'mutius Laws. The code of Dumvallo Mul'mutius, sixteenth King of the Britons (about A.D. 400). This code was translated by Gildas from British into Latin, and by Alfred into Anglo-Saxon. These laws obtained in England till the Conquest. (History of England, iii. 1.)

"Mul'mutius made our laws,
Who was the first of Britain which did put His brown within a golden crown, and called Himself a king."
Shakespeare: Cymbeline, iii. 1.

"Mul'mutius was the son of Chidon, King of Cornwall. (See Geoffrey of Monmouth, British History, ii. 17.)

Mulread'y Envelope (The, 1849), is an envelope resembling a half-sheet of letter-paper, when folded. The space left for the address formed the centre of an ornamental design by Mulready, the animal artist. When the penny postage envelopes were first introduced, these were the stamped envelopes of the day, which, however, remained in circulation only one year, and were more fit for a comic table than anything else.

"A set of those odd-looking envelope things,
Where Britannia (who seems to be crucified) stands both right and left, funny people with whom among animals, Quakers, and Celestial birds—
And a tayer and wav, and small Queen's-heads in packed,
Which, when notes are too big you must stick on their backs."—Inquisitory: Legends.

Multiplier. Alchemists, who pretended to multiply gold and silver. An act was passed (2 Henry IV., c. iv.)
making the "art of multiplication" felony. In the Canterbury Tales, the Chanoine Yeman says he was reduced to poverty by alchemy, adding: "Do, such advantage is't to multiply." (Prologue to Chanoine Tale.)

Multitudes. Dame Juliana Berners, in her Booke of St. Albans, says, in design-nating companies we must not use the Mundiforti. One of the giant race, who had a son and daughter of such surpassing beauty that their father called them Mani and Sol (moon and sun). (Scandinavian mythology.)
Mundungus. Bad tobacco.

Mundungus, in Sterne's Sentimental Journey (1768), is meant for Samuel Sharp, a writer, who published Letters from Italy. Tobias Smollett, who published Tours Through France and Italy (1785), "one con minal euer," was called "Snel-fangus.

Munera. The daughter of Pollente, the Saracen, to whom he gave all the spoils unjustly took from those who fell into his power. Talus, the iron page of Sir Artegal, chopped off her golden hands and silver feet, and tossed her over the castle wall into the moat. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, bk. v. 2.)

Munkar and Nakir. Two black angels of appalling aspect, the inquisitors of the dead. The Koran says that during the inquisition the soul is united to the body. If the scrutiny is satisfactory, the soul is gently drawn forth from the lips of the deceased, and the body is left to repose in peace; if not, the body is beaten about the head with iron clubs, and the soul is wrenched forth by racking torments.

Muninn. Memory; one of the two ravens that sit perched on the shoulders of Odin; the other is Hugin (thought). (Scandinavian mythology.)

Muntasor [Mount Tabor]. The royal residence of the soldier whose daughter married Ottil, King of Lombardy.

Murad. Son of Had' a' na and Marsilus, King of Portugal, Castile, Aragon, Leon, and Valencia, when those countries were held by the Moors. He was called "Lord of the Lion," because he always led about a lion in silken fetters. When he carried defiance to Charlemagne at Fronsac, the lion fell in love with Aude the Fair; Murad chastised it, and the lion tore him to pieces. (Croquemousse, vi.)

Muscadins of Paris. French dukes or esquires, who used the London maschers in the first French Revolution. Their dress was top-boots with thick soles, knee-breeches, a dress-coat with long tails, and a high stiff collar; and a thick cudgel called a constabulary. It was thought to be John Bullish to assume a huskiness of voice, a discourtesy of manners, and a swaggering vulgarity of speech and behaviour. Probably so called from being "perfumed like a popinjay."

Muscular Christianity. Healthy or strong-minded religion, which braces a man to fight the battle of life bravely and manfully. This expression has been erroneously attributed to Charles Kingsley. (See his Life, ii. 74, 75.)

Muses. Nine daughters of Jupiter and Mnemosyne, goddesses of poetry, history, and other arts and sciences. The paintings of Herculaneum show all nine in their respective attributes. In the National-Museum of Paris is the famous collection with which Pius VI. enriched the Vatican. Lessaur left a celebrated picture of the same subject.

Mus'cum. The most celebrated are the British Museum in London; the Louvre at Paris; the Vatican at Rome; the Museum of Florence; that of St. Petersburg; and those of Dresden, Vienna, Munich, and Berlin.

A walking museum. So Longinus, author of a work on The Sublime, was called. (A.D. 213-273.)

Mushroom (an archaic form is mushroom). (French, monsieur, a white mushroom; Latin, musculus, moss.)

"Vocatur fungus muscarum, eo quod in luteo palentianus interit muscarum." - Albertus Magnus, viii. 346.

Music hath charms, etc. : from Congreve's Mourning Bride, i. 1.

Music. Men of genius averse to music. The following men of genius were actually averse to music: Edmund Burke; Byron had no ear for music, and neither vocal nor instrumental music afforded him the slightest pleasure. Charles Fox, Hume, Dr. Johnson, Daniel O'Connell, Robert Peel, William Pitt; Pope preferred a street organ to Handel's oratorios; the poet Rogers felt actual discomfort at the sounds of music; Sir Walter Scott, the poet Southey, and Tennyson. Seven of these twelve were actually poets, and five were orators. The Princess Mathilde (Demi-off), an excellent artist, with a veritable passion for art, may be added to those who have had a real antipathy to music.

Music of the Spheres. Pythagoras was the first who suggested the notion so beautifully expressed by Shakespeare—

"There's not the smallest orb which thou beholdst,
But in his motion like an angel sing,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubins." —Merchant of Venice, v. 2.
Plato says that a siren sits on each planet, who carols a most sweet song, agreeing to the motion of her own particular planet, but harmonising with all the others. Hence Milton speaks of the "celestial syrens' harmony, that sit upon the nine enfolded spheres." (Arcades.) (See Nine Spheres.)

Maximus Tyrius says that the mere proper motion of the planets must create sounds, and as the planets move at regular intervals the sounds must harmonise.

Musical Notation. (See Do.)

Musicians. Father of musicians. Jubal, "the father of all such as handle the harp and organ" (Gen. iv. 21).

Musidorus. (See Damon.)

Mus'sits or Musets. Gaps in a hedge; places through which a hare makes his way to escape the hounds.

"The many musits through which he goes Are like a lazy rinth to amaze his foes." Shakespeare: Venus and Adonis.

The passing of the hare through these gaps is termed musiting. The word is from Musse (old French), a little hole.

Musket is the Spanish mosqueta, a musket.

Muzlin. So called from Mosul, in Asia, where it was first manufactured. (French, museline; Italian, mussolino.)

Musnad. Cushioned seats, reserved in Persia for persons of distinction.

Muspel. A region of fire, whence Surtur will collect flames to set fire to the universe. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Muspelheim (3 syl.). The abode of fire which at the beginning of time existed in the south. It was light, warm, and radiant; but was guarded by Surt with a flaming sword. Sparks were collected therefrom to make the stars. (Scandinavian mythology.) (See Manheim.)

"The Muspelheim is a noted Scandinavian poem of the 4th century. Muspelheim is the Scandinavian hell, and the subject of the poem is the Last Judgment. The great Surt or Surtur is Anti-christ, who in the end of the world will set fire to all creation. The poem is in alternate verse, and shows both imagination and poetic talent." (See Manheim.)

Mustard. Connected with must, in 1382 Philip the Bold, Duke of Burgundy, granted to the town of Dijon, noted for its mustard, armorial bearings with the motto MOUTIR ME TARDE (Multum ardeo, I ardently desire). The arms and motto, engraved on the principal gate, were adopted as a trade-mark by the mustard merchants, and got shortened into Mout-tarde (to burn much).

The mustarium is of the mustard family, in Spanish masureno; and the Italian mustards is mustard.

Mustard. After meat, mustard. I have now no longer need of it. "C'est de la moutarde après dîner."

Musulman (plural, Musulmans or Moslems)—that is, Moslemin, plural of Moslem. A Mahometan; so called from the Arabic muslim, a believer.

Mustatur. "Omnia mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis," is by Nicholas Borbonius, a Latin poet of the sixteenth century. Dr. Sandys says that the Emperor Lothair, of the Holy Roman Empire, had already said, "Tempora mutantur, nos et mutamur in illis."

Mute as a Fish. Quite silent. Some fish make noises, but these are mechanical, not organic.

Mutes at Funerals. This was a Roman custom. The undertaker, attended with lictors dressed in black, marched with the corpse; and the undertaker, as master of the ceremonies, assigned to each follower his proper place in the procession.

Mutton (French, mouton). A gold coin impressed with the image of a lamb.

Mutton-eating King (The). Charles II. of England. The witty Earl of Rochester wrote this mock epitaph on his patron:—

"Here lies our mutton-eating king, Whose word no man relies on: He never said a foolish thing, And never did a wise one."

Come and eat your mutton with me. Come and dine with me.

Mutton-fist. A large, coarse, red fist.

Muttons. A Stock Exchange term for the Turkish '65 loan, partly secured by the sheep-tax.

Reremon a nos moutons. (See Moutons.)

Mutual Friends. Can two persons be called mutual friends? Does not the word of necessity imply three or more than three? (See the controversy in Notes and Queries, June 9, 1894, p. 451.)

"A mutual flame was quickly caught, Was quickly, too, revealed; For neither bosom lodged a thought Which virtue keeps concealed."

Edwin and Emma.

(Mutual = reciprocal.)
Muzzle. To muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. Not to pay for work done; to expect other persons will work for nothing. The labourer is worthy of his hire, and to withhold that hire is to muzzle the ox that treadeth out your corn.

My Eye (All). (See under All.)

Mynheer Clash. A Dutchman. Clash or Claus is an abbreviation of Nicholaus, a common name in Holland. Sandy, a contraction of Alexander, is a similar nickname for a Scotchman.

My'onian Sails. The ship Argo; so called because its crew were natives of Myrina.

"When his black whirlwinds o'er the ocean rolled And rent the Myrian sails."

Camoens: Lusiad, bk. vi.

Myrmidons of the Law. Bailiffs, sheriffs' officers, and other law menials. Any rough fellow employed to annoy another is the employer's myrmidon.

The Myrmidons were a people of Thessaly who followed Achilles to the siege of Troy, and were distinguished for their savage brutality, rude behaviour, and thirst for rapine.

Myron. A Greek statuary and sculptor, born in Boeotia, n.c. 480. A fellow-disciple of Polyclitus, and a younger contemporary of Phidas. His great works are in bronze. By far the most celebrated of his statues were his Discobolus and his Cow. The cow is represented lowing. (Discobolus is a quoit or discus player.) It is said that the cow was so true to nature that a bull mistook it for a living animal.

There are several similar legends. Thus it is said that Apelles painted Alexander's horse so realistically that a living horse mistook it and began to neigh. Velasquez painted a Spanish admiral so true to life, that Felipe IV. mistook the painting for the man and reproved it severely for not being with the fleet. Zozias painted some grapes so well that birds flew at them to peck them. Queen Matays painted a fly on a man's leg so immitably that Mandyn, the artist, tried to brush it off with his handkerchief. Ferrabosio, of Eusebius, painted a curtain so well that Zozias was deceived by it, and told him to draw it aside that he might see the picture behind it.

Myrra. An Ionian slave, the beloved concubine of Sardanapalus, the Assyrian king. She roused him from his indolence to oppose Arba'ees the Mede, who aspired to his throne, and when she found that his cause was hopeless induced him to place himself on a funeral pile, which she fired with her own hand, and springing into the flames, perished with her beloved lord and master. (Byron: Sardanapalus.)

Myr'rophores (3 syl.; the myrrh bearers). The three Marys who went to see the sepulchre, bearing myrrh and spices. In Christian art they are represented as carrying vases of myrrh in their hands.

Myrtle (Thc). If you look at a leaf of myrtle in a strong light, you will see that it is pierced with innumerable little punctures. According to fable, Phaedra, wife of Theseus, fell in love with Hip-polotus, her step-son; and when Hip-polotus went to the arena to exercise his horses, Phaedra repaired to a myrtle-tree in Trezen to await his return, and beguiled the time by piercing the leaves with a hair-pin. The punctures referred to are an abiding memento of this tradition.

In the Orlando Furioso Astolfo is changed into a myrtle-tree by Acrisia.

Myrtle. The ancient Jews believed that the eating of myrtle leaves conferred the power of detecting witches; and it was a superstition that if the leaves crackled in the hands the person beloved would prove faithful.

The myrtle which dropped blood. AEneas (book iii.) is represented as tearing up the Myrtle which dropped blood. Poly-dorus tells us that the barbarous inhabitants of the country pierced the Myrtle (then a living being) with spears and arrows. The body of the Myrtle took root and grew into the bleeding tree.

Mysteries of Woods and Rivers. The art of hunting and fishing.

Mystery. A kind of medieval drama, the characters and events of which were drawn from sacred history.

Mystery or Mysterium. Said to make up the number 666 referred to in Rev. xvii. 5. This would not be worthy notice, except for the fact that the word "mystery" was, till the time of the Reformation, inscribed on the Pope's mitre.

* Almost any phrase or long name can be twisted into this number. (See Number of the Beast.)

Mysterious Three (The) of Scandinavian mythology were "Har" (the Mighty), the "Like-Mighty," and the "Third Person," who sat on three thrones above the rainbow. Then came the "Æsir," of which Odin was chief, who lived in Asgard (between the rainbow and earth); next come the "Vanir," or gods of the ocean, air, and clouds, of which dieuies Njörd was chief.

N

N. This letter represents a wriggling eel, and is called in Hebrew nun (a fish).

N, in Spanish, has sometimes a mark over it, thus—n. This mark is called a tildë, and alters the sense and pronunciation of a word. Thus, "pena" means punishment, but "peña," a rock. (See Marks in Grammar.)

N. (One whose name is not given.) (See M or N.)

N, a numeral. Greek ν = 50, but ν = 50,000. N (Rom. = 900, but N = 900,000.

N added to Greek words ending in a short vowel to lengthen it "by position," and "I" added to French words beginning with a vowel, when they follow a word ending with a vowel (as si l'on for si on), is called N or L "ephelcystic" (tagged-on); Greek, ἔπι ἥλκο. (See Marks in Grammar.)

N. H. Buggs. The letters are the initials of Norfolk Howard, in allusion to a Mr. Bugg who, in 1863, changed his name to Norfolk Howard.

nth, or nth plus One, in University slang, means to the utmost degree. Thus, "out to the nth" means wholly unnoticed by a friend. The expression is taken from the index of a mathematical formula, where n stands for any number, and n + 1, one more than any number.

Nab. The fairy which offers Orpheus for food in the infernal regions a roasted ant, a CBC's thigh, butterflies' brains, some sucking nites, a rainbow-tart, and other delicacies of like nature, to be washed down with dewdrops, beer made from seven barleycorns, and the supernumerary of earth-born toppers. (King: Orpheus and Eurydice.)

Nab. To seize without warning. A contraction of apprehend. (Norwegian, nappe, to catch at, nap, snatch; Swedish, nappa.) Our nap (to file or steal) is a variety of the same word.

The keeper or catch of a latch or bolt is called the nab.

---

Nab’man. A sheriff's officer. (See Nab.)

"Old Boroton has sent the nab'man after him at last."—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering dramatized by Terry, p. 30.

Nabob or Nebo. One of the divinities of the Assyrians, supposed to be the moon. (See Is. xlv. 1.) Many of the kings of Babylon assumed the name.

Nabonassar is Nab-ôn-assar, Nab-o-of-Assur or Assyr.

Nabokhodasor is Nab-chad-ôn (or adon)-n-assar, i.e., Nabo-king-of-Assur or Assyria.

Nabonidus is Nab-ôn (or adon)-n-assar, i.e., Nabu or Nabu-king-of-Assur.

Belchazzar is Baal-ch'ôz-zar, i.e., Baal-chadôn-n-assar, or Baal-king-of-Assur.

Nabob' (generally called Na'bob). Corruption of the Hindu word narak, the plural of nabh. An administrator of a province and commander of the Indian army under the Mogul Empire. These men acquired great wealth and lived in Eastern splendour, so that they gave rise to the phrase, "Rich as the nabobs," corrupted into "Rich as a nabob." In England we apply the phrase to a merchant who has attained great wealth in the Indies, and has returned to live in his native country.

Nabonassar or Nebo-adon-Assur. (Nebo, Prince of Assyria.) Founder of the Babylonian and Chaldaean kingdoms, and first of the dynasty of Nabonassar. Era of Nabonassar began Wednesday, February 26th, 747 B.C., the day of Nabonassar's accession. It was used by Ptolemy, and by the Babylonians, in all their astronomical calculations.

Naboth's Vineyard. The possession of another coveted by one able to possess himself of it. (1 Kings xxi. 1-10.)

"The little Manor House property had always been a Naboth’s vineyard to his father."—Good Words, 1875.

Nadab, in Dryden's satire of Abolom and Achitophel, is meant for Lord Howard, of Esrick or Escrick, a profligate who laid claim to great piety. Nadab offered incense with strange fire, and was slain by the Lord (Lev. x. 2); and Lord Howard, while imprisoned in the Tower, is said to have mixed the consecrated wafer with a compound of roasted apples and sugar, called Lamb's-wool.

"And casting Nadab let oblivion damn, / Who made for a sacrifice of the peace-offering."

Abolom and Achitophel, parts 1. 639-6.

Nadir. An Arabic word, signifying that point in the heavens which is directly opposite to the zenith.

From zenith down to nadir. From the highest point of elevation to the lowest depth.

Nadir. A representation of the planetary system.

"We then lost (161) a most beautiful table, fabricated of different metals. • Saturn was of copper, Jupiter of gold, Mars of iron, the Sun of silver, Mercury of amber, Venus of tin, and the Moon of brass. • It was the most celebrated nadir in all Basutoland." (Nyguen)

Nadir Shah. Kouti Khan, a Persian warrior. (1687-1747.)

Nag. A horse. This is an example of a of the article joined to the following noun, as in the word newt = an ekt. (Danish and Norwegian, og: Anglo-Saxon, eoh or eh; Latin, equum; Dutch, nege.) Taylor (1630) has naggon, as—

"Wert thou George with thy naggon, That fattened with the draggon"

"Shakespeare's munt and umnec are mine-aunt and mine-uncle.

Nag, Nagging. Constant fault-finding. (Anglo-Saxon, gnag-an, to gnaw, bite.) We call a slight but constant pain, like a tooth-ache, a nagging pain.

Nag's Head Consecration. On the passing of the first Art of Uniformity in Queen Elizabeth's reign, fourteen bishops vacated their sees, and all the other sees, except Llandaff, were at the time vacant. The question was how to obtain consecration so as to preserve the succession called "apostolic" unbroken, as Llandaff refused to officiate at Parker's consecration. In this dilemma (the story runs) Scory, a deposed bishop, was sent for, and officiated at the Nag's Head tavern, in Cheapside, thus transmitting the succession.

* Such is the tale. Strype refutes the story, and so does Dr. Hook. We are told that it was not the consecration which took place at the Nag's Head, but only that those who took part in it dined there subsequently. We are furthermore told that the Bishops Barnlow, Scory, Coverdale, and Hodgkins, all officiated at the consecration.

Naga. Serpents; the king of them is Sesha, the sacred serpent of Vishnu. (Hindu mythology.)

Nagifar. The giants' ship, in which they will embark on "the last day" to give battle to the gods. It is made of the nails of the dead. (Old Norse, nagl, a human nail, and fari, to make.) (Scandinavian mythology.) Piloted by Hrymer.

Nahushtan. Trumpery bits of brass. (2 Kings xviii. 4.)

Naiad. Nymphs of lakes, fountains, rivers, and streams. (Classical mythology.) (See Fairy.)

Nail.

"Quo quibus praebis, et cavensis plebas flat politos super munera. —In Indenture dated July 12th, 1528 (see A. C.)."

"'O'Keeffe says: "In the centre of Limerick Exchange is a pillar with a circular plate of copper about three feet in diameter, called The Nail, on which the current of all stock-exchange bargains has to be paid." (Brocketts.)

A similar custom prevailed at Bristol, where were four pillars, called nails, in front of the Exchange for a similar purpose. In Liverpool Exchange there is a pillar of copper called The Nail, on which bargains are settled.

Hung on the nail. Up the spout, put in pawn. The custom referred to is that of hanging each pawn on a nail, with a number attached, and giving the customer a duplicate thereof. Very similar to the custom of guarding hats, cloaks, walking-sticks, and umbrellas, in public exhibitions and assemblies.

To hit the nail on the head. To come to a right conclusion. In Latin, "Rem remus." The Germans have the exact phrase, "Den Nagel auf den Kopf treff'n."

Nail (For want of a). "For want of a nail, the shoe is lost; for want of a shoe, the horse is lost; and for want of a horse, the rider is lost." (Herbert: Jacula Prudentum.)

Nail-money. Six crowns given to the "roy des haroys" for affixing the arms of a knight to the pavilion.

Nail fixed in the Temple (of Jupiter). On September 13th a nail was annually driven into the wall of the temple of Jupiter. This was originally done to tally the year, but subsequently it lapsed into a religious ceremony for warding off calamities from the city. Originally the nail was driven in the wall by the praetor maximus, subsequently by one of the consuls, and lastly by the dictator. (See Livy, vii. 3.)

Nail in One's Coffin. To drive a nail into one's coffin. To shorten life by anxiety, drink, etc. Topers call a dram "a nail in their coffin," in jocular allusion to the testostotal axiom.

"Care to our coffin adds a nail, no doubt; But every grin so merry draws one out." -J. W. Fowler. Epistolatory Odes, Ode xxv.

Nail One's Colours to the Mast (To). To refuse to surrender. When the colours are nailed to the mast they cannot be lowered in proof of submission.

Nailed. Caught and secured in jail. (See Clow.)

I nailed him (or it). I pinned him, I pinned him, meaning I secured him. Isaiah (xxii. 23) says, "I will fasten him as a nail in a sure place." However, the idea may still be, I secured him by making him pay down the earnest on The Nail. (See Pay on the Nail, second clause.)

Nails driven into Cottage Walls. This was a Roman practice, under the notion that it kept off the plague. L. Maullius was named dictator (A.D. 390) "to drive the nail." Our cottagers still nail horseshoes to thresholds to ward off evil spirits. Mr. Coutts, the banker, had two rusty horseshoes fastened on the highest step outside Holly Lodge.

Nails of the Cross. The nails with which Our Lord was fastened to the cross were, in the Middle Ages, objects of great reverence. Sir John Maundeville says, "He had two in his hones, and two in his feet; and of on these the emperour of Constantyynoble made a brydillio to his hors, to hore him in bataylle; and throghe vertue thereof he overcam his enemies" (c. vii.). Fifteen are shown as relics. (See Iron Crown.)

Nain Rouge. A Lat. or goblin of Normandy, kind to fishermen. There is another called Le petit homme rouge.

Nalvete (pron. nahl-erv-ty). Ingenious simplicity; the artless innocence of one ignorant of the conventions of society. The term is also applied to poetry, painting, and sculpture. The word is formed from the Latin natura, natura, etc., meaning nature without art.

Naked Lady. Meadow saffron (Colchicum Autumnale). Called naked because, like the almond, peach, etc., the flowers come out before the leaves. It is poetically called "the leafless orphan of the year," the flowers being orphaned or destitute of foliage. Some call it "Naked Boy," and the "Naked Boy Courts" of London were places where meadow saffron was sold.

Naked Truth. The fable says that Truth and Falsehood went bathing; Falsehood came first out of the water, and dressed herself in Truth's garments. Truth, unwilling to take those of Falsehood, went naked.

Nakeer. (See Munkar.)

Nala, a legendary king of India, whose love for Damayanti and subsequent misfortunes have supplied subjects for numerous poems. Dean Milman has translated into English the episode from the Mahabharata, and W. Yates the famous Sanskrit poem called Nalodaya.

Na'ma. A daughter of the race of man, who was beloved by the angel Zaraph. Her one wish was to love purely, intensely, and holily; but she fixed her love on a seraph, a creature, more than on her Creator; therefore, in punishment, she was condemned to abide on earth, "unchanged in heart and frame," so long as the earth endureth; but when time is no more, both she and her angel lover will be admitted into those courts "where love never dies." (Moore: Loves of the Angels, story iii.)

Namby Pamby Phillips. Ambrose Philips (1671-1719). His nickname was bestowed upon him by Harry Carey, the dramatist, for his verses addressed to Lord Carbery's children, and was adopted by Pope. This was not John Philips, author of the Splendid Shilling; "Namby" is a baby way of pronouncing Ambrose, and "Pamby" is a jingling reduplication.

Marshall says: "This sort of verse has been called [Namby Pamby] after the name of its author.

Name.

"What's in a name? That which we call a rose, By any other name would smell as sweet." -Shakespeare: Rome and Juliet, ii. 2.

To take God's name in vain. To use it profanely, thoughtlessly, or irreverently.

"Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain." -Exod. xx. 7.

Name. Fairies are extremely averse to having their names known, indeed there seems to be a strange identity between personality and name. Thus we are forbidden to take God's "name in vain," and when Jacob wrestled with the angel, he was anxious to know his opponent's name. (Compare the Greek onoma and the Latin anima.)
Napoleon. Name-sake; also name-child, etc.

"God for ever bless your honour, I am your name-she, sure enough."—Smollett: adventures of Sir Launcelot Greaves.

Name the Day. Fix the day of marriage.

Names. To call a person names. To blackguard a person by calling him nicknames.

Names of the Puritans. Praise-God Barebones. A leather-seller in Fleet Street.

If—Jesus—Christ—had—not—died—for—thee—thou—hadst—been—damned—Barebones. His son; usually called Damuced Dr. Barebones.

Nancy. The sailor’s choice in Dibdin’s exquisite song beginning, “‘Twas post meridian half-past four.” At half-past four he parted by signal from his Nancy; at eight she bade her a long adieu; next morn a storm arose, and four sailors were washed overboard, “but love forbade the waves to snatch our tar from Nancy”: when the storm ceased an enemy appeared, but when the battle was hottest our gallant friend “put up a prayer and thought on Nancy.”

Miss Nancy. Mrs. Anna Oldfield, a celebrated actress, buried in Westminster Abbey. She died in 1730, and her remains lay in state, attended by two noblemen. She was buried in a very fine Brussels lace head-dress, a holland shawl, with a tucker and double-ruffles of the same lace, new kid gloves, etc.

“Odeum! In woodens? Twould a sight procok’! Were the last words that your Nancy spoke.” Pope: Moral Essays.

Miss Nancy. An effeminate young man.

Nancy of the Vale. A village maiden who preferred Strephon to the gay lordlings who sought her. (Shenstone.)

Nankeen. So called from Nankin, in China. It is the natural colour of Nankin cotton.

Nanna. Wife of Balder. When the blind-god slew her husband, she threw herself upon his funeral pile and was burnt to death.

Nannie, to whom Burns has addressed several of his songs, was Miss Fleming, daughter of a farmer in the parish of Tarbolton, Ayrshire.

Nantes (1 syl.). Edict of Nantes. The decree of Henri IV. of France, published from Nantes in 1568, securing freedom of religion to all Protestants. Louis XIV. repealed this edict in 1685.

Nap. To go nap. To take all the winnings on the cards in hand; hence, to risk all on one venture. Nap is a game of cards; so called from Napoleon III.

Nap (A), a doze or short sleep, as “To take a nap,” is the Anglo-Saxon huęppian or huępp-ian (to take a nap; the nap of cloth is the Anglo-Saxon huęppa.)

Naphtha. The drug used by Molyne’s for anointing the wedding robes of Glanvile, daughter of King Creon, whereby she was burnt to death on the morning of her marriage with Jason.

Napier’s Bones. A method invented by Baron Napier, of Merchiston, for shortening the labour of trigonometrical calculations. Certain figures are arranged on little slips of paper or ivory, and simply by shifting these slips the result required is obtained. They are called bones because the haron used bone or ivory rods instead of cardboards.

Napoleon III. Few men have had so many nicknames.

MAX OF DECEMBR, so called because his camp was at December 2nd, and he was made emperor December 2nd, 1852.

MAX OF SPAIN, and, by a pun, M. Solanarte. It was at Seville he surrendered his sword to William I., King of Prussia (1870). MAX OF SILENCE, from his wonted impenetrability. CORTE D’ARREXER, the name and title he assumed when he escaped from the fortress of Ham.

RANPOYER, the name of the man who changed clothes with him when he escaped from Ham. The emperor’s Petticoats were called Boisguyard, those of the empress were Montjuicy.

BOUSFRASE is a compound of Buttes(france), Strasbourg, and Paris, the places of his noted escape.

RANTPOLE = harum-scarum, half-foot and half-guardian.

VERTEKEL. A patronymic, which cannot be here explained.

There are some very curious numerical coincidences connected with Napoleon III. and Eugénie. The last complete year of their reign was 1869. (In 1870 Napoleon was deposed and exiled.)

Now, if to the year of coronation (1852), you add either the birth of Napoleon, or the birth of Eugénie, or the capitulation of Paris, or the date of marriage, the sum will always be 1869. For example:

Napping. To catch one napping. To find a person unprepared or off his guard. (Anglo-Saxon, knapping, slumbering.)

Nar'aka. The hell of the Hindus. It has twenty-eight divisions, in some of which the victims are mangled by ravens and owls; in others they will be doomed to swallow cakes boiling hot, or walk over burning sands. Each division has its name: Khmana (fearful) is for liars and false witnesses; Rodha (obstruction) for those who plunder a town, kill a cow, or strangle a man; Sikara (swine) for drunkards and stealers of gold; etc.

Narcissus, in the Night Thoughts, was Elizabeth Lee, Dr. Young's stepsister. In Night iii. the poet says she was clandestinely buried at Montpelier, because being a Protestant, she was "denied the charity that dogs enjoy." (For Pope's Narcissa see NANCY.)

Narcissus (Thr.). This charming flower is named from the son of Cephusus. This beautiful youth saw his reflection in a fountain, and thought it the presiding nymph of the place. He tried to reach it, and jumped into the fountain, where he died. The nymphs came to take up the body that they might pay it funeral honours, but found only a flower, which they called Narcissus, after the name of the son of Cephusus. (Ovid's Metamorphoses, iii. 346, etc.)

Poe says the plant is called Narcissus from the tinekhe (nutmeasun), and that it is properly narriscum, meaning the plant which produces number or pillar.

"Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph that I've yet unseen... Canst thou not tell me of a green pan, That lieth by Narcissus lane?"

Milton: Comus, 223, etc.

"Echo fell in love with Narcissus..."

Narac. The highest title of honour in the realm of Liliput. Gulliver received this distinction for carrying off the whole fleet of the Blefuscudians. (Swift: Gulliver's Travels; Voyage to Lilliput, v.)

Narrow House or Home. A coffin; the grave. Gray calls the grave a "narrow cell."

"Each in his narrow cell for ever laid.\nThe rude forefathers of the haughty sleep.*

*Elop.

Narrowdale Noon (Till). To defer a matter till Narrowdale noon is to defer it indefinitely. "Christmas is coming."

Ann. "So is Narrowdale Noon." Your... was deferred or delayed, like Narrowdale Noon. Narrowdale is in Derbyshire. The Dove Dale is a valley about three miles long, and nowhere more than a quarter of a mile broad. It is approached from the north by a "narrow dale," in which dwell a few cotters, who never see the sun all the winter, and when its beams first pierce the dale in the spring it is only for a few minutes in the afternoon.

Narse (2 syl.). A Roman general against the Goths; the terror of children. (473-568.) (See BOLOG.)

"The name of Narse was the formidable sound with which the Avestan moulders were accustomed to terrify their infants."—Ribbon: Death and Fall, etc., viii. 219.

Narwhal. Drinking-cups made of the bone of the narwhal used to be greatly valued, from the supposition that they counteracted the fatal effects of poison.

Naseby (Northamptonshire) is the Saxon nafela (the navel). It is so called because it was considered the navel or centre of England. Similarly, Delphi was called the "navel of the earth," and in this temple was a white stone kept bound with a red ribbon, to represent the navel and umbilical cord.

Nasi. The president of the Jewish Sanhedrim.

Na'so. The "surname" of Ovid, the Roman poet, author of Metamorphoses. Nasso means "nose," hence Holofernes' pun: "And why Naso, but for smelling out the odoriferous flowers of fancy?" (Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, iv. 2.)

Nasser. The Arabian merchant whose fables are the delight of the Arabs. D'Hérouetlet tells us that when Mahomet read to them the history of the Old Testament, they cried out with one voice that Nasser's tales were the best; upon which Mahomet gave his malediction on Nasser, and all who read him.

Na'stand [dead-man's region]. The worst marsh in the infernal regions, where serpents pour forth venom incessantly from the high walls. Here the murderer and the perjured will be doomed to live for ever. (Old Norse, ni, a dead body, and strand, a strand.) (Scandinavian mythology.) (See LIE-STAND.)

Nathan'iel (Sir). A grotesque curate in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost.
Nation of Gentlemen. So George IV. called the Scotch when, in 1822, he visited that country.

Nation of Shopkeepers. Napoleon was not the first to call the English “a nation of shopkeepers” in contempt.

National Anthem. Both the music and words were composed by Dr. Henry Carey in 1740. However, in Antwerp cathedral is a MS. copy of it which affirms that the words and music were by Dr. John Bull; adding that it was composed on the occasion of the discovery of Gunpowder Plot, to which the words “frustrate their knavish tricks” especially allude.

National Anthems.

Of Austria. Haydn’s Hymn to the Emperor.

Belgian. The Brahansoupe.

Danish. Song of Denmark [a flag with a white cross, which fell from heaven in the 13th century at the prayer of Waldemar II.].

English. Rule Britannia, words by Thomson, music by Handel, and God Save the King. (See above.)

French. Ancient, the Chanson de Roland. Since the Revolution, the Marseillaise and the Chant du Départ.

Hungarian. The Rakoczy March.

Italian. Da Capo, Amanti um Pazzo [i.e. Move a step on ward], 1821. Garibaldi’s warlike Hymn, and Godfredo Mamelis Italian Brethren, Italy has Awakened, composed by Mercantini.

Russian. God Protect the Czar.

Scottish. Several Jacobite songs, the most popular being The King shall Enjoy his own Lyne; When the King Comes over the Water, and Lilliburlero of 1688.

National Colours. (See Colours.)

National Convention. The assembly of deputies which assumed the government of France on the overthrow of the throne in 1792. It succeeded the National Assembly.

National Debt. Money borrowed by the Government, on the security of the taxes, which are pledged to the lenders for the payment of interest.

The National Debt in William III.‘s reign was £13,730,439.

At the commencement of the American war, £128,583,635.

At the close thereof, £249,851,628.

At the close of the French war, £840,950,491.

Cancelled between 1817 and 1854, £85,538,790.

Created by Crimean war, £268,628,199.

In 1866, £802,842,949.

In 1872 it was £792,740,000.

In 1875 it was £714,797,715.

In 1879 it was £702,430,594.

In 1882 it was £677,679,571.

In 1883 it was £671,042,842.

National Exhibition. So Douglas Jerrold called a public execution at the Old Bailey. These scandals were abolished in 1868. Examinations now take place in the prison yard.

National Workshops.—The English name of “Ateliers nationaux,” established by the French provisional government in February, 1848, and which were abolished in three months, after a sanguinary contest.

Nativo. In feudal times, one born a serf. After the Conquest, the natives were the serfs of the Normans. Wat Tyler said to Richard II.:

“The first petition was that he should make all men free thro Yule tide and quarter, so that there should not be any native man after that time.”—Higden: Polychronikon, viii. 427.

Nativity (The) means Christmas Day, the anniversary of the birth of Jesus.

The Care of the Nativity is under the chancel of the “church of the Nativity.”

In the recess, a few feet above the ground is a stone slab with a star cut in it, to mark the spot where the Saviour was born. Near it is a hollow scraped out of the rock, said to be the place where the infant Jesus was laid.

To cast a man’s nativity is to construct a plan or map out of the position, etc., of the twelve houses which belong to him, and to explain the scheme.

Natty. Tidy, methodical, and neat. (Italian netto, French net, Welsh nath.)

Natty Bumppo, called “Leather Stocking.” He appears in five of Fenimore Cooper’s novels: as the Deerslayer; the Pathfinder; the Hawk-eye (La Longue Carabine); in the Last of the Mohicans; Natty Bumppo, in the Pioneers; and the Trapper in the Prairie, in which he dies.

Natural (J.). A born idiot; one on whom education can make no impression. As nature made him, so he remains.

A natural child. One not born in lawful wedlock. The Romans called the children of concubines naturales, children according to nature, and not according to law.

"Cui pater est populus, pater est abi nullus Cui pater est populus non habit ille patrem."

Omnes:

Orions.

Nature. In a state of nature. Nude or naked.

Naught (not "nought"). Naught is Ne (negative), aught (anything). Saxon náht, which is no aht (not anything).

"A headless man had a letter [c] to write.

The dumb repeated it [naught] word for word.

And deaf was the man who listened and heard [naught]."

Dr. Whewell.

Naught, meaning bad.

"The water is naught."—2 Kings, ii. 10.

Naughty Figs (Jeremiah xvii. 7. 2.) Worthless, vile (Anglo-Saxon náht, i.e. a negative, aht aught). We still say a "naughty boy," a "naughty girl," and a "naughty child." ·

"One basket had very good figs, even like the figs that are first ripe... The other basket had very naughty figs, which could not be eaten."

Navigation. Father of navigation.

Don Henrique, Duke of Viseo, the greatest man that Portugal ever produced. (1394-1460.)

Father of British inland navigation.

Francis Egerton, Duke of Bridgewater (1736-1803).

Navy. A contraction of navigator.

One employed to make railways.

"Canals were thought of as lines of inland navigation and a tavern built by the side of a canal was called a "Navigation Inn." Hence it happened that the men employed in excavating canals were called 'navigators,' shortened into navies."—

Nay-word. Pass-word. Slender, in The Merry Wives of Windsor, says—

"We have a nay-word how to kn-"—

The other.

I come to her in white and cry, 'h, she cries

But when the one another."—

Shakespeare.

Nayres (1 syl.) The aristocratic class of India. (See Poleas.)

Nasareans or Nazarenes (3 syl.)

A sect of Jewish Christians, who believed Christ to be the Messiah, that He was born of the Holy Ghost, and that He possessed a Divine nature; but they Nevertheless conformed to the Mosaic rites and ceremonies. (See below.)

Nazarene (3 syl.)

A native of Nazareth; hence our Lord is so called (John xviii, 5, 7; Acts xxiv. 5).

Nazareth. Can any good thing come out of Nazareth? (John i. 46.) A general insinuation against any family or place of ill repute. Can any great man come from such an insignificant village as Nazareth?

Nazarite (3 syl.) One separated or set apart to the Lord by a vow. These Nazarites were to refrain from strong drinks, and to suffer their hairs to grow. (Hebrew, nazar, to separate. Numb. vi. 1-21.)

N e plus Ultra (Latin). The perfection or most perfect state to which a thing can be brought. We have Ne- plus-ultra corkscrews, and a multitude of other things.

N e sutor, etc. (See Cobbler.)

N e a r. Any sweetheart or lady-love. She is mentioned by Horace, Virgil, and Tibullus.

"To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,

Or with the tangles of Neura's hair."

Milton: Lycidas.

Neapolitan. A native of Naples; pertaining to Naples.

Near, meaning mean, is rather a curious play on the word close (close-fisted). "What is " close by" is near.

Near Side and Off Side. Left side and right side. "Near wheel" means that to the coachman's left hand; and "near horse" (in a pair) means that to the left hand of the driver. In a four-in-hand the two horses on the left side of the coachman are the near wheeler and the near leader. Those on the right hand side of the coachman are "off horses." This, which seems an anomaly, arose when the driver walked beside his team. The teamster always walks with his right arm nearest the horse, and therefore, in a pair of horses, the horse on the left side is nearer than the one on his right.

Thus, 2 is the near wheeler

\[ \frac{2}{4} \]

and 1 the near leader. 4 is the off wheeler and 3

coachman. the off leader.

Neat as a Bandbox. A band-box is a slight box for caps, hats, and other similar articles.

Neat as a Pin, or Neat as a New Pin. Very prim and tidy.

Neat as Wax. Certainly the waxen cells of bees are the perfection of neatness and good order.

Nebo, the god of science and literature, is said to have invented cuneiform writing. His temple was at Borispes, but his worship was carried wherever Babylonian letters penetrated. Thus we had Mount Nebo in Moab, and the city of Nebo in Judea.

Nebraska. U.S. A word of Indian origin, meaning the “shallow river.”

Nebuchadnezzar. A correspondent of Notes and Queries (July 21, 1877) says that the compound Russian word Neboch-ad-nc-tzar means, “There is no god but the czar.” Of course this is not the meaning of the Babylonian proper name, but the coincidence is curious. The -ezar of Nebuchadnezzar means Assyria, and appears in such words as Nabonassar, Bel-ch-azzer, Nebi-pol-azer, Tiglath-Pil-azer, Esar-hadezer, and so on.

Nabonassar is Nebi-adun-azer (Nebo prince of Assyria); Nebuchadnezzar is Nebo-chah-adun-azer (Nebo, royal prince of Assyria). Nebo was probably an Assyrian god, but it was no unusual thing for kings to assume the names of gods, as Bel-ch-azzer, where Bel = Baal (Baal king of Assyria). (See Nabo.)

Nebuchadnezzar. The prophet Daniel says that Nebuchadnezzar walked in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon and said, “Is not this great Babylon that I have built. . . . by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty? And the same hour . . . he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles’ feathers, and his nails like birds’ claws” (iv. 29-33).

Necessity. Make a virtue of necessity. (Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona, iv. 1.) “Quintilian has laudam virtutis necessestat damas: St. Jerome (Epist. liii, sect. 26) has de necesseitate vandalismi. In the Rambler of the Rev. by Mr. W. R. Miller, XX. 41, we find Xil ne jacit de necesse vitae, et Bucaccio has Si cune sive falla della necessita.”

Necessity the tyrant’s plea. (Milton: Paradise Lost, book iv. verse 393.)

Neck. “Oh that the Roman people had but one neck, that I might cut it off at a blow!” The words of Caligula, the Roman emperor.

To break the neck of an enterprise. To begin it successfully, and overcome the first difficulties. Well begun is half done. The allusion is to killing fowls by breaking their necks.

Neck-verse (Psalm li. 1). “Have mercy upon me, O God, according to Thy lovingkindness: according unto the multitude of Thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions.” This verse was so called because it was the trial-verse of those who claimed benefit of clergy; and if they could read it, the ordinary of Newgate said, “Legit ut clerics,” and the convict saved his neck, being only burnt in the hand and set at liberty.

“If a clerk had been taken
For stealing of tamen,
For burglary, murder, or rape.
If he could not rehearse
(Well enough) his neck-verse.
. . . He never could fail to escape.”

British Apollo (1710).

Neck-weed. A slang term for hemp, of which the hangman’s rope is made.

Neck and Crop. Entirely. The crop is the gorge of a bird.

Neck and Heels. I bundled him out neck and heels. There was a certain punishment formerly in vogue which consisted in bringing the chin and knees of the culprit forcibly together, and then thrusting the victim into a cage.

Neck and Neck. Very near together in merit; very close competitors. A phrase used in horse races, when two or more horses run each other very closely.

Neck or Nothing. Desperate. A racing phrase; to win by a neck or to be nowhere—i.e., not counted at all because unworthy of notice.

Necked. A stiff-necked people. Obstinate and self-willed. In the Psalms we read, “Speak not with a stiff neck” (lxv. 5); and in Jeremiah xvii. 23, “They obeyed not, but made their necks stiff;” and Isaiah (xlvii. 4) says, “Thy neck is an iron sinew.” The allusion is to a wilful horse, ox, or ass, which will not answer to the reins.

Necklace. A necklace of coral or white bryony beads used to be worn round the necks of children to aid their teething. Necklaces of hyoscyamus or hembane-root have been recommended for the same purpose. In Italy coral belques are worn as a charm against the “evil eye.”

The diamond necklace (1785). (See DIAMOND NECKLACE.)

The fatal necklace. Cadmus received on his wedding-day the present of a necklace, which proved fatal to everyone who possessed it. Some say that Vulcan, and others that Euro pa, gave the necklace to Cadmus. Harmonia’s necklace (q.c.) was a similar fatal gift. (See FATAL GIFTS.)

Necromancy means prophesying by calling up the dead, as the witch of Endor called up Samuel. (Greek: slackos, the dead; mantea, prophecy.)
Nectar. Wine conferring immortality, and drunk by the gods. The Koran tells us "the righteoues shall be given to drink pure wine sealed with musk." The food of the gods is ambrosia. (Greek nectar.)

Neddy (a man's name). A contraction and diminutive of Mine Edward—Mine Eddy, My N'Eddy. Teddy is the French tu, toi, form; and Neddy the numation form. (Ed, Ted, Ned.)

Neddy. A donkey; a low cart used in Dublin; so called because its jolting keeps the riders eternally nodding.

"The ‘set-down’ was succeeded by the Neddy, so called from its oscillating motion backwards and forwards."—Sketches of Ireland (1847).

Neddy. A dunce; a euphemism for "an ass!"

Need Makes the old Wife Trot. In German, "Die not macht ein alte weib treiben;" in Italian, "Bizoug fâ trotter la vecchia;" in French, "Benois fait trotter la vieille;" the Scotch say, "Need gars naked men run."

Needs must when the Devil Drives. The French say: "Il faut marcher quand le diable est aux trousses;" and the Italians say: "Bisogna andare quandt il diavolo è nella casa." If I must, I must.

"He must needs go that the Devil drives." Shakespeare: All's Well That Ends Well, 1. 3.

Needâre. Fire obtained by friction. It has been supposed to defeat sorcery, and cure diseases assigned to witchcraft. (Danish, gnide, to rub.)

Needful (The). Ready money, cash. The one thing needful for this life.

Needham. You are on the high-road to Needham—'twin or poverty. The pun is on the word need. Needham is in Suffolk. (See Land of Nod.)

Needle. To hit the needle. Hit the right nail on the head, to make a perfect hit. A term in archery, equal to hitting the bull's-eye.

Eye of a needle. (See Eye.)

Negative Pregnant (A). A denial which implies an affirmative, and is so interpreted. A law term.

Negro. Fuller says a negro is "God's image cut in ebony."

Negro Offspring. White father and negro mother. Offspring, quinteron, quintera.

White father and mulatta mother. Offspring, -ona.
Nemesis. Retribution, or rather the righteous anger of God. A female Greek deity, whose mother was Night.

Neptune Impune Laecussit. No one injures me with impunity. The motto of the Order of the Thistle. It was first used on the coins of James VI. of Scotland (James I. of England). A strange motto for Puritans to adopt (Matt. xviii. 21, 22).

Neology. The Rationalistic interpretation of Scripture. The word is Greek, and means new-(theo)-logy. Those who accept this system are called Neologians.

Neoptolemos or Pyrrhus. Son of Achilles: called Pyrrhos from his yellow hair, and Neoptolemos because he was a new soldier, or one that came late to the siege of Troy. According to Virgil, it was this young man that slew the aged Priam. On his return home he was murdered by Orestes, at Delphi.

Nepente (3 syl.) or Nepuēthes, a drug to drive away care and superinduce love. Polydactyle, wife of Thoios (or Tho, 1 syl.), King of Egypt, gave Nepente to Helen (daughter of Jove and Leda). Homer speaks of a magic potion called nepuēthes, which made persons forget their woes. (Odyssey, iv. 228.)

"That nepenteus which the wife of Thoios In Egypt gave to the Jove-born Helenus." Milton: Comus, 682, 685.

The water of Ardenne had the opposite effect.

Nepé's Bones. (See Napier.)

Nephele-coccygia. A town in the clouds built by the cuckoos. It was built to cut off from the gods the incense offered by man, so as to compel them to come to terms. (Aristophanes: The Birds.)

"Without flying to Nephele-coccygias we can meet with sharper and bittier."—Maccabag.

Nephew (French neveu, Latin nepos). Both in Latin and in archaic English the word means a grandchild, or descendant. Hence, in 1 Tim. v. 4, we read—"If a woman have children or nephews [grand-children]." Propertius has it, "Me inter se seros tandemabit Roman nepotes [posterity]."*

* Niece (Latin nepeta) also means a granddaughter or female descendant. (See Nepotism.)

Nepomuk. St. John Nepomuk, a native of Bohemia, was the almoner of Wenceslas IV., and refused to reveal to the emperor the confession of the empress. After having heroically endured torture, he was taken from the rack and cast into the Moldau. Nepomuk is the French nép, born, and Pomuk, the village of his birth. A stone image of this saint stands on the Karl Bricke over the Moldau, in Prague. (1330-1383.)

Nepotism. An unjust elevation of our own kinsmen to places of wealth and trust at our disposal. (Latin, nepos, a nephew or kinsman.)

Neptune (2 syl.). The sea. In Roman mythology, the divine monarch of the ocean. (See Ben.) A son of Neptune. A seaman or sailor.

Neptune's Horse. Hippocampus; it had but two legs, the hinder part of the body being that of a fish. (See Horse.)

Neptunian or Néptunist. One who follows the opinion of Werner, in the belief that all the great rocks of the earth were once held in solution in water, and have been deposited as sediment. The Vulcans or Plutonians ascribe them to the agency of fire.

Nereids (2 syl.). Sea-nymphs, daughter of Nereus (2 syl.), fifty in number. Nereids or Néreïdēs (4 syl.). Sea-nymphs. Cauoma, in his Lusiad, gives the names of three—Doto, Nys, and Nerine; but he has spiritualised their office, and makes them the sea-guardians of the virtuous. They went before the fleet of Gama, and when the treacherous pilot supplied by Zorrocin, King of Mozambique, steered the ship of Vasco da Gama towards a sunken rock, these guardian nymphs pressed against the prow, lifting it from the water and turning it round. The pilot, looking to see the cause of this strange occurrence, beheld the rock which had nearly proved the ruin of the whole fleet (bk. ii.)

Nereus (2 syl.) A sea-god, represented as a very old man, whose special dominion was the Ægean Sea.

Neriane (3 syl.). One of the Nereids. (See Nyse.)

Nerissa. Portia's waiting-maid; clever, self-confident, and coquetish. (Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice.)

Ne'ro. Emperor of Rome. Some say he set fire to Rome to see "how Troy would look when it was in flames;" others say he forbade the flames to be put out, and went to a high tower, where he sang verses to his lute "Upon the Burning of Old Troy."
A Nero. Any bloody-minded man, relentless tyrant, or evil-doer of extraordinary savagery.

Nero of the North. Christian II. of Denmark (1480, 1534-1558, 1559).

Nero's Friend. After Nero's fall, when his statues and monuments were torn down by order of the Senate, and every mark of dishonour was accorded to his memory, some unknown hand during the night went to his grave and strewed it with violets.

Net. An idol of the ancient Arabs. It was in the form of a vulture, and was worshipped by the tribe of Hemery.

Nestor. A statue some fifty cubits high, in the form of an old woman. It was hollow within for the sake of giving secret oracles. (Arabian mythology.)

Nessus. Shirt of Nessus. A source of misfortune from which there is no escape; a fatal present; anything that wounds the susceptibilities. Thus Renan has “the Nessus-shirt of ridicule.” Hercules ordered Nessus (the centaur) to carry his wife Dejani'ra across a river. The centaur ill-treated the woman, and Hercules shot him with a poisoned arrow. Nessus, in revenge, gave Dejani'ra his tunic, saying to whomsoever she gave it would love her exclusively. Dejani'ra gave it to her husband, who was devoured by poison as soon as he put it on; but, after enduring agony, the hero threw himself on a funeral pile, and was consumed. (See Harmonia's Robe.)

Nettle. To feather one's nest. (See Feather.)

Nest-egg (A). Some money laid by. The allusion is to the custom of placing an egg in a hen's nest to induce her to lay her eggs there. If a person has saved a little money, it serves as an inducement to him to increase his store.

Nestor. King of Pylos, in Greece; the oldest and most experienced of the chieftains who went to the siege of Troy. A "Nestor" means the oldest and wisest man of a class or company. (Homer: Iliad.)

Nestor of the chemical revolution. A term applied by Lavoisier to Dr. Black. (1728-1789.)

Nestor of Europe. Leopold, King of Belgium (1790, 1831-1865).

Nesto'rians. Followers of Nestor'ius, Patriarch of Constantinople in the fifth century. He maintained that Christ had two distinct natures, and that Mary was the mother of His human nature, which was the mere shell or husk of the divine.

Neth'anim. The hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of God, an office which the Gibeonites were condemned to by Joshua (Joshua ix. 27). The word means given to God.

Nettle. Camden says the Romans brought over the seed of this plant, that they might have nettles to fadve their limbs with when they encountered the cold of Britain.

Nettles. It is ill work plucking nettles with bare hands, or belting the cat. It is ill work to interfere in matters which cannot but prove disagreeable or even worse. In French, "Attaquer le grelot."

Nettoyer (French). "Nettoyer une personne, c'est à dire luy gagner tout son argent." (Odin: Curiosités Françoises.) Our English phrase, "I cleaned him out," is precisely tantamount to it.

Never. There are numerous locutions to express this idea; as—

"While to my limbs th'envenomed mantle clings, Drenched in the centaur's black, malignant suds."

West: Tiumphs of the Gout (Lucian).

Net. To feather one's nest. (See Feather.)

New.

New Brooms sweep Clean. New servants work hard; new masters keep a sharp look out. (In French, "Il n'est rien tel que balai neuf.")

New Christians. Certain Jews of Portugal, who yielded to compulsion and suffered themselves to be baptised,
New Jerusalem

The paradise of Christians, in allusion to Rev. xxi.

New Man. The regenerated man. In Scripture phrase the unregenerated state is called the old man (g.v.).

New Style. The reformed or Gregorian calendar, adopted in England in September, 1752.

New Testament. The oldest MSS. extant are:—(1) The Codex Sinaiacus (N.), published at the expense of Alexander II. of Russia since the Crimean war. This codex contains nearly the whole of the Old and New Testaments, and was discovered in the convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai, by Constantius Tischendorf. It is ascribed to the fourth century. (2) The Codex Vaticanus (B), in the Vatican Library. Written on vellum in Egypt about the fourth century. (3) The Codex Alexandrinus (A), belonging to the fifth century. It was presented to Charles I. in 1628 by Cyril Lucaris, Patriarch of Alexandria, and is preserved in the British Museum. It consists of four folio volumes on parchment, and contains the Old and New Testaments (except the first twenty-four chapters of St. Matthew) and the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians.

New World. America; the Eastern Hemisphere is called the Old World.

New Year's Day. January 1st. The ancient Romans began their year in March; hence such words as September, October, November, December, meaning the 7th, 8th, 9th, 10th mouth, had a rational meaning. Since the introduction of the Christian era, Christmas Day, Lady Day, Easter Day, and March 1st have in turn been considered as New Year's Day; but since the reform of the calendar in the sixteenth century, January 1st has been accepted as New Year's Day, because it was the eighth day after the Nativity, when Jesus was circumcised (Luke ii. 21). (See New Style.)

The civil and legal year began March 25th till after the alteration of the style, in 1752, when it was fixed, like the historic year, to January 1st. In Scotland the legal year was changed to January 1st as far back as 1600; the proclamation was made Nov. 27, 1599.

New Year's Gifts. The Greeks transmitted the custom to the Romans, and the Romans to the early Britons. The Roman presents were called strenae, whence the French term strenes (a New Year's gift). Our forefathers used to bribe the magistrates with gifts on New Year's Day—a custom abolished by law in 1290, but even down to the reign of James II. the monarchs received their tokens.

N.B. Nonius Marcellus says that Tatus, King of the Sabines, was presented with some branches of trees cut from the forest sacred to the goddess Sternia (strength), on New Year's Day, and from this happy omens established the custom.

News. The letters N.W. used to be prefixed to newspapers to show that they obtained information from the four quarters of the world, and the supposition that our word news is thence derived is at least ingenious; but the old-fashioned way of spelling the word, newes, is fatal to the conceit. The French nouvelles seems to be the real source. (See Notarica.)

"News is conveyed by letter, word, or mouth, And comes to us from North, East, West, and South."—Witt's Recreations.

Newcastle (Northumberland) was once called Moncaster, from the monks who settled there in Anglo-Saxon times; it was called Newcastle from the castle built there by Robert, son of the Conqueror, in 1080, to defend the neighbourhood from the Scots.

Newcastle (Staffordshire) is so called from the new castle built to supply the place of an older one which stood at Chesterton-under-Lyme, about two miles distant.

Carry coals to Newcastle. A work of supererogation, Newcastle being the great seat of coals. The Latins have "Aquam maris infundere" ("To pour water into the sea"); "Sidera coelo addere" ("To add stars to the sky"); "Nortibus Athenas" ("To carry owls to Athens"), which abounds in them.

Newcastle Programme. (See People's Charter.)

Newcome (Colone). A character in Thackeray's novel called The Newcomes.

Newcomen. Strangers newly arrived.

Newgate. Before this was set up, London had but three gates: Aldgate, Aldersgate, and Ludgate. The new one was added in the reign of Henry I.

Newgate, Nash, in his Pierce Peniles,
Nibelungen-Lied

A mythical mass of gold and precious stones, which Siegfried obtained from the Nibelungs, and gave to his wife Kriemhild as her marriage portion. It was guarded by Albric the dwarf. After the murder of Siegfried, his widow removed the hoard to Worms; here Hagan seized it, and buried it secretly beneath "the Rhine at Lechham, intending at a future time to enjoy it, "but that was never to be." Kriemhild married Etzel with the view of avenging her wrongs. In time Günther, with Hagan and a host of Burgundians, went to visit King Etzel, and Kriemhild stirred up a great broil, at the end of which a most terrible slaughter ensued. (See KRIEMHILD.)

"Twas much as twelve huge wagons in four whole nights and days,
Could carry from the mountain down to the flat
Though road from each wagon three journeyed every day.

"It was made up of nothing but precious stones and gold:
Were all the world bought from it, and down the value told,
Not a mark the less, there'd be left than erst there was a ween."

Nibelungen-Lied. A famous German epic of the thirteen century, probably a compilation of different lays. It is divided into two parts, one ending with the death of Siegfried, and the other with the death of Kriemhild, his widow. The first part contains the marriage of Gunther, King of Burgundy, with Queen Brunnhild; the marriage of Siegfried with Kriemhild, his death by Hagan, the removal of the "Nibelungen hoard" to Burgundy, and its seizure by Hagan, who buried it somewhere under the Rhine. This part contains nineteen lays, divided into 1,188 four-line stanzas. The second part contains the marriage of the widow Kriemhild with King Etzel, the visit of the Burgundians to the court of the Hunnish king, and the death of all the principal characters, including Hagan and Kriemhild. This part, sometimes called The Nibelungen-Nel, from the last three words, contains twenty stanzas, divided into 1,271 four-line stanzas. The two parts contain thirty-nine lays, 2,459 stanzas, or 9,336 lines. The tale is based on a legend in the Volsunga Saga.
Nibelungen-Nöt. The second part of the famous German epic called the Nibelungen-Lied (q.v.).

Nibelungers. Whoever possessed the "Nibelung hoard" (q.v.). Thus at one time certain people of Norway were so called, but when Siegfried possessed himself of the hoard he was called King of the Nibelungers; and at the death of Siegfried, when the hoard was removed to Burgundy, the Burgundians were so called. (See NIBELUNG.)

* In all these Teutonic names is = e, and a = i.

Nio Frog. (See FROG.)

Nice. The Council of Nice. The first ecumenical council of the Christian Church, held under Constantine the Great at Nice, or Nicaea, in Asia Minor, to condemn the Ariotic heresy (325). The seventh ecumenical council was also held at Nice (787).

Nice as Ninepence. A corruption of "Nice as nine-pins." In the game of nine-pins, the "men" are set in three rows with the utmost exactitude or nicety. Nine-pence is an Irish shilling of 1361. (See NINEPENCE.)

Nice'an Barks or Nycean Barks. Edgar Poe, in his lyric To Helen, says—

"Helen, thy beauty is to me
Like those Nicean barks of yore,
That gently o'er a perfumed sea
The weary, way-a-way wanderer bore
To his own native shore."

The way-worn wanderer was Dionysos or Bacchus, after his renowned conquests. His native shore was the Western Horn, called the Amalthean Horn. And the Nicean barks were vessels sent from the island Nyss, to which in infancy Dionysos was conveyed to screen him from Rhoe. The perfumed sea was the sea surrounding Nyss, a paradisal island.

Nicene Creed. (See NICE, COUNCIL OF.)

Niche. A niche in the Temple of Flora. The Temple of Flora was the Pantheon, converted (1791) into a receptacle for illustrious Frenchmen. A niche in the temple is a place for a monument recording your name and deeds.

Nicholas (St.). The patron saint of boys, as St. Catherine is of girls. In Germany, a person assembles the children of a family or school on the 6th December (the eve of St. Nicholas), and distributes gilt nuts and sweetmeats; but if any naughty child is present, he receives the redoubtable punishment of the klauauf. The same as Santa Claus and the Dutch Kris Kringle (q.v.). (See SANTA CLAUS.)

St. Nicholas. Patron saint of parish clerks. This is because he was the patron of scholars, who used to be called clerks.

St. Nicholas. Patron saint of sailors, because he averted a storm on a voyage, to the Holy Land.

St. Nicholas. The patron saint of Russia.

St. Nicholas. The patron saint of Aberdeen.

St. Nicholas, in Christian art, is represented in episcopal robes, and has either three purses or golden balls, or three children, as his distinctive symbols. The three purses are in allusion to the three purses given by him to three sisters to enable them to marry. The three children allude to the legend that an Asiatic gentleman sent his three boys to school at Athens, but told them to call on St. Nicholas for his benediction; they stopped at Myra for the night, and the innkeeper, to secure their baggage, murdered them in bed, and put their mangled bodies into a pickling-tub with some pork, intending to sell the whole as such. St. Nicholas had a vision of the whole affair, and went to the inn, when the man confessed the crime, and St. Nicholas raised the murdered boys to life again. (See Homer's Everyday Book, vol. i. col. 15:6; Maitre Yace, Metrical Life of St. Nicholas.)

Clerks or Knights of St. Nicholas. Thieves; so called because St. Nicholas was their patron saint; not that he aided them in their wrong-doing, but because on one occasion he induced some thieves to restore their plunder. Probably St. Nicholas is simply a pun for Nick, and thieves may be called the devil's clerks or knights with much propriety.

"I think wonder come prancing down the hills from Kingston a couple of St. Nicholas's clerks." —Young: Mayh at Midnight (1632).

Nick, in Scandinavian mythology, is a water-wraith or kelpie. There are nicks in sea, lake, river, and waterfall. Both Catholic and Protestant clergy have laboured to stir up an aversion to these beings. They are sometimes represented as half-child, half-horse, the hoofs being reversed, and sometimes as old men sitting on rocks wringing the water from their hair. This kelpie must not be confounded with the nur (q.v.).

Old Nick is the Scandinavian water-form of an old man. Butler says the word is derived from Nicholas Machiavel, but this can be only a poetical satire, as the term existed many years before the birth of that Florentine.

"Nick Machiavel had ne'er a trick
(Though he gives name to our old Nick)
But was below the least of these."—Hudibras, iii. 1.

Old Nick. Grimm says the word Nick is Neken or Niskken, the evil spirit of the North. In Scandinavia there is scarcely a river without its Nikr or wraith. (See NICKAR and NIOOR. Anglo-Saxon nicor, a monster.)

He nicked it. Won, hit, accomplished it. A nick is a winning throw of dice. Hence Florio (p. 280) says: "To yce or nick a caste of diee."

To nick the nick. To hit the exact moment. Tallies used to be called "nicksticke." Hence, to make a record of anything is "to nick it down," as publicans nick a score on a tally.

In the nick of time. Just at the right moment. The allusion is to tallies marked with nicky or notches. Shakespeare has, "Tis now the prick of noon" (Romeo and Juliet, ii. 4), in allusion to the custom of pricking tallies with a pin, as they do at Cambridge University still. If a man enters chapel just before the doors close, he would be just in time to get nicked or pricked, and would be at the nick or prick of time.

Nicks-Nan Night. The night preceding Shrove Tuesday is so called in Cornwall, because boys play tricks and practical jokes on that night.

Nickar or Niuickar. The name assumed by Odin when he impersonates the destroying principle. (Grimm: Deutche Mythologie.)

Nickel Silver. A mixed metal of copper, zinc, and nickel, containing more nickel than what is called "German silver." From its hardness it is well adapted for electroplating. (German, nickel, which also means a trumpeter.)

Nick. One who nicks or hits a mark exactly. Certain night-lurkers, whose game was to break windows with halfpence, assumed this name in the early part of the eighteenth century.

*He scattered pence the flying Nicker finds,
And with the copper shower the casement rings.*—Gay:Trivia, iii.

Nickelo dys (Mrs.). An endless talker, always introducing something quite foreign to the matter in hand, and plunging herself on her penetration. (Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby.)

Nicknames. "An eke name," written A nuke name. An additional name, an ag-nomen. The "eke" of a beehive is the piece added to the bottom to enlarge the hive. (See Now-a-Days.)

Nicknames. National Nicknames:

For an American of the United States, "Brother Jonathan" (q.v.).
For a Dutchman, "Nic Frog" (q.v.), and "Mynheer Closh" (q.v.).
For an Englishman, "John Bull." (See BULL.)
For a Frenchman, "Crupaud" (q.v.), Johnny or Jean, Robert Macaire.
For French Canadians, "Jean Baptiste."
For French reformers, "Brissotins."
For French peasantry, "Jacques Bonhomme."
For a Glaswegian, "Glasgow Keelie."
For a German, "Cousin Michael" or "Michel" (q.v.).
For an Irishman, "Paddy."
For a Liverpudlian, "Dicky Sam."
For a Londoner, "A Cockney" (q.v.).
For a Russian, "A bear."
For a Scot, "Sawney" (q.v.).
For a Swiss, "Colin Tampon" (q.v.).
For a Turk, "Infidel."

Nick'nev'en. A gigantic malignant hag of Scotch superstition. Dunbar has well described this spirit in his *Flying of Dunbar and Kennedy."

Nicodemused into Nothing, that is, the prospects of one's life ruined by a silly name; according to the proverb, "Give a dog a bad name and hang him." It is from Sterne's Tristram Shandy (vol. i. 10), on the evil influence of a silly name on the mind of the bearer of it.

"How many Caesar's and POMPERS... by mere inspiration of the names have been rendered worthy of them; and how many... might have done...well in the world...had they not been Nicodemused into nothing." (This is, to call a man Nicodemus would be enough to make a man.)

Nicola'tans. The followers of Nicholas (second century). They were Gnostics in doctrine and Epicureans in practice.

Nic'oelas. (See NICOLAS.)

"My brother saw a noor in the Northern sea. It was three fathoms long, with the body of a man, and the head of a cat, the head of a man, and the back of a goat, the back of a man, and the beak of a duck, the beak of a man, and the breast of a whale. It was watching for the fishermen."—Kingston: Hypatia, chap. xii.

Nio'otene (3 syl.) is so named from Jean Nicot, Lord of Villemain, who purchased some tobacco at Lisbon in 1550, introduced it into France, and had the honour of fixing his name on the plant. Our word tobacco is from the Indian tabaco (the tube used by the Indians for inhaling the smoke).

Nídhögg. The monster serpent, hid in the pit Hvergelmer, which for ever gnaws at the roots of the mundane ash-tree Yggdrasil. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Niceo. (See NEPHEW.)

Nîlheim (2 syl., mist-home). The region of endless cold and everlasting night, ruled over by Hela. It consists of nine worlds, to which are consigned those who die of disease or old age. This region existed "from the beginning" in the North, and in the middle thereof was the well Hvergelmer, from which flowed twelve rivers. (Old Norse, yfi, mist; and heim, home.) In the South was the world called Muspelheim (q.v.). (Scandinavian mythology.) (See HVERGELMER MANHEIM.)

Night. The celebrated statue of Night, in Florence, is the chef d'oeuvre of Michael Angelo. In the gallery of the Luxembourg, Paris, is the famous picture of Night by Rubens; and at Versailles is the painting of Mignard.

Nightcap (A). A glass of grog before going to bed. Supposed to promote sleep.

"The nightcap is generally a little whisky left in the decanter. To do it honour it is taken neat. Then all get up and wish: 'good-night.'"—Sam O'Roll: Friend Macdonald, m.

Nightingale. Tereus, King of Thrace, fetched Philomela to visit his wife; but when he reached the "solitudes of Helæs" he dishonoured her, and cut out her tongue that she might not reveal his conduct. Tereus told his wife that Philomela was dead, but Philomela made her story known by weaving it into a peplus, which she sent to her sister, the wife of Tereus, whose name was Procris. Procris, out of revenge, cut up her own son and served it to Tereus; but as soon as the king discovered it he pursued his wife, who fled to Philomela, her sister. To put an end to the sad tale, the gods changed all three into birds; Tereus (2 syl.) became the hawk, his wife the swallow, and Philomela the nightingale.

Auckland nightingales. Asses. Cambridgeshire nightingales. Edible frogs. Liège and Dutch "nightingales" are edible. Nightingales (A). A sensation in sleep as if something heavy were sitting on our breast. (Anglo-Saxon, mars, an incubus.) This sensation is called in French conchomar. Anciently it was not unfrequently called the night- bag, or the basking of the witch. Fu'seli used to eat raw beef and pork chops for supper to produce nightmare, that he might draw his horrible creations. (See Mars' s Nest.)

"I do believe that the witch we call Mars has been dealing with you."—Sir Walter Scott: The Betrothed, chap. xv.

Nightmare of Europe. Napoleon Bonaparte (1769, 1804-1814, 1821).

Nihilists. A radical society of the maddest proclivities, which started into existence in 1848, under the leadership of Herzen and Bakunin. Their professed object was to annihilate all laws of social community, and reform the world de novo. The following is their code:

1. Annihilate the idea of a God, or there can be no freedom.
2. Annihilate the idea of right, which is only might.
3. Annihilate civilization, property, marriage, morality, and justice.
4. Let your own happiness be your own law.

Nihilo. Ex nihil nihil fit. From nothing comes nothing—i.e. every effect must have a cause. It was the dictum of Xenophonés, founder of the Elecic school (sixth century), to prove the eternity of matter. We now apply the phrase as equivalent to "You cannot get blood from a stone." You cannot expect clever work from one who has no brains.

When all is said, "deity" is an exception.

Nil Admirari. To be stolidly indifferent. Neither to wonder at anything, nor yet to admire anything.

Nil Desperandum. Never say die; never give up in despair.

Nile. The Egyptians used to say that the swelling of the Nile was caused by the tears of Isis. The feast of Isis was celebrated at the anniversary of the death of Osiris, when Isis was supposed to mourn for her husband. The hero of the Nile. Horatio, Lord Nelson (1758-1805).

Nill'ice or Sephal'ice. A plant in the blossoms of which the bees sleep.

Nimble as a Cat on a hot Bake-stone. In a great hurry to get away. The bake-stone in the north is a large stone on which bread and oat-cakes are baked.
Nimble as Ninepence. (See Ninepence.)

Nimbus characterises authority and power, not sanctity. The colour indicates the character of the person so invested:—The nimbus of the Trinity is gold; of angels, apostles, and the Virgin Mary, either red or white; of ordinary saints, violet; of Judas, black; of Satan, some very dark colour. The form is generally a circle or half-circle, but that of Dity is often triangular.

The nimbus was used by heathen nations long before painters introduced it into sacred pictures of saints, the Trinity, and the Virgin Mary. Prome-theus was represented with a nimbus, the Roman emperors were also decorated in the same manner, because they were dealt.

Nim'in Pimin. Affected simplicity. Lady Emily, in the Heroes, tells Miss Alscip the way to acquire the paphian Minim is to stand before a glass and keep pronouncing nimimi pimini. "The lips cannot fail to take the right pile." (General Burgoyne, iii. 2.)

This conceit has been borrowed by Charles Dickens in his Little Dorrit, where Mrs. General tells Amy Dorrit—"...sgive a pretty form to the lip. Papa, potatoes, poultry, prunes, and pimmin. You will find it serviceable if you say to yourself on entering a room, Papa, potatoes, poultry, prunes, and pimmin, pimmin, pimmin!"

Nimrod. "A mighty hunter before the Lord" (Gen. xx. 9), which the Tur-gum says means a "sinful hunting of the sons of men." Pope says of him, he was "a mighty hunter, and his prey was man;" so also Milton interprets the phrase. (Paradise Lost, xii. 21, etc.)

The legend is that the tomb of Nimrod still exists in Damascus, and that no dew ever "falleth" upon it, even though all its surroundings are saturated with it.

Nimrod. Any tyrant or devastating warrior.

Nimrod, in the Quarterly Review, is the nom-de-plume of Charles James Apperley, of Denbighshire, who was passionately fond of hunting. Mr. Pithman, the proprietor, kept for him a stud of hunters. His best productions are Thrasha, the Tart, and the Road. (1777-1843.)

Ninecompoop. A poor thing of a man. Said to be a corruption of the Latin non compos [mentis], but of this there is no evidence.

Nine. Nine, five, and three are mystical numbers—the diao'son, diapente, and diatirion of the Greeks. Nine consists of a trinity of trinities. According to the Pythagorean numbers, man is a full chord, or eight notes, and deity comes next. Three, being the trinity, represents a perfect unity; twice three is the perfect dual; and thrice three is the perfect plural. This explains the use of nine as a mystical number, and also as an exhaustive plural, and consequently no definite number, but a simple representative of plural perfection. (See Diapason.)

(1) Nine indicating perfection or completion:—

Doncalt's ark, made by the advice of Prometheus, was tossed about for nine days, when it stranded on the top of Mount Parnassus.

Rigged to the nines or Dressed up to the nines. To perfection from head to foot.

There are nine earths. Hela is goddess of the ninth. Milton speaks of "nine-enfolded spheres." (Ariadne.)

There are nine worlds in Annwn. There are nine heavens. (See Heavens.)

Gods. Macaulay makes Perseus swear by the nine gods. (See Nine Gods.)

There are nine orders of angels. (See Angels.)

There are the nine korvigan or fays of Armorica.

There were nine muses.

There were nine Gallicae or virgin priestesses of the ancient Gallic oracle. The serpents or Nagas of Southern Indian worship are nine in number.

There are nine worthies (q.r.); and nine worthies of London. (See Worthies.)

There were nine rivers of Jelt, according to classic mythology. Milton says the gates of hell are "thrice three-fold; three folds are brass, three iron, three of adamantine rock. They had nine folds, nine plates, and nine linings." (Paradise Lost, ii. 1645.)

Fallen angels. Milton says, when they were cast out of heaven, "Nine days they fell." (Paradise Lost, vi. 871.)

Vulcan, when kicked out of heaven, was nine days falling, and then lighted on the island Lemnos.

Nine as ninepence. (See Nine.)

(2) Examples of the use of nine as an exhaustive plural:—

Nine tailors make a man does not mean the number nine in the ordinary acceptation, but simply the plural of tailor without relation to number. As a tailor is not so robust and powerful as the ordinary run of men, it requires more than one to match a man. (See Tailors.)

A nine days' wonder is a wonder that lasts more than a day; here nine equals "several."
Nine Days' Wonder.

Witches. The weird sisters in Macbeth sang, as they danced round the cauldron, “Thrice to nine, and thrice again to make up nine,” and then declared, “the charm wound up.”

Writhing thread. Nine knots are made on black wool as a charm for a sprained ankle.

(4) Prominent examples:—

Niobe’s children lay nine days in their blood before they were buried.

Nine buttons of official rank in China.

Nine of Diamonds (q.e.) The curse of Scotland.

There are nine mandarins (q.v.).

According to the Ptolemaic system, there were seven planets, the Firmament of the First, and the Crystaline. Above these nine came the Primum Mobile or First Moved, and the Empyrean or abode of Deity.

The followers of Jula, a heterodox sect of the Hindus, believe all objects are classed under nine categories. (See Jainas.)

Shakespeare speaks of the “ninth part of a hair.”

“T’ll cavil on the ninth part of a hair.”

_1 Hen. IV., in I._

Nine. To look nine ways. To squint.

Nine. The superlatives of superlatives in Eastern estimation. It is by unities that Eastern presents are given when the donor wishes to extend his bounty to the highest pitch of munificence.

“He [Makainos] caused himself to be preceded by nine supercanals. The first was laden with nine sets of gold or silver; the second bore 9 sabres, the hilt and scabbards of which were adorned with diamonds; upon the third came 9 sets of armure; the fourth had 9 suits of horse furniture; the fifth had 9 cases full of rubies, the sixth 9 cases full of rubies; the seventh, 9 cases full of emerald, the eighth had 9 cases full of anethyrics, and the ninth had 9 cases full of diamonds.” Claude de Lavins, Oriental Tales.

Nine Crosses. Altar crosses, procession crosses, roods on lofts, pilgram crosses, consecration crosses, marking crosses, pectoral crosses, spire crosses, and crosses pendent over altars. (See Glossary of Ecclesiastical Ornaments.)

Nine Crowns. (See Crowns.)

Nine Days’ Wonder (4). Something that causes a great sensation for a few days, and then passes into the limbo of things forgotten. In Bohn’s Handbook of Proverbs we have “A wonder lasts nine days, and then the puppy’s eyes are open,” alluding to cats and dogs, which are born blind. As much as to say, the eyes of the public are blind in astonishment for nine days, but then their eyes are open, and they see too much to wonder any longer.

"King: You'd think it strange if I should marry her.

Glimmer: That would be ten days' wonder, at the least.

King: That's a day longer than a wonder lasts." Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI., iii. 2.

Nine Gods (The). (1) Of the Etruscans: Juno, Minerva, and Tinia (the three chief); the other six were Vulcan, Mars, and Saturn, Hercules, Summanus, and Vei.ius.

"Lars Porsenn of Clusium
By the nine gods he swore
That the great house of Tarquin
Should suffer wrong no more."

Macaulay: Lay of Ancient Rome (Horatius, i.).

(2) Of the Sabines (2 syll.). Hercules, Romulus, Esculapius, Bacchus. Æneas, Vesta, Santa, Fortuna, and Eudes.

Nine Points of the Law. Success in a law-suit requires (1) a good deal of money; (2) a good deal of patience; (3) a good cause; (4) a good lawyer; (5) a good counsel; (6) good witnesses; (7) a good jury; (8) a good judge; and (9) good luck.

Nine Spheres (The). Milton, in his Arcades, speaks of the "celestial spheres' harmony that sit upon the nine enfolded spheres." The nine spheres are those of the Moon, of Mercury, of Venus, of the Sun, of Mars, of Jupiter, of Saturn, of the Firmament, and of the Crystaline. Above these nine heavens or spheres come the Primum Mobile, and then the Heaven of the heavens, or abode of Deity and His angels.

The earth was supposed to be in the centre of this system.

"Nine worthies were they called, of different rites—
Three Jews, three pagans, and three Christian knights."

Dryden: The Flower and the Leaf.

Nine worthies (privy councillors to William III.):—

Whigs: Devonshire, Dorset, Monmouth, and Edward Russell.

Tories: Caerarthen, Pembroke, Nottingham, Marlborough, and Lowther.

Nine worthies of London. (See Worthies.)

Ninepence. Nimble as ninepence. Silver ninepences were common till the year 1696, when all unmilled coin was called in. These ninepences were very pliable or nimble, and, being bent, were given as love tokens, the usual formula of presentation being To my love, from my love. (See Nice as Ninepence.)

Ninepenny. (St.). The apostle of the Picts (fourth and fifth centuries).

Ninon de l'Enclos, noted for her beauty, wit, and gaiety. She had two natural sons, one of whom fell in love with her, and blew out his brains when he discovered the relationship. (1615-1706.)

Ni'mus. Son of Belus, husband of Semir'amis, and the reputed builder of Nineveh.

Niobe (3 syll.). The personification of female sorrow. According to Grocian fable, Niobe was the mother of twelve children, and taunted Lato'na because she had only two—namely, Apollo and Diana. Lato'na commanded her children to avenge the insult, and they caused all the sons and daughters of Niobe to die. Niobe was inconsolable, went herself to death, and was changed into a stone, from which ran water. "Like Niobe, all tears" (Hamlet.)

The group of Niobe and her children, in Florence, was discovered at Rome in 1583, and was the work either of Scopas or Praxitêlos.

The Niobe of nations. So Lord Byron styles Rome, the "lone mother of dead empires," with "broken thrones and temples," a "chaos of ruins," a "desert where we steer stumbling o'er recollections." (Childe Harold, canto iv. stanza 79.)

Niord. The Scandinavian sea-god. He was not one of the Æsir. Niord's son was Frey (the fairy of the clouds), and his daughter was Freyja. His home was Noatun. Niord was not a sea-god, like Neptune, but the Spirit of water and air. The Scandinavian Neptune was Ægir, whose wife was Skadi.

Nip (A). As a "nip of whisky," a "nip of brandy," "just a nip." A nipperkin was a small measure. (Dutch, nippen, a sip.)

Nip-cheese or Nip-farthings. A miser, who nips or pinches closely his cheese and farthings. (Dutch, nippen.)
Nipperkin. A small wine and beer measure. Now called a "nip."

"His hawk-economy won't thank him for; Which stops his petty nipperkin of port."

Peter Pindar: Hour Powder.

Nirvāṇa. Annihilation, or rather the final deliverance of the soul from transmigration (in Buddhism). Sanskrit, nir, out; eda, blow. (See Gautama.)

Nishapour and Tous. Mountains in Khorassan where turquoises are found.

Nisi Prius. A Nisi Case, a cause to be tried in the assize courts. Sittings at Nisi Prius, sessions of Nisi Prius Courts, which never try criminal cases. Trial at Nisi, a trial before judge of assize. An action at one time could be tried only in the court where it was brought, but Magna Charta provided that certain cases, instead of being tried at Westminster in the superior courts, should be tried in their proper counties before judges of assize. The words "Nisi Prius" are two words on which the following clause attached to the writs entirely hinges: — "We command you to come before our justices at Westminster on the morrow of All Souls', NISI PRIUS justiciarii domini regis ad assisaps capiendavenerint — i.e. unless previously the justices of our lord the king come to hold their assizes at (the court of your own assize town)."

Nis'roch. An idol of the Ninevites represented in their sculptures with a hawk's head. The word means Great Eagle.

Nis. One of the attendants of Queen Mab.

Nitouche (St.) or Mie Touche (Touch-me-not). A hypocrite, a demure-looking pharisee. The French say, Faire la Sainte Nitouche, to pretend to great sanctity, or look as if butter would not melt in your mouth.

"It is certainly difficult to believe hard things of a woman who looks like St. Nitouche in profile." — J. O. Hobbs: Some Knottons and a Moral, chap. iii.

Nix (mas.), Nixie (fem.). Kind busy-body. Little creatures not unlike the Scotch brownie and German kobold. They wear a red cap, and are ever ready to lend a helping hand to the industrious and thrifty. (See NICK.)

*Like a red-faced Nixon." — Pickwick.

Nizam'. A title of sovereignty in Hyderabad (India), derived from Nizam-ul-mulk (regulator of the state), who obtained possession of the Deccan at the beginning of the 18th century. The name Cesar was by the Romans used precisely in the same manner, and has descended to the present hour in the form of Kaiser (of the German Empire).
Nob (The). The head. For knob.

Nob of the First Water (A). A mighty boss; a grand panjandrum (q.v.). First water refers to diamonds. (See Diamonds.) Nobes and Snobs. Nobles and pseudo-nobles. (See Nob, Snob.)

Noble. An ancient coin, so called on account of the superior excellency of its gold. Nobles were originally disposed of as a reward for good news, or important service done. Edward III. was the first who coined rose nobles (q.v.), and gave 100 of them to Godin Agace of Picardy, for showing him a ford across the river Somme, when he wanted to join his army.

The Noble. Charles III. of Navarro (1361-1425). Soliman Tekelb, Turkish prince at Adrianople (died 1410).

Noble Soul. The surname given to Khosrâd I., the greatest monarch of the Sassanian dynasty. (* 531-579.)

Noblesse Oblige (French). Noble birth imposes the obligation of high-minded principles and noble actions.

Noctes Ambrosianae. While Lockhart was writing Vade Rims, he was in the habit of taking walks with Professor Wilson every morning, and of supping with Blackwood at Ambrose's, a small tavern in Edinburgh. One night Lockhart said, "What a pity there has not been a short-hand writer here to take down all the good things that have been said!" and next day he produced a paper from memory, and called it Noctes Ambrosianae. That was the first of the series. The part ascribed to Hoggs, the Ettrick Shepherd, is purely suppositive.

Nocturnas Athenae Ferrae. To carry coals to Newcastle. Athens abounded with oaks, and Minerva was therefore symbolised by an owl. To send ovals to Athens would be wasteful and extravagant excess.

Nod. A nod is as good as a wink to a blind horse. Whether you nod or whether you wink, if a horse is blind he knows it not; and a person who will not see takes no notice of hints and signs. The common use of the phrase, however, is the contrary meaning, viz. "I twig your meaning, though you speak darkly of what you purpose, but mum's the word!"

"A nod is as good as a wink to a blind horse; and there are certain understandings, in public as well as in private life, which it is better for all parties not to put into writing."—The Nineteenth Century (July, 1885, p. 9).

Nod (The Land of). (See Land of Nod.)

Noddy. A Tom Noddy is a very foolish or half-witted person, "a noodle." The marine birds called Noddies are so silly that anyone can go up to them and knock them down with a stick. A donkey is called a Noddy Noddy.

"Minshew has a capital guess derivation, well fitted for a Dictionary of Fable. He says, "Noddy, a fool, so called because he nods his head when he ought to speak." Just as well derive wise-man from why, because he wants to know the why of everything.

Nodel. The lion in the beast-epic called Reynard the Fox. Nodel represents the regal element of Germany; Isengrim, the wolf, represents the baronial element; and Reynard represents the church element.

Noel. Christmas day, or a Christmas carol. A contraction of nouvelles (tidings), written in old English, newells.

("A child this day was born, A child of high renown, Most worthy of a sceptre, A sceptre and a crown, Nowells, nowells, nowells! Sing all we may, Because that Christ, the King, Was born this blessed day.")—Old Carols.

Noko'mis. Daughter of the Moon. Sporting one day with her maidens on a swing made of vine canes, a rival cut the swing, and Nokomis fell to earth, where she gave birth to a daughter named Weno'nah.

Nolens Volens. Whether willing or not. Two Latin participles meaning "being unwilling (or) willing."

Noil me Tangere. Touch me not. The words Christ used to Mary Magdalene after His resurrection. It is the motto of the Order of the Thistle. A plant of the genus Strepotens. The seed-vessels consist of one cell in five divisions, and when the seed is ripe each of these, on being touched, suddenly folds itself into a spiral form and leaps from the stalk. (See Darwin : Loves of the Plants, ii. 3.)

Noll. Old Noll. Oliver Cromwell was so called by the Royalists. Noll is a familiar contraction of Oliver—i.e. Ol’ with an initial liquid.

Nolle Prossequi [Don't prosecute]. A petition from a plaintiff to stay a suit. (See Non Pros.)
Nolo Episcopari

[Nolo Episcopari. [I am unwilling to accept the office of bishop.] A very general notion prevails that every bishop at consecration uses these words. Mr. Christian, in his notes to Blackstone, says, "The origin of these words and of this vulgar notion I have not been able to discover; the bishops certainly give no such refusal at present, and I am inclined to think they never did at any time in this country." When the see of Bath and Wells was offered to Beveridge, he certainly exclaimed, "Nolo episcopari;" but it was the private expression of his own heart, and not a form of words, in his case. Chamberlayne says in former times the person about to be elected bishop modestly refused the office twice, and if he did so a third time his refusal was accepted. (Present State of England.)

Nom. "Nom de guerre" is French for a "war name," but really means an assumed name. It was customary at one time for everyone who entered the French army to assume a name; this was especially the case in the times of chivalry, when knights went by the device of their shields or some other distinctive character in their armour, as the "Red-cross Knight."

"Nom de plume." English-French for the "pen name," and meaning the name assumed by a writer who does not choose to give his own name to the public; as Pierre Puinder, the "nom de plume" of Dr. John Wolcot; Peter Parly, of Mr. Goodrich; Correy Bell, of Charlotte Brontë; Cuthbert Bede, of the Rev. Edward Bradley, etc.

Nom'ads. Wanderers who live in tents; pastoral tribes without fixed residence. (Greek, nomadés: from nomos, a pasture.)

Nom'inalists. A sect founded by Roscelin, Canon of Compiègne (1040-1120). He maintained that if the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are one God, they cannot be three distinct persons, but must be three simply names of the same being; just as father, son, and husband are three distinct names of one and the same man under different conditions. Abclard, William Occam, Buridan, Hobbes, Locke, Bishop Berkeley, Condillac, and Dugald Stewart are the most celebrated disciples of Roscelin. (See Realists.)

Non Angli sed Angeli, si forent Christiani. Words attributed to Gregory (the Great) in 573 when some British children reduced to slavery were shown him at Rome. Gregory was at the time about thirty-five years of age, and was both abbot and cardinal-deacon.

Non Bis in Idem (Latin). Not twice for the same thing — i.e., no man can be tried a second time on the same charge.

Non Compos Mentis or Non Com. Not of sound mind; a lunatic, idiot, drunkard, or one who has lost memory and understanding by accident or disease.

Non Con. (See Nonconformist.)

Non Est. A contraction of Non est inventus (not to be found). They are the words which the sheriff writes on a writ when the defendant is not to be found in his bailiwick.

Non mi Recordo, a shuffling way of saying "I don't choose to answer that question." It was the usual answer of the Italian courier and other Italian witnesses when on examination at the trial of Queen Caroline, wife of George IV., in 1820.

"The Italian witnesses often created amusement, when under examination, by the frequent answer, "Non mi recordo."—Cavaliè's History of England, vol. vii, iv, 10.

Non Plus ("no more" can be said on the subject). When a man is come to a non-plus in an argument, it means that he is unable to deny or controvert what is advanced against him. "To non-plus" a person is to put him into such a fix.

Non Pros. for Non pros'equi (not to prosecute). The judgment of Non pros is one for costs, when the plaintiff stays a suit.

Non Sequitur (A). A conclusion which does not follow from the premises stated.

"The name began with B and ended with G. Perhaps it was Widers." — Dunkens: Nicholas Nickleby, p. 135.

Nonese. For the noner. A corruption of for them ans (for them once), meaning for this once. "An apron" for a naperon is an example of n transferred the other way. We have some half-dozen similar examples in the language, as "tither day" — i.e. the other or that other = the other. Nuncle used in King Lear, which was originally nuncele. An arrant knife is a narrant knave. (See Nae.)
Noneconformists. The 2,000 clergy-men who, in 1662, left the Church of England, rather than conform or submit to the conditions of the Act of Uniformity—i.e., "unfeigned assent to all and everything contained in the Book of Common Prayer." The word is loosely used for Dissenters generally.

Nones (1 syl.), in the Roman calendar.

On March the 7th, June, July,
October too, the Nones you say;
Except in these, those Nones appear
On the 5th day of all the year.
If to the Nones you add an
Of every like you’ll find the date.

Nouns. Those clergymen who refused to take the oath of allegiance to the new government after the Revolution. They were Archbishop Sancroft with eight other bishops, and four hundred clergymen, all of whom were ejected from their livings. (1691.)

Nonne Prestes Tale. A thirsty widow had a cock, "right Chaunteclere," who had his harem; but "damyset Peritlote" was his favourite, who perched beside him at night. Chaunteclere once dreamt that he saw a fox who "tried to make arrest on his body," but Peritlote chided him for placing faith in dreams. Next day a fox came into the poultry-yard, but told Chaunteclere he merely came to hear him sing, for his voice was so ravishing he could not deny himself that pleasure. The cock, pleased with this flattery, shut his eyes and began to crow most lustily, when Dan Russell seized him by the throat and ran off with him. When they got to the wood, the cock said to the fox, "I should advise you to eat me, and that anon," "It shall be done," said the fox, but as he loosed the cock's neck to speak the word, Chaunteclere flew from his back into a tree. Presently came a hue and cry after the fox, who escaped with difficulty, and Chaunteclere returned to the poultry-yard wiser and discreetor for his adventure. (Chaucer: Canterbury Tales.)

This tale is taken from the old French "Roman de Renart." The same story forms also one of the fables of Marie of France, "Don Coe et Don Werpit."

Nor. The giant, father of Night. He dwelt in Utgard. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Norfolk. The folk north of Kent, Essex, and Suffolk.

Norfolk Street (Strand), with Arundel, Surrey, and Howard Streets, were the site of the house and grounds of the Bishop of Bath and Wells, then of the Lord High Admiral Seymour, and afterwards of the Howards, Earls of Arundel and Surrey, from whom it came into the possession of the Earl of Norfolk.

Norma. A vestal priestess who has been seduced. She discovers her paramour in an attempt to seduce her friend, also a vestal priestess, and in despair contemplates the murder of her base-born children. The libretto is a melodrama by Romani, music by Bellini (1831.) (Norma, an opera.)

Normandy. The Poles are the vintagers in Normandy. The Norman vintage consists of apples beaten down by poles. The French say, "En Normandie l'on vendange avec la gaule," where gaule is a play on the word Gaul, but really means a pole.

The Gem of Normandy, Emma, daughter of Richard I. (*-1052.)

Norna. The well of Urda, where the gods sit in judgment, and near which is that "fair building" whence proceed the three maidens called Urda, Verandil, and Skulda (Past, Present, and Future). (Scandinavian mythology.)

Norna of the Fitful Head. A character in Sir Walter Scott's Private, to illustrate that singular kind of insanity which is ingenious in self-imposition, as those who fancy a lunatic asylum their own palace, the employes thereof their retinue, and the porridge provided a banquet fit for the gods. Norna's real name was Ulla Troil, but after her amour with Basil Mortoun (Vaughan), and the birth of a son, named Clement Cleveland, she changed her name out of shame. Towards the end of the novel she gradually recovered her right mind.

Nornir or Norns. The three fates of Scandinavian mythology, Past, Present, and Future. They spin the events of human life sitting under the ash-tree Yggdrasil (Igg'dra-sil).

* Besides these three Norns, every human creature has a personal Norn or Fate. The home of the Norns is called in Scandinavian mythology "Doom-stead."

Norrisian Professor. A Professor of Divinity in Cambridge University
Norroy

This professorship was founded in 1760 by John Norris, Esq., of Whilton in Norfolk. The four divinity professors are Lady Margaret's Professor of Divinity, Regius Professor of Divinity, Norrison Professor, and Hulsean Professor.

Norroy. North-roy or king. The third king-of-arms is so called, because his office is on the north side of the river Trent; that of the south side is called Clarencieux (q. v.).

Norte. Violent northern gales, which visit the Gulf of Mexico from September to March. In March they attain their maximum force, and then immediately cease. (Spanish, northe, the north.)

North (Christopher). A sum-de-plume of Professor Wilson, of Gloucester Place, Edinburgh, one of the chief contributors to Blackwood's Magazine.

North. He's too far north for me. Too canny, too cunning to be taken in; very hard in making a bargain. The inhabitants of Yorkshire are supposed to be very canny, especially in driving a bargain.

North-east Passage (The). A way to India from Europe round the north extremity of Asia. It had been often attempted even in the 16th century. Hence Beaumont and Fletcher:

"That everlasting casock, that has worn
As many servants out as the North-east Passage
Has consumed sailors."

The Tamer Tamed, ii. 2.

North Side of the Altar (The). The side on which the Gospel is read. The north is the dark part of the earth, and the Gospel is the light of the world, which shineth in darkness—"Illuminare his quin in fenestras et umbra mortis intent." Facing the altar from the body of the church, the north side is on your left.

North Side of a Churchyard. The poor have a great objection to be buried on the north side of a churchyard. They seem to think only evil-doers should be there interred. Probably the chief reason is the want of sun. On the north side of Glasgow cathedral is shown the hangman's burial place.

There is, however, an ecclesiastical reason:—The east is God's side, where His throne is set; the west, man's side, the Galilee of the Gentiles; the south, the side of the "spirits made just" and angels, where the sun shines in his strength; the north, the devil's side, where Satan and his legion lurk to catch the unwary. Some churches have still a "devil's door" in the north wall, which is opened at baptisms and communications to let the devil out.

"As men die, so shall they arise: if in faith in the Lord, both to the south . . . and shall arise in glory; if in unbelief . . . towards the north, then are they past all hope."—Coverdale: Praying for the Dead.

Northamptonshire Poet. John Clare, son of a farmer at Halstone. (1793-1864.)

Northern Bear. Russia.

Northern Gate of the Sun. The sign of Cancer, or summer solstice; so called because it marks the northern tropic.

Northern Lights. The Auro'ra Borealis, ascribed by the northern savages to the merriment of the ghosts. (See Aurora.)

Northern Wagoner (The). Ursa Major, called "Charles's wain," or wagon. The constellation contains seven large stars. "King Charles's Wain" is absurd. "Charles's Wain" is a blunder for the "Crulisor Peasants' Wain."

"By this the northern wagoner has set
His sevenfold train behind the medias star [the pole-star]."—Spenser: Faerie Queene, i. 2.

Norse. An aged peasant and his son in Home's tragedy of Douglas.

Norway (Maid of). Margaret, infant queen of Scotland. She was the daughter of Eric II., King of Norway, and Margaret, daughter of Alexander III. of Scotland. She never actually reigned, as she died on her passage to Scotland in 1290.

Nose. Bleeding of the nose. Sign of love.

"But did my nose ever bleed when I was in your company? and, poor wretch, just as she spoke thus, to show her true heart, her nose fell a-bleeding."—Bouler: Lectures, p. 120.

Bleeding of the nose. Grose says if it bleeds some drop only if it forebodes sickness, if three drops the omen is still worse; but Melton, in his Astrologaster, says, "If a man's nose bleeds one drop at the left nostril it is a sign of good luck, and vice versa."

Led by the nose. Isaiah xxxvii. 9 says, "Because thy rage against Me . . . is come up into Mine ears, therefore will I put My hook in thy nose . . . and will turn thee back . . . ." Horses, asses, etc., led by bit and bridle, are led by the nose. Hence Inigo says of Othello, he was "led by the nose as asses are" (i. 3). But buffaloes, camels, and bears are actually led by a ring inserted into their nostrils.
Golden nose. Tycho Brahe, the Danish astronomer. Having lost his nose in a duel with Passberg, he adopted a golden one, which he attached to his face by a cement which he carried about with him.

"That eminent man who had a golden nose, Tycho Brahe."—Marriott: Jutland and the Danish Isles, p. 326.

General Zetelaus, having lost his right hand in battle, had a golden one given him by Boleslaus III.

To count noses. To count the numbers of a division. It is a horse-dealer's term, who counts horses by the nose, for the sake of convenience. Thus the Times, comparing the House of Commons to Tattersall's, says, "Such is the counting of noses upon a question which lies at the basis of our constitution."

To cut off your nose to spite your face, or... to be revenged on your face. To act out of pique in such a way as to injure yourself: as to run away from home, to marry out of pique, to throw up a good situation in a fit of ill temper, etc., or any similar folly.

To keep one's nose to the grind-stone. To keep one hard at work. "Tools, such as gentry, chisels, etc., are constantly sharpened on a stone or with a grind-stone. The nose of a stair is the edge, and "nose" in numerous phrases stands for the person's self. In French nez is so used in some phrases.

"From this... he kept full nose to the grind-stone."—A. H. Tits, Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 236.

Paying through the nose. Grimm says that Odin had a poll-tax which was called in Sweden a nose-tax: it was a penny per nose or poll. (Deutsche Rechts-Alterthümer.) (See Nose Tax, Rhino.) To snap one's nose off. To speak snappishly. "Ready to snap one's nose off."

To "pull (or wring) the nose," tirer or arrache le nez is to affront by an act of indignity; to snap one's nose is to affront by speech. Fighting dogs snap at each other's noses.

To wipe [one's] nose. To affront a person; to give one a blow on the nose. Similarly, to wipe a person's eye; to fetch one a wipe over the knuckles, etc., connected with the Anglo-Saxon verb hecwynn, to whip, to strike (our whip).

"She was so nose-wipt, slighted, and disdained."—Nevil's Glossary, p. 619.

"To wipe off a score," "to wipe a person down," meaning to cajole or pacify; from the Anglo-Saxon wipian, to wipe, cleanse. Hence to fice one out of his money. Quite another verb to that given above.

To take pepper in the nose. To take offence.

"A man is testy, and anger wrinkles his nose; such a man takes pepper in the nose."—Optick Glasses of Humors (1690).

To turn up one's nose. To express contempt. When a person sneers he turns up the nose by curling the upper lip.

Under your [very] nose. This is French also: "Au nez et à la bavette de quelqu'un" ("Just before your face"). Nose = face in numerous locations, both in French and English: as, "Monter son nez;" " REGARDER quelqu'un sous le nez;" "Mettre le nez à la fenêtre, etc.

Nose-bag (A). A visitor to a house of refreshment who brings his own victuals and calls for a glass of water or lemonade. The reference is to carrying the food of a horse in a nose-bag to save expense.

Nose Literature.

"Knows he, that never took a pinch. Nosey, the pleasure there's that flows? Knows he the titillating joy Which my nose knows? Or nose, I am as proud of thee As any mountain of its knows, Imon on thee, and feel that pride A Roman knows."—L. Hymne und, translated from the French of T. Routelin.

Chapter on Noses, in Tristram Shandy, by L. Sterne.

On the Dignity, Gravity, and Authority of Noses, by Tagliacozzi or Tagliacozzo (1597).

Of Virginity (sec. 77). A chapter in Kornmann.

The Noses of Adam and Eve by Mlle. Bourignon.

Ponsa Meditations on the Nose of the Virgin Mary, by J. Petit.

Review of Noses (Louis Brevitatis), by Théophile Raynaud.

Sermon on Noses (La Incrivale du Nez), by Anibal Carr (1854).

Nose Tax (Thr). In the ninth century the Danes imposed on Irish houses a poll tax, historically called the "Nose Tax," because those who neglected to pay the ounce of gold were punished by having their nose slit.

Nose of Wax (A). Movable and accommodating (faith). A waxen nose may be twisted any way.

"Sec addunt etiam simile quoddam non antiquissimum: Eo esse quoddammodo nunc summae, nam ex eo, verum in onerem mode, et quantum instituto invenire — Joella Apollon. Exc. et alii., sec. 6.

Nose Out of Joint. To put one's nose out of joint is to supplant a person in another's good graces. To put another person's nose where yours is now. There is a good French locution, "Lui couper l’herbe sous le pied." (In Latin, "Aliquem de jure suo dejecere") Sometimes it means to humble a conceived person.

"Fearing now that this wench which is brought over thither should put your nose out the juynt, comming between home and you."—Terence in English (1814).

Noisy. The Duke of Wellington was lovingly so called by the soldiery. His "commander’s nose" was a very distinguishing feature of the Iron Duke.

Nos’mot-Bo’cal [Bo’-ky]. Prince of Purgatory. Purgatory is the "realm of Nosmot-Bocai."

"Sir, I last night received command to see you out of Fairy land, into the realm of Nosmot-Bocai."

But let not fear of sulphur cheek ye, For he’s a head of sense and wit."—King: Orpheus and Euridice.

Nostradamus (Michael). An astrologer who published an annual "Almanack," very similar in character to that of "Francis Moore," and a Rerum of Prophecies, in four-line stanzas, extending over seven centuries. (1503–1566.)

The Nostradamus of Portugal, Goucal Annos Bandarra, a poet-cobbler, whose lucubrations were stopped by the Inquisition. (Died 1550.)

As good a prophet as Nostradamus—i.e., so obscure that none can make out your meaning. Nostradamus was a provincial astrologer of the sixteenth century, who has left a number of prophecies in verse, but what they mean no one has yet been able to discover. (French proverb.)

Nostrum means Our own. It is applied to a quack medicine, the ingredients of which are supposed to be a secret of the compounders. (Latin.)

Not. in riding and driving.

"I’m a hill hurry not.
Down a hill hurry not,
On level ground spare him not."

On a Milestone in Yorkshire (near Richmond).

Not at Home. Scipio Nasica was intimate with the poet Ennius. One day, calling on the poet, the servant said, "Ennius is not at home," but Nasica could see him plainly in the house. Well, he simply walked away without a word. A few days later Ennius returned the visit, and Nasica called out, "Not at home." Ennius instantly recognised the voice, and demonstrated, "You are a nice fellow" (said Nasica); "why, I believed your slave, and you won’t believe me."

This tale is often attributed to Dean Swift, but, if authentic, it was a borrowed not.

Not Worth a Rap. (See Rap.)

Not Worth a Rush. (See Rush.)

Not Worth a Straw. (See Straw.)

Not Worth Your Salt. Not worth your wages. The Romans served out rations of salt and other necessaries to their soldiers and civil servants. These rations were called by the general name of salt (sad), and when money was substituted for these rations, the stipend went by the name of sal-arium.

Notables (in French history). An assembly of nobles or notable men, selected by the king, of the House of Vals, to form a parliament. They were convened in 1626 by Richelieu, and not again till 1787 (a hundred and sixty years afterwards), when Louis XVI. called them together with the view of relieving the nation of some of its pecuniary embarrassments. The last time they ever assembled was November 6th, 1786.

Notary Public. A law officer whose duty it is to attest deeds, to make authentic copies of documents, to make protests of bills, and to act as a legal witness of any formal act of public concern.

Note of Hand (A). A promise to pay made in writing and duly signed.

Noting. Out of all notch. Out of all bounds. The allusion is to the practice of fitting timber: the piece which is to receive the other is notched upon; the one to fit into the notch is said to be notched down.

Notoriety. Depraved taste for notoriety:—
Clas'mbros'tos, who leaped into the sea. (See CLEOMBROS)
Emped'ocles, who leaped into Etna. (See EMPEDOCLES)
Heros'traxos, who set fire to the temple of Diana. (See DIANA)
William Lloyd, who broke in pieces the Portland vase. (1845)
Jonathan Martin, who set fire to York Minster. (1829)

Nottingham (Saxon, Nottingeham, place of caves). So called from the caverns in the soft sandstone rock. Montecute took King Edward III. through these subterranean passages to the hill castle, where he found the "gentle Mortimer" and Isabella, the dowager-queen. The former was slain, and the latter imprisoned. The passage is still called "Mortimer's Hole."

Nottingham Lambs. The roughs of Nottingham.

Nourmahal. Sultana. The word means Light of the Harem. She was afterwards called Nourjehan (Light of the World). In Lalla Rookh, the tale called The Light of the Harem is this: Nourmahal was estranged for a time from the love of Selim, son of Achar. By the advice of Namou'nna, she prepares a love-spell, and appears as a lute-player at a banquet given by "the imperial Selim." At the close of the feast she tries the power of song, and the young sultan exclaims, "If Nourmahal had sung those strains I could forgive her all!" whereupon the sultana threw off her mask, Selim "caught her to his heart," and, as Nourmahal rested her head on Selim's arm, "she whispers him, with laughing eyes, 'Remember, love, the Feast of Roses.'" (Thomas Moore)

Nous (1 syl.). Genius, natural acumen, quick perception, ready wit. The Platonists used the word for mind, or the first cause. (Greek, nous, contraction of nostos. Pronounce noo'z.)

Nous Avons Changé Tout Cela. A facetious reproof to a dogmatic prig who wants to lay down the law upon everything, and talks contemptuously of old customs, old authors, old artists, and old everything. The phrase is taken from Mollière's Médecin Malgré Lui, act ii. sc. vi. (1666).

"Déroute. Il n'y a qu'une chose qui m'a choquée; c'est l'endroit du feu et du cœur. Il me semble que vous les places autrement qu'ils ne sont; que le cœur est du côté gauche et le feu du côté droit.

Sponsale. Oui; cela est tout autrefois; mais nous avons changé tout cela, et nous faisons maintenant la médecine d'une manière toute nouvelle.

"Déroute. C'est ce que je ne savois pas, et je vous demande pardon de mon ignorance."

Novatians. Followers of Novatia'nus, a presbyter of Rome in the third century, who would never allow anyone who had lapsed to be readmitted into the church.

November 17. (See Queen's Day.)

Novum Or'ganum. The great work of Lord Bacon.

Now-a-days. A corruption of Incur-days, F' now days. (See Apron, Nag, Nickname, Nugget etc.)

Now-now. Old Anthony Now-now. An itinerant fiddler, meant for Anthony Munday, the dramatist who wrote City Pages. (Chettle: Kindhart's Dream, 1592.)

Nowhereus (2 syl.). (See Meda'moth.)

Noyades (2 syl.). A means of execution adopted by Carrier at Nantes, in the first French Revolution, and called Carrier's Vertical Deportation. Some 150 persons being stowed in the hold of a vessel in the Loire, the vessel was scuttled, and the victims drowned. Nero, at the suggestion of Anic'tus, Nucu, or miraculous drop which falls in Egypt on St. John's day (June), is supposed to have the effect of stopping the plague. Thomas Moore refers to it in his Paradise and the Peri.

Nude. Rabelais wittily says that a person without clothing is dressed in "grey and cold" of a comical cut, being "nothing before, nothing behind, and sleeves of the same." King Shrovetide, monarch of Suesuk Island, was so arrayed. (Rabelais: Gargantua, iv. 23.)

The nude statues of Paris are said to be draped in "cerulean blue."

Nugget of Gold. Nugget, a diminutive of nug or nog, as logget is of log. "A nug of sugar" (Scotch) is a lump, and a "nugget of gold" is a small lump. So a "log of wood" is a billet (Latin, lignum), and "loggers" (Norfolk) are sticks of toffy cut up into small lumps.

A correspondent in Notes and Queries says nog is a wooden ball used in the game of shinner. Nog, in Essex, means a "piece;" and a noggin of brand means a hunch.

Nulla Linea. (See Line.)

Nulli Secundus Club. The Coldstream Guards.

Numa. The second king of Rome, who reduced the infant state to order by wise laws.

Numa'sia. A tragedy by Cervantes, author of Don Quixote, but never published in his lifetime.

Number Nip. The gnome king of the Giant Mountains. (Motions: Popular Tales.)

"She was like one of those petty dwellers in Number Nine's secret of metamorphose and tur- mids."—Le Pans: The House in the Churchyard, p. 182.

Number One. Oneself.

To take care of number one, is to look after oneself, to seek one's own interest; to be selfish.

Number of the Beast. "It is the number of a man, and his number is six hundred threescore and six" (Rev. xiii. 18). This number has been applied to divers persons previously assumed to be Antichrist; as Apostates, Benedictos, Diosctian, Evanthus, Julian (the Apostate), Lampetia, Lateinco, Luther, Mahomet, Mysterium, Napoleon L., Nistias, Paul V., Silvester II., Trajan, and several others. Also to certain phrases supposed to be descriptive of the Man of Sin, as Vicar General of God, Armoume (I renounce), Kako Odeagos (bad guide), Abinu Kadescha Paps (our holy father the pope), e.g.:—

Numbers (from 1 to 13), theological symbols:

(1) The Unity of God.
(2) The hypostatic union of Christ, both God and man.
(3) The Trinity.
(4) The number of the Evangelists.
(5) The wounds of the Redeemer; two hands and two feet, one in the side.
(6) The creative week.
(7) The gifts of the Holy Ghost (Rev. i. 12).
(8) Seven times Christ spoke on the cross.
(9) The number of the beast in the Apocalypse (Rev. xiii. 18).
(10) The nine orders of angels (q.v.)
(11) The number of the apostles who remained faithful.
(12) The original college.
(13) The final number after the conversion of Paul.
Host of men.
House of senators.
Legion of "foul fiends."
Library of books.
Litter of pigs, whelps, etc.
Menagerie of wild beasts.
Mob of roughs, wild cattle, etc.
Multitude of men. In law, more than ten.
Muster of peacocks.
Mute of hounds.
Nest of rabbits, ants, etc.; shelves, etc.
Nursery of trees, shrubs, etc.
Pack of hounds, playing cards, grousé, etc.
Panel of jurymen.
Pile of meats, etc.
Pile of books, wood stacked, etc.
Posse (a show't); Posse (2 syl.).
Pride of lions.
Rabble of men ill-bred and ill-clad.

String of horses.
Stud of mares.
Suit of clothes.
Sute of rooms.
Swarm of bees, locusts, etc.
Take of fish.
Team of oxen, horses, etc.
Tribe of goats.

Numbers. Odd Numbers. "Numero Deus impare gaudeat" (Virgil: Eclogues, viii. 75). Three indicates the "beginning, middle, and end." The Godhead has three persons; so in classic mythology Hecate had threefold power: Jove's symbol was a triple thunderbolt. Neptune's a sea-trident, Pluto's a three-headed dog: the Fates were three, the Furies three, the Graces three, the Horae three; the Muses three—times three. There are seven stars, nine planets, nine orders of angels, seven days a week, thirteen lunar months, or 365 days a year, etc.; five senses, five fingers on the hand and toes on the foot, five vowels, five conveniats, etc. A volume might be filled with illustrations of the saying that "the gods delight in odd numbers." (See Odd, Nine.)

Numbers. Pythagoras looked on numbers as influential principles.
1 is Unity, and represents Deity, which has no parts.
3 is Diversity, and therefore disorder.
The principle of strife and all evil.
5 is Perfect Harmony, or the union of unity and diversity.
4 is Perfection. It is the first square (2 x 2 = 4).
5 is the prevailing number in Nature and Art.
2 is Justice (Perfect Harmony being 3, which multiplied by Trinity = 6).
7 is the climacteric number in all diseases. Called the Medical Number (2 syl.).

2. The Romans dedicated the second month to Pluto, and the second day of the month to the Muses. They believed it to be the most fatal number of all.

8 and 6 are omitted, not being prime numbers; 4 is the multiple of 2, and 12 is the multiple of 3.

Numerals. All our numerals and ordinals up to a million (with one exception) are Anglo-Saxon. The one exception is the word Second, which is French. The Anglo-Saxon word was other, as First, Other, Third, etc. Million is the Latin millio (-onis).

There are some other odd exceptions in the language: Spring, summer, and winter are native words, but autumn is Latin. The days of the week are native words, but the names of the months are Latin. We have day, month, year; but minute is Latin, and hour is Latin through the French.

Numerals (Greek). (See Epimenon.)

Numero. Homme de numero—that is "un homme fin en affaires," M. Walckenaer says it is a shop phrase, meaning that lie knows all the numbers of the different goods, or all the private marks indicative of price and quality.

"Il n'ecrit lors de Paris jusqu'à Rome, faisant son sort a bon de numero." (La Fontaine; Richard Muntow.)

Numidius. Quintus Cæsilius Metellus, commander against Jugurtha, of Numidia, about 100 B.c.

Numination. Adding N to an initial vowel, as Not for Ol[iver], Nell for Ell[en], Ned for Ed[ward].

Nunc Dimitis. The canticle of Simeon is so called, from the first two words in the Latin version (Luke ii. 29–32).

Nunc Stans. The everlasting Now.

"It exists in the nunc stans of the schoolmen—the eternal Now that represented the continuance of the Supreme Being in medieval thought.
—Nineteenth Century, December, 1857, p. 333.

Nuncipative Will. A will or testament made by word of mouth. As a general rule, no will is valid unless reduced to writing and signed: but soldiers and sailors may simply declare their wish by word of mouth. (Latin, muncupo, to declare.)

Nunky pays for all. (See Sam.)

Nuremberg Eggs. Watches, Watches were invented at Nuremberg about 1500, and were egg-shaped.

Nurr and Spell or Knor and Spell.
A game resembling traplial, and played with a wooden ball called a nurr or knor. The ball is released by means of a string from a little brass cup at the end of a tongue of steel called a spell or spill. After the player has touched the spring, the ball flies into the air, and is snatched with a butt. In scoring, the distances are reckoned by the score for previously marked off by a Gunter’s chain. The game is played frequently in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

Nurse an Omnibus (70) is to try and run it off the road. This is done by sending a rival omnibus close at its heels, or, if necessary, one before and one behind it, to pick up the passengers. As a nurse follows a child about regardless of its caprices, so these four-wheel nurses follow their rival.

Nurseries. In the language of horse-racing, handicaps for two-year-old horses. These horses can be run only with horses of their own age, after the 1st September; and before the 1st July must not run more than six furlongs in length.

Nursery Tales. Well-known ones:

- Arabian Nights. Aladdin’s Lamp, The Forty Thieves, Sinbad the Sailor, and hundreds more.
- Carroll. Lewis. Alice in Wonderland, Hunting the Snark, etc.
- D'Aulnoy. (Miss) — Knot of the Peacocks, The Blue Bird, and many others.
- Fordyce. Be La Mode Endure.
- Goldsmith (Oliver). Goody Two-Shoes. 1763
- Hans. Goibbin Tales.
- Johnson (Leland). The Seven Champions of Chrystendum.
- Kraushar and Runghens (Lord Brabourne).
  Stories for Children, etc.
- Lamb. The Devil on Two Sticks.
- Parratt. Charles (A Frenchman): Blue Beard, Little Red Riding Hood, Fairy Tales.
- Ridley James. Tales of the Genii.
- Rostand. Jack and the Beanstalk, Jack the Giant-Killer, and some others.

Nut. A hard nut to crack. A difficult question to answer; a hard problem to solve. (Anglo-Saxon, hant, a nut.)

He who would cut the nut must first crack the shell. The gods give nothing to man without great labour, or "Nel sine magno vita laborid delect mortalibus."

"Qui nucem esse velit, frangat nucem" (Plantus.) In French, "Il faut casser le noyau pour en faire l’amande." It was Hercules who said, "Expect nothing without toil."

If you would reap, you also must plough.
For bread must be earned by the sweat of the brow.

Nuts of May. Here we go gathering nuts of May. A corruption of knuts or sprigs of May. We still speak of "love-knots," and a bunch of flowers is called a "knot."

Nuts. Heads; so called from their resemblance to nuts. Probably "crack," applied to heads, is part of the samo figure of speech.

"To go off their nut about ladies,"
As used for young fellows as Ricksie."

Sands. Diary. Ballads (Polio).

It is time to lay our nuts aside (Latin, Reliquiae Nores). To leave off our follies, to relinquish boyish pursuits.

The allusion is to an old Roman marriage ritual, in which the bridegroom, as he led his bride home, scattered nuts to the crowd, as if to symbolise to them that he gave up his boyish sport.

That's nuts to him. A great pleasure, a fine treat. Nuts, among the Romans, made a standing dish at dessert; they were also common toys for children, hence, to put away childish things is,
Latin, to put your nuts away.

Nut-brown Maid. Henry, Lord
Clifford, first Earl of Cumberland, and Lady Margaret Percy, his wife, are the origins of this ballad. Lord Clifford had a miserly father and ill-natured stepmother, so he left home and became the head of a band of robbers. The ballad was written in 1592, and says that the "Not-brown Mayd" was wooed and won by a knight who gave out that he was a banished man. After describing the hardships she would have to undergo if she married him, and finding her love true to the test, he revealed himself to be an earl's son, with large hereditary estates in Westmoreland. (Percy: Reliques, series ii.)

Nutmack Night. All Hallow's Eve, when it is customary in some places to crack nuts in large quantities.

Nutmackers. The 3rd Foot; so called because at Albuera they cracked the heads of the Polish Lancers, then opened and retreated, but in a few minutes came again into the field and did most excellent service. Now called "The East Kent."

Nuttshell. The Iliad in a nutshell. Pliny tells us that Cicero asserts that the whole Iliad was written on a piece of parchment which might be put into a nutshell. Lalaune describes, in his Curiosités Bibliographiques, an edition of Rochefoucault's Maximes, published by Didot in 1829, on pages one inch square, each page containing 25 lines, and each line 44 letters. Charles Toppan, of New York, engraved on a plate one-eighth of an inch square 12,000 letters. The Iliad contains 501,830 letters, and would therefore occupy 42 such plates engraved on both sides. Huet has proved by experiment that a parchment 27 by 21 centimètres would contain the entire Iliad, and such a parchment would go into a common-sized nut; but Mr. Toppan's engraving would get the whole Iliad into half that size. George P. Marsh says, in his Lectures, he has seen the entire Arabic Koran in a parchment roll four inches wide and half an inch in diameter. (See Iliad.)

To lie in a nutshell. To be explained in a few words; to be capable of easy solution.

Nym (Corporal). One of Falstaff's followers, and an arrant rogue. Nym is to steal. (Merry Wives of Windsor.)

Nyse (2 syl.). One of the Nereids (g.e.).

"The lovely Nyse and Nertha singing,
With all the vehemence and speed of wing."

_Gamut._ Lusaud, bk. ii.

---

O. This letter represents an eye, and is called in Hebrew _ain_ (an eye).

O. The fifteen _O's_ are fifteen prayers beginning with the letter _O._ (See _Hora Beatae Mariae Virginis Mariae._)

The Christmas O's. For nine days before Christmas (at 7 o'clock p.m.) are seven antiphones (3 syl.), each beginning with _O_, as _O_ Sapiemta, _O_ Radiz, etc.

O'. An Irish patronymic. (Gaelic, _ogha_; Irish, _ot_, a descendant.)

O', in Scotch, means "of," as "Tam-o'-Shanter."

O.H.M.S. On His [or Her] Majesty's Service.

O.K. A telegraphic symbol for "All right" (or _korrect_, a Sir William Curtis's or Artemus Ward's way of spelling "all correct").

O. P. Riot (Old Price Riot). When the new Covent Garden theatre was opened in 1809, the charges of admission were increased; but night after night for three months a throng crowded the pit, shouting "O, P." (_old prices_); much damage was done, and the manager was obliged at last to give way.

O tempora! O morés! Alas! how the times have changed for the worse! Alas! how the morals of the people are degenerated!

O Yes! O Yes! O Yes! French, _oje_ (hear ye).

"Fame with her loud at _O_ yes!"

_Cries, "This is he.""

_Shakespeare: Timon and Cressida_, iv. 5.

Oak. A corruption of _oipb_ (elf). A foolish child or dolt is so called from the notion that all idiots are changelings, left by the fairies in the place of the stolen ones.

"This guileless oak had vacancy of sense Supplied, and simply too, by ignorance."

_Byron: Verses found in a Summer-house._

Oak. Worn on May 29th. May 29th was the birthday of Charles II. It was in the month of September that he concealed himself in an oak at Boscobel. The battle of Worcester was fought on Wednesday, September 3rd, 1651, and Charles arrived at Whiteladies, about three-quarters of a mile from Boscobel House, early the next morning. He returned to England on his birthday, when the Royalists displayed a branch of oak in allusion to his hiding in an oak-tree.

To sport _one's oak_. To be "not at home" to visitors. At the Universities the "chambers" have two doors, the usual room-door and another made of oak, outside it; when the oak is shut or "sported" it indicates either that the occupant of the room is out, or that he does not wish to be disturbed by visitors.
Oak and Ash. The tradition is, if the oak gets into leaf before the ash we may expect a fine and productive year; if the ash precedes the oak in foliage, we may anticipate a cold summer and unproductive autumn. In the years 1816, 1817, 1821, 1823, 1828, 1829, 1830, 1838, 1840, 1845, 1850, and 1859, the ash was in leaf a full month before the oak, and the autumns were unfavourable. In 1831, 1832, 1839, 1853, 1855, the two species of trees came into leaf about the same time, and the years were not remarkable either for plenty or the reverse; whereas in 1818, 1819, 1820, 1822, 1824, 1825, 1826, 1827, 1833, 1834, 1835, 1836, 1837, 1842, 1846, 1854, 1868, and 1869, the oak displayed its foliage several weeks before the ash, and the summers of those years were dry and warm, and the harvests abundant.

Oak-tree. (See Philmon.)

The oak-tree was consecrated to the god of thunder because oaks are said to be more likely to be struck by lightning than other trees.

Oaks. (The). One of the three great classic races of England. The Derby and Oaks are run at Epsom, and the St. Leger at Doncaster. The Oaks, in the parish of Woodmanstone, received its name from Lambert's Oaks, and an inn, called the "Hunter's Club," was rented of the Lambert family. It afterwards became the residence of General Burgoyne, from whom it passed to the 11th Earl of Derby. It was Edward Smith Stanley, 12th Earl of Derby, who originated the Oak Stakes, May 14, 1779. On his death, in 1834, the estate was sold to Sir Charles Guy, and was then held by Joseph Smith. The Oaks Stakes are for fillies three years old. (See Derby.)

Oaks Famous in Story.

1. Owen Glendower's Oak, at Shelton, near Shrewsbury, was in full growth in 1403, for in this tree Owen Glendower witnessed the great battle between Henry IV. and Henry Percy. Six or eight persons can stand in the hollow of its trunk. Its girth is 40 feet.

2. Cotterthorpe Oak, near Wetherby, in Yorkshire, will hold seventy persons in its hollow. Professor Burnet states its age to be 1,600 years.

3. Fairlop Oak, in Hainault Forest, was 36 feet in circumference a yard from the ground. It was blown down in 1820.

4. The Oak of the Partisans, in Percy Forest, St. Ouen, in the department of the Vosges, is 107 feet in height. It is 700 years old. (1895.)

5. The Bull Oak, Wedgwick Park, was growing at the time of the Conquest.

6. The Wytharching Oak was 700 years old at the time of the Conquest.

7. William the Conqueror's Oak, in Windsor Great Park, is 38 feet in girth.

8. Queen's Oak, Huntingfield, Suffolk, is so named because near this tree Queen Elizabeth shot a buck.

9. Sir Philip Sidney's Oak, near Penshurst, was planted at his birth in 1551, and has been memorialised by Ben Jonson and Waller.

10. The Ellerslie Oak, near Paisley, is reported to have sheltered Sir William Wallace and 300 of his men.

11. The Newcote Oak, in Needwood Forest, Staffordshire, is between 600 and 700 years old.

12. The Abbot's Oak, near Woburn Abbey, is so called because the Woburn abbot was hanged on one of its branches, in 1537, by order of Henry VIII.

13. The Major Oak, Sherwood Forest, Edwinstowe, according to tradition, was a full-grown tree in the reign of King John. The hollow of the trunk will hold 15 persons, but of late years a new bark has considerably diminished the opening. Its girth is 37 or 38 feet, and the head covers a circumference of 240 feet.

14. The Parliament Oak, Clipston, in Sherwood Forest, Notts, is the tree under which Edward I., in 1282, held his parliament. He was hunting in the forest, when a messenger came to tell him of the revolt of the Welsh. He hastily convened his nobles under the oak, and it was resolved to march at once against Llewellyn, who was slain. The oak is still standing (1895), but is supported by props.

15. Robin Hood's Lauder is an oak in that part of Sherwood Forest which belongs to the Duke of Portland. The tradition is that Robin Hood, the great outlaw, used this oak, then hollow, as his larder, to put the deer he had slain out of sight. Not long ago some schoolgirls boiled their kettle in the hollow of the oak, and burnt down a large part; but every effort has been made to preserve what remains from destruction.

16. The Reformation Oak, near Mousehold Heath, near Norwich, is where the rebel Ket held his court in 1549, and when the Rebellion was stamped out, nine of the ringleaders were hanged on this tree.
Oberthal

Contractions formerly used by students in academical disputations.

Obadiah. A slang name for a Quaker.

Obadiah. One of the servants of Mr. Shandy. (Sterne: Tristram Shandy.)

Obam'hou. The devil of the Camma tribes of Africa. It is exorcised by noise like bees in flight.

O'belisk. (See DAGGER.)

Obelias. A small brass coin (nearly 1d. in value) placed by the Greeks in the mouth of the dead to pay Charon for ferrying the body over the river Styx. Name as obolos, an obol.

Obermann. The impersonation of high moral worth without talent, and the tortures endured by the consciousness of this defect. (Étienne Perrot de Sénancour: Obermann.)

Oberon. King of the Fairies, whose wife was Titania. Shakespeare introduces both Oberon and Titania, in his Midsummer Night's Dream. (Atheron, anciently Alberon, German Alberich, king of the elves.)

Oberon the Fay. A humpy dwarf only three feet high, but of angelic face, lord and king of Mommuir. He told Sir Huon his pedigree, which certainly is very romantic. The lady of the Hidden Isle (Cephalonia) married Neptune's, King of Egypt, by whom she had a son called Alexander the Great. Seven hundred years later Julius Caesar, on his way to Thassaly, stopped in Cephalonia, and the same lady, falling in love with him, had in time another son, and that son was Oberon. At his birth the fairies bestowed their gifts—one was insight into men's thoughts, and another was the power of transporting himself to any place instantaneously. He became a friend to Huon (q.v.), whom he made his successor in the kingdom of Mommuir. In the fulness of time, falling asleep in death, legions of angels conveyed his soul to Paradise. (Huon de Bordeaux, a romance.)

Oberthal (Count). Lord of Dordrecht, near the Meuse. When Bertha, one of his vassals, asked permission to marry John of Leyden, the count refused, resolving to make her his mistress. This drove John into rebellion, and he joined the Anabaptists. The count was taken prisoner by Gio'na, a discarded servant, but liberated by John. When John was crowned Prophet-king, the count entered his banquet-hall to arrest.
Odd Numbers. Luck in odd numbers. A major chord consists of a fundamental or tonic, its major third, and its just fifth. According to the Pythagorean system, "all nature in a harmony" man is a full chord; and all beyond is Deity, so that nine represents deity. As the odd numbers are the fundamental notes of nature, the last being deity, it will be easy to see how they came to be considered the great or lucky numbers. In China, odd numbers belong to heaven, and v.v. (See DIAPA-

S 0N, NUMBER.)

"Good luck lies in odd numbers...They say, there is a deity in odd numbers, either in natur or chance, or death."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, 1. 1.

"No doubt the odd numbers 1, 3, 5, 7, 9, play a far more important part than the even numbers. One is Deity, three the Trinity, five the chief division (see Five), seven is the sacred number, and nine is three times three, the great clim-acteric.

Odd and Even. According to Pytha-gorus, by the number of syllables in a man's name, the side of his infinity may be predicted; odd being left, even being right.

Thus, to give only one or two examples:

Napoleon lost his right arm and right eye.

Raglan (even) lost his right arm at Waterloo.

The fancy is quite worthless, but might afford amusement on a winter’s night.

Odd's or Odd's, used in oaths; as—

Odd's boodkim! or Odd's body! means "God's body," of course referring to incarnate Deity.

Odd's heart! God's heart.

Odd's pittikins! God's pity.

Odd's plessed will! (Merry Wives of Windsor, 1. 1.)

Odd roth! (See DRAT.)

Odd-zounds! God's wounds.

Odds. By long odds. By a great difference; as, "He is the best man by long odds." A phrase used by betting men. In horse-racing, odds are offered in bets on favourite horses; so, in the Cambridge and Oxford races, long odds are laid on the boat which is expected to win.

That makes no odds. No difference; never mind; that is no excuse. An application of the betting phrase.

Ode. Prince of The Ode. Pierre de Ronsard, a French lyrist. (1524-1583.)

Odharrir. The mead or nectar made of Kvasir's blood, kept in three jars. The second of these jars is called Soth, and the Boh. Probably the nectar is the "spirit of poetry." (Scandinavian mythology.)

Odin. Chief god of the Scandinavians.

His real name was Siggé, son of Fridulph, but he assumed the name of Odin when he left the Tanais, because he had been priest of Odin, supreme god of the Scythians. He became the All-wise by drinking from Mimer's fountain, but purchased the distinction at the cost of one eye. His one eye is the Sun.

The father of Odin was Bör.

His brothers are Vile and Ve.

His wife is Frigga.

His sons, Thor and Balder.

His mansion is Gladsheim.

His seat, Valaskjalp.

His court as war-god, Valhalla.

His hall, Einherian.

His two black ravens are Hugin (thought) and Munin (memory).

His steed, Sleipnir (q.v.).

His ships, Skildbladnir and Naglifar.

His spurt, Gunnerg, which never fails to hit the mark aimed at.

His ring, Draupnir, which every ninth night drops eight other rings of equal value.

His throne is Hildskjalp.

His swords, Geri and Freki.

He will be ultimately swallowed up by the wolf Fenrir or Fenrir. (Scandinavian mythology.)

The row of Odin. A matrimonial or other vow made before the "Stone of Odin," in the Orkneys. This is an oval stone, with a hole in it large enough to admit a man's hand. Anyone who violated a vow made before this stone was held infamous.

O'dium Theologi'cum. The bitter hatred of rival religionists. No wars so sanguinary as holy wars; no persecutions so relentless as religious persecutions; no hatred so bitter as theological hatred.

O'Doherty (Sir Morgan). Papers contributed to Blackwood's Magazine by William Magnus, L.L.D., full of wit, fun, irony, and eloquence, (1819-1842.)

Odor Luai (Latin). The sweets of gain; the delights of money-making.

"Every act of such a person is scented with the odor incur."—Sir Walter Scott: The Betrothed (Introduction).

Odorico (in Orlando Furioso). A Biscayan, to whom Zerbino commits Isabella. He proves a traitor and tries to ravish her, but, being interrupted by a pirate crew, flies for safety to Alphonzo's court. Here Almo'nio defies him, and overcomes him in single comb-bat. King Alphonzo gives the traitor to the conqueror, and he is delivered bound to Zerbino, who awards him as a punishment to attend Gabri'na for one year as her champion, and to defend her against every foe. He accepts the charge, but hangs Gabri'na to an elm.

Off-hand

Odo-rino in turn hangs Odoricus to an elm.

Odo-ur. In good odour; in bad odour. In favour, out of favour; in good repute, in bad repute. The phrases refer to the "odour of sanctity" (q.v.).

Odo-urn of Sanctity (In the). The Catholics tell us that good persons die in the "odour of sanctity," and there is a certain truth in the phrase, for, when one honoured by the Church dies, it is not unusual to perfume the room with incense, and sometimes to embalm the body. Homer tells us (iliad, xxiii.) that Hector's body was washed with rose-water. In Egypt the dead are washed with rose-water and perfumed with incense. (Mallet: Letters, x. p. 88.) Herodotus says the same thing (History, ii. 86-90). When the wicked and those hated die, no such care is taken of them.

"In both the Greek and Western Church incense is used, and the aroma of these consecrated oils follows the believer from birth to death."— nineteenth century; April, 1864, p. 524.

* The Catholic notion that priests bear about with them an odour of sanctity may be explained in a similar manner: they are so constantly present when the cesers diffuse sweet odour, that their clothes and skin smell of the incense.

* Shakespeare has a strong passage on the disodour of impiety. Antipholus and his daughter, whose wickedness abounded, were killed by lightning, and the poet says:—

A fire from heaven came and shrivelled up Their bodies, even to its eating, for they so stunk
That all those eyes adored them ere their fall
Scarcely, as now their hand should give them burial.

Pericles, Prince of Tyre, ii. 4.

Od-rystan Carmen. The poetry of Orpheus, a native of Thrace, called Odrysian tellus, because the Odrysians were their chief inhabitants.

O'dur. Husband of Freyja, whom he deserted. (Scaudianian mythology.)

O'dy-le (2 syl.). That which emanates from a medium to produce the several phenomena connected with mesmerism, spirit-rapping, table-turning, and so on. The productions of these "manifestations" is sometimes called od'yum. Baron Reichenbach called it Od force, a force which becomes manifest wherever chemical action is going on.

O'dy-ssey. The poem of Homer which records the adventures of Odysseus (Ulysses) in his home-voyage from Troy. The word is an adjective formed out of the hero's name, and means the things or adventures of Ulysses.

O'dipus. I am no Oedipus. I cannot guess what you mean. Oedipus guessed the riddle of the Sphinx, and saved Thesbes from her ravages. (See Sphinx.)

Oeil. A l'œil. On credit, for nothing. Corruption of the Italian a milio (gratis). In the French translation of Don Quixote is this passage:—

"Ma femme, dit Sancho Panza, ne m'a jamais dit que quand il fallait dire non. Or elles sont toutes de môme... Elles sont toutes bonnes à pendre... passe ceci, elles ne valent pas ce que j'ai dans l'œil."}

Oeil de Bœuf (L'). A large reception-room (salles) in the palace of Versailles, lighted by round windows so-called. The ceiling, decorated by Van der Meulen, contained likenesses of the children of Louis XIV. (seventeenth and eighteenth centuries.)

Les Fastes de l'Oeil de Bœuf. The annals of the courtiers of the Grand Monarque; anecdotes of courtiers generally. The œil de bœuf is the round window seen in entresols, etc. The inte-room where courtiers waited at the royal chamber of Versailles had these ox-eye windows, and hence they were called by this name.

Off (Saxon, of; Latin, ab, from, away). The house is a mile off—i.e., is "away" or "from" us a mile. The word preceding off defines its scope. To be "well off" is to be away or on the way towards well-being; to be badly off is to be away or on the way to the bad. In many cases "off" is part of a compound verb, as to cut-off (away), to peel-off, to march-off, to tear-off, to take-off, to get-off, etc. The off-side of horses when in pairs is that to the right hand of the coachman, the horses on his left-hand side are called the "near" horses. This, which seems rather anomalous, arises from the fact that all teamsters walk beside their teams on the left side, so that the horses on the left side are near him, and those on the right side are farther off.

He is well off; he is badly off. He is in good circumstances; he is straitened in circumstances, être bien [or mal] dans ses affaires. In these phrases "off" means fares, "he fares well [or ill]; his affairs go off well [or ill]. (Anglo-Saxon, off-farum.)

Off-hand. Without preparation; impromptu. The phrase, "in hand," as, "It was long in hand," means that it was long in operation, or long a-doing; so that "off-hand" must mean it was not "in hand."

Off his Head. Delirious, deranged, not able to use his head; so "off his feed," not able to eat or enjoy his food. The latter phrase is applied to horses which refuse to eat their food.

Off the Hooks. Indisposed and unable to work. A door or gate off the hooks is unhinged, and does not work properly. Also, dead.

Off with his Head! So much for Buckingham! (Colley Cibber: The Tragi-Comical History of Richard III., altered from Shakespeare.)

Offa's Dyke, which runs from Bechley to Flintshire, was not the work of Offa, King of Mercia, but was repaired by him. It existed when the Romans were in England, for five Roman roads cross it. Offa availed himself of it as a line of demarcation that was sufficiently serviceable, though by no means tallying with his territory either in extent or position.

Og, King of Bushan, according to Rabbinical mythology, was an antediluvian giant, saved from the flood by climbing on the roof of the ark. After the passage of the Red Sea, Moses first conquered Siyon, and then advanced against the giant Og (whose bedstead, made of iron, was above 15 feet long and nearly 7 feet broad, Dent. iii. 11). The Rabbins say that Og plucked up a mountain to hurl at the Israelites, but he got so entangled with his burden, that Moses was able to kill him without much difficulty.

Og, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is Thomas Shadwell, who succeeded Dryden as poet-laureate. Dryden called him MacFlocknoe, and says "he never deviates into sense." He is called Og because he was a very large and fat man. (Part ii.)

Oghams. The alphabet in use among the ancient Irish and some other Celtic nations prior to the ninth century.

"The oghams seem to have been merely treestring. The Irish regarded the oghams as a forest, the individual characters being trees (teada); while each cross-stroke is called a twig (meas)."

Oghris. The lion that followed Prince Murad like a dog. (Crocutaictis.)

Ogier the Dane (2 syl). One of the paladins of King Charlemagne.

Various fairies attended at his birth, and bestowed upon him divers gifts. Among them was Morgue, who when the knight was a hundred years old embarked him for the isle and castle of Avalon, "hard by the terrestrial paradise." The vessel in which he sailed was wrecked, and Ogier was in despair, till he heard a voice that bade him "fear nothing, but enter the castle which I will show thee." So he got to the island and entered the castle, where he found a horse sitting at a banquetable. The horse, whose name was Papillon, and who had once been a mighty prince, conducted him to Morgue the Fay, who gave him (1) a ring which removed all infirmities and restored him to ripe manhood; (2) a Lethean crown which made him forget his country and past life; and (3) introduced him to King Arthur. Two hundred years rolled on, and France was invaded by the Paynims. Morgue now removed the crown from Ogier's head and sent him to defend "le buj pays de France." Having routed the invaders, Morgue took him back to Avalon, and he has never reappeared on this earth of ours. (Ogier de Danie; a romance.)

Ogier the Dane. Represented as the Knave of Spades in the French pack. He is introduced by Ariosto in his Oriando Furioso.

The words of Ogier the Dane. Curtana (the cutter), and Sauvagine. (See Morris: Earthly Paradise, August.)

Ogleby (Lord). A superannuated nobleman who affects the gaiety and graces of a young man. (Clandestine Marriage, by Garrick and Colman the Elder.)

Ogres of nursery mythology are giants of very malignant dispositions, who live on human flesh. It is an Eastern invention, and the word is derived from the Ogurs, a desperately savage horde of Asia, who overran part of Europe in the fifth century. Others derived it from Orcus, the ugly, cruel man-eating monster so familiar to readers of Bojardo and Ariosto. The female is Ogres.

O'Groat. (See John o' Groat.)

Ogygian Deluge. A flood which overran a part of Greece while Oggyges was king of Attica. There were two floods so called—one in Bocotia, when the lake Copa overflowed its banks; and another in Attica, when the whole territory was laid waste for two hundred years (B.C. 1764).

Varro tells us that the planet Venus underwent a great change in the reign of Ogyges (5th c.). It changed its diameter, its colour, its figure, and its course. "Ogyges Deluge occurred more than 200 years before Deucalion's Flood.

Ol Polloi, properly Hoi Polloi. (Greek.) The commonality, the many. In University along the "poll men," or those who take degrees without "honours."

Oignement de Bretagne (French). A sound drubbing. Oignement is a noun corruptly formed from hogue. In Lyons boys called the little cuffs which they gave each other hogies.

"Frère Euthéphius a trouvons,
Et par argente de Breague,
Qui grand de paume et de taure,"

Le Maitre de S. Denys, etc., p. 129.

Oignons d'Egypte. The flesh-pots of Egypt. Hence "regretter les oignons d'Egypte," to sigh for the flesh-pots of Egypt, to long for luxuries lost and gone.

"Je plume oignons. I scold or grumble. Also peler des oignons in the same sense. A fogger of hogies, to scold or grumble.

"Gif ton, que t'en la pas.
Il tire maigre. Je plume oignons."

La Quatriéme Journée du Maitre de la Passion.

"Par de sa oul oignons peler."

Villon: Huitite n.

Oil. To stroke oil. To make a happy hit or valuable discovery. The phrase refers to hitting upon or discovering a bed of petroleum or mineral oil.

Oil of Palms. Money. Huile is French slang for "money," as will appear from the following quotation: "Il faudra que voire bonté laisse les frais de votre curiosité; il faut de la poésie, il faut de l'huile." (La Fausse Coquette, ii. 7: 1694.)

Oil on Troubled Waters. To pour oil on troubled waters, as a figure of speech, means to soothe the troubled spirit. "A soft answer turneth away wrath."

As a physical fact, Professor Horford, by emptying a vial of oil upon the sea in a stiff breeze, did actually still the ruffled surface. Commodore Wilkes of the United States, saw the same effect produced in a violent storm off the Cape of Good Hope, by oil leaking from a whale-ship.

Origin of the phrase: The phrase is mentioned by the Venerable Bede in his Ecclesiastical History, written in Latin, and completed in 735. Stapleton translated the book in 1663. St. Aidan, it appears, gave his blessing to a young priest who was to set out by land, but return by water, to convey a young maiden destined for the bride of King Oswin or Oswy. St. Aidan gave the young man a cruse of oil to pour on the sea if the waves became stormy. A storm did arise, and the young priest, pouring oil on the waves, did actually reduce them to a calm. Bede says he had the story from "a most creditable man in Holy Orders."

"St. Aidan died in 694, and Bede died in 735. There is no question in archaeology so often asked to be explained as this.

Oil the Knocker (Th.). To see the porter. The expression is from Racine, "On n'entre point chez lui sans graisser le marteau" ("No one enters his house without oiling the knocker"). (Les Plaisirs.)

Ointment. Money. From the fable De la Vieille qui tint la Palme au Chervalier (thirteenth century).

"Voici bien au temps que j'ai vu, avant l'invention de l'argenterie, que les huiles, au lieu d'être argente, sont couvertes au quatrième mois."

Histoire de Canterbury; Chroniques; Scritture de Can. (1393.)

Olaf or Olave (St.). The first Christian king of Norway, slain in battle by his pagan subjects in 1030. He is usually represented in royal attire, bearing the sword or halbert of his martyrdom, and sometimes carrying a loaf of bread, as a rebus on his name, which in Latin is Holcusus or Whole-loaf. (Born 995.)

Old Bags. John Scott, Lord Eldon; so called from his carrying home with him in different bags the cases still pending his judgment. (1751-1838.)

Old Blade (Afr.). "Lui chez moutier" (an old stag), meaning one up to snuff. (See Snuff.)

Old Bonâ Fide. Louis XIV. (1638, 1643-1715.)

Old Boots. Like old boots. Famously. "Cheeky as old boots," very saucy. "He ran like old boots," i.e. very fast. The reference is to the nursery story of the Seven-leagued Boots, old being simply a word of fondness as "Well, old boy," etc. The allusion, suitable enough in many phrases, becomes, when used in slang, very remotely applicable.

Old Dominion. Virginia. Every Act of Parliament to the Declaration of Old England.

Independence designated Virginia “the Colony and Dominion of Virginia.” Captain John Smith, in his History of Virginia (1629), calls this “colony and dominion” Old Virginia, in contradistinction to New England, and other British settlements.

Old England. This term was first used in 1641, twenty-one years after our American colony of New Virginia received the name of New England.

Old Faith Men. (See PHILIPPINS.)

Old Fags. The 87th Foot; so called from the war-cry “Fag-an-Beulach” (Clear the way), pronounced Faun-a-bollag. The 87th Foot is now called “The Royal Irish Fusiliers.”

Old Fox. Marshal Soult; so called by the soldiers because of his strategic abilities and never-failing resources, (1769-1851.) (See Fox.)

Old Gentleman (The). The devil; a cheating card.

Old Glory. The United States’ Flag.

Old Gooseberry. To play [or play up] old gooseberry. To be a third person; to be de trop. Old Gooseberry is the name given to a person accompanying an engaged couple.

Old Grog. Admiral Edward Vernon; so called by British sailors from his wearing a program cloak in foul weather. (1684-1757.)

Old Hands, supernumeraries who have been used to the work. “New hands” are those new to the work.

Old Harry. The devil. (See HARRY.)

Old Humphrey. The nom-de-plume of George Mogridge, of London, author of several interesting books for children. (Died 1854.)

Old Mortality. The itinerant antiquary in Sir Walter Scott’s novel of that name. It is said to be a picture of Robert Paterson, a Scotchman, who busied himself in clearing the moss from the tombstones of the Covenanters.

Old News. Stale news. Hawker’s (or piper’s) news. “Le secret de polichinelle.”

A pinch for old news. A schoolboy’s punishment to one of his mates for telling news what is well known.

Old Noll. (See NOLL.)

Old Noll’s Fiddler. (See FIDDLER.)

Old Port School. Old-fashioned clergymen, who stuck to Church and State, old port and “orthodoxy.”

Old Reeky. (See AULD REEKIE.)

Old Rowley. Charles II. was so called from his favourite racehorse. A portion of the Newmarket racecourse is still called Rowley Mile, from the same horse.

Old Salt (An). An experienced sailor.

Old Scratch. The devil; so called from Skrutz or Skratti, a demon of Scandinavian mythology. (See NICK.)

Old Song. Went for an old song. Was sold for a mere trifle, for a nominal sum or price.

Old Style—New Style. Old Style means computed according to the un-reformed calendar. New Style means computed according to the calendar reformed and corrected by Gregory XIII. in 1582. The New Style was introduced into England, in 1752, during the reign of George II., when Wednesday, September 2nd, was followed by Thursday, September 14th. This has given rise to a double computation, as Lady Day, March 25th, Old Lady Day, April 6th; Midsummer Day, June 24th, Old Midsummer Day, July 6th; Michaelmas Day, September 29th, Old Michaelmas Day, October 11th; Christmas Day, December 25th, Old Christmas Day, January 6th.

Old Tom. Cordial gin. Thomas Norris, one of the men employed in Messrs. Hodges’ distillery, opened a gin palace in Great Russell Street, Covent Garden, and called the gin concocted by Thomas Chamberlain, one of the firm of Hodges, “Old Tom,” in compliment to his former master.

Old Women, in theatrical parlance, means actresses who take the part of “old women.” In full companies there are first and second “old women.” The term Old Men is similarly used.

Old World. So Europe, Asia, and Africa are called when compared with North and South America (the New World).

Old as Adam. Generally used as a reproof for stating as news something well known. “That’s as old as Adam,” or was known as far back as the days of Adam. (See OLD AS METHUSELAH.)
Old as Methuselah. Of great age, Methuselah was the oldest man that ever lived. (See above.)

Old as the Hills. "Old as Panton Gates." (See Panton Gates.)

Old Age Restored to Youth. "La fontaine de Jeunesse fit rejaillir la gent." The broth of Medea did the same. Grinding old men young. Ogiut's Ring (q.v.) restored the aged to youth again. The Dancing Water restores the aged woman to youth and beauty. (See Water.)

Old Dogs will not Learn New Tricks. In Latin, "Senex pittacous negligit ferâdim" (An old parrot does not mind the stick). When persons are old they do not readily fall into new ways.

Old Lady of Threadneedle Street. The Bank of England, situated in Threadneedle Street. So called from a caricature by Gilray, dated 22nd May, 1797, and entitled The Old Lady in Threadneedle Street in Danger. It referred to the temporary stopping of cash payments 26th February, 1797, and one pound bank-notes were issued 4th March the same year.

Old Man Eloquent. Isocrates; so called by Milton. When he heard of the result of the battle of Chareonea, which was fatal to Grecian liberty, he died of grief.

"That damitde victory
At Chareonea, fatal to liberty, Killed with report that Old Man Eloquent." Milton: Sonnets.

Old Man of the Moon (The). The Chinese deity who links in wedlock predestined couples. (See Man in the Moon.)

"The Chinese have a firm belief in marriages being made in heaven. A certain deity, whom they call the 'Old Man of the Moon,' links up all predestined couples."—T. N. Jordan: Modern China (Nineteenth Century, July, 1890, p. 45).

Old Man of the Mountain. Hassan-ben-Sabah, the sheik Al Jobal, and founder of the sect called Assassins (q.v.).

Old Man of the Sea. In the story of Sinbad the Sailor, the Old Man of the Sea, hoisted on the shoulders of Sinbad, clung there and refused to dismount. Sinbad released himself from his burden by making the Old Man drunk. (Arabian Nights.)

Oldbuck. An antiquary; from the character of Jonathan Oldbuck, a whimsical virtuoso in Sir Walter Scott's Antiquary.

Oldcastle (Sir John), called the Good Lord Cobham, the first Christian martyr among the English nobility (December 14th, 1417).

Oldenburg Horn. A horn long in the possession of the reigning princes of the House of Oldenburg, but now in the collection of the King of Denmark. According to tradition, Count Otto of Oldenburg, in 967, was offered drink in this silver-gilt horn by a "wild woman," at the Osenborg. As he did not like the look of the liquor, he threw it away, and rode off with the horn.

Oldest Nation and most ancient of all languages. Ptolemychus of Egypt, wishing to penetrate these secrets, commanded that two infants should be brought up in such seclusion that they should never hear a single word uttered. When they had been thus secluded for two years, the boys both cried out to the keeper, "Bread! Bread!" a Phrygian word for Bread, so Ptolemychus declared the Phrygian language to be man's primitive speech. (See Language.)

O'leum Adde Camino. To pour oil on fire; to aggravate a wound under pretence of healing it. (Horace: Satires, ii. 3, 321.)

Olib'rius (Au). The wrong man in the wrong place. Olib'rius was a Roman senator, proclaimed emperor by surprise in 472, but he was wholly unsuited for the office.

Olifant. Lord Nigel Olifant of Glenranoch, on going to court to present a petition to King James I., aroused the dislike of the Duke of Buckingham; Lord Dalgarvo gave him the cut direct, when Nigel struck him, and was obliged to seek refuge in Alsatia. After various adventures he married Margaret Ramsay, the watchmaker's daughter. (Sir Walter Scott: Fortunes of Nigel.)

Olgar'ohy [old-gar'-eh]. A government in which the supreme power is vested in a class. (Greek, oligon, the few; arché, rule.)

Olindo. The Mahometan king of Jerusalem, at the advice of his magician, stole an image of the Virgin, and set it up as a palladium in the chief mosque. The image was stolen during the night, and the king, unable to discover the perpetrator, ordered all his Christian subjects to be put to the sword. So-fronia, to prevent this wholesale massacre, accused herself of the deed, and was condemned to be burnt alive.
Olindo, her lover, hearing of this, went to the king and took on himself the blame; whereupon both were condemned to death, but were saved by the intercession of Clorinda. (Jerusalem Delivered.)

Olio or Oglio. A mixture or medley of any sort. (Spanish, ollc, a pot for boiling similar to what the French call their pot au feu. The olio is the mixture of bread, vegetables, spices, meat, etc., boiled in this pot.)

Olìve (2 syl.) Sacred to Pallas
Athe'næ. (See OLIVE-TREE.)

Emblem of (1) Chastity. In Greece the newly-married bride wore an olive-garland; with us the orange-blossom is more usual.

(2) Fecundity. The fruit of the olive is produced in vast profusion; so that olive-trees are valuable to their owners.
(See ORANGE-BLOSSOMS.)

(3) Merit. In ancient Greece a crown of olive-twigs was the highest distinction of a citizen who had deserved well of his country.

(4) Peace. An olive-branch was anciently a symbol of peace. The vanquished who sued for peace carried olive-branches in their hands. And an olive-twig in the hands of a king (on medals), as in the case of Numa, indicated a reign of peace.

To hold out the olive branch. To make oives of peace.

(5) Prosperity. David says, "I am like a green olive-tree in the house of God" (Psalm lii. 8).

(6) Victory. The highest prize in the Olympic games was a crown of olive-leaves.

Origin of the olive-tree. The tale is, that Athênes (Minerva) and Poseidon (Neptune) disputed the honour of giving a name to a certain city of Greece, and agreed to settle the question by a trial of which could produce the best gift for the new city. Athênes commanded the earth to bring forth the olive-tree. Poseidon commanded the sea to bring forth the war-horse. Athênes's gift was adjudged the better, and the city was called Athens.

Olìve Branches. Children of a parent. It is a Scripture term: "Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine . . . thy children like olive plants round about thy table" (Psalm cxxviii. 3).

Oliver. Son and heir of Sir Rowland de Boys, who hated his youngest brother Orlando, and persuaded him to try a wrestling match with a professed wrestler, hoping thus to kill his brother;
but when Orlando proved victorious,
Oliver swore to set fire to his chamber when he was asleep. Orlando fled to the forest of Arden, and Oliver pursued him; but one day, as he slept in the forest, a snake and a lioness lurked near to make him prey; Orlando happened to be passing, and slew the two monsters. When Oliver discovered this heroic deed he repented of his ill-conduct, and his sorrow so interested the Princess Celia that she fell in love with him, and they were married.
(Shakespeare: As You Like It.)

Oliver or Olivier. Charlemagne's favourite paladin, who, with Roland, rode by his side. He was Count of Genes, and brother of the beautiful Aude. His sword was called Hauteclaire, and his horse Ferrant d'Espagne.
A Round for an Oliver. Tit for fat, quad pro quo. Dr. J. N. Scott says that this proverb is modern, and owes its rise to the Cavaliers in the time of the Civil wars in England. These Cavaliers, by way of rebuff, gave the anti-monarchical party a General Monk for their Oliver Cromwell. As Monk's Christian name was George, it is hard to believe that the doctor is correct. (See ROLAND.)

Olìvetans. Brethren of "Our Lady of Mount Olivet," an offshoot of the Benedictine order.

Oliv'ia. Niece of Sir Toby Belch, Malvolio is her steward, Maria her woman, Fabian and a chosen man her servants. (Shakespeare: Twelfth Night.)

Oliver. A female Tartuffe (q.c.) in Wyckerley's Plain Dealer. A con-sumnate hypocrite, of most unblushing effrontery.

Ollapod. Odds and ends, a mixture of scraps. In Spain it takes the place of the French pot au feu, into which every sort of edible is thrown and stewed. (See Olio.) Used figuatively, the term means an incongruous mixture, a miscellaneous collection of any kind, a medley.

Ollapod. An apothecary, always trying to say a witty thing, and looking for wit in the conversation of others.
When he finds anything which he can construe into "point" he says, "Thank you, good sir; I owe you one." He had a military taste, and was appointed "cornet in the volunteer association of cavalry" of his own town. (G. Colman: The Poor Gentleman.)

Olympia (in Orlando Furioso). Countess of Holland, and wife of Bireno. Cymosco of Friza wanted to force her to marry his son Arbantes, but Arbantes was slain. This aroused the fury of Cymosco, who seized Bireno, and would have put him to death if Orlando had not slain Cymosco. Bireno having deserted Olympia, she was bound naked to a rock by pirates; but Orlando delivered her and took her to Ireland. Here King Oberto espoused her cause, slew Bireno, and married the young widow. (Bks. iv., v.)

Olympiad, among the ancient Greeks, was a period of four years, being the interval between the celebrations of their Olympic Games.

Olympian Jove, or rather Zeus (1 syl.) A statue by Phidias, and reckoned one of the "Seven Wonders of the World." Pausanias (vii. 2) says when the sculptor placed it in the temple at Elis, he prayed the god to indicate whether he was satisfied with it, and immediately a thunderbolt fell on the floor of the temple without doing the slightest harm.

"The statue was made of ivory and gold, and though seated on a throne, was 60 feet in height. The left hand rested on a sceptre, and the right palm held a statue of Victory in solid gold. The robes were of gold, and so were the four lions which supported the footstool. The throne was of cedar, embellished with ebony, ivory, gold, and precious stones. (See MINERVA.)

It was placed in the temple at Elis B.c. 433, was removed to Constantinople, and perished in the great fire of A.D. 475. It was completed in 4 years, and of course the materials were supplied by the Government of Elis.

The " Homer of Sculptors" died in prison, having been incarcerated on the trumpery charge of having introduced on a shield of one of his statues a portrait of himself.

Olympic Games. Games held by the Greeks at Olympia, in Elis, every fourth year, in the month of July.

Olympus. On the confines of Macedonia and Thessaly, where the fabulous court of Jupiter was supposed to be held. It is used for any pantheon, as "Odin, Thor, Balder, and the rest of the Northern Olympus." The word means all bright or clear. In Greek the word is Olimpos.

O'lynn (Brian). Slang for gin. (See CHIVY.)

On. A Sanscrit word, somewhat similar to Amen. When the gods are asked to rejoice in a sacrifice, the god Savitri cries out Om (Be it so). When Pravihan is asked if his father has instructed him, he answers Om (Verily). Brahmaus begin and end their lessons on the Veda with the word Om, for "unless Om proceeds his lecture, it will be like water on a rock, which cannot be gathered up; and unless it concludes the lecture, it will bring forth no fruit."

"Om mani padum haim. These are the first six syllables taught the children of Tibet and Mongolia, and the last words uttered by the dying in those lands. It is met with everywhere as a charm.

O'man's Sea. The Persian Gulf.

Ombre. A Spanish game of cards called the royal game of ombre. Prior has an epigram on the subject. He says he was playing ombre with two ladies, and though he wished to lose, won everything, for Fortune gave him "success in every suit but hearts." Pope has immortalised the game in his Rape of the Lock.

Omega. The alpha and omega. The first and the last, the beginning and the end. Alpha is the first and omega the last letter of the Greek alphabet.

Omens. (See Ill Omens.)

Omevinger Saga. An historical tradition of Scandinavia.

Omnibus. The French have a good slang term for these conveyances. They call an omnibus a "Four Banal" (parish omen). Of course, omnibus (for all) is the obscure case of omnis (all). Yet Howitt, in his Views of Remarkable Places (1840), says "Cabs and cars and omnibus and stages" (p. 180). The plural of omnibus is "omnibuses."

Omnium (Latin of all). The particulars of all the items, or the assignment of all the securities, of a government loan.

Omnium Gatherum. Dog Latin for a gathering or collection of all sorts of persons and things: a miscellaneous gathering together without regard to suitability or order.

Omorcas. The goddess who was sovereign of the universe when it was first created. It was covered with water Omphale (3 syl.). The masculine but attractive Queen of Lydia, to whom Hércules was bound a slave for three years. He fell in love with her, and led an effeminate life spinning wool, while Omphale wore the lion’s skin and was lady paramount.

On dit (French). A rumour, a report; as, “There is an on dit on Exchange that Spain will pay up its back dividends.”

On the Loose. Dissolute (which is das-solute). “Living on the loose” is leading a dissolute life, or out on the sproe.

On the Shelf. Passé, no longer popular, one of the “has-beens.” The reference is not to pawns laid on the shelf, but to books no longer read, and clothes no longer worn, laid by on the shelf.

One-horse System (A). A one-sided view; looking at all things from one standpoint; bigotry.

One-horse Universities. Petty local universities.

“One step from the sublime to the ridiculous.” Tom Paine said, “The sublime and the ridiculous are often so nearly related that it is difficult to class them separately. One step above the sublime makes the ridiculous, and one step above the ridiculous makes the sublime again.”

One too Many for Him (I was). I outwitted him; or “One too much for you.”

“One Touch of Nature Makes the whole World Kin.” (Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, iii. 3.)

Onion Pennies. Roman coins dug up at Silchester; so called from one Onion, a giant, who, the country people say, inhabited the buried city. Silchester used to be called by the British Ard-Öone—i.e. Ardal Onion (the region of Eionion or Onion).

Only (The). Jean Paul Friedrich Richter (1763-1825). Carlyle says, “In the whole circle of literature we look in vain for his parallel.” (German, Der Einzigé.)

Onslow, invoked by Thomson in his Autumn, was Arthur Onslow, the Speaker of the House of Commons, termed virum ac renervabilile nomen. It was said of him that “his knowledge of the Constitution was only equalled by his attachment to it.”

Onus (Latin). The burden, the blame, the responsibility; as, “The whole onus must rest on your own shoulders.”

Onus Proban’di. The obligation of proof; as, “The onus probandi rests with the accuser.”

Onyx is Greek for a finger-nail; so called because the colour of an onyx resembles that of the finger-nail.

Opal. From the Greek opes (the eye). Considered unlucky for the same reason that peacocks’ feathers in a house are said to be unlucky. A peacock’s feather, being full of eyes, act as spies in a house, pry into one’s privacy. Similarly, it is unlucky to introduce the eye-stone or opal into a house, because it will interfere with the sanctity of domestic privacy. (See CERAMON.)

“Not an opal
Wrapped in a bay-leaf in my left fist.
To charm their eyes with.”

Ben Johnson: New Inn, i. 6.

Opal of Alphonso XII. (of Spain) seemed to be fatal. The king, on his wedding day, presented an opal ring to his wife (Mercedes, daughter of the Duke of Montpensier), but her death occurred soon afterwards. Before the funeral the king gave the ring to his sister (Maria del Pilar), who died a few days afterwards. The king then presented the ring to his sister-in-law (the Princess Christina, youngest daughter of the Duke of Montpensier), who died within three months. Alphonso, astounded at these fatalities, resolved to wear the ring himself, but died also within a very short time. The Queen Regent then attached the ring to a gold chain, which she suspended on the neck of the Virgin of Almudena of Madrid. (See FATAL ORFE.)

Open Air Mission. A mission founded in 1863. Its agents preach in the open air, especially at races, fairs, and on occasions when large numbers of people congregate.

Open Question (An). A statement, proposal, doctrine, or supposed fact, respecting which each individual is allowed to entertain his own private opinion. In the House of Commons every member may vote as he likes, regardless of party politics, on an open question. In the Anglican Church it is an open question whether the Lord's Supper should be taken fasting (before breakfast), or whether it may be taken at noon, or in the evening. Undoubtedly the institution was founded by Christ "after supper:" but Catholics and the High Ritualistic party insist on its being taken fasting.

Open Secret (An). A piece of information generally known, but not yet formally announced.

"It was an open secret that almost every one of Lord Palmerston's ecclesiastical appointments was virtually made by Lord Shaftesbury." —Leisure Hour, 1867.

Open Sesame. The charm by which the door of the robber's dungeon flew open. The reference is to the tale of The Forty Thieves, in the Arabian Nights.

"These words were the only 'open sesame' to their fancies and sympathies." —Ed. Shelton.

"The spell loses its power, and he who should hope to conjure with it would find himself as much mistaken as Ophelia when she stood crying, 'Open, West,' 'Open, barley,' to the door which obeyed no sound but 'Open, Sesame.'"

Open the Ball (To). To lead off the first dance; to begin anything which others will assist in carrying out.

Ophelia. Daughter of Polo'nius the chamberlain. Hamlet fell in love with her, but after his interview with the Ghost, found it incompatible with his plans to marry her. Ophelia, thinking his "strange conduct" the effect of madness, becomes herself demented, and in her attempt to gather flowers is drowned. (Shakespeare: Hamlet.)

Opt'icus. A fabulous monster, composed of dragon, camel, and lion, used in heraldry. It forms the crest of the Barber Surgeons of London.

Op'ium-eater (The English). Thomas de Quincey, author of Confessions. (1783-1850.)

Oppidan of Eton. A student not on the foundation, but who boards in the town. (Latin, oppidum.)

Optimä (plural, op-ti-mä), in Cambridge phraseology, is a graduate in honours below a wrangler. Of course, the Latin optimus (a best man) is the fons et origo of the term. Optimi's are of two grades: a man of the higher group is termed a senior optimä, while one of the inferior class is called a junior optimä.

Opt'imus. In moral philosophy, is the doctrine that "whatever is, is right," that everything which happens is for the best.

Opus Ma'jus. The great work of Roger Bacon.

Opus Op'erant'tis, in theology, means that the personal piety of the person who does the act, and not the act itself, causes it to be an instrument of grace. Thus, in the Eucharist, it is the faith of the recipient which makes it efficient for grace.

Opus Oper'atum, in theology, means that the act conveys grace irrespectively of the receiver. Thus baptism is said by many to convey regeneration to an infant in arms.

Or Ever. Ere ever. (Saxon, ar, before.)

"Or ever I had seen that day. Horatio." —Shakespeare: Hamlet, 1. 2.

"Dying or ere they sucken." —Macbeth, IV. 3.

Oracle. The answer of a god or inspired priest to an inquiry respecting the future; the deity giving responses: the place where the deity could be consulted, etc.

Oracle. The following are famous responses:

1) When Croesus consulted the Delphic oracle respecting a projected war, he received for answer, "Craes haecim penetrae magnum, perverti opus victa." (Whom Croesus passes over the river Halyx, he will overthrow the strength of an empire). Croesus supposed the oracle meant he would overthrow the enemy's empire, but it was his own that he destroyed.

2) Pyrrhus, being about to make war against Rome, was told by the oracle: "Aio te, Ascide, Roma nos victore posta" (I say, Pyrrhus, that you the Romans can conquer, which may mean either You, Pyrrhus, can overthrow the Romans, or Pyrrhus, the Romans can overthrow you.

3) Another prince, consulting the oracle concerning a projected war, received for answer, "His redhibit numquam per bella peribus" (You shall go shall return never you shall perish by the war). It will be seen that the whole giant of this response depends on the place of the omitted comma; it may be You shall return, you shall never perish in the war, or You shall return never, you shall perish in the war', which latter was the fact.

(4) Philip of Macedon sent to ask the oracle of Delphi if his Persian expedition would prove successful, and received for answer—

"The ready victim crowned for death Before the altar stands."

Philip took it for granted that the "ready victim" was the King of Persia, but it was Philip himself.

(5) When the Greeks sent to Delphi to know if they would succeed against the Persians, they were told—

"Seed-time and harvest, weeping over shall tell How thousands fought at Salamis and fell."

But whether the Greeks or the Persians were to be "the weeping sires," deponent stateth not, nor whether the thousands "about to fall" were to be Greeks or Persians. (See PUNCTUATION.)

(6) When Maxentius was about to encounter Constantine, he consulted the guardians of the Sibylline Books as to the fate of the battle, and the prophetess told him, "Ilo die hostem Romanorum esse perterritum," but whether Maxentius or Constantine was "the enemy of the Roman people" the oracle left undecided.

(7) In the Bible we have a similar equivoke: When Ahab, King of Israel, was about to wage war on the king of Syria, and asked Micaiah if Ramoth-Gilead would fall into his hands, the prophet replied, "Go, for the Lord will deliver the city into the hands of the king," (1 Kings xxii. 13, 35). Ahab thought that he himself was the king referred to, but the city fell into the hands of the king of Syria.

There are scores of punning prophecies equally equivocal.

Oracle (Syr). A dogmatical person, one not to be gain said. The ancient oracles professed to be the responses of the gods, from which there could be no appeal.

"I am Sir Oracle.
And when I open my lip, no dot back."

Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, i. 1.

To work the oracle. To induce another to favour some plan or join in some project.

"They fetched a rattling price through starlight, working the oracle with those swells."

Boldwood: Dobber under Arms, chap. xii.

Oracle of the Church (The). St. Bernard. (1001-1153.)

Oracle of the Holy Bottle, Bac-

buc, near Cathay, in Upper Egypt. Books iv. and v. of Rabelais are occupied by the search for this oracle. The ostensible object was to obtain an answer to a question which had been put to sibyl and poet, mawk and fool, philosopher and witch, judge and "sort," viz., whether Panurge should marry or not?" The whole affair is a disguised satire on the Church. The celibacy of the clergy was for a long time a moot point of great difficulty, and the "Holy Bottle" or cup to the laity was one of the moving causes of the "great schisms" from the Roman Catholic Church. The crew setting sail for the Bottle refers to Anthony, Duke of Vendome, afterwards king of Navarre, setting out in search of religious truth. Bacbuc is the Hebrew for a bottle. The anthem sung before the fleet set sail was When Israel went out of bondage, and all the emblems of the ships bore upon the proverb "In vino veritas." Bacbuc is both the Bottle and the priestess of the Bottle.

Oracle of Sieve and Shears (The). This method of divination is mentioned by Theocritus. The modus operandi was as follows:—The points of the shears were stuck in the rim of a sieve, and two persons supported them with their finger-tips. Then a verse of the Bible was read aloud, and St. Peter and St. Paul were asked if it was A. B. or C ( naming the persons suspected). When the right person was named, the sieve would suddenly turn round.

"Searching for things lost with a sieve and shears."—Ben Jonson: Alchemist, i. 1.

Oracles were extremely numerous, and very expensive to those who consulted them. The most famous were Dodona, Ammon (in Libya), Delphos, that of Trophonius (in Boeotia), and that of Venus in Paphos.

Oracle of Apollo, at Delphi, the priestess of which was called the Pythianess, at Delos, and at Chios.

Oracle of Diana, at Celsichus, of the Ephesians, and another in Rome.

Oracles of Heracles, at Athens, and another at Gades.

Oracle of St Peter, at Dodona (the most noted); another at Ammon, in Libya; another at Crete.

Oracle of Mars, in Thrace, Minerva, in Mycenae: Pax, in Arcadia.

Oracles of Tithiasica, in Boeotia, where only men made the responses.

Oracle of Venus, at Paphos, another at Aphaca, and many others.

In most of the temples women, sitting on a tripod, made the responses.

Orange Lilies (The). The 35th Foot. Called "orange" because their facings were orange till 1832; and "lilies" because they were given white plumes in recognition of their gallantry in the battle of Quebec in 1759, when they routed the Royal Roussillon French Grenadiers. The white plume was discontinued in 1800. The 35th Foot is now called the "Royal Sussex."

William of Orange. William III. of England (1650, 1689-1702). "Orange" is a corruption of Arausio, in the department of Vaucluse, some sixteen miles from Avignon. The town was the capital of a principality from the eleventh to the sixteenth century. The last sovereign was Philibert de Chalons, whose sister married William, Count of Nassau. William's grandson (William) married Mary, eldest daughter of Charles I., and their eldest son was our William III., referred to in the text.

Orange Lodges or Clubs are referred to in Atherani Curiosa, published in 1763. Thirty years later the Orange-men were so very powerful a society, having a "grand lodge" extending over the entire province of Ulster, and ramifying through all the centres of Protestantism in Ireland." (See next article, and ORANGEMAN.)

Orange Peel. A nickname given to Sir Robert Peel when Chief Secretary for Ireland (1812-1818), on account of his strong anti-Catholic proclivities. (See above, and ORANGEMAN.)

Orange-tawny. The ancient colour appropriated to clerks and persons of inferior condition. It was also the colour worn by the Jews. Hervey, Lord Hervey, says, "Jews should have orange-tawny bonnets, because they do Judaize." (Essay xii.) Bottom the weaver asked Quince what coloured beard he was to wear for the character of Pyramus: "I will discharge it in either your straw-coloured beard, your orange-tawny beard, your purple-ingrain beard, or your French crown-colour, which is a perfect yellow." (Otho/mm Night's Dream, i. 2.)

Orange Blossoms Worn at Weddings. The Saracen brides used to wear orange blossoms as an emblem of fertility; and occasionally the same emblem may have been worn by European brides ever since the time of the Crusades; but the general adoption of wreaths of orange blossoms for brides is comparatively a modern practice, due especially to the recent taste for flower-language. The subject of bridal decorations being made a study, and the Orange flower being found suitable, from the use made of it by the ancient Saracens, it was introduced by modistes as a fit ornament for brides. The notion once planted, soon became a custom, now very generally adopted by those who study the conventions of society, and follow the accepted fashions. (See Olive.)

To gather orange blossoms, To look for a wife. A bride wears orange blossoms to indicate the hope of fruitfulness, no tree being more prolific. An orange tree of moderate size will yield three or four thousand oranges in a year; and the blossom being white, is a symbol of innocence and chastity. The orange was also used by Cardinal Wolsey as a pomander. It is said that some sweet oranges turn bitter by neglect.

Orangeman. A name given by Roman Catholics to the Protestants of Ireland, on account of their adhesion to William III. of the House of Orange; they had been previously called "Prep-of-Day Boys." The Roman party were Jacobites. (See ORANGE LODGES.)

Orana. The lady-love of Amadis of Gaul.

Orator Henley. The Rev. John Henley, who for about thirty years delivered lectures on theological, political, and literary subjects. (1692-1756.)

Orbillian Stick (The). A cane or birch-rod. Orbillius was the schoolmaster who taught Horace, and Horace calls him Plu/iscus (the logger). (Ep. ii. 71.)

Oro (in Orlando Furioso). A sea-monster that devoured men and women. He haunted the seas near Ireland. Orlando threw an anchor into his open jaws, and then dragged the monster to the Irish coast, where he died.

Orc. The Orkney Islands, or Orcades.

Orchard properly means a kitchen garden, a yard for herbs. (Saxon, ort/gyard—i.e. wort-yard.) Wort enters into the names of numerous herbs, as mugwort, liver-wort, spleen-wort, etc.

"The hortyard entering [he admires the fair And pleasant plants]."

Or'sus. The abode of the dead; death. (Roman mythology.)

Or'deal (Saxon, great judgment), instituted long before the Conquest, and not abolished till the reign of Henry III, Ordinarily, Ordeals were of several kinds, but the most usual were by wager of battle, by hot or cold water, and by fire. This method of "trial" was introduced from the notion that God would defend the right, even by miracle if needful.

1. Wager of battle, was when the accused person was obliged to fight anyone who charged him with guilt. This ordeal was allowed only to persons of rank.

2. Of fire, was another ordeal for persons of rank only. The accused had to hold in his hand a piece of red-hot iron, or had to walk blindfold and barefoot among nine red-hot plough-shares laid at unequal distances. If he escaped unjured he was accounted innocent, alter non. This might be performed by deputy.

3. Of hot water, was an ordeal for the common people. The accused was required to plunge his arm up to the elbow in scalding hot water, and was pronounced guilty if the skin was injured in the experiment.

4. Of cold water, was also for the common people. The accused, being bound, was tossed into a river; if he sank he was acquitted, but if he floated he was accounted guilty.

5. Of the bier, when a person suspected of murder was required to touch the corpse; if guilty the "blood of the dead body would start forth afresh."

6. Of the cross. Plaintiff and defendant had to stand with their arms crossed over their breasts, and he who could endure the longest won the suit.

7. Of the Eucharist. This was for clergymen suspected of crime. It was supposed that the elements would choke him, if taken by a guilty man.

8. Of the corned. or consecrated bread and cheese. Godwin, Earl of Kent, is said to have been choked when he submitted to this ordeal, being accused of the murder of the king's brother.

"This sort of ordeal was by no means unusual. Thus in Ceylon, a man suspected of theft is required to bring what he holds nearest before a judge, and placing a heavy stone on the head of his substitute, says "May this stone crush thee to death if I am guilty of this offence."

In Turkey, an assacker sets a wild bear and an hatchet before the tribunal, saying, as he swallows a piece of bread, "May the bear devour me, and the hatchet chop off my head, if I am guilty of the crime laid to my charge."

9. Of lot, two dice, one marked by a cross, being thrown.

Ordinal. It was a fiery ordeal. A severe test. (See above, No. 2.)

Ordinary

Order! When members of the House of Commons and other debaters call out Order, they mean that the person speaking is transgressing the rules of the House.

Order of the Cookle. Created by St. Louis in 1269, in memory of a disastrous expedition made by sea for the succour of Christians. Perrot says it scarcely survived its foundation.

Order of the Day (The), in parliamentary parlance, is applied to the prearranged agenda of "Private Members' Bills." On Tuesdays these bills always stand after "notices of motions." (See Previous Question.)

To move for the Order of the Day is a proposal to set aside a government measure on a private members' day (Tuesday), and proceed to the prearranged agenda. If the motion is carried, the agenda must be proceeded with, unless a motion "to adjourn" is carried.

Orders. In Orders or In Holy Orders. Belonging to the clerical order or rank. To take Orders. To become a clergyman.

* The word "order" means not only a mandate, but also an official rank, and in the Catholic Church, a "rule" of life, as Ordo albus (white friars or Augustines), Ordo niger (black friars or Dominicans). In "Holy Orders" is in the plural number, because in the Protestant Church there are three ranks of clergymen—deacons, priests, and bishops. In the Catholic Church there are four major orders and four minor ones. According to Du Cange, the Ordines minori are Subdeacons, Deacons, Presbyterats, and Episcopals (Subdeacon, Deacon, Priest, and Bishop).

Orders of Architecture. These five are the classic orders: Tuscan, Doric, Ionic, Corinthian, and Composite.

The following was the usual practice: Corinthian, for temples of Venus, Flora, Pallas, and the Water nymphs. Doric, for temples of Minerva, Mars, and Hercules. IONIC, for temples of Juno, Diana, and Bacchus. Tuscan, for groutes and all rural deities.

Ordigale. The otter in the tale of Reynard the Fox (part iii.).

Ordinary (An). One who has an "ordinary or regular jurisdiction" in his own right, and not by deputation. Thus a judge who has authority to take cognisance of causes in his own right is an ordinary. A bishop is an ordinary in his own diocese, because he has authority to take cognisance of ecclesiastical matters therein; but an archbishop is the ordinary of his province, having authority in his own right to receive appeals therein from inferior jurisdictions. The chaplain of Newgate was also called the ordinary thereof.

Ordinary (An). A public dinner where each guest pays his quota; a table d’hôte.

"Twist a dinner: I know they stay for you at the ordinary."—Beaumont and Fletcher : Scornful Lady, i. 1.

Oread (plural, Oreada [3 syl.] or Oreaden [4 syl.]). Nymphs of the mountains. (Greek, oreas, a mountain.)

Oreilles. Sir W Scott (Waverley, x.) speaks of ramum primum notur thus:—

"C’est des oreilles," that is, it is strong and induces sleep. It makes one "Dormir sur les oreilles." Littéré, however, says, "Though wine of une oreille is excellent, that of deux oreilles is execrable."

"Vin d’une oreille, le bon vin ; vin de deux oreilles, les mauvais. On appelle, ainsi le bon vin, parce que le bon vin fait pencher la tête de celui qui le goûte d’un côté seulement ; et le mauvais vin, parce qu’on secoue la tête, et par conséquent le deux oreilles."

Orelle. The steed of Don Roderick, the last of the Goths, noted for its speed and symmetry. (See Horse.)

Orella’na. The river Amazon in America: so called from Orellana, lieutenant of Pizarro.

Orfeo and Heurdo’dis. The tale of Orpheus and Eurydice, with the Gothic machinery of elves or fairies.

Orgies (2 syl.). Drunken revels, riotous feasts; so called from the nocturnal festivals in honour of Bacchus. (Greek, orgē, violent emotion.)

Orgoglio (pron. Or-gog-lo’yo). The word is Italian, and means "Arrogant Pride," or The Man of Sin. A hideous giant as tall as three men; he was son of Earth and Wind. Finding the Red Cross Knight at the fountain of Idleness, he beats him with a club and makes him his slave. Una, hearing of these mischances, tells King Arthur, and Arthur liberates the knight and slays the giant. Moral: The Man of Sin had power given him to "make war with the saints and to overcome them" for "forty and two months" (Rev. xiii. 5, 7), then the "Ancient of Days came," and overcame him (Dan. vii. 21, 22). (Spenser : Faerie Queene, book i.)

* * *

Arm—i.e. Bohemia was first cut off from the Church of Rome. He then cut off the giant’s "right leg"—i.e. England; and, this being cut off, the giant fell to the earth, and was afterwards dispatched.

Orgon. Brother-in-law of Tartuffe. His credulity is proverbial: he almost disbelieved his senses, and saw everyone and everything through the couleur de rose of his own honest heart. (Molière: Tartuffe.)

Oria’na. The beloved of Am’adis of Gaul, who called himself Beltene’bros when he retired to the Poor, Rock. (Amadis de Gaul, ii. 6.) Queen Elizabeth is sometimes called the "peerless Oria’ta," especially in the madrigals entitled the Triumphs of Oria’ta (1601).

Oria’na. The nursing of a lioness, with whom Esphandian, son of Oria’na and Am’adis of Gaul, fell in love, and for whom he underwent all his perils and exploits. She is represented as the fée est, gentlest, and most faithful of womankind.

Orlando [O’ron’d]. A fay who lived at Rosebush, and brought up Mangis d’Aggremont (q.v.). When her protégé grew up she loved him "d’un si grand amour, qu’elle doute fort qu’il ne se déparé d’arrecutes elle." (Romance de Mangis d’Aggremont et de Viran son Frère.)

Oriel. A fairy whose empire lay along the banks of the Thames, when King Oberon held his court in Kensington Gardens. (Tickell: Kensington Gardens.)

Oriental. The placing of the east window of a church due east, that is, so that the rising sun may at noon shine on the altar. Anciently, churches were built with their axes pointing to the rising sun on the saint’s day; so that a church dedicated to St. John was not parallel to one dedicated to St. Peter. The same practice prevailed both in Egypt and ancient Greece.

Modern churches are built nearly due east and west as circumstances will allow, quite regardless of the saint’s day.

Oriflamme (3 syl.). First used in France as a national banner in 1119. It consisted of a crimson flag mounted on a gilt staff (un glaive tout doré où est attaché une bannière vermillon). The flag was cut into three "vandykes" to represent "tongues of fire," and between each was a silken tassel. This celebrated standard was the banner of St. Denis; but when the Counts of Vexin became possessed of the abbey the banner passed into their hands. In 1082 Philippe I. united Vexin to the crown, and the sacred Oriflamme belonged to the king. It was carried to the field after the battle of Agincourt, in 1415. The romance writers say that “mescroans” (infidels) were blinded by merely looking on it. In the Roman de Girart the Saracens are represented as saying, “If we only set eyes on it we are all dead men” (“Se's attendus tant somnus mors et pris”). Froissart says it was no sooner unfurled at Rosseq than the fog cleared off, leaving the French in light, while their enemies remained in misty darkness still. (Or. gold, referring to the staff; flamme, flame, referring to the tongues of fire.)

Origenists. An early Christian sect who drew their opinions from the writings of Origen. They maintained Christ to be the Son of God only by adoption, and denied the eternity of future punishments.

Original Sin. That corruption which is born with us, and is the inheritance of all the offspring of Adam. As Adam was the federal head of his race, when Adam fell the taint and penalty of his disobedience passed to all his posterity.

Orillo or Orillo (in Orlando Furioso, book viii.). A magician and robber who lived at the mouth of the Nile. He was the son of an ump and fairy. When any limb was lopped off he restored it by his magic power, and when his head was cut off he put it on his neck again. Astolpho encountered him, cut off his head, and fled with it. Orillo mounted his horse and gave chase. Meanwhile Astolpho with his sword cut the hair from the head. Life was in one particular hair, and as soon as that was severed the head died, and the magician’s body fell lifeless.

Orinda, called the “Incomparable,” was Mrs. Katherine Philips, who lived in the reign of Charles II. and died of small-pox. Her praises were sung by Cowley, Dryden, and others. (See Dryden’s Ode To the Memory of Mrs. Anne Killigrew.)

Orion, a giant hunter, noted for his beauty. He was blinded by Cepheus, but Vulcan sent Cedalion to be his guide, and his sight was restored by exposing his eyeballs to the sun. Being slain by Diana, he was made one of the constellations, and is supposed to be attended with stormy weather. “Asur-gens fluctu nimbo'ne Orion.” (Virgil: Aeneid, i. 539.)

“As beautiful as Orin.” Homer: Iliad, xviii.

Wife of Orion. Side.

Dogs of Orion. Arctoph’ones and Ptooph’agos.

Orkborne (Dr.). A learned student, very dry and uncompanionable; very particular over his books, and the tutor of Eugenia, the niece of Sir Hugh. He is a character in Camilla, the third novel of Mme. D’Arblay. Eugenia was deformed owing to an accident partly caused by her uncle; and Sir Hugh, making the best compensation in his power, appointed Dr. Orkborne to educate her, and also left her heiress to his estates.

“Mr. Oldnuck hated putting to rights as much as Dr. Orkborne, or any other professor.” - Scott: Antiquary.

Orkneys. Either the Teutonic Ork-n-eyes (the water or islands of the whirlpool), in allusion to the two famous whirlpools near the Isle of Swima; or else the Norwegian Orkneyar (northern islands), the Hebrides being the Sudreyjar, or southern islands.

Orlando. The youngest son of Sir Rowland de Boys. At a wrestling match the banished duke’s daughter, Rosalind, who took a lively interest in Orlando, gave him a chain, saying, “Gentleman, wear this for me.” Orlando, flying because of his brother’s hatred, met Rosalind in the forest of Arden, disguised as a country lad, seeking to join her father. In time they become acquainted with each other, and the duke assented to their union. (Shakespeare: As You Like It.)

Orlando, called Rotolando or Roland, and Rutlandus in the Latin chronicles of the Middle Ages, the paladin, was lord of Anglant, knight of Brava, son of Milo d’Anglesis and Bertha, sister of Charlemagne. Though married to Alabinda, he fell in love with Angelica, daughter of the infidel king of Cathay; but Angelica married Medoro, a Moor, with whom she fled to India. When Orlando heard thereof he turned mad, or rather his wits were taken from him for three months by way of punishment, and deposited in the moon. Astolpho went to the moon in Elijah’s chariot, and St. John gave him an urn containing the lost wits of Orlando. On reaching earth again, Astolpho first bound the madman, then holding the urn to his nose, the errant wits returned, and Orlando, cured
Orlando Furioso

An epic poem in forty-six cantos, by Ariosto (digested by Hoole into twenty-four books, but retained by Rowe in the original form). The subject is the siege of Paris by Agramant the Moor, when the Saracens were overthrown. In the pagan army were two heroes—Rodo'mont, called the Mars of Africa, and Roge'tro. The latter became a Christian convert. The poem ends with a combat between these two, and the overthrow of Rodomont.

The anachronisms of this poem are most marvellous. We have Charlemagne and his paladins joined by King Edward of England, Richard Earl of Warwick, Henry Duke of Clarence, and the Dukes of York and Gloucester (bk. vi.). We have cannon employed by 'tyrnie, King of Friza (bk. iv.), and also in the siege of Paris (bk. vi.). We have the Moors established in Spain, whereas they were not invited over by the Saracens for nearly 300 years after Charlemagne's death. In book xvii. we have Præster John, who died 1292; in the last three Constantine the Great, who died 337.

Orlando Innamorato (Roland the paladin in love). A romantic epic in three books, by the Count Boiardo of Scandiano, in Italy (1495).

There is a burlesque in verse of the same title by Berni of Tuscany (1538), author of Cidomarke Ryme.

Orleans. Your explanation is like an Orleans comment—i.e. Your comment or explanation makes the matter more obscure. The Orleans College was noted for its worldly commentaries, which darkened the text by overloading it with words. (A French proverb.)

Ormondine (3 syl.). The necromancer who by his magic arts threw St. David for seven years into an enchanted sleep, from which he was redeemed by St. George. (The Seven Champions of Christendom, i. 9.)

Ormulum. A paraphrase of Scripture in Anglo-Saxon verse; so called from the name of the author, Orm or Ormin (13th cent.).

Ormuzd or Ormuz. The principle or angel of light and good, and creator of all things, according to the Magian system. (See Ahriman.)

Ormuz'd'es (4 syl.). The first of the Zoroastrian trinity. The divine goodness of Plato; the devisor of creation (the father). The second person is Mithras, the eternal intellect, architect of the world; the third, Ahriman (Psyche), the mundane soul.

Orroan' dés. (Only son of a Scythian king, whose love for Stattir (widow of Alexander the Great, and daughter of Dur'ius) leads him into numerous dangers and difficulties, which he surmounts. [La Cupidr: C'assandra, a romance.]

Or'roins (General History of), from Creation to A.D. 417, in Latin by a Spanish presbyter of the 5th century, was translated into Anglo-Saxon by Alfred the Great.

Orrotalt, according to the Greek writers, was the Bacchus of the ancient Arabs. This, however, is a mistake, for the word is a corruption of Allah Ta'ala (God the Most High).

Orpheus (2 syl.). A Thracian poet who could move even inanimate things by his music. When his wife Eurydice died he went into the infernal regions, and so charmed King Pluto that Eurydice was released from death on the condition that Orpheus would not look back till he reached the earth. He was just about to place his foot on the earth when he turned round, and Eurydice vanished from him in an instant. Pope introduces this tale in his St. Cecilia's tale.

The tale of Orpheus is thus explained: Aëdeson, King of Thesspro'tis, was for his cruelty called Pluto, and having seized Eurydice as she fled from Aristaeos, detained her captive. Orpheus obtained her release on certain conditions, which he violated, and lost her a second time.

There is rather a striking resemblance between the fate of Eurydice and that of Lot's wife. The former was emerging from hell, the latter from Sodom; Orpheus looked back and Eurydice was snatched away; Lot's wife looked back and was converted into a pillar of salt.

A Scandinavian Orpheus. "Odin was so eminently skilled in music, and could sing airs so tender and melodious, that the rocks would expand with delight, while the spirits of the infernal regions would stand motionless around him, attracted by the sweetness of his strains.

(Scandinavia, by Crichton and Wheaton, vol. i. p. 81.)

Orpheus of Highwaymen. So Gay has been called on account of his Beggar's Opera. (1683-1732.)

Orrery. An astronomical toy to show the relative movements of the planets, etc., invented by George Graham, who sent his model to Rowley, an instrument maker, to make one for Prince Eugène. Rowley made a copy of it for Charles Boyle, third Earl of Orrery, and Sir Richard Steele named it an orrery out of compliment to the earl. One of the best is Fulton's, in Kelvin Grove Museum, West End Park, Glasgow.

Orain. One of the leaders of the rabble that attacked Hudibras at a bear-baiting. He was "famous for wise conduct and success in war." Joshua Goaling, who kept the bears at "Paris Garden," in Southwark, was the academy figure of this character.

Oraini (Maffio). A young Italian nobleman, whose life was saved by Genna'ro at the battle of Rimini. Oraini became the staunch friend of Genna'ro, but both were poisoned at a banquet given by the Princess Negroni. (Donizetti: Lucrezia di Borgia, an opera.) This was the name of the conspirator who attempted the life of Napoleon III.

Orson. Twin brother of Valentine, and son of Hellissant, sister of King Popin and wife of Alexander, Emperor of Constantinople. The twin brothers were born in a wood near Orleans, and Orson was carried off by a bear, which suckled him with her cubs. When he grew up he was the terror of France, and was called the Wild Man of the Forest. He was reclaimed by Valentina, overthrew the Green Knight, and married Fesn, the daughter of Duke Savory of Aquitaine. (French, orson, a little bear.) (Valentine and Orson.)

Orthodox Sunday, in the Eastern Church, is the First Sunday in Lent, to commemorate the restoration of images in 843.

("In the Church of England, on the first day in Lent, usually called " Ash Wednesday," the clergy are directed to read "the... sentences of God’s curving against impudent sinners.")

I shall not eat your orts—i.e. your leavings.

"Let him have time a beggar's orts to crave."—Shakespeare: Days of Lucrece.

Orras. "Orthas a queron, non a salisce." Latin for "sprung from an oak, and not from a willow"—i.e. stubborn stuff; one that cannot bend to circumstances.

Orrwine (2 syl.). Knight of Metz, sister's son of Sir Hagen of Trony, a Burgundian in the Nablungn Lied.

Orviet'tan (3 syl.) or Venice treacle, once believed to be a sovereign remedy against poison. From Orvieto, a city of Italy, where it is said to have been first used.

"With these drugs will I, thus very day, compound the true orvietan."—Sir Walter Scott: Kenilworth, chap. xtv.

O' Sacrum. (See Luz.) A triangular bone situated at the lower part of the vertebral column, of which it is a continuation. Some say that this bone was so called because it was in the part used in sacrifice, or the sacred part; Dr. Nash says it is so called "because it is much bigger than any of the vertebrae;" but the Jewish rabbis say the bone is called sacred because it resists decay, and will be the germ of the "new body" at the resurrection. (Hudibras, part iii. caniwo 2.)

Osbaldstone. Nine of the characters in Sir Walter Scott's Rob Roy bear this name. There are (i) the London merchant and Sir Hildebrand, the heads of two families; (2) the son of the merchant is Francis, the pretender of Diana Vernon; (3) the "distinguished" offspring of the brother are Percival the sol, Thorncliffe the bulky, John the game-keeper, Richard the horse-jockey, Wilfred the fool, and Rashleigh the scholar, by far the worst of all. This last worthy is slain by Rob Roy, and dies cursing his cousin Frank, whom he had injured in every way he could contrive.

Oseway (Dane). The ewe in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Osiris (in Egyptian mythology). Judge of the dead, and potestane of the kingdom of the ghosts. This brother and husband of Isis was worshipped under the form of an ox. The word means Many-eyed;
Ostrich is the moon, husband of Isis.

"We see Ostrich represented by the moon, and by an eye at the top of fourteen steps. These steps symbolise the fourteen days of the waning moon."—J. N. Lockyer, in the Nineteenth Century, July, 1869, p. 31.

Ostrich is used to designate any waning luminary, as the setting sun, as well as the waning moon or setting planet.

"Ostrich is the setting sun, but the rising sun is Horus, and the moonday sun Ra.

Osmund. A necromancer, who by his enchantments raised up an army to resist the Christians. Six of the Champions of Christendom were enchanted by Osmond, but St. George restored them. Osmond tore off his hair in which lay his spirit of enchantment, bit his tongue in two, disembowelled himself, cut off his arms, and then died. (The Seven Champions of Christendom, i. 19.)

Osnaburg. The Duke of York was Bishop of Osnaburg. Not prelate, but sovereign-bishop. By the treaty of Westphalia, in 1648, it was decreed that the ancient bishopric should be vested alternately in a Catholic bishop and a Protestant prince of the House of Luneburg. Frederick, Duke of York, was the last sovereign-bishop of Osnaburg. In 1803 the district was attached to Hanover, and it now forms part of the kingdom of Prussia.

Osnaburg. A kind of coarse linen made of flax and tow, originally imported from Osnaburg.

Osprey or Ospray (a corruption of Latin ostrasfragus, the bone-breaker). The fish-eagle, or fishing hawk (Pandion haliaetus).

Ossa. Heaping Pelon upon Ossa. Adding difficulty to difficulty: fruitless efforts. The allusion is to the attempt of the giants to scale heaven by piling Mount Ossa upon Mount Pelion.

"Ter sunt comminutae peli Ossana."

Ossel'd. Son of the Evening Star. When "old and ugly, broken with age, and weak with coughing," he married Owenee, youngest of the ten daughters of a North hunter. She loved him in spite of his ugliness and decrepitude, because "all was beautiful within him." One day, as he was walking with his nine sisters-in-law and their husbands, he leaped into the hollow of an oak-tree, and came out "tall and straight and strong and handsome;" but Owenee at the same moment was changed into a weak old woman, "wasted, wrinkled, old, and ugly;" but the love of Ossel'd was not weakened. The nine brothers and sisters-in-law were all transformed into birds for mocking Osseo and Owenee when they were ugly, and Owenee, recovering her beauty, had a son, whose delight as he grew up was to shoot at his aunts and uncles, the birds that mocked his father and mother. (Longfellow: Hiawatha, xii.)

Ossian. The son of Fingal, a Scotch warrior-hard who lived in the third century. The poems called Ossian's poems were first published by James M'Pherson in 1760, and professed to be translations from Erse manuscripts collected in the Highlands. This is not true. M'Pherson no doubt based the poems on traditions, but not one of them is a translation of an Erse manuscript; and so far as they are Ossianic at all, they are Irish, and not Scotch.

Ostend Manifesto. A declaration made in 1857 by the Ministers of the United States in England, France, and Spain, "that Cuba must belong to the United States."

Oster-Monath. The Anglo-Saxon name of April.

Ostler, jocosely said to be derived from oast-stealer, but actually from the French ostler, an innkeeper.

Ostracism. Oyster-shelling, black-balling, or expelling. Clis'sthenes gave the people of Attica the power of removing from the state, without making a definite charge, any leader of the people likely to subvert the government. Each citizen wrote his vote on an earthenware table (ostracon), whence the term.

Ostrich. When hunted the ostrich is said to run a certain distance and then thrust its head into a bush, thinking, because it cannot see, that it cannot be seen by the hunters. (See Crocodile.)

Ostrich Brains. It was Heliogabalus who had battuees of ostriches for the sake of their brains. Smollett says "he had six hundred ostriches compounded in one mess." (Peregrine Pickle.)

Ostrich Eggs in Churches. Ostrich eggs are suspended in several Eastern churches as symbols of God's watchful care. It is said that the ostrich hatches her eggs by gazing on them, and if she suspends her gaze even for a minute or so, the eggs are addled. Furthermore, we are told that if an egg is bad the Ostrich Stomachs. Strong stomachs which will digest anything. The ostrich swallows large stones to aid its gizzard, and when confined where it cannot obtain them will swallow pieces of iron or copper, bricks, or glass.

Ostringers, Sperviters, Falconers. Ostringers are keepers of goshawks and terceels. Sperviters are those who keep sparrowhawks or muskets. Falconers are those who keep any other kind of hawk, being long-winged. (Markham: Gentleman's Academie, or Books of S. Albans.)

Oswald's Well commemorates the death of Oswald, Christian king of Northumbria, who fell in battle before Penda, pagan king of Mercia, in 642.

Othello (in Shakespeare's tragedy so called). A Moor, commander of the Venetian army, who eloped with Desdemona. Brabantio accused him of necromancy, but Desdemona, being sent for, refuted the charge. The Moor, being then sent to drive the Turks from Cyprus, won a signal victory. On his return, Iago played upon his jealousy, and persuaded him that Desdemona intrigued with Cassio. He therefore murdered her, and then stabbed himself.

Othello the Moor. Shakespeare borrowed this tale from the seventh of Giovanni Giraldi Cinthio's third decade of stories. Cinthio died 1573.

Othello's Occupation's Gone (Shakespeare). "Jam quadrige nec demuertereunt" (Petronius). I am laid on the shelf; I am no longer the observed of observers.

Other Day (Thur). The day before yesterday. The Old English other was used for second, as in Latin, unus, alter, tertius; or proximus, alter, tertius. Starting from to-day, and going backwards, yesterday was the proximus ab illo; the day before yesterday was the altera ab illo, or the other day; and the day preceding that was tertius ab illo, or three days ago. Used to express "a short time ago."

Othman, Osmen, or Othman, surnamed the Conqueror. Founder of the Turkish power, from whom the empire is called the Ottoman, and the Turks are called Osmans, Othmanis, Osmans, etc. Peter the Great, being hemmed in by the Turks on the banks of the Pruth, was rescued by his wife, Catherine, who negotiated a peace with the Grand Vizier.

O'tium cum Dig. [diguita'et]. Retirement after a person has given up business and has saved enough to live upon in comfort. The words are Latin, and mean "retirement with honour." They are more frequently used in jest, familiarity, and ridicule.

Otus. A giant, brother of Ephialtis (q.v.). Both brothers grew nine inches every month. According to Pliny, Otus was forty-six cubits (sixty-six feet) in height. (Greek fable.) (See GIANTS.)

O'Trigger (Sir Lucas) in The Rivals (Sheridan).

Out (French for "yes"). A contraction of Hoc igitur. Thus, hoc-il', ho-il', o't, ot, out.

Out. Out of God's blessing into the warm sun. One of Ray's proverbs, meaning from good to less good. "Ab equis ad avsimus." When the king says to Hamlet "How is it that the clouds still hang on you?" the prince answers, "No, my lord, I am too much i' the sun," meaning, "I have lost, God's blessing, for too much of the sun"—i.e. this far inferior state.

"Then out of heaven's benediction comes To the warm sun." Shakespeare: King Lear, ii. 2.

To have it out. To contest either physically or verbally with another to the utmost of one's ability; as, "I mean to have it out with him one of these days;" "I had it out with him"—i.e. "I spoke my mind freely and without reserve." The idea is that of letting loose pent-up disapprobation.

Out-Herod Herod (7t). To go beyond even Herod in violence, brutality, or extravagant language. In the old miracle plays Herod was the type of tyranny and violence, both of speech and of action.

Out and Out. Incomparably, by far, or beyond measure; as, "He was out and out the best man." "It is an out-and-outer" means nothing can exceed it. It is the word utter, the Anglo-Saxon utterre.

Out in the Fifteen—i.e. in the rebel army of the Pretender, in 1716
Out in the Forty-five

(Out in the Forty-five—i.e. in the rebel army of the Young Pretender, in 1745 (George II.). (Howitt : History of England, vol. iv. p. 347.)

Out of Harness. Not in practice, retired. A horse out of harness is one not at work.

Out of Pocket. To be out of pocket by a transaction is to suffer loss of money thereby. More went out of the pocket than came into it.

Out of Sorts. Indisposed, in bad spirits. The French locution is rather remarkable—Ne pas être dans son assiette. "To sort" is to arrange; "a sort" is one of the orders so sorted.

Out of sorts. In printers’ language, means not having sufficient of some particular letter, mark, or figure.

Out of the Wood. "You are not out of the wood yet," not yet out of danger. "Don’t shout till you are out of the wood," do not think yourself safe till you are quite clear of the threatened danger. When freebooters were masters of the forests no traveller was safe till he had got clear of their hunting ground.

Outis (Greek, wóbdy). A name assumed by Odysseus in the cave of Polyphemus. When the monster roared with pain from the loss of his eye, his brother giants demanded from a distance who was hurting him: "Nobody," thundered out Polyphemus, and his companions went their way. Odysseus in Latin is Ulysses.

Outrigger. The leader of a unicorn team. The Earl of Malmsbury, in 1867, so called the representative of the minority in the three-cornered constituency.

Outrun the Constable. (See under Constable.)

Outworks, in fortification. All the works between the enceinte (q. v.) and the covered way (q. v.).

Outzel. The blackbird; sometimes the thrush is so called. (Anglo-Saxon, òzle, a blackbird.) Bottom speaks of the "ouzel cock, so black of hue with orange tawny bill." (Midsummer Night’s Dream.)

Ovation. A triumph; a triumphal reception or entry of the second order; so called from ovís, a sheep, because the Romans sacrificed a sheep to a victorious general to whom an ovation was accorded, but an ox to one who had obtained a "triumph."

Owen Meredith. Robert Bulwer Lytton.

Owl. I live too near a wood to be scared by an owl. I am too old to be frightened by a bogie: I am too old a stager to be frightened by such a person as you.
Owl, the emblem of Athens. Because owls abound there. As Athēna (Minerva) and Athēna (Athens) are the same word, the owl was given to Minerva for her symbol also.

Owl-light. Dusk; the blind man's holiday. French, "Entre chien et loup."

Owl in an Ivy Bush (Like an). Very ugly, a horrible fright [of a fellow]. Said of (or to) a person who has dressed his head unbecomingly, or that has a scared look, an untidy head of hair, or that looks neither wise. The ivy bush was supposed to be the favourite haunt of owls, and numerous allusions to this supposition might be readily cited.

"Good ivy, say to us what birds hast thou?"
None but the owl that cries ' How, how,'!
Carol (time Henry VI.).

Owl was a Baker's Daughter (The). According to legend, our Saviour went into a baker's shop to ask for something to eat. The mistress of the shop instantly put a cake into the oven for Him, but the daughter said it was too large, and reduced it half. The dough, however, swelled to an enormous size, and the daughter cried out, "Heugh! heugh! heugh!" and was transformed into an owl. Ophelia alludes to this tradition in the line—

"Well, God 'told you! They say the owl was a baker's daughter."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 5.

Owlglass. A haunt or abode of owls.

Owlglass (German, Eulenspiegel). Thyl, son of Klaus (Eulenspiegel) prototype of all the knavish fools of modern times. He was a native of Brunswick, and wandered about the world playing all manner of tricks on the people he encountered. (Died 1350.)

Ox, Emblematic of St. Luke. It is one of the four figures which made up Ezekiel's cherub (i. 10). The ox is the emblem of the priesthood, and has been awarded to St. Luke because he begins his gospel with the Jewish priest sacrificing in the Temple. (See Luke.)

The ox is also the emblem of St. Frideswide, St. Leonard, St. Sylvester, St. Medard, St. Julietta, and St. Blan- dina.

He has an ox on his tongue. (Latin, Bovum in lingua habere, to be bribed to silence.) The Greeks had the same expression. The Athenian coin was stamped with the figure of an ox. The French say, "Il a un ox dans la bouche," referring to a dog which is bribed by a bone.

The black ox hath trampled on you (The Antiquary). Misfortune has come to your house. You are henpecked. A black ox was sacrificed to Pluto, the infernal god, as a white one was to Jupiter.

The black ox never trod upon his foot (common proverb). He never knew sorrow. He is not married. (See above.)

The dumb ox. St. Thomas Aquinas; so named by his fellow students at Cologne, on account of his dulness and taciturnity. (1224-1274.)

Albertus said, "We call him the dumb ox, but he will give one day such a bellow as shall be heard from one end of the world to the other." (Alban Butler.)

Ox-eye. A cloudy speck which indicates the approach of a storm. When Elijah heard that a speck no bigger than a "man's hand" might be seen in the sky, he told Ahab that a torrent of rain would overtake him before he could reach home (1 Kings xvii. 14, 45). Thomson alludes to this storm signal in his Summer.

Ox of the Deluge. The Irish name for a great black deer, probably the Archæus Huber'icus, or Irish elk, now extinct.

Balliol, pink, white, blue, white, pink.
Brasenose, black, and gold edges.
Christ Church, blue, with red cardinal's hat.
Corpus, red and blue stripe.
Exeter, black, and red edges.
Jesus, green, with white edges.
Lincoln, blue, with mitre.
Magdalen, black and white.
Merton, blue, and white edges, with red cross.
New College, three pink and two white stripes.
Oriel, blue and white.
Pembroke, pink, white, pink.
Queen's, red, white, blue, white, blue, white, red.
St. John's, yellow, black, red.
Trinity, blue, with double dragon's head, yellow and green, or blue, with white edges.
University, blue, and yellow edges.
Wadham, light blue.
Worcester, blue, with pink, white, blue, blue.
Halset.
St. Alban's, blue, with arrow-head.
St. Edmonds', red, and yellow edges.
St. Mary, white, black, white.
Magdalen, black, and blue edges.

Oxford Blues. The Royal Horse Guards were so called in 1690, because of their blue facings.
Cambridge boat crew, light blue.

Oxford Movement. (See Tracts for the Times.)

Oxford Stroke (in rowing). A long, deep, high-feathered stroke, excellent in very heavy water. The Cambridge stroke is a clear, fine, deep sweep, with a very low feather, excellent in smooth water. The Cambridge pull is the best for smooth water and a short reach, but the Oxford for a "lumpy" river and a four-mile course.

Oxgang, as a land measure, was no certain quantity, but as much as an ox could gang over or cultivate. Also called a bovate. The Latin jugum was a similar term, which Varro defines "Quod junctus boves uno die exarare potest."

Eight oxgangs made a virgate. If an oxgang was as much as an ox could cultivate, then every acre would be about fifteen acres.

Oyer and Terminer (Courts of) are general gaol deliveries, held twice a year in every county. Oyer is French for to hear—i.e. hear in court or try; and terminer is French for to conclude. The words mean that the commissioners appointed are to hear and bring to an end all the cases in the county.

Oyster. Fast as a Kentish oyster, i.e. hermetically sealed. Kentish oysters are proverbially good, and all good oysters are fast closed.

Oyster. No more sense than an oyster. This is French: "Il raisonne comme une huître." Oysters have a mouth, but no head.

Oyster Part (Art). An actor who appears, speaks, or acts only once. Like an oyster, he opens but once.

Oyster and Huître (French) are variants of the same Latin word, ostræa. Old French huître, uître, huître.

Oysters. Who eats oysters on St. James's Day will never want. St. James's Day is the first day of the oyster season (August 5th), when oysters are an expensive luxury eaten only by the rich. By 6, 7 Vict., c. 79, the oyster season begins September 1, and closes April 30.

Oz. (for ounce). 2 made with a tail (3) resembles the old terminal mark 3, indicating a contraction—as vi3. a contraction of vi[delict]; quib3, a contraction of quibus; os3, a contraction of sed (but), and so on.

P. This letter is a rude outline of a man's mouth, the upright being the neck. In Hebrew it is called pe (the mouth).

P. The free P's. William Oxberry was so called, because he was Printer, Poet, Publisher, Publican, and Player. (1784-1824.)

P[alliterative]. In 1548, Placentius, a Dominican monk, wrote a poem of 253 hexameter verses (called Pugna Porcorum), every word of which begins with the letter p. It opens thus:—
"Praise Paul's prize pig's prolific progeny."

In English heroes the letter A or T would be far more easy, as they would give us articles.

P.C. (patres conscripti). The Roman senate. The hundred senators appointed by Romulus were called simply patres; a second hundred added by Tatinus, uper the union of the Sabines with the Romans, were called patres minorum gentium; a third hundred subsequently added by Tarquin's Priscus were termed patres conscripti, an expression applied to a fourth and fifth hundred conscripted to the original patres or senators. Latterly the term was applied to the whole body.

f So f = forte, ff = fortissimo, and fff = fortississimo.

P.P.C. (pour prendre congé). For leave-taking; sometimes written on the address cards of persons about to leave a locality when they pay their farewell visits. In English, paid parting call.

P.S. (post-scriptum). Written afterwards—i.e. after the letter or book was finished. (Latin.)

P's and Q's. Mind your P's and Q's. Be very circumspect in your behaviour.

Several explanations have been suggested, but none seems to be wholly satisfactory. The following comes nearest to the point of the caution:—In the reign of Louis XIV., when wigs of unwieldy size were worn, and bows were made with very great formality, two things were specially required, a "step" with the feet, and a low bend of the body. In the latter the wig would be very apt to get deranged, and even to fall off. The caution, therefore, of the French dancing-master to his pupils was, "Mind your P's [i.e. pieds, feet] and Q's [i.e. queues, wigs]."

Pabana (The) or Peacock Dance. A grave and stately Spanish dance, so called from the manner in which the lady held up her skirt during the performance.

Pacific Ocean (The). So called by Magellan, because he enjoyed calm weather and a placid sea when he sailed across it. All the more striking after the stormy and tempestuous passage of the adjoining straits.

Packing a Jury. Selecting persons on a jury whose verdict may be relied on from prudence, far more than on evidence.

Pac'olet. A dwarf in the service of Lady Clermond. He had a winged horse, which carried off Valentine, Orson, and Clermond from the dungeon of Ferragus to the palace of King Pepin, and afterwards carried Valentine to the palace of Alexander, Emperor of Constantinople, his father. (Valentine and Orson.)

"It is a horse of Pac'olet. (French.) A very swift one, that will carry the rider anywhere; in allusion to the enchanted flying horse of wood, belonging to the dwarf Pac'olet. (See above.)"

"I fear neither shot nor arrow, nor any horse how swift soever he may be, not though he could outstrip the Pegasus of Persians or of Pac'olet, being assured that I can make good my escape." —Aubreton: Epistola, bk. ii p. 24.

Pactolus. The golden sands of the Pactolus. The gold found in the Pactolian sands was from the mines of Mount Tmolus; but the supply ceased at the commencement of the Christian era. (See MNAS.) Now called Bagouly.

Padding. The filling-up stuff of serials. The padding of coats and gowns is the wool, etc., put in to make the figure of the wearer more shapely. Figuratively, stuff in books or speeches to spin them out.

Paddington Fair. A public execution. Tyburn, where executions formerly took place, is in the parish of Paddington. Public executions were abolished in 1868.

Paddle Your Own Canoe. Mind your own business. The caution was given by President Lincoln, of North America.

Paddock. Cold as a paddock. A paddock is a toad or frog; and we have the corresponding phrases "cold as a toad," and "cold as a frog." Both are cold-blooded. "Paddock calls." (Macbeth, i. 1.)

Paddi-whack means an Irish wag, wag being from the Saxon wæg-ion.

Paddy. An Irishman. A corruption of St. Patrick, Irish Padrig.

Padian was long supposed by the Scotch to be the chief school of necromancy; hence Sir Walter Scott says of the Earl of Gowrie—

"He learned the art that none may name in Padua, far beyond the sea." —(Las of the Last Men.)

Padua or Padésoy. A silk stuff originally made at Padua.

Pean. The physician of the celestial gods; the deliverer from any evil or calamity. (Greek, pean, to make to cease.)

Pean. A hymn to Apollo, and applied to the god himself. We are told in Dr. Smith's Classical Dictionary, that this word is from Pean, the physician of the Olympian gods; but surely it could be no honour to the Sun-god to be called by the name of his own vassal. Homer suggests pean, to make to cease, meaning to make diseases to cease; but why supply diseases rather than any other noun? The more likely derivation, mejudier, is the Greek verb pean, to dart; Apollo being called the "fur-darter." The hymn began with "Io Pean." Homer applies it to a triumphal song in general.

Pagan properly means "belonging to a village" (Latin, pagus). The Christian Church fixed itself first in cities, the centres of intelligence. Long after it had been established in towns, idolatrous practices continued to be observed in rural districts and villages, so pagan and villager came to mean the same thing. (See Heathen.)

Pagan Works of Art. In Rome there are numerous works of art intended for Pagan deities and Roman emperors perverted into Christian notabilities.

Angelo, in St. Peter's of Rome, are old Pagan statues of Cupids and winged genii.

Gabriel, in St. Peter's of Rome, is an old Pagan statue of the god Mercury.
poets is so called, and well deserves the compliment. The Shepherd's Calendar of Spenser is largely borrowed from Bellèau's Song on April. (1528-1577.)

Painters and Artists. Characteristics of great artists. The brilliant truth of a Watteau, the dead reality of a Poussin, the touching grace of a Reynolds.

"The colouring of Titian, the expression of Rubens, the grace of Raphael, the purity of Rembrandt, the correctness of Correggio, the learning of Poussin, the air of divinity, the taste of the Graces, the grand contour of Angelo." -

"The April freshness of Gioto, the piety of Fra Angela, the virginal purity of the young Raphael, the sweet gravity of John Bellini, the philosophic depth of Da Vinci, the sublime elevation of Michael Angelo, the suavity of Fra Bartolommeo, the delicacy of the Della Robbia, the restrained powers of Rosalind." - Defects of great artists.

In Michael Angelo, the awkwardness of the frame. In Titian, the pain of the thumb is the prominent.

In Raphael, the ears are badly drawn. In Pinturicchio both ears and hands are badly drawn.

Puer of painters. Parrhasios, the Greek painter, so called himself. (Fifth century B.C.)

Apelles of Cos. (Fourth century B.C.)

Painting. It is said that Apelles, being at a loss to delineate the form of Alexander's horse, dashed his brush at the picture in despair, and died by accident what he could not accomplish by art.

Pair Off. When two members of Parliament, or two opposing electors, agree to absent themselves, and not to vote, so that one neutralizes the vote of the other. The Whips generally find the pairs for members.

Paishd'ian Dynasty. The Kao- Omurs dynasty of Persia was so called from the third of the line (Houshang), who was so named Paishd, or the just lawgiver (n.c. 910-870). (See Kao Omurs.)

Pai'. La Paix des Dames. The treaty concluded at Cambrai, in 1529, between Francois I. and Charles V, of Germany; so called because it was brought about by Louise of Savoy (mother of the French king) and Marguerite, the emperor's aunt.

Pal (.4). A gipsy-word, meaning a brother, or companion.

Palace originally meant a dwelling on the Palatine Hill of Rome. This hill was so called from Pal'ès, a pastoral deity, whose festival was celebrated on April 21st, the "birthday of Rome," to commemorate the day when Romulus, the wolf-child, drew the first furrow at the foot of the hill, and thus laid the foundation of the "Roma Quadr'a," the most ancient part of the city. On this hill Augustus built his mansion, and his example was followed by Tiberius and Nero. Under the last-named emperor, all private houses on the hill had to be pulled down to make room for "The Golden House," called the Palatium, the palace of palaces. It continued to be the residence of the Roman emperors to the time of Alexander Severus. (See PALLACE.)

Paladin. An officer of the Palatium or Byzantine palace, a high dignitary.

Paladins. The knights of King Charlemagne. The most noted are Allory de l'Estoc; Astolfo; Basion de Genevois; Fierambros or Ferunbras; Florismart; Ganelon, the traitor; Geoffroy, Seigneur de Bordelais, and Geoffroy de Frises; Guerin, Duc de Lorraine; Guillaume de l'Estoc, brother of Allory; Guy de Bourgogne; Hoël, Comte de Nantes; Lambert, Prince de Bruxelles; Malagigi; Nami or Nainy de Bavière; Ogier or Oger the Dane; Olivier, son of Regnier, Comte de Gennes; Orlando (see Roland); Otilé; Richard, Duc de Normandie; Rinaldo; Riol du Mans; Roland, Comte de Cenoua, son of Milon and Dame Berthe, Charlemagne's sister; Samson, Duc de Bourgogne; and Thierry d'Araine. Of these, twelve at a time seemed to have formed the coterie of the king. (Latin, palatum, one of the palace.)

"Who bear the laws were knights in Arthur's days. Twelve they, and twelve the peers of Charlemain."

Palémon, originally called Melicertés. Son of Ino; called Palémon after he was made a sea-god. The Roman Portunus, the protecting god of harbours, is the same. (See PALEMON.)

Palais des Thermes. Once the abode of the Roman government of Gaul, as well as of the kings of the first and second dynasties. Here Julius fixed his residence when he was Cesar of Gaul. It is in Paris, but the only part now extant is a vast hall, formerly the chamber of cold baths (seignita-rum), restored by Napoleon III.

Palamedès of Lombardy joined the squadron of adventurers with his two brothers, Achilles and Sforza, in the allied Christian army. He was shot by Clarinda with an arrow. (Tissot: Jerusalem Delivered, book iii. c. ii. 4.)

He is a Palamedes. A clever, ingenious person. The allusion is to the son of Nauplion, who invented measures, scales, dice, etc. He also detected that the madness of Ulysses was only assumed.

Sir Palamedès. A Saracen knight overcome in single combat by Sir Tristram. Both loved Isolde, the wife of King Mark; and after the lady was given up by the Saracen, Sir Tristram converted him to the Christian faith, and stood his godfather at the font. (Thomas the Rhymers.)

Palémon and Arcite (2 syl.). Two young Theban knights who fell into the hands of "Duke Theseus," and were shut up in a dungeon at Athens. Both fell in love with Emily, the duke's sister-in-law. In time they obtained their liberty, and the duke appointed a tournament, promising Emily to the victor. Arcite prayed to Mars to grant him victory, Palémon prayed to Venus to grant him Emily, and both obtained their petition. Arcite won the victory, but, being thrown from his horse, died; Palémon, therefore, though not the winner, won the prize for which he fought. The story is borrowed from Le Teseide of Boccaccio. The Black Horse, a drama by John Fletcher, is the same tale; so called because it was a black horse from which Arcite was thrown. (Chaucer: The Knight's Tale.)

Palat'inate (4 syl.). The province of a palatine, as the Palatinate of the Rhine, in Germany. A palatine is an officer whose court is held in the royal palace, also called the palatine count or palatgraf. There were three palatine counties in England—viz. Chester, Durham, and Lancaster, in which the count exercised a royal authority, just as supreme as though he had been the regal tenant of the palace itself.

Pala'ver comes from the Portuguese palavra (talk), which is palaver, a council of African chiefs.

"Comparisons are odorous: palabras [words], neighbours Verges."—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing, iii. 4.

Pale. Within the pale of my observation—i.e., the scope thereof. The dominion of King John and his successors in Ireland was marked off, and the part belonging to the English crown was called the pale, or the part paled off.

Pale Faces. So Indians call the European settlers.
Palemon. "The pride of swans" in Thomson's Autumn; a poetical representation of Boaz, while the "lovely young Lavinia" is Ruth.

Palemon, in love with the captain's daughter, in Falconer's Shipwreck.

"It is a rayer, and that's a very good one, it came lately from Palermo." Damon and Pithias, i. 227.

Palla. The god of shepherds and their flocks. (Roman mythology.)

Palestine Soup. Soup made of Jerusalem artichokes. This is a good example of blunder begetting blunder. Jerusalem artichoke is a corruption of the Italian Girosale artichoco - i.e. the "sunflower artichoke." From girosale we make Jerusalem, and from Jerusalem artichokes we make Paisley soup.

Palestra (3 syl.). Either the act of wrestling, etc., or the place in which the Grecian youths practised athletic exercises. (Greek, pale.)

Palestrina or Palestina. An island nearly south of Venice, noted for its glass-houses.

Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestina, called "The Prince of Music." (1529-1594.)

Paleotot [pale-t'o]. A corruption of palat-a-toque, a cloak with a hood. Called by Pier Plowman a palatock. The hood or toque has disappeared, but the word remains the same.

Palimpsest. A parchment on which the original writing has been effaced, and something else has been written. (Greek, palin; again; peu, I rub or efface.) When parchment was not supplied in sufficient quantities, the monks and others used to wash or rub out the writing in a parchment and use it again. As they did not wash or rub it out entirely, many works have been recovered by modern ingenuity. Thus Ciceron's De Republica has been restored; it was partially erased to make room for a commentary of St. Augustine on the Psalms. Of course St. Augustine's commentary was first copied, then erased from the parchment, and the original MS. of Ciceron made its appearance.

"Central Asia is a palimpsest; everywhere actual barbarism overlays a bygone civilization." The Times.

Palindrome (3 syl.). A word or line which reads backwards and forwards alike, as Madam, also Roma tibi subito motibus ibit amor. (Greek, palin dromo, to run back again.) (See Sotades,"

The following Greek palindrome is very celebrated:

ΝΙΩΝΟΝΟΜΗΜΑΤΑΜΗΜΟΝΑΝΟΙΝ (Wash my transgressions, not only my face). The legend round the font at St. Mary's, Nottingham. Also on the font in the basilica of St. Sophia, Constantinople; also on the font of St. Stephen d'Egres, Paris; at St. Menin's Abbey, Orleans; at Dulwich College; and at the following churches: Worlingsworth (Suffolk), Harlow (Essex), Knaptown (Norfolk), Melton Mowbray (it has been removed to a neighbouring hamlet), St. Martin's, Ludgate (London), and Hadleigh (Suffolk). (See Ingram: Churches of London, vol. ii.; Malcolm: Londinium Redivivum, vol. iv, p. 366; Allen: London, vol. iii, p. 590.)

"It is said that when Napoleon was asked whether he could have invaded England, he answered "Aile was I ere I saw Eliza."

Palinode (3 syl.). A song or discourse recounting a previous one. A good specimen of the palinode is Horace, book i. ode 16, translated by Swift. Watts has a palinode in which he retracts the praise bestowed upon Queen Anne. In the first part of her reign he wrote a laudatory poem to the queen, but he says that the latter part deluded his hopes and proved him a false prophet. Samuel Butler has also a palinode to recant what he said in a previous poem to the Hon. Edward Howard, who wrote a poem called The British Princes. (Greek, palin ede, a song again.)

Palinurus (in English, Palmury, Any pilot; so called from Palinurus, the steersman of Æneas.

"Oh! think how to his [Pitt's] latest day, When death, just overweening, claimed his prey, With Palinurus' unalter'd mood, Firm at his dangerous post he stood; Each call for needful rest repelled, With one strong arm the rudder held, Till in his fall with piteous way The stearing of the realm gave way."

Pallawa Ware. Dishes and other similar articles covered with models from nature of fish, reptiles, shells, flowers, and leaves, most carefully coloured and in high relief, like the wares of Della Robbia. Bernard Palissy was born at Saintes. (1510-1590.)

Pall, the covering thrown over a coffin, is the Latin pallium, a square piece of cloth used by the Romans to throw over their shoulders, or to cover them in bed; hence a coverlet.

Pall, the long sweeping robe, is the Roman palla, worn only by princes and Pall-bearers. The custom of appointing men of mark for pall-bearers, has come to us from the Romans. Julius Caesar had magistrates for his pall-bearers; Augustus Caesar had senators; but Marcus L. Paulus had the chief men of Macedonia who happened to be at Rome at the time; but the poor were carried on a plain bier on men's shoulders.

Pall Mall. A game in which a palle or iron ball is struck through an iron ring with a mall or mallet.

Palladium. Something that affords effectual protection and safety. The Palladium was a colossal wooden statue of Palus in the city of Troy, said to have fallen from heaven. It was believed that so long as this statue remained within the city, Troy would be safe, but if removed, the city would fall into the hands of the enemy. The statue was carried away by the Greeks, and the city burnt by them to the ground.

The Scotch had a similar tradition attached to the great stone of Scone, near Perth. Edward I. removed it to Westminster, and it is now in the Coronation Chair of England. (See CORONATION, SCONE.)

Palladium of Rome. Aure'le (q.v.).

Palladium of Meg'ara. A golden hair of King Nisus. (See SCYLLA, EDEH HALL.)

Pallas. A name of Minerva, sometimes called Pallas Minerva. According to fable, Pallas was one of the Titans, of giant size, killed by Minerva, who flayed him, and used his skin for armour; whence she was called Pallas Minerva. More likely the word Pallas is from palle, to brandish; and the compound means Minerva who brandishes the spear.

Pallet. The painter in Smollett's Peregrine Pickle. A man without one jot of reverence for ancient customs or modern etiquette.

Pall'iate (3 syl.) means simply to cloak. (Latin, pallium, a cloak.)

"That we should not assemble nor cloke them (our mind) . . . but confess them with a humble, lowly, and obedient heart."—Common Prayer Book.

Palm. An itching palm. A hand ready to receive bribes. The old superstition is that if your palm itches you are going to receive money.

"Let me tell you, Cassius, you yourself Are much condemned to have an itching palm."Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iv. 3.

To bear the palm. To be the best. The allusion is to the Roman custom of giving the victorious gladiator a branch of the palm-tree.

Palm Off (To) wares, tricks, etc., upon the uncury. The allusion is to jugglers, who conceal in the palm of their hand what they pretend to dispose of in some other way. These jugglers were sometimes called palmers.

"You may palm upon us new for old."—Shakespeare.

Palm Oil. Bribes, or rather money for bribes, 1ces, etc.

"In Ireland the machines, or a political movement, will not work unless there is plenty of palm oil to grease 'em."Irish satirical ballads from 1650 to 1800, p. 30.

"The rich may escape with whole skins, but those without 'palm oil' have scant mercy."—Nineteenth Century, 1865, p. 252.

Palm Sunday. The Sunday next before Easter. So called in memory of Christ's triumphant entry into Jerusalem, when the multitude strewed the way with palm branches and leaves. (John xii.)

Sad Palm Sunday. March 29, 1663, the day of the battle of Towton, the most fatal of all the battles in the domestic war between the White and Red Roses. Above 37,000 Englishmen were slain.

"Whose banks received the blood of many thousand men. On Sad Palm Sunday slain that Towton field we call . . . the bloody fields betwixt the White Rose and the Red."—Drayton: Polyolbion, xxviii.

Palm Tree is said to grow faster for being weighed down. Hence it is the symbol of resolution overcoming calamity. It is believed by Orientals to have sprung from the residue of the clay of which Adam was formed.
Palmer. A pilgrim privileged to carry a palm-staff. In Fosbrooke's British Monachism we read that: "certain prayers and psalms being said over the pilgrims, as they lay prostrate before the altar, they were sprinkled with holy water, and received a consecrated palm-staff. Palmers differed from pilgrims in this respect: a pilgrim made his pilgrimage and returned to public or private life; but a Palmer spent all his days in visiting holy shrines, and lived on charity.

"His sandals were with travel torn,
Staff, button, hinge, scrap he wore;
The faded palm-branch in his hand
Shone pilgrim from the Holy Land."—Sir Walter Scott: Minstrel, i. 27.

Palmerin of England. A romance of chivalry, in which Palmerin is the hero. There is another romance called Palmerin de Oliva. (See Southey's Palmarin.)

Palmy Days. Prosperous or happy days, as those were to a victorious gladiator when he went to receive the palm branch as the reward of his prowess.

Palsy. The gentleman's palsy, ruin from gambling. (Elizabeth's reign.)

Paludamentum. A distinctive mantle worn by a Roman general in the time of war. This was the "scarlet robe" in which Christ was invested. (Matt. xxvii. 28.)

"They hung on him an old scarlet paludamentum—some cast-off war-chuck with its purple inner-clave from the Frangarum—ad libitum."—Foxe's Book of Martyrs, chap. iv. 40.

Pan. The name of clubs, short for Pamphile, the French word for the name of clubs.

"Dr. Johnson's derivation of Pan from palm, because 'Pan' triumphs over other gods, is extremely curious. Of course, Pan is short for Pamphile, the French name for the name of clubs."—Notes and Queries (W. W. Skeat, 1 May, 1880), p. 35.

Pam'ela. The title of the finest of Richardson's novels, which once enjoyed a popularity almost equal to that of the romances of Sir Walter Scott.

Pamela. Lady Edward Fitzgerald (died 1831).

Pampas. Treeless plains, some 2,000 miles long and from 300 to 500 broad, in South America. They cover an area of 750,000 square miles. It is an Indian word meaning flats or plains.

Pamper, according to Junius, is from the Latin pan'pinius, French panpire (vine-tendril). Hence Milton—

"Where any row
Of fruit-trees, over-wood, reached too far
Their pampered boughs, and needed hands to check Fructless embraces."—Paradise Lost, v. 214.

The Italian pambruto (well-fed) is a compound of pana (bread) and bere (drink).

Pamphlet, said to be from Pamphila, a Greek lady, whose chief work is a commonplace book of anecdotes, epigrams, notes, etc. Dr. Johnson suggests pan-mul-fllet (held "by a thread")—i.e., stitched, but not bound; another derivation is panyne fila de (pages tacked together). It was anciently written pantiileus, pantile, and by Caxton pantile.

Pamphyle (3 syl.). A sorceress who converted herself into an owl (Aptilina). There was another Pamphyle, the daughter of Apollo, who first taught women to embroider with silk.

"In one very remote village lived the sorceress Pamphyle, who turns her neighbours into various animals... and... spinning... throws a club in the door, [and] the old witch transforms herself into an owl."—Petr: Marianus Epitraneus, chap. v.

Pan. The personification of deity displayed in creation and pervading all things. As flocks and herds were the chief property of the pastoral age, Pan was called the god of flocks and herds. He is also called the god of Lyre, not the "woods" only, but "all material substances." The lower part was that of a goat, because of the aspersion of the earth; the upper part was that of a man, because ether is the "hegemonic of the world;" the lustful nature of the god symbolised the spermatic principle of the world, the libbard's skin was to indicate the immense variety of created things; and the character of "blameless Pan" symbolised that wisdom which governs the world. (Greek, pan, everything.) (Thorsnes: De Naturre Deorum, xxvii. 203.)

"Universal Pan.
Knit with the Graces and the Hours in dance,

Panacea. A universal cure. Panacea was the daughter of Esculapius (god of medicine). The name is evidently composed of two Greek words pan-akeonai (all I cure). Of course the medicine that cures is the daughter or child of the healing art.

Panacea. An Orkney proverb says the well of Kildingue and the dulse (sea-weed) of Guildin will cure every malady save Black-Death. (Sir Walter Scott: The Pirate, chap. xxix.) (See AZOTA.)

Other famous panaceas.
Prince Ahmed's apple, or apple of Samarcand, cured all disorders. (See under APPLE.)

The balsam of Fierabras (q.v.).

The Promethean unguent rendered the body invulnerable.

Aladdin's ring (q.v.) was a preservative against all the ills which flesh is heir to.

Sir Gilbert's sword. Sir T. Malory, in his History of Prince Arthur (i. 116), says:—

"Sir Ismaelot touched the wounds of Sir Meint with Sir Gilbert's sword, and wiped them with the cressedealt, and anon a wholer man was he never in all his life."

(See also Achilles' Spear, Medea's Kettle, Reynard's Ring [see Ring], Panthera, etc.)

Panama: A word which, in 1892, became synonymous with government corruptions. M. de Lesseps undertook to cut a sea passage through the Isthmus of Panama, and in order to raise money from the general public, bribed French senators, deputies, and editors of journals to an enormous extent. An investigation was made into the matter in 1892, and the results were most damaging. In the beginning of 1893 Germany was charged with a similar misappropriation of money connected with the Guelp Fund, in which Prince Ludwig of Bavaria was involved.

"On the other side of the Vosges people will exult that Germany has also her Panama."—Reader's Telegram, Berlin, January 2nd, 1893.

Pancake (2 syl.) is a pudding or "cake" made in a frying-pan. It was originally to be eaten after dinner, to stay the stomachs of those who went to be shriven. The Shrove-bell was called the Pancake Bell, and the day of shriving "Pancake Tuesday."

Panseate (3 syl.) An Athenian hetaira, and her companion in sin. Phrynë, were the models of Venus Rising from the Sea, by Apelles. (See Phrynë.)

Paneras (St.). Patron saint of children. He was a noble Roman youth, martyred by Diocletian at the age of fourteen (A.D. 304). (See Nicholas.)

St. Pancras, in Christian art, is represented as treading on a Saracen and bearing either a stone and sword, or a book and palm-branch. The allusions are to his hatred of infidelity, and the implements of his martyrdom.

Pan'darm. Leader of the Lycians in the Trojan war, but represented as a pimp in mediæval romances. (See Pander.)

Pandects of Justinian (The), found at Amalfi (1137), gave a spur to the study of civil law which changed the whole literary and legal aspect of Europe. The word means much the same as "cyclopedia." (Greek, pan, everything; deek'-onoi, I receive.)

Pandemo'niun (A). A perfect pandemonium. A bear-garden for disorder and licentiousness. In allusion to the parliament of hell in Milton's Paradise Lost, book 1. (Greek, pan daimon, every demon.) (See Cordeliers.)

Pander. To pander to one's vices is to act as an agent to them, and such an agent is termed a pander, from Pandaros, who procures for Troilus the love and graces of Cressida. In Much Abo'ut Nothing it is said that Troilus was "the first employer of pandars" (v. 2). (Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida; Chaucer: Troilus and Cressida.)

"Let all pitiful goers-between be called to the world's end after my name, call them all Pandars. Let all constant men be 'Troiluses,' all false women be 'Cressidas,' and all brokers between, 'Pandars.'"—Shy, Amen."—Troilus and Cressida, ill. 2.

Pandora's Box (A). A present which seems valuable, but which is in reality a curse; as when Midas was permitted, according to his request, to turn whatever he touched into gold, and found his very food became gold, and therefore unestatable. Prometheus made an image and stole fire from heaven to endow it with life. In revenge, Jupiter told Vulcan to make a female statue, and gave her a box which she was to present to the man who married her. Prometheus distrusted Jove and his gifts, but Epimetheus, his brother, married the beautiful Pando'ra, and received the box. Immediately the bridegroom opened the box all the evils that flesh is heir to flew forth, and have ever since continued to afflict the world. The last thing that flew from the box was Hope.

Panel (A), means simply a piece of rug or skin. (Latin, parnum, Greek, pe'nos.) In law it means a piece of parchment containing the names of jurors. To empanel a jury is to enter their names on the panel or roll. The panels of a room are the framed wainscot which supplies the place of tapestry, and the panels of doors are the thin boards like wainscot.
Pangloss (Dr.). A learned pedant, very poor and very conceited, pluming himself on the titles of LL.D. and A.S.S. (Greek, "All-tongue.") (Colman: Herivat-Law.)

Pantho. On one occasion Bacchus, in his Indian expedition, was encompassed with an army far superior to his own; one of his chief captains, named Pan, advised him to command all his men at the dead of night to raise a simultaneous shout. The shout was rolled from mountain to mountain by innumerable echoes, and the Indians, thinking they were surrounded on all sides, took to sudden flight. From this incident, all sudden fits of great terror have been termed panics. (See Judges vii. 18-21.)

Theon gives another derivation, and says that the god Pan struck terror into the hearts of the giants, when they warned against heaven, by blowing into a sea-shell.

Pajanadrum. The Grand Pajanadrum. A village boss, who imagines himself the "Magnus Apollo" of his neighbours. The word occurs in Footh's Envargo of nonsense which he composed to test the memory of old Macklin, who said he had brought his memory to such perfection that he could remember anything by reading it over once.

"I myself knew a man at college who could do the same. He would repeat accurately one hundred lines of Greek by reading them twice over, although he could not accurately translate them. His memory was marvellous, but his uselessness was still more so.

Panbables. To stand upon one's pantables. To stand upon one's dignity. Pantables are slippers, and the idea is se tenir sur le haut bout—i.e. to remit nothing.

"He standeth upon his pantables and regardeth greatly his reputation."—Sayer: Navomus (1580).

Pantagruel. So called because he was born during the drought which lasted thirty and six months, three weeks, four days, thirteen hours, and a little more, in that year of grace noted for having "three Thursdays in one week." His father was Gargantua, the giant, who was four hundred four-score and forty-four years old at the time; his mother, Badebec, died in giving him birth; his grandfather was Grangouier (q.v.). He was so strong that he was chained in his cradle with four great iron chains, like those used in ships of the largest size; being angry at this, he stamped out the bottom of his basanet, which was made of weavers' beams, and, when loosed by the servants, broke his bonds into five hundred thousand pieces with one blow of his infant fist. When he grew to manhood he knew all languages, all sciences, and all knowledge of every sort, out-Solomoning Solomon in wisdom. Having defeated Anarchus, King of the dipping, all submitted except the Almirons. Marching against these people, a heavy rain fell, and Pantagruel covered his whole army with his tongue. While so doing, Alcophillus crawled into his mouth, where he lived six months, taking toll of every orsel that his lord ate. His immortal achievement was his voyage from Utopia in quest of the "oracle of the Holy Bottle" (q.t.).

"Wouldst thou not issue forth . . . To see the third part in this earthly cell Of the brave acts of good Pantagruel."

Rabelais: To the Spirit of the Queen of Numantia.

* Pantagruel was the last of the race of giants.

"My thirst with Pantagruel's own would rank."—Punch, June 15th, 1868, p. 17.

Pantagruel (meant for Henri II., son of Francois I.), in the satirical romance of Rabelais, entitled History of Gargantua and Pantagruel.

Pantagruelion Herb. Hemp; so called because Pantagruel was the inventor of a certain use which it serves for, exceeding hateful to felons, unto whom it is more hurtful than strangle-weed to flax.

"The figure and shape of the leaves are not much different from those of the sea-tree or the aery, though itself being so like the Hemp tree that many heretics have called it the Domestic Supatorio, and the Supatorio the Wild Pantagruel."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, Il. 46.
Pantalone. A feeble-minded old man, the foil of the clown, whom he aids and abets in all his knavery. The word is derived from the dress he used to wear, a loose suit down to the heels.

"That Licentio that comes a-wafting in my man Tranio bearing my port, that we might bereave the old pantalone."—Shakespeare. Timon of Athens, iii. 7.

Pantalone. Lord Byron says the Venetians were called the Pantlers of the Lion—i.e., the Lion of St. Mark, the standard of the republic; and further tells us that the character of "pantalone," being Venetian, was called Panthaloon (Planter of the Lion). (Childe Harold, bk. iv. stanza 14, note 9.)

Playing Pantalone. Playing second fiddle; being the cat's-paw of another; servilely imitating.

Pantechinicon. A place where all sorts of manufactured articles are exposed for sale; a storehouse for furniture.

Panthe'a, wife of Abradatus, King of Susa. Abradatus joined the Assyrians against Cyrus, and his wife was taken captive. Cyrus refused to visit her, that he might not be tempted by her beauty to outstep the bounds of modesty. Abradatus was so charmed by this continence that he joined the party of Cyrus, and, being slain in battle, his wife put an end to her life, and fell on the body of her husband.

"Here stands Lady Rachel Russell—there the arch-village old Bess o' Hardwicke. The one is our English version of Pantà's of Airus; the other of Xantippe in a coat and peaked stomacher."—Mrs. Lynn Linton: Nineteenth Century, Oct. 1861, p. 652.

Panthe'a (Greek). Status carrying symbols of several deities, as in the medal of Antoninus Pius, where Serapis is represented by a modius, Apollo by rays, Jupiter Ammon by vam's horns, Pluto by a large beard, and Ascellus; Pius by a wand, around which a serpent is twined.

Pantheon. The finest that erected in Rome by Agrippa (son-in-law of Augustus). It is circular, 130 feet in diameter, and the same in height. It is now a church, with statues of heathen gods, and is called the Rotunda. In Paris the Pantheon was the church of St. Geneviève, built by Louis XV., finished 1790. Next year the Convention called it the Pantheon, and set it apart as the shrine of those Frenchmen whom their country wished to honour ("aux grands hommes la patrie reconnaissante"). (Greek, panthe* theoi*, all the gods.)

Panther. The Spotted Panther in Dryden's Hind and Panther means the Church of England full of the spots of error; whereas the Church of Rome is faultless as the milk-white hind.

"The panther, sure the noblest next the hind, And harrest creature of the spotted kind, Oh, could her inborn stains be washed away, She were too good to be a beast of prey."—Part I.

Panthera. A hypothetical beast which lived in the East. Reynard affirmed that he had sent her majesty the queen a comb made of panther bone, "more lustrous than the rainbow, more odoriferous than any perfume, a charm against every ill, and a universal panacea." (H. von Altnau: Reynard the Fox.)

She wears a comb made of panther bone. She is all perfection. (See above.)

Pantile Shop. A meeting-house, from the fact that dissenting chapels were often roofed with pantiles. Hence pantile was used in the sense of dissenting. Mrs. Centlivre, in the Gortian Election, contrasts the pantile crew with a good churchman.

Pantomime (3 syl.), according to etymology, should be "all dumb show", but in modern practice it is partly dumb show and partly grotesque speaking. Harlequin and Columbine never speak, but Clown and Pantaloon keep up a constant fire of fun. Dr. Clarke says that Harlequin is the god Mercury, with his short sword called "herpè;" he is supposed to be invisible, and to be able to transport himself to the ends of the earth as quick as thought. Columbine, he says, is Psyche (the soul); the old man is Charon; and the Clown Momus (the buffoon of heaven), whose large gaping mouth is an imitation of the ancient masks. (Travels, iv. 458.)

The best Roman pantomimists were Bathysalus (a freedman of Macènus), Pyladès, and Hyla.

Pantry. (French, paniterie (2 syl.); Latin, panarium, from pans, bread.) An archaic form is "pantry." The keeper of a pantry was at one time called a "panterer." (French, panterer.)

Panurge (2 syl.). A companion of Pantagruel's, not unlike our Rochester and Buckingham in the reign of the mutton-eating king. Panurge was a desperate rake, was always in debt, had a dodge for every scheme, knew everything and something more, was a boon companion of the mirthfullest temper and most licentious bias; but was timid of danger, and a desperate coward. He enters upon ten thousand adventures for the solution of this knotty point, "Whether or not he ought to marry?" and although every response is in the negative, disputes the ostensible meaning, and stoutly maintains that no means yes. (Greek for fortunam.) (Rabelais.)

Panurge, probably meant for Calvin, though some think it is Cardinal Lorraine. He is a licentious, intemperate libertine, a coward and knave. Of course, the satire points at the celibacy of the clergy.

"Said Slick in the thoroughbred Yankee, bold, cunning, and, above all, a merchant. In short, he is a sort of Republican Panurge."—Globe

As Panurge asked if he should marry. Asking advice merely to contradict the giver of it. Panurge asked Pantagruel whether he advised him to marry, "Yes," said Pantagruel. When Panurge urged some strong objection, "Then don't marry," said Pantagruel; to which the favourite replied, "His whole heart was bent on so doing." "Marry then, by all means," said the prince, but Panurge again found some insuperable barrier. And so they went on; every time Pantagruel said "Yes," new reasons were found against this advice; and every time he said "Nay," reasons no less cogent were discovered for the affirmative. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel, bk. iii. 9.)

"Besides Pantagruel, Panurge consulted lots, dreams, a sibyl, a deaf and dumb man, the old poet Ruminagrois, the chiroancer Herr Trippp, the theologian Hippothadée, the physician Rondibilis, the philosopher Trouilloquu, the court fool Triboulet, and, lastly, the Oracle of the Holy Bottle.

Panurge Stone (The). A stone let into the wall of a house in Panurge Alley. It is a rude representation of a boy sitting on a panier (French, panier; Latin, panarium, a bread-basket.) The stone has the following inscription:

"When you have sought the city round, Yet still this is the highest ground."

ANNA.EL. 279, 1968.

"This is not correct, for there are higher spots both in Cornhill, and in Cannon Street.

Pap. He gives pap with a hatchet. He does or says a kind thing in a very brusque and ungracious manner. The Spartan children were fed by the point of a sword, and the Teuton children with hatchets, or instruments so called—probably of the doll type. "Ursus," in Victor Hugo's novel of "L'Homme qui Rit," gives "pap with a hatchet.""—Papa, Father. The former is Greek pappas (father); Chaldée, abba. For many centuries after the Conquest, the "gentry" taught their children to use the word "papa," but this custom is now almost gone out.

Papal Slippers (Th's) are wrought with a cross of rubies over each instep.

Paper. So called from the papy'rus or Egyptian reed used at one time for the manufacture of a writing material. Bryan Donkin, in 1805, perfected a machine for making a sheet of paper to any required length.

Paper a House (7th), in theatrical phraseology, means to fill a house with "deadheads," or non-paying spectators, admitted by paper orders. The women admitted thus, not being dressed so smartly as the paying ones, used to cover their shoulders with a "scarlet opera cloak," often lent or hired for the occasion.

Paper King. John Law, the projector of the Mississippi Scheme. (1671-1729.)

Paper Marriages. Weddings of dons, who pay their fees in bank-notes.

Paphian. Relating to Venus, or rather to Paphos, a city of Cyprus, where Venus was worshipped; a Cyprian; a prostitute.

Papimania. The country of the Papimans: the country subject to the Pope, or any priest-ridden country, as Spain. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel, iv. 45.)

Papyra. The goddess of printing; so called from papy'rus, the Nile-reed, from which at one time paper was made, and from which it borrows its name.

"Tell to astonished reading Papi is taught To paint in my rich colours sound and thought. With Wisdom's voice to print the race sublime. And mark in adamant the steps of Time."—Burns: "Lays of the Plaisant Cantio.

Papyri. Written scrolls made of the Papy'rus, found in Egypt and Herculeanum.

Par. (4), A newspaper paragraph. (Press slang.)
Paradise

Paradise. Stock at par means that it is to be bought at the price it represents. Thus, £100 stock in the 2½ per cent. quoted at par would mean that it would require £100 to invest in this stock; if quoted at £105, it would be £5 above par; if at £95, it would be £5 below par. (Latin, par, equal.)

Paracelstists. Disciples of Paracelsus in medicine, physics, and mystic sciences. A Swiss physician, (1493-1541.)

Paraclete. The advocate; one called to aid or support another. (The word paraclete is from the Greek para-kalo, to call to; and advocate is from the Latin ad-vocoy, the same thing.)

Paradise. The Greeks used this word to denote the extensive parks and pleasure-grounds of the Persian kings. (Persian, parades; Greek, paradisos.) (See CALAYA.)

An old word, 'paradise,' which the Hebrews had borrowed from the Persians, and which at first designated the 'parks of the Achemenidae,' summed up the general dream.—Renan: Life of Jesus, 31.

Upper and Lower Paradise. The rabbins say there is an earthly or lower paradise under the equator, divided into seven dwellings, and twelve times ten thousand miles square. A column reaches from this paradise to the upper or heavenly one, by which the souls mount upwards after a short sojourn on the earthly one.

The ten dumb animals admitted to the Moslem's paradise are:—

1. The dog Kratim, which accompanied the Seven Sleepers,
2. Bal, a jackal, which spoke with the voice of a man to reproved the disobedient prophet.
3. Solomon's ant, of which he said, "Go to the ant, thou sluggard..."
5. The ram caught in the thicket, and offered in sacrifice in lieu of Isaac.
6. The calf of Abraham.
7. The camel of Saleb.
8. The cuckoo of Belkis.
9. The ox of Moses.
10. Mahomet's mare, called Borak.

Paradise Lost. Satan rouses the panic-stricken host of fallen angels to tell them about a rumour current in Heaven of a new world about to be created. He calls a council to deliberate what should be done, and they agree to send Satan to search out for the new world. Satan, passing the gulf between Hell and Heaven and the limbo of Vanity, enters the orb of the Sun (in the guise of an angel) to make inquiries as to the new planet's whereabouts; and, having obtained the necessary information, alights on Mount Niphates, and goes to Paradise in the form of a corromant. Seating himself on the Tree of Life, he overhears Adam and Eve talking about the prohibition made by God, and at once resolves upon the nature of his attack. Gabriel sends two angels to watch over the bower of Paradise, and Satan flies. Raphael is sent to warn Adam of his danger, and tells him the story of Satan's revolt and expulsion out of Heaven, and why and how this world was made. After a time Satan returns to Paradise in the form of a mist, and, entering the serpent, induces Eve to eat of the forbidden fruit. Adam eats "that he may perish with the woman whom he loved." Satan returns to Hell to tell his triumph, and Michael is sent to lead the guilty pair out of the garden. (Milton.)

Paradise Regained (in four books). The subject is the Temptation. Eve, being tempted, fell, and lost Paradise; Jesus, being tempted, resisted, and regained Paradise. (Milton.)

Paradise Shoots. The lign aloe; said to be the only plant descended to us from the Garden of Eden. When Adam left Paradise, it is said, he took with him a shoot of this tree, which he planted in the land where he settled, and from which all other lign aloces have been propagated.

Paradise of Fools. The Hindus, Mahometans, Scandinavians, and Roman Catholics have devised a place between Paradise and "Purgatory" to get rid of a theological difficulty. If there is no sin without intention, then infants and idiots cannot commit sin, and if they die cannot be consigned to the purgatory of evil-doers; but, not being believers or good-doers, they cannot be placed with the saints. The Roman Catholics place them in the Paradise of Infants and the Paradise of Fools.

Paradise and the Peri. The second tale in Moore's poetical romance of Lalla Rookh. The Peri laments her expulsion from Heaven, and is told she will be readmitted if she will bring to the Gate of Heaven the "gift most dear to the Almighty." First she went to a battle-field, where the tyrant Mahmoud, having won a victory, promised life to a young warrior, but the warrior struck the tyrant with a dart. The wound, however, was not mortal, so "The tyrant lived, the hero fell." The Peri took to Heaven's Gate the last drop of the patriot's blood as her offering, but the gates would not open to her. Next she flew to Egypt, where the plague was raging, and saw a young man dying; presently his betrothed bride sought him out, caught the disease, and both died. The Peri took to Heaven's Gate the last sigh of that self-sacrificed damsel, but the offering was not good enough to open the gates to her. Lastly, she flew to Syria, and there saw an innocent child and guilty old man. The vespers call sounded, and the child knelt down to prayer. The old man wept with repentance, and knelt to pray beside the child. The Peri offered the Repentant Teur, and the gates flew open to receive the gift.

Parallel. None but himself can be his parallel. Wholly without a peer; "Quæris Alcæa parem?" "Ne mo to praæmissa nec secundis." There are many similar sentences; for example:—

"Neum est, nil fit:"—Seneca: Hercules Farnæus, l. 1. necesse est. Liv. viii. 4. (58-52.)

"And but herself admits no parallel" Mississipley: Duke of Millanum, ii. 4. (1602)

"None but himself can be parallel," Anagnoum ou John Lithur (1626.)

"Is there a treachery like this in busness... None but itself can be its parallel," Thesobid: Double Falsehood, iii. 1. (1721.)

Paramatta. A fabric of wool and cotton. So called from a town in New South Wales, where the wool was originally bought.

Parapet. Fortification, the shot-proof covering of a mass of earth on the exterior edge of the ramparts. The openings cut through the parapets to permit guns to fire in the required direction are called embrasures: about 18 feet is allowed from one embrasure to another, and the solid intervening part is called the merlon. An indented parapet is a battlement. (Italian, parapetto, breastwork.)

Paraphernalia means all that a woman can claim at the death of her husband beyond her jointure. In the Roman law her paraphernalia included the furniture of her chamber, her wearing apparel, her jewels, etc. Hence personal attire, fittings generally, anything for show or decoration. (Greek, parapherne, beyond dower.)

Parasite (Greek, para sitos, eating at another's cost). A plant or animal that lives on another; hence a hanger-on, who fawns and flatters for the sake of his food.

Parc aux Cerfs [deer park]. A mansion fitted up in a remote corner of Versailles, whither girls were inveigled for the licentious pleasure of Louis XV. The rank of the person who visited them was scrupulously kept concealed: but one girl, more bold than the rest, rifed the pockets of M. le Comte, and found that he was no other than the king. Madame de Pompadour did not shrink from superintending the labours of the royal valets to procure victims for this infamous establishment. The term is now used for an Alsatia, or haven of shipwrecked characters.

"Boulogne may be proud of being 'parc aux cerfs' to those whom remorose greed drives from their island home."—Saturday Review.

Parcæ. The Fates. The three were Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos. (Latin mythology.) Parcae is from pars, a lot; and the corresponding Moire is from meros, a lot. The Fates were so called because they decided the lot of every man.

Parchment. So called from Pergamum in Lesser Asia, where it was used for purposes of writing when Ptolemy prohibited the exportation of paper from Egypt.

Pardon Bell. The Angelus bell. So called because of the indulgence once given for reciting certain prayers forming the angelus.

Par'donneuses Tale, in Chaucer, is Death and the Riuers. Three rioters in a tavern agreed to hunt down Death and kill him. As they went their way they met an old man, who told them that he had just left him sitting under a tree in the lane close by. Off posted the three rioters, but when they came to the tree they found a great treasure, which they agreed to divide equally. They cast lots which was to carry it home, and the lot fell to the youngest, who was sent to the village to buy food and wine. While he was gone the two who were left agreed to kill him, and so increase their share; but the third bought poison to put into the wine, in order to kill his two confîvers. On his return with his stores, the two set upon him and slew him, then sat down to drink and be merry together; but, the wine being poisoned, all the three rioters found Death under the tree as the old man had said.
Pari Passu. At the same time; in equal degrees; two or more schemes carried on at once and driven forward with equal energy, are said to be carried on pari passu, which is Latin for equal strides or the equally measured pace of persons marching together.

"The cooling effects of surrounding matter go on nearly pari passu with the heating."—Gree<sup>1</sup> Fractional Physical Forces, p. 61.

Parian Chronicle. A chronological register of the chief events in the mythology and history of ancient Greece during a series of 1,318 years, beginning with the reign of Cecrops, and ending with the archonship of Diogæ'tos. It is engraved on Parian marble, and was found in the island of Paros. It is one of the Arumedian Marbles (q.v.).

Parian Verse. Ill-natured satire; so called from Archilochus, a native of Paros.

Parias or Pari'ahs. The lowest class of the Hindu population, below the four castes. Literally drummers, from pari, a large drum.

"The lodgers overheard may perhaps be able to take a more comprehensive view of public question; but they are political Hebræos, they are the Pariahs of our constitutional Brahminism."—The Times, March 20, 1847.

Paridel. A young gentleman that travels about and seeks adventure, because he is young, rich, and at leisure. (See below.)

"There, too, my Paridel, she marked thee there, Where the sun's beam on the back of a Louisian chair, And heard thy everlasting own confess The rains and penitencies of idleness."—Page: Dombey and Son, 3d.

Sir Paridel. A male coquette, whose delight was to win women's hearts, and then desert them. The model was the Earl of Westmorland. (Skeptic: Tiberius Queene, bk. iii. cant. 10: bk. iv. c. 1.)

Paris or Alexander. Son of Priam, and cause of the siege of Troy. He was hospitably entertained by Menelaus, King of Sparta; and eloped with Helen, his host's wife, without the least (as he thought about the siege. Post-Homeric tradition says that Paris slew Achilles, and was himself slain either by Pyrrhos or Philoctetes. (Homer: Iliad.)

Paris. Kinsman to the Prince of Verona, the unsuccessful suitor of Juliet. (Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet.)

Paris. Rabelais says that Gargantua played on the Parisians who came to stare at him a practical joke, and the men said it was a sport "par ris" (to be laughed at); wherefore the city was called Par-ils. It was called before Leggottia, from the "white skin of the ladies." (Greek, leukōtes, whiteness.) (Gargantua and Pantagruel, bk. i. 17.)

Paris, called by the Romans "Lute'tia Parisiorum" (the mud-city of the Parisii). The Parisii were the Gallic tribe which dwelt in the "Ile du Palais" when the Romans invaded Gaul. (See Isis.)

Mons. de Paris. The public executioner of Paris.

Little Paris. The "Galleria Vittorio Emanuele" of Milan is so called on account of its brilliant shops, its numerous cafés, and its general gay appearance.

Brussels, the capital of Belgium, situated on the Senne, is also called "Little Paris."

Paris-Garden. A bear-garden; a noisy, disorderly place. In allusion to the bear-garden so called on the Thames bank-side, kept by Robert de Paris in the reign of Richard II.

"Do you take the court for a Paris-garden?"—Shakespeare: Henry VIII., v. 2.

Parish Registers. Bills of mortality. George Crabbe, author of The Borough, has a poem in three parts, in ten-syllable verse with rhymes, entitled The Parish Register.

Parisian. Made at Paris; after the model of Paris; a native of Paris; like a native of Paris.

Parisian Wedding (The). The massacre of St. Bartholomew, part of the wedding festivities at the marriage of Henri of Navarre and Margaret of France.

"Charles IX., although it was not possible for him to recall to life the countless victims of the Parisian Wedding, was ready to explain those murders to every unperturbed mind."—Motley: Dutch Republic, ii.

Parisienne (La). A celebrated song by Casimir Delavigne, called the Marseillaise of 1830.

"Paris, a la plus qu'un cri de gloire; En avant marchons, Contre leurs canons, A travers les feux des bataillons, Courons a la victoire."—Parisina.

Parisina, the beautiful young wife of Azo. She falls in love with Hugo, her stepson, and betrays herself to her husband in a dream. Azo condemns his son to be executed, but the fate of Parisina, says Byron, is unknown. (Parisina.)

Frizzi, in his History of Ferrara, tells us that Parisina Malatesta was the second wife of Niccolo, Marquis of Este, that she fell in love with Ogo, her stepson, and that the infidelity of Parisina was revealed by a servante named Zoe's.
He says that both Ogo and Parisina were beheaded, and that the marquis commanded all the faithless wives he knew to be beheaded to the Moloch of his passion.

Parizade (4 syl.). A lady whose adventures in search of the Talking Bird, Singing Tree, and Yellow Water, are related in the Story of the Sisters who Envied their Younger Sister, in the Arabian Nights. This tale has been closely imitated in Chery and Fairstar (q.v.).

Parks. The office of pound-keeper: from pereus (a pound).

There are in England 334 parks stocked with deer; red deer are kept in 31 of them. The oldest is Eredge Park, in Sussex, called in Domestacy Book Reredfelle (Rotherfield). The largest private deer park is Lord Egerton's, Tatton, in Cheshire, which contains 2,500 acres. Blenheim Park contains 2,800 acres, but only 1,150 acres of it are open to deer. Almost as extensive as Tatton Park are Uichmond Park, in Surrey; Eastwell Park, in Kent; Grims- thorpe Park, in Lincolnshire; Thoresby Park, in Notts; and Knowesley Park, in Lancashire. (E. P. Shirley: English Deer Parks.) Woburn Park is 3,500 acres.

Parlance. In common parlance. In the usual or vulgar phraseology. An English-French word; the French have parler, parlant, parlage, etc.—to speak, speaking, talk—but not parlant.

Parlement (French). A crown court, where, in the old régime, councillors were allowed to plead, and where justice was administered in the king's name. The Paris Parlement received appeals from all inferior tribunals, but its own judgments were final. It took cognisance of all offences against the crown, the peers, the bishops, the corporations, and all high officers of state; and, though it had no legislative power, had to register the royal edicts before they could become law. Abolished by the Constituent Assembly in 1790.

Parliament.

"My Lord Coke tells us Parliament is derived from parler le ment (to speak one's mind). He might as honestly have taught us that armament is 'dress mentis' (a form for the mind), or 'funda ment' the bottom of the mind."—Hymer: On Parliaments.

The Added Parliament (between April 5th, 1614, and June 7th, 1615); so called because it remonstrated with the king on his levying "benevolences," but passed no acts.

The Barebone Parliament. The Parliament convened July 4th, 1633; overridden by Praise-God Barebone.

The Black Parliament. Held by Henry VIII. in Bridewell.

The Club Parliament. (See PARLIAMENT OF BARDS.)

The Convention Parliament. Two Parliaments were so called: one in 1660, because it was not held by the order of the king, but was convened by General Monk; the second was convened January 22nd, 1689, to confer the crown on William and Mary.

The Devil's Parliament. The Parliament convened at Coventry by Henry VI., in 1459, which passed attainders on the Duke of York and his supporters.

The Drunken Parliament. The Parliament assembled at Edinburgh, January 1st, 1661, of which Burnet says the members "were almost perpetually drunk."

The Good Parliament (1376, in the reign of Edward III., while the Black Prince was still alive). So called from the severity with which it pursued the unpopular party of the Duke of Lancaster.

The Iliterate or Unlearning Parliament. (See UNLEARNED PARLIAMENT.)

The Little Parliament. Same as "the Barebone Parliament" (q.v.).

The Long Parliament sat 12 years and 5 months, from November 2nd, 1640, to April 20th, 1653, when it was dissolved by Cromwell; but a fragment of it, called "The Rump," continued till the Restoration, in 1660.

Historian of the Long Parliament.

Thomas May, buried in Westminster Abbey. (1595-1650.)

The Mud Parliament, in the reign of Henry III. (1258), was so called from its opposition to the king. It insisted on his confirming the Magna Charta, and even appointed twenty-four of its own members, with Simon de Montfort as president, to administer the government.

The Merciless (or Unmerciful) Parliament (from February 3rd to June 3rd, 1388). A junto of fourteen tools of Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, which assumed royal prerogatives, and attempted to depose Richard II.
The Mongrel Parliament (1681), held at Oxford, consisting of Whigs and Tories, by whom the Exclusion Bill was passed.

The Pacifist Parliament. A triennial Parliament, dissolved August 8th, 1713. It signed the treaty of peace at Utrecht, after a war of eleven years.

The Pensioner (or Pensionary) Parliament (from May 8th, 1661, to January 24th, 1678 [i.e. 16 years and 260 days]). It was convened by Charles II., and was called "Pensionary" from the many pensions it granted to the adherents of the king.

The Rump Parliament, in the Protectorate; so called because it contained the rump or fag-end of the Long Parliament (1659). It was this Parliament that voted the trial of Charles I.

The Running Parliament. A Scotch Parliament; so called from its constantly being shifted from place to place.

The Unlearned or Lawless Parliament (Parliamentum Indicium) (1647). So called by Sir E. Coke, because it contained no lawyer.

The Unmerciful Parliament, in the reign of King II.; so called by the people from its tyrannical proceedings.

The Useless Parliament. The Parliament convened by Charles I., on June 18th, 1625; adjourned to Oxford, August 1st; and dissolved August 12th; having done nothing but offend the king.

Parliament Soldiers. The soldiers of General Monk, who restored Charles II. to the throne.

"Ring a ding-ding; ring a ding-ding; The Parliament soldiers are gone for the king, Some they did laugh, and some they did say To see the Parliament soldiers go by. [To fetch back the king."

Parliament of Bats (The), 1426, during the regency in the reign of Henry VI. So called because the members, being forbidden by the Duke of Gloucester to wear swords, armed themselves with clubs or bats.

Parliament of Danes. Convened by Henry IV. at Coventry, in 1404, and so called because all lawyers were excluded from it.

Parliaments'ian (A). One who favoured the Parliament in opposition to Charles I.

Parlour (A). The reception room in a religious house where the religious see their friends. (French, parlour.)

Parl'ious. A corrupt form of perilous, in slang = our modern use of "awful," amazing, wondrous.

"Oh! I'm a parlous lad." Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii., 2.

Parme'onianist. A name given to the Don'atists; so called from Parmenianus, Bishop of Carthage, the great antagonist of Augustine.

Par'mesan'. A cheese made at Parma, in Italy.

Parnassos (Greek), Parnassus (Latin). A mountain near Delphi, in Greece. It has two summits, one of which was consecrated to Apollo and the Muses, the other to Bacchus. It was anciently called Larassos, from larax, an ark, because Deucalion's ark stranded there after the flood. After the oracle of Delphi was built at its foot it received the name of Parnassos, which Pencorus says is a corruption of Hur Nahae (hill of divination). The Turks call it Luakura. Parnassus. The region of poetry. Properly a mountain of Phocis, in Greece, sacred to Apollo and the Muses. "Where lies your vein? Are you inclined to soar to the higher regions of Parnassus or to flutter round the base of the hill?" (The Antiquary)—i.e. Are you going to attempt the higher walks of poetry, such as epic and dramatic, or some more modest kind, as simple song?

To climb Parnassus. To write poetry.

Parochial. Relating to a parish. Hence, petty, narrow. (See Little Englanders.)

Parody. Father of Parody. Hippo'nom of Ephesus. The word parody means an ode which perverts the meaning of another ode. (Greek, para été.)

Parole (French). A verbal promise given by a soldier or prisoner of war, that he will not abuse his leave of absence; the watchword of the day.

Paroles (3 syl.). A man of vain words, who dubs himself "captain," pretends to knowledge which he has not, and to sentiments he never feels. (French, paroles, a creature of empty words.) (Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well.)

"I know him a notorious liar, Think him a great way fool, solely a coward; Yet these fixed evils sit so tight on him That they take place ..." Act I. I.
He was a mere Parolles in a pedagogue’s wig. A pretender, a man of words, and a pedant. The allusion is to the bragging, faithless, slandering villain mentioned above.

"Ruff, sword; cool, blushing; and, Parolles, live safest in shame; being fooled, by fooling thrive; This is peace and means for every man alive." Shakespeare: All’s Well that Ends Well, iv. 3.

Parr. Old Parr. Thomas Parr lived in the reigns of ten sovereigns: married a second wife when he was 120 years old, and had a child by her. He was a husbandman, born at Salop in 1483, and died 1635, aged 152 years. Mr. Thoms, in his Records of Longevity, denies the truth of Parr’s great age.

Paricide (3 syl.). La Belle Paricide. Beatrice Cenci (*1599.)

Parrot-coal. A name given to anthracite because of the crackling or clattering noise it makes when burnt.

Parsons or Grebiers. Fire-worshippers. We use the word for Persian refugees driven out of their country by the persecutions of the Musalmans. They now inhabit various parts of India. (The word means People of Pars or Pars—i.e. Persia.)

Parson. He has need now of nothing but a little parsley—i.e. he is dead. The Greeks decked tombs with parsley, because it keeps green a long time.

beîráta seleiou, he needs parsley; that is, he is dead, and should be strewn with parsley.

Parson, says Blackstone, is “person ecclesi, one that hath full rights of the parochial church.” (See Clerical Titles.)

"Among wyres and odewes I am ynowned ayt. [Want to see]. Yparrocit [unpaid] in pwees. The person that knew me."

Robert Langland: Piers Plowman Vision.

"God give you good morrow, master parson."

(i.e. Sir Nathaniel, a parson). Shakespeare: Love’s Labour’s Lost, iv. 2.

Parson Adams. A simple-minded country clergyman of the eighteenth century, in Fielding’s Joseph Andrews. Fielding says that Parson Adams at the age of fifty was provided with a handsome income of £23 a year (1740). Timothy Burrell, Esq., in 1715, bequeathed to his nephew Timothy the sum of £20 a year, to be paid during his residence at the University, and to be continued to him until he obtained some preferment worth at least £30 a year. (Sussex Archaeological Collections, vol. iii. p. 172.) (See Passing Rich.)

Parson Bates. A stalwart, choleric, sporting parson, editor of the Morning Post in the latter half of the eighteenth century. He was afterwards Sir Henry Bates Dudley, Bart.

"When Sir Henry Bates Dudley was appointed an Irish dean, a young lady of Dublin said, ‘Oh! how I long to see our danes. They say he is a very handsome man, and that he fights like an angel.’"—Cassell’s Magazine: London legende, ii.

“Other persons famous in story are the Rev. Kirah Balwedder, the vicar of Bray, Brocklehurst, Dr. Primrose, the parson in Goldsmith’s Deserted Village, the parson in Chaucer’s Canterbury Tales, and some others.”

Parsons (Walter), the giant porter of King James, died in 1622. (Faulder’s Worthies.)

Part. The character assigned to an actor in a play.

Part. A portion, piece, or fragment. For my part. As far as concerns me. For the most part. Generally, as a rule.

In good part. Favourably.

Part and parcel. An essential part, portion, or element.

Partant pour la Syrie. The national air of the French Empire. The words were composed by M. de Laborde in 1809; the music by Queen Hortense, mother of Napoleon III. It is a ballad, the subject of which is as follows:—Young Dunois followed the count, his lord, to Syria, and prayed the Virgin “that he might prove the bravest warrior, and love the fairest maiden.” After the battle, the count said to Dunois, “To thee we owe the victory, and my daughter I give to thee.” Moral: “Amour a la plus belle; honneur au plus vaillant.”

Parthenopé (4 syl.). Naples: so called from Parthenopé, the siren, who threw herself into the sea out of love for Ulysses, and was cast up on the bay of Naples.

Parthenopéan Republic. That of Naples, from January 22, 1799, to the June following.

“Prince Frederick Leopold is a parti, as he has inherited the bulk of his father’s immense fortune [twenty-four millions sterling].”—Newspaper Paragraph, 1835.
Particular Baptists. That branch of the Baptist Dissenters who limit the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper to those who have been recipients of adult baptism. Open Baptists admit any baptised person to receive it.

Particularists. Those who hold the doctrine of particular election and reprobation.

Parting. "Parting is such sweet sorrow, That I shall say 'Good Night' till it be morrow." Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 2

Parting Cup (A), was, by the ancient Romans, drunk in honour of Mercury to insure sound sleep. (See Ovid, Fasti, ii. 635.) (See Stirkup Cup.)

Partington. A Mrs. Malaprop, or Tabitha Bramble, famous for her misuse of hard words. (B. P. Shillaber; an American author.)

Dame Partington and her mop. A taunt against those who try to withstand progress. The newspapers say that a Mrs. Partington had a cottage at Sidmouth, in Devonshire. In November, 1824, a heavy gale drove the sea-waves into her house, and the old lady laboured with a mop to sop the wet up, till she was obliged to take refuge in the upper part of the house. The Rev. Sydney Smith, speaking on the Lords rejection of the Reform Bill, October, 1831, compares them to Dame Partington with her mop, trying to push back the Atlantic. "She was excellent," he says, "at a slop or puddle, but should never have meddled with a tempest."

Parliet. The hen in Chaucer's Nun's Priest's Tale, and in the tale of Reynard the Fox (fourteenth century). So called from the parliet or brass collar of "the doublet," referring to the frill-like feathers round the neck of certain hens. (A parliet was a ruff worn in the 16th century by women.)

"In the hart the leman shek Close to parliet prest on high" (Chaucer, The Legend of Good Women). Suster Parliet with her hooded head, allegorises the cloistered community of nuns in Dryden's Hind and Panther, where the Roman Catholic clergy are likened to barnyard fowls.

Partridge. The attendant of Jones, half-barber and half-schoolmaster; shrewd, but simple as a child. His simplicity, and his strong excitement at the play-house, when he went to see Garrick in Hamlet, are admirably portrayed. (Fielding: Tom Jones.)

Partridge's Day (St.), September 1, the first day of partridge shooting.

Partula, according to Tertullian, was the goddess of pregnancy, who determined the time of gestation. (Asinus Callinus, iii. c. 16.)

Parturient Montes. "Parturient montes, nascetur ridiculus mus." The Egyptian king Tachos sustained a long war against Artaxerxes Ochus, and sent to the Scythians for aid. King Agesilaus went with a contingent, but when the Egyptians saw a little, ill-dressed lama man, they said: "Parturient montes; formidabit Jupiter; ille vero meum pepervit." ("The mountain laboured, Jupiter stood aghast, and a mouse ran out.") Agesilaus replied, "You call me a mouse, but I will soon show you I am a lion."

Party. Person or persons under consideration. "This is the next party, your worship"—i.e. the next case to be examined. "This is the party that stole the things"—the person or persons accused. (French, partic, a person.)

"If you ask spirit trouble any, one must make a sworne... and the party shall no more vexed"—Tooke, n. 7.

Party Spirit. The animus or feeling of a party man.

Par'venu (French). An upstart; one who has risen from the ranks.

Parvis (London). The "place" or court before the main entrance of a cathedral. In the parvis of St. Paul's lawyers used to meet for consultation, as brokers do in exchange. The word is now applied to the room above the church porch. (Paravris, a Low Latin corruption of paradiso, a church close.)

"A sergeant of law, war and woe, That often amidst adjutant parts, Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (Introduction).

Parvis [Victorius]. Surname of Khosru or Chosroes II., the grandson of Khosru the Magnificent. The reigns of Khosru I. and II. were the golden period of Persia history. Parvix kept 15,000 female musicians, 6,000 household officers, 20,000 saddle-mules, 900 elephants, 200 slaves to scatter perfumes when he went abroad. 1,000 seakabers to water the roads before him, and sat on a pillared throne of almost inconceivable splendour.

The horse of Chosroes Parvix. Shidir, the Persian Bucephalo. (See Horses.)

Parysatis. Wife of Darius Nothos. (A corruption of Peri Zadcher, fairy Pascal's Thoughts

Passing Rich

Where a person is allowed to pass up the senate-house to his degree without being "plucked." (See Pruck.)

Well to pass. Well to do. Here "pass" is the synonym of fare (Saxon, faran, to go or pass). Shakespeare has the expression, "How goes it?"—i.e., How fares it, how passes it?

Passe Brewell. Sir Tristram's horse. Sir Tristram was one of the round-table knights. (History of Prince Arthur, ii. 68.)

Passe-partout. A sort of picture-frame. The middle is cut out to the size of the picture, and the border or edge is embossed, so as to present a raised margin. The passe-partout and picture, being backed and faced with a glass, are held together by an edging of paper which shows on the glass face. The word means something to "pass over all."

A master-key is also called a passe-partout (a pass through all the rooms).

Passe-lourdon (3 syl.). A great rock near Poitiers, where there is a very narrow hole on the edge of a precipice, through which the university freshmen are made to pass, to "matriculate" them. The same is done at Mantua, where the freshmen are made to pass under the arch of St. Longinus. Passe-lourdon means "rubber-pass."

Pass'leyon. A young foundling brought up by Morgana la Fee. He was detected in an intrigue with Morgana's daughter, and the adventures of this amorous youth are related in the romance called Per' forest, syl. iii.

Passing Bell (Thb.). It now means the bell tolled to announce the death of one who has died in the parish; but originally it meant the bell which announced that the person was in extremis, or passing from time into eternity.

When a person lies in agon, the bells of the parish belong to are rung with the clappers until either he dies or recovers again. As soon as this sign is given, everybody in the streets, as well as in the houses, falls on his knees, offering prayer for the sick person. (See ScH of the Caxen Lif.—Diary of the Duke of Medina's Journey.

Passing Fair. Admirably fair. (Dutch, passeren, to admire.)

Passing Rich. Goldsmith tells us in his Dezierted Viuages, that the clergyman was "passing rich with £60 a year." This is no covert satire, but a sober fact. Equal to about £350.

"A man he was to all the country dear. And passing rich with forty pounds a year."

Goldsmith: Deserted Villages.
Passion Flower 918

Patelin

In Norway and Sweden the clergy are paid from £20 to £40 a year, and in France £40 a year is the usual stipend of the working clergy. Of St. Yves it was said (1251-1303):—

"It distribuieit, avec une sainte prudence aux pauvres les revenus de son biens et ceux de son patrimoine, qui etoient de 500 de rente, alors une somme tres notable, particulierement en Haute-Provence."—Yves Lobineau: Lives of the Saints of Great Britain.

Passion Flower.
The leaf symbolizes the spear.
The five anthers, the five wounds.
The tendril, the cords or whips.
The column of the anther, the pillar of the cross.
The stems, the hammers.
The three styles, the three nails.
The stony threads within the flowers, the crown of thorns.
The calyx, the glory or nimbus.
The white tub, purity.
The blue tint, heaven.
It keeps open three days: symbolizing the three years ministry. (Matt. xiii. 41.)
(See Pike's Head.)

Passionists. Certain priests of the Roman Catholic Church, who mutually agreed to preach "Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." The founder of this "congregation" was Paul Francis, surnamed Paul of the Cross. (1694-1775.)

Passover. A Jewish festival to commemorate the deliverance of the Israelites, when the angel of death (that slew the first-born of the Egyptians) passed over their houses, and spared all who did as Moses commanded them.

Passy-measure or Passing-measure. A slow, stately dance; a corruption of the Italian passamezzo (a middle pace or step). It is called a cinque measure, because it consists of five measures—"two singles and a double forward, with two singles side." (Collier.)

Passy-measure Pavin. A pavin is a stately dance (see Payn); a passy-measure pavin is a reeling dance or motion, like that of a drunken man, from side to side. Sir Toby Belch says of Dick Surgeon—

"He's a rogue and a passy-measure pavin, I hate a drunken rogue."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, v. 1.

Pastoboard. A visiting card; so called from the material of which it is made.

Paston Letters. The first two volumes appeared in 1787, entitled Original Letters written during the Reigns of Henry VI., Edward IV., and Richard III. by various Persons of Rank: edited by Mr. (afterwards Sir John) Fenn. They are called Paston because chiefly written by or to members of the Paston family in Norfolk. They passed from the Earl of Yarmouth to Peter le Neve, antiquary; then to Mr. Martin, of Pulgrave, Suffolk; were then bought by Mr. Worth, of Diss; then passed to the editor. Charles Knight calls them "an invaluable record of the social customs of the fifteenth century" (the time of the Wars of the Roses), but of late some doubt has been raised respecting their authenticity. Three extra volumes were subsequently added.

Pastorale of Pope Gregory, by Alfred the Great.

Patavinity. A provincial idiom in speech or writing; so called from Patavium (Padua), the birthplace of Livy. (See Patois.)

Patch. A fool; so called from the motley or patched dress worn by licensed fools.

"What a pied ninny's this! Thou scurvy patch!"—Shakespeare: The Tempest, iii. 2.

Cross-patch. An ill-tempered person. (See above.)

Not a patch upon. Not to be compared with; as, "His horse is not a patch upon mine." "My patch is better than his garment."

Patch (To). To express certain political views. The allusion is to the custom, in Queen Anne's reign, of wearing on the face little black patches. If the patch was on the right cheek, it indicated that the wearer was a Whig; if on the left cheek, that she was a Tory; if on the forehead between the eyes, or on both cheeks, that she was of no political bias. (See Court Plaster.)

"Whatever might be her husband's politics, she was at liberty to patch as she pleased."—Nineteenth Century, February, 1850, p. 55.

Patelin. The artful dodger. The French say, Savoir son Patelin (to know how to bamboozle you). Patelin is the name of an artful cheat in a farce of the fifteenth century so called. On one occasion he wanted William Josseuame to sell him cloth on credit, and artfully fell on praising the father of the merchant, winding up his laudation with this ne plus ultra: "He did sell on credit, or even lend to those who wished to borrow." This farce was reproduced in 1706 by Brueys, under the name of L'Avocat Patelin.

"Consider, sir, I pray you, how the noble Patelin, having a mind to extort to the third heaven the father of William Josseuame, said go more than this: 'And he did lend to those who were desirous to borrow of him.'—Robertson: Pintagracel, iii. 4.
Patelinage. Foolery, buffoonery; acting like Patelin in the French farce.

"I never in my life laughed so much as at the acting of that Patelinage."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, iii. 34.

Patent Rolls. Letters patent collected together on parchment rolls. Each roll is a year, though in some cases the roll is subdivided into two or more parts. Each sheet of parchment is numbered, and called a membrane: for example, the 8th or any other sheet, say of the 10th year of Henry III., is cited thus: "Pat. 10, Hen. III., m. 8." If the document is on the back of the roll it is called dorso, and "d." is added to the citation.

Pat’er Nos’ter. The Lord’s Prayer; so called from the first two words in the Latin version. Every tenth bead of a rosary so is called, because at that bead the Lord’s Prayer is repeated. Formerly applied to the Rosary beads.

Pater Patrum. St. Gregory of Nyssa was so entitled by the Nicene Council. (332-385.)

Paternoster Row (Londen) was so named from the rosary or paternoster makers. We read of "one Robert Nikke, a paternoster maker and citizen, in the reign of Henry IV." Some say it was so called because funeral processions on their way to St. Paul’s began their paternoster at the beginning of the Row, and went on repeating it till they reached the church-gate.

Pathfinder. Major-General John Charles Fremont, who conducted four expeditions across the Rocky Mountains. (1842.)

Pathfinder, in Fenimore Cooper’s five novels, is Natty Bumppo, called the Pathfinder, the Deerslayer, the Hawkeye, and the Trapper. (See NATTY BUMppo.)

Patience cry the Lepers. A punning proverbial phrase. Lepers seek diligently the herb patience (lapathum) to relieve them from their suffering.

Patient (The). Albert IV., Duke of Austria, (1377-1404.) (See HELENA.)

Patient Griseel. Griseldis, Grisild, Grisilde, or Grisildus, according to Chaucer, was the wife of Wautier, Marquis of Saluces (Clerks Tail). According to Boccaccio, Griselda, a poor country lass, became the wife of Gautie’re, Marquis of Saluzzo (Tenth Day, novel x.). She is put upon by her husband in the most wanton and gratuitous manner, but bears it all, not only without a murmur, but even without loss of temper. She is the model of patience under injuries. The allegory means that God takes away our children and goods, afflicts us in sundry ways, and tries us "so as with fire;" but we should always say, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

Patin. Brother of the Emperor of Rome, who fought with Am’adis of Gaul, and had his horse killed under him.

Pat’ina. A beautiful surface deposit or fine rust, with which, in time, buried coins and bronzes become covered. It is at once preservative and ornamental, and may be seen to advantage in the ancient bronzes of Pompeii. (Greek, patina, a patent.)

Patmos (My). My solitude, my place of banishment from society, my out-of-the-way home. As "Good-b’ye, I must go to my Patmos." The allusion, of course, is to the banishment of St. John to the island of Patmos, in the reign of Domitian.

Patois (2 syl.). Dialectic peculiarity, provincialism. Asimius Pollio noticed something of the kind in Livy, which he called patercinatus, from Patavium, Livy’s birth-town.

Patri-Passians. One of the most ancient sectaries of the Christian Church, who maintained the oneness of the Godhead. The founder was Praxeas, of Phrygia, in the second century. The appellation was given to them by their opponents, who affirmed that, according to their theory, the Father must have suffered on the cross.

Patrician, properly speaking, is one of the patres or fathers of Rome. These patres were the senators, and their descendants were the patricians. As they held for many years all the honours of the state, the word came to signify the magnates or nobility of a nation.

N.B. In Rome the patrician class was twice augmented: first by Tatius, after the Sabine war, who added a whole "century;" and again by Tarquinius Priscus, who added another. The Sabine century went by the name of patricians of the senior races (maio’rum gentium), and the Tarquinian patricians were termed of the junior creation (mino’rum gentium).
Patrick. Chambers says, "We can trace the footsteps of St. Patrick almost from his cradle to his grave by the names of places called after him." Thus, assuming the Scottish origin, he was born at Kil-patrick (the cell of Patrick), in Dumbartonshire; he resided for some time at Dal-patrick (the district of Patrick), in Lanarkshire; and visited Craig-patrick (the rock of Patrick), near Inverness. He founded two churches, Kirk-patrick in Kirkcudbright, and Kirk-patrick in Dumfries; and ultimately sailed from Port-patrick, leaving behind him such an odour of sanctity that among the most distinguished families of the Scottish aristocracy Patrick has been a favourite name down to the present day.

Arriving in England, he preached at Patter-dale (Patrick's valley), in Westmorland; and founded the church of Kirk-patrick, in Durham. Visiting Wales, he walked over Sarn-badrig (causeway of Patrick), which now forms a dangerous shoal in Carnarvon Bay: and, departing for the Continent, sailed from Llanbaddog (church of Patrick), in the isle of Anglesea. Undertaking his mission to convert the Irish, he first landed at Innis-patrick (island of Patrick), and next at Hala-patrick, on the opposite shore of the mainland, in the county of Dublin. Sailing northwards, he touched at the Isle of Man, called Innis-patrick, where he founded another church of Kirk-patrick, near the town of Peel. Again landing on the coast of Ireland, in the county of Down, he converted and baptised the chieftain Dichu on his own threshing-floor, an event perpetuated in the word Sainl-ir.e. Sabat-patrick (bapx of Patrick). He then proceeded to Temple-patrick, in Antrim; and from thence to a lofty mountain in Mayo, ever since called Croagh-patrick. In East Meath he founded the abbey of Downach-Patraig (house of Patrick), and built a church in Dublin on the spot where St. Patrick's Cathedral now stands. In an island of Lough Derg, in Donegal, there is St. Patrick's Furgatory; in Leinster, St. Patrick's Wood; at Cashel, St. Patrick's Rock. There are scores of St. Patrick's Wells from which he drank; and he died at Saul, March 17th, 493. (Book of Days.)

Patrick's Cross (St.). The same shape as St. Andrew's Cross (X), only different in colour, viz. red on a white field. (See Andrew.)

Patrick's Grave (St.), in the yard of Downpatrick cathedral. The visitor is shown a spot where some of the mould has been removed, and is told that pilgrims take away a few grains as a charm, under the belief that the relic will insure good health, and help to atone for sin.

Patrick's Monument (St.), in the cemetery of Downpatrick cathedral. Visitors are shown the spot where the "saint" was buried, but, on asking why there is no memorial, is informed that both Protestants and Catholics agreed to erect a suitable one, but could not agree upon the inscription. Whatever the Protestants erected in the day the Catholics pulled down at night, and vice versa. Tired of this toil of Peneiople, the idea was abandoned, and the grave was left unmarked by monumental stone.

Patrick's Purgatory (St.), Ireland, described in the Italian romance called Giurano Moschino. Here gourmands are fumigated with delicious banquets which elude their grasp, and are at the same time troubled with colic. (See Tantalus.)

Patrick and the Serpent (St.). According to tradition, St. Patrick cleared Ireland of its vermin; one old serpent resisted him; but St. Patrick overcame it by culling. He made a box, and invited the serpent to enter it. The serpent objected, saying it was too small; but St. Patrick insisted it was quite large enough to be comfortable. After a long contention, the serpent got in to prove it was too small, when St. Patrick slammed down the lid, and threw the box into the sea. To complete this wonderful tale, the legend says the waves of the sea are made by the writhings of this serpent, and the noise of the sea is that of the serpent imploring the saint to release it.

Patreco or Pater-cova. Hedgepriests who for a few marred people under a hedge, as Abrahah-men (q.v.).

Patoeios. The gentle and amiable friend of Achilles, in Homer's Iliad. When Achilles refused to fight in order to annoy Agamemnon, he sent his friend Patroclus to battle, and he was slain by Euphorbos.

PauUcians. Martha or Patty, says Gay, was the daughter of a Lincolnshire farmer, with whom the village blacksmith fell in love. To save her from wet feet when she went to milk the cows, the village Muleiber invented a clog, mounted on iron, which he called patty, after his mistress. This pretty fable is of no literary value, as the word is the French patin (a high-heeled shoe or skate), from the Greek pat'in (to walk).

The patten now supports each frugal dame, Which from the blue-eyed Patty takes its name.

Pattens-Money (Chapa]la de la Reina). A subsidy levied in Spain on all crown tenants at the time of a royal marriage.

Patter. To chatter, to chack. Dr. Pusey thinks it is derived from Peter-noster (the Lord's Prayer). The priest recited it in a low, mumbled voice till he came to the words, "and lead us not into temptation," which he spoke aloud, and the choir responded, "but deliver us from evil." In our reformed Prayer Book, the priest is directed to say the whole prayer "with a loud voice," Probably the "pattering of rain"—i.e., the rain coming with its pit-pat, is after all the better derivation.

They talk is similar from the French patris, or PATIVAINTY.

Pattern. A corruption of patron. As a patron is a guide, and ought to be an example, so the word has come to signify an artistic model. (French, patron, Latin, patrimon.)

Patleson (Mr. Peter). Introduced by Sir Walter Scott in the Introductions of the Heart of Midlothian and Bride of Lammermoor. He is represented as "assistant" at Gauderleigh, and author of the Tales of My Landlord, published posthumously by Jedidiah Cleishbotham.

Paul (St.). Patron saint of preachers and tentmakers. Originally called Paul. The name was changed in honour of Sergius Paulus, whom he converted.

His symbols are a sword and open book, the former the instrument of his martyrdom, and the latter indicative of the new law propagated by him as the apostle of the Gentiles. He is represented of short stature, with bald head and grey, bushy beard.

Born at Tarsus, a town of Judæa, from which he removed, with his parents, to Taras, of Cilicia.

Tribe, that of Benjamin.

Taught by Gamaliel.

Beheaded by a sword in the fourteenth year of Nero. On the same day as Peter was crucified. Buried in the Ostian Way.

Paul Pry. An idle, meddlesome fellow, who has no occupation of his own, and is always interfering with other folk's business. (John Poole: Paul Pry, a comedy.) The original was Thomas Hill.

Paul and Virginia. A tale by Bernardin de St. Pierre. At one time this little romance was as popular as Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Paul the Hermit (St.) is represented as an old man, clothed with palm-leaves, and seated under a palm-tree, near which are a river and loaf of bread.

Paul of the Cross. Paul Francis, founder of the Passionists. (1694-1775.)

Paul's Man (p. l). A braggart; a captain out of service, with a long rapier; so called because St. Paul's Walk was at one time the haunt of such nights. Jonson called Bobadi (q.v.) a Paul's man.

Paul's Walkers. Loungers who frequented the middle of St. Paul's, which was the Bond Street of London up to the time of the Commonwealth. (See Ben Jonson's Every Man out of his Humour, where are a variety of scenes given in the interior of St. Paul's.) Harrison Ainsworth describes these "walkers" in his novel entitled Old St. Paul's.

"The young fellows used to meet at the central point, St. Paul's, and from this circumstance obtained the appellative of Paul's Walkers, as we now say Bond Street, Loungers."—Man's European Magazine, July, 1847.

Paulianists. A sect of heretics so called from Paulianus Samositanus (Paul of Samosita), elected Bishop of Antioch in 262. He may be considered the father of the Samians.

Paulicians. A religious sect of the Eastern Empire, an off-shoot of the Manichaens. It originated in an Armenian named Paul, who lived under Justinian II. Neander says they were the followers of Constantine of Mananatis, and were called Paulicians because the apostle Paul was their guide. He says they rejected the worship of the Virgin and of saints, denied the doctrine of transubstantiation, and maintained the right of everyone to read the Scriptures freely.

Paulina, wife of Antigonus, a Sicilian nobleman, takes charge of Queen Hermione, when unjustly sent to prison by her jealous husband, and after a time presents her again to Leontes as a statue “by that rare Italian master, Julio Romano.” (Shakespeare: Winter’s Tale.)

Paulo. The cardinal, brother of Count Guido Franceschi, who advised his scapegrace bankrupt brother to marry an heiress, in order to repair his fortune. (Robert Browning: The Ring and the Book.)

Pavon or Pavine. Every pavon has its galliard (Spanish). Every sage has his moments of folly. Every white must have its black, and every sweet its sour. The pavon was a stately Spanish dance, in which the ladys and gentlemen stalked like peacocks (Latin, pavo‘nes), the gentlemen with their long robes of office, and the ladies with trains like peacocks’ tails. The pavon, like the minuet, ended with a quick movement called the galliard, a sort of cavotta.

Pavilion of Prince Ahmed (The). This pavilion was so small it could be covered with the hand, and yet would expand so largely as to encamp a whole army. (Arabian Nights: Ahmed and Fari-Banon.) (See Solomon’s Carpet.)

Pawnbroker. The three golden balls. The Lombards were the first money-lenders in England, and those who borrowed money of them deposited some security or pawn. The Medici family, whose arms were three gilded pills, in allusion to their profession of medicine, were the richest merchants of Florence, and greatest money-lenders. (See Bails.)

Roscoe, in his Life of Lorenzo de Medici, gives a different solution. He says that Averardo de Medici, a commander under Charlemagne, slew the giant Muggello, whose club he bore as a trophy. This club or mace had three iron balls, which the family adopted as their device.

Pawn is the Latin pingua (a pawn or pledge).

Pawnee. Brandy paviour. Brandy grog. (Hindu, pa‘ni, water.)

Pax. The “kiss of peace.” Also a sacred utensil used when mass is celebrated by a high dignitary. It is sometimes a crucifix, sometimes a tablet, and sometimes a reliquary. The pax is omitted on Maundy Thursday, from horror at the kiss of Judas.

Pay (see term). To cover with pitch. (Latin, picare, to cover with pitch.)

Here’s the devil to pay, and no pitch hot. (See under Devil.)

Pay (To). To discharge a debt. (French, payer.)

Who’s to pay the piper? Who is to stand Sam? Who is to pay the score? The phrase comes from the tradition about the Pied Piper of Hameln, who agreed to cure the town of rats and mice; when he had done so, the people of Hameln refused to pay him, whereupon he piped again, and led all the children to Koppellberg Hill, which closed over them.

From the corresponding French phrase, “payer les violons,” it would seem to mean who is to pay the fiddler or piper if we have a dance [on the green]; who is going to stand Sam?

Pay (To). To slacken a cable; as, “Pay away” [more cable]; that is, “discharge” more cable. (French, payer.)

Pay (To). To requite, to punish. I’ll pay him out. I’ll be a match for him, I’ll punish him.

“Thy with a false-tale him soundly did pay e.”

The King and Northern Man (1680).

Pay off old Scores (To). To pay off a debt, whether of money or revenge.

Pay with the Roll of the Drum (To). Not to pay at all. No soldier can be arrested for debt when on the march.

“How happy the soldier who lives on his pay, And spends half-a-crown out of sixpence a day; He cares not for justice, headles, or hum, But pays all his debts with the roll of the drum.”

O’Kaye.

Payraising. A process of preserving and hardening wood invented by Mr. Payne. (See Kyanise.)

Pea-jacket (A). Dutch, pig or pije, a coarse thick cloth or felt. A “pike jacket.”

Peace. The Perpetual Peace. The peace concluded January 24th, 1802, between England and Scotland. But a few years afterwards the battle of Flodden Field was fought.

Peace-makers (The). The nickname of the Bedfordshire regiment. So called from having no battles on the colours.
Pearl

Peace of Antal'cidas (The), between Artaxerxes and the states of Greece. It was brought about by Antal'cidas, the Spartan (B.C. 387).

Peace of God. In 1035 the clergy interfered to prevent the constant feuds between baron and baron; they commanded all men to lay down their arms on pain of excommunication. The command and malediction were read daily from the pulpits by the officiating priests after the proper gospel:—"May they who refuse to obey be accursed, and have their portion with Cain, the first murderer; with Judas, the arch-traitor; and with Dathan and Abi'ran, who went down alive into the pit. May they be accursed in the life that now is; and in that which is to come may their light be put out as a candle." So saying, all the candles were instantly extinguished, and the congregation had to make its way in the dark out of church as it best could.

Peace with Honour. The rallying cry of the late Lord Beaconsfield; it originated with his speech after the Berlin Conference (1878), when he stated that he had brought back Peace with Honour.

Peaceful (The). Kang-wäng, third of the Thow dynasty of China, in whose reign no one was either put to death or imprisoned. (1098-1152.)

Peach. To inform, to "split;" a contraction of "impeach."

Peacock. Let him keep peacock to himself. Let him keep to himself his eccentricities. When George III. had partly recovered from one of his attacks, his Ministers got him to read the King's Speech, but he ended every sentence with the word "peacock." The Minister who drilled him said that peacock was an excellent word for ending a sentence, only kings should not let subjects hear it, but should whisper it softly. The result was a perfect success: the pause at the close of each sentence had an excellent effect.

By the peacock! A common oath which at one time was thought sacred. The fabled incorruptibility of the peacock's flesh caused the bird to be adopted as a type of the resurrection.

Peacock's Feather Unlucky (4). The peacock's tail is emblem of an Evil Eye, or an ever-vigilant traitor. The tale is this: Argus was the chief Minister of Ostris, King of Egypt. When the king started on his Indian expedition, he left his queen, Isis, regent, and Argus was to be her chief adviser. Argus, with one hundred spies (called eyes), soon made himself so powerful and formidable that he shut up the queen-regent in a strong castle, and proclaimed himself king. Mercury marched against him, took him prisoner, and cut off his head; whereupon Juno metamorphosed Argus into a peacock, and set his eyes in its tale.

Peak (The), Derbyshire. "The Queen of Scots' Pillar" is a column in the cave of the peak as clear as an alabaster, and so called because Mary Queen of Scots proceeded thus far, and then returned.

Peal. To ring a peal is to ring 5,040 changes; any number of changes less than that is technically called a "touch" or "flourish." Bells are first raised, and then pealed. (Qy. Latin pelle, to strike?)

"This society rang . . . . a true and complete peal of 5,040 grandire triples in three hours and fourteen minutes:"—Inscription in Windsor Castle Tower.

Pearl (The). Dioscorides and Pliny mention the belief that pearls are formed by drops of rain falling into the oyster-shells while open; the rain-drops thus received being hardtened into pearls by some secrerctions of the animal.

According to Richardson, the Persians say when drops of spring-rain fall into the pearl-oyster they produce pearls.

"Pregnant the tear as that rain from the sky
Which turns into pearls as it falls on the sea"

Thomas Moore

"Pearls . . . are believed to be the result of an abnormal secretion procured by an irritation of the mollusk consequent on the intrusion into the shell of some foreign body, as a grain of sand, an egg of the mollusk itself, or perhaps some cercarum parasite."—C. F. King, &c. et. c., chap. xiv. p. 281.

* Cardan says that pearls are polished by being pecked and played with by doves. (De Reum Varietate, vii. 34.)

Pearl. For Cleopatra melting her pearl in honour of Antony, see CLEOPATRA.

A similar act of vanity and folly is told by Horace (2 Satire, iii. verse 230). Clodius, son of Æsop the tragedian, drew a pearl from his ear of great value, melted it in a strong acid, and drank to the health of Cecilia Metella. This story is referred to by Valerius Maximus, Macrobius, and Pliny. Horace says,

"Qui malior, ac si
Illud Idem in rapidum fumum faceret clausum"

Sir Thomas Gresham, it is said, when Queen Elizabeth dined with him at the City banquet, melted a pearl worth £15,000, and drank to her health.

"Here fifteen thousand pounds alone cay gos
Instead of sugar, Gresham drinks the pearl Unto his queen and mistress."—Thomas Heywood.

Pearl of the East. Zenobia, Queen of Palmyra (reigned 268-272).

Peasant Bard. Robert Burns, the lyric poet of Scotland. (1759-1796.)

Peasant-boy Philosopher (The). James Ferguson. (1710-1776.)

Peasants' War (The), between 1500 and 1525. It was a frequent rising of the peasantry of Swabia, Franconia, Saxony, and other German states, in consequence of the tyranny and oppression of the nobles. In 1502 was the rebellion called the Laced Shoe, from its cognisance; in 1514, the League of Poor Conrad; in 1523, the Latin War. The insurgents were put down, and whereas they had been whipped before with scourgis, they were now chastised with scorpions.

Peasood. Father of Peasblossom, if Bottom's pedigree may be accepted.

"I pray you commend me to Mistress Squash your mother, and to Master Peasoot your father, grand master Peasosoan."—Shakespeare. Midsummer Night's Dream, iii. 1.

Pens. For shaving, pessod for wooling. The allusion in the latter clause is to the custom of placing a pessod with nine peas in it on the door-lintel, under the notion that the first man who entered through the door would be the husband of the person who did so. Another custom is alluded to by Browne—

"The pessod are men with no little tape
Wax'd having in it by the labour of a man.
And read it from the stile to bring it to her,
And in her name, a vegetation was her."—_Britannia's Pastorals._

Peo. Etun shung for money. A contraction of the Latin _pecunia._

Pecori. To cry pecori. To acknowledge oneself in the wrong. It is said that Sir Charles Napier, after the battle of Hyderabad, in 1813, used this word as a pun upon his victory "Pecori." (I have summed, i.e. Sinned).

Peck. (A.) Some food. "To have a peck," is to have something to eat.

Peckish. Hungry, or desirous of something to eat. Of course "peck" refers to fowls, etc., which peck their food.

"When shall I feel peckish again?"—_Horace; _oed. vi. chap 1.

Pecker. Keep your pecker up. As the mouth is in the head, pecker (the mouth) means the head: and to "keep your pecker up," means to keep your head up, or, more familiarly, "keep your tail up." "Never say die."

Peckham. _All holiday at Peckham._—i.e. no appetite, not peckish: a pun on the word peck, as going to Bedfordshire is a pun on the word bed.

Pecksniff. A canting hypocrite, who speaks homilies of morality, does the most heartless things "as a duty to society," and forgives wrong-doing in nobody but himself. (Dickens: _Martin Chuzzlewit._)

Peculiar. A parish or church exempt from episcopal jurisdiction, as a royal chapel, etc.

Peculiars (The Court of). A branch of the Court of Arches having jurisdiction over the "peculiars" of the archbishop of Canterbury. (See above.)

Pecullum. My own pecullum. Private and individual property or possession. The Roman slaves were allowed to acquire property, over which their masters had no right or control; this was called their pecullum.

Pecuniary. From _pecunia_, coin, especially sheep. Varo says that sheep were the ancient medium of barter and standard of value. Ancient coin was marked with the image of an ox or sheep. We have the Gold Sheep (_monna d'or_) and Gold Lamb (_agneau d'or_) of ancient France, so called from the figure struck on them, and worth about a shilling. (Latin, _pecuniarum, pecunia_.)

Pedagogue (3 syl.) means a schoolmaster. _It_ was a slave whose duty it was to attend the boy whenever he left home. A schoolmaster "leads" his boys, morally and otherwise. (Greek, _paeas agoge_.)

Pedlar is not a tramp who goes on his feet, as if from the Latin _pedes_ (feet), but a man who carries a ped or hamper without a lid, in which are stored fish or other articles to hawk about the streets. In Norwich there is a place called the Ped-market, where women expose eggs, butter, cheese, etc., in open hampers.

Pedlar's Acre (Lambeth). According to tradition, a pedlar of this parish left a sum of money, on condition that his picture, with a dog, should be preserved for ever in glass in one of the church-windows. In the south window of the middle aisle, sure enough, such a picture exists: but probably it is a rebus on Chapman, the name of some benefactor. In Swaffham church there is a portrait of one John Chapman, a great benefactor, who is represented as a pedlar with his pack: and in that town a similar tradition exists.

Pedlars' French. The slang of the Romany folk. Even Bracton uses the word Frenchman as a synonym of foreigner, and it is not long since that everyone who could not speak English was called a Frenchman. The Jews, with a similar width, used the word Greek.

"Instead of Pedlars' French gives him plain language — Lexicon and Rhetoric Pedlars. Friends, &c."

Peel. A Peel district. A clerical district (not a parish) devised by Sir Robert Peel.

Peeler (4). Slang for a policeman: so called from Sir Robert Peel, who reconstructed the police-system. Bobby, being the nickname of Robert, is applied to the same force. (Ne Bonny.)

Peeler. It is an extraordinary circumstance that this word, now applied to a policeman or thief-catcher, was in the sixteenth century applied to robbers. Holinshed, in his Scottish Chronicle (1570), refers to Patrick Dunbar, who "delivered the country of these peelers." Thomas Mortimer, in his British Plutarch; Milton, in his Paradise Regained (book iv.); and Dryden, all use the word "peeler" as a plunderer or robber. The old Border towers were called "peels." The two words are, of course, quite distinct.

Peep. To look at. As a specimen of the ingenuity of certain etymologists in tracing our language to Latin and Greek sources, may be mentioned Mr. Casaubon's derivation of peep from the Greek apipteon (to stare at). (Pe-pe-pr bo'.)

Playing bo-peep or peep-loo. Hiding or skulking from creditors; in allusion to the infant nursery game.

Peep-o'-Day Boys. The Irish insurgents of 1784: so called because they used to visit the houses of their opponents (called defenders) at peep of day searching for arms or plunder.

Pedling Tom of Coventry. Leofric, Earl of Mercia and Lord of Coventry, imposed some very severe imposts on the people of Coventry, which his countess, Godiva, tried to get mitigated. The earl, thinking to silence her importunity, said he would comply when she had ridden naked from one end of the town to the other. Godiva took him at his word, actually rode through the town naked, and Leofric remitted the imposts. Before Godiva started, all the inhabitants voluntarily confined themselves to their houses, and resolved that anyone who stirred abroad should be put to death. A tailor thought to have a peep, but was rewarded with the loss of his eyes, and has ever since been called Peeping Tom of Coventry. There is still a figure in a house at Coventry said to represent Peeping Tom.

"Matthew of Westminster (1307) is the first to record the story of Lady Godiva: the addition of Peeping Tom dates from the reign of Charles II. In Smithfield Wall is a grotesque figure of the inquisitive tailor in "flopping wig and Stuart cravat."

In regard to the terms made by Leofric, it may be mentioned that Rudder, in his History of Gloucester, tells us that "the privilege of cutting wood in the Herdonios was granted to the parishioners of St. Briavel's Castle, in Gloucestershire, on precisely similar terms by the Earl of Hereford, who was at the time lord of Dean Forest."

Tennyson, in his Godiva, has reproduced the story.

Peers of the Realm. The five orders of duke, marquis, earl, viscount, and baron. The word peer is the Latin partis (equals), and in feudal times all great vassals held equal in rank.
The following is well fitted to a dictionary of Phrase and Fable:--

"It is well known that, although the English aristocracy recuits itself from the sons of serfs, as Lord Tenterden; merchant tailors, as Count Craven; mariners, as the Counts of Coventry, etc., it will never tolerate poverty within its ranks. The male representative of Simon de Montfort is now a saddler in Tooley Street; the great-grandson of Oliver Cromwell, a porter in Cork market; and Stephen James Penny, Verger of St. George's Hanover Square, is a direct descendant of the fifth son of Edward III."—The Gascoigne.

Peg or Peggy, for Margaret, corrupted into Meg or Meggy. Thus, Pat or Patty for Martha; Poll or Polly, for Mary, corrupted into Moll or Molly; etc.

Peg too Low (A). Low-spirited, moody. Our Saxon ancestors were accustomed to use peg-tankards, or tankards with a peg inserted at equal intervals, that when two or more drunk from the same bowl, no one might exceed his fair proportion. We are told that St. Dunstan introduced the fashion to prevent brawling.

"I am a peg too low means, I want another draught with intrigue. And took your grinders down a peg."

There are always more round pegs than round holes. Always more candidates for office than places to dispose of.

Peg'sasos (Greek: Pegasus, Latin). The inspiration of poetry, or, according to Boiardo (Orlando Innamorato), the horse of the Muses. A poet speaks of his Peg'sasus, as "My Pegasus will not go this morning;" meaning his brain will not work. "I am mounting Peg'sasus"—i.e. going to write poetry. "I am on my Peg'sasus," i.e. engaged in writing verses.

Peg'sasus or Peg'sas, according to classic mythology, was the winged horse, by which Bellerophon rode against the Chimera. When the Muses contended with the daughters of Piers, Hel'icorn rose heavenward with delight; but Peg'sasus gave it a kick, stopped its ascent, and brought out of the mountains the soul-inspiring waters of Hippocrene [Hip'-po-creen].

Peg (Katharine). One of the mistresses of Charles II., daughter of Thomas Pegg, of Yeldersley, in Derbyshire, Esquire.

Pegging Away (Keep). Keep on attacking, and you will assuredly prevail. "But screw your courage to the sticking-place, and we'll not fail" (Macbeth), Patience and perseverance will overcome mountains. It was President Lincoln who gave this advice to the Federals in the American civil war.

Pele's Forte et Dure. A species of torture applied to contumacious felons. In the reign of Henri IV, the accused was pressed to death by weights; in later reigns the practice prevailed of tying the thumbs tightly together with whipcord, to induce the accused to plead. The following persons were pressed to death by weights:—Juliana Quick, in 1442; Anthony Arrowsmith, in 1596; Walter Calverly, in 1605; Major Strangways, in 1657; and even in 1741 a person was pressed to death at the Cambridge assizes. Abolished 1772.

Pela'gianism. The system or doctrines taught by Pela'gius (q.v.). He denied what is termed birth-sin or the taint of Adam, and he maintained that we have power of ourselves to receive or reject the Gospel.

Pela'gius. A Latinised Greek form of the name Morgan—the Welsh mór, like the Greek pel'agos, meaning the sea.

Pelf. Filthy pelf. Money. The word was anciently used for refuse or rubbish. "Who steals my purse steals trash." Filthy means ungodly; the Scripture expression is "unrighteous mammon." It is certainly not connected with piffer, as it is usually given; but it may possibly be with the Anglo-Saxon pilet, a pile or heap.

"The old French word pelfre means spoil.

Pel'ias. The huge spear of Achilles, which none but the hero could wield; so called because it was cut from an ash growing on Mount Pelion, in Thessaly.

Pelican, in Christian art, is a symbol of charity. It is also an emblem of Jesus Christ, by whose blood we are healed" (Eucherius and Jerome). (See below.)

Pel'ican. A mystic emblem of Christ, called by Dante nostro Pelicano. St.
Hieronymus gives the story of the pelican restoring its young ones destroyed by serpents, and his salvation by the blood of Christ. The Bestia ria says that Physiologus tells us that the pelican is very fond of its brood, but when the young ones begin to grow they rebel against the male bird and provoke his anger, so that he kills them; the mother returns to the nest in three days, sits on the dead birds, pours her blood over them, revives them, and they feed on the blood. (Bibl. Nat. Belg., No. 10,073.)

"Then said the Pellycane.
When my lordis he shynne
With my bloudis I them remend [revise].
Scapeunte doth recorde,
The same day ou Lord,
And foro from deth to lyne."

Skelton: Armory of Birds.

Pelecanus. The notion that pelicans feed their young with their blood arose from the following habit:—They have a large bag attached to their under bill. When the parent bird is about to feed its brood, it macerates small fish in this bag or pouch, then pressing the bag against its breast, transfers the mace- rated food to the mouths of the young.

* A pelican in her porty is the representation of a pelican feeding her young with her blood. The Romans called filial love piety, hence Virgil’s hero is called pudicita because he rescued his father from the flames of Troy.

Pellides. Son of Pelus (2 syl.)—that is, Achilles, the hero of Homer’s Iliad, and chief of the Greek warriors that besieged Troy.

"When, like Pellides, bold beyond control,
Homer raised high to heaven the loud imputious song.

Boroglio: Minstrel.

Pello. Heaping Ossa upon Pelion. Adding difficulty to difficulty, embarrassment to embarrassment, etc. When the giants tried to scale heaven, they placed Mount Ossa upon Mount Pelion for a scaling ladder.

"Ter sunt conti inferiorem Pelion."

* Virgil: Geor. i. 281.*

*: A noteworthy hexameter verse. The 3 of “conti” does not rhyme, nor yet the 6 of “Pelio.”

Pell-mell. Headlong: in reckless confusion. From the players of pall-mall, who rush heedlessly to strike the ball. The “pell” is the ball (Italian, palla), and the “mall” is the mallet or bat (Italian, maggia; Latin, malletum). Sometimes the game is called “pall mall;” and sometimes the ground set apart for the game, as Pall Mall, London.

"It is not quite certain that pell-mell is the same compound word as pall-mall.

Pelle’san Conqueror. Alexander the Great, born at Pella, in Macedonia.

"Remember that Pelle’san conqueror."

* Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 1."

Pelias (Syr). One of the knights of the Round Table. In the Piure Querne he goes after the “blatant beast,” when it breaks the chain with which it had been bound by Sir Calidore.

Pells. Clerk of the Pells. An officer of the Exchequer, whose duty it was to make entries on the pells or parchment rolls. Abolished in 1894.

Pelops. Son of Tan’talus, cut to pieces and served as food to the gods. The More’a was called Peloponnesos or the “island of Pelops,” from this mythical king.

The ivory shoulder of the sons of Pelops. The distinguishing or distinctive mark of anyone. The tale is that Demeter ate the shoulder of Pelops when it was served up by Tan’talus, and when the gods put the body back into the cauldron to restore it to life, he came forth lacking a shoulder. Demeter supplied an ivory shoulder, and all his descendants carried this mark in their bodies. (See Pythagoras.)

Pelorus. Cape di Faro, a promontory of Sicily. (Virgil: Enid, iii. 6, 7.)

"As when the force of subterraneous wind transports a bill Took from Pelorus.*"

* Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 1. etc.*

Pelos [med]. Father of Physigia-thos, king of the frogs. (Battle of the Frogs and Mice.)

Pelt. in printing. Untanned sheep-skins used for printing-balls. (French, pelle; Latin, pellis, a skin.)

Pen Name, sometimes written nom-de-plume. A fictitious name assumed by an author who does not wish to reveal his real name. (See Nom de Guerre.)

Pen and Feather. Varieties of the same word, the root being the Sanskrit pattra, a wing or instrument for flying. Latin, psitta or psittus, pen; Greek, pterous; Tentome, phuthra; Anglo-Saxon, fether; our “feather.”

*: Analogous examples are Tear and Larme, Nag and Egues, Wig and Peruke, Heart and Cœur, etc.

Penang Lawyers. Clubs. Penang sticks come from Penang, or the Prince of Wales Island, in the Malaccas.
Penates (3 syl.). The household gods of the Romans.

Pencil of Rays. All the rays that issue from one point, or that can be focussed at one point (Latin, penicillum, little tail, whence penicillus, a painter's brush made of the hair of a cow's tail); so called because they are like the hairs of a paint-brush, except at the point where they aggregate.

Pendennis (Arthur). The hero of Thackeray's novel, entitled The History of Pendennis, etc.

Major Pendennis. A tailor-hunter, similar in character to Macklin's celebrated Sir Pertinax M'Sycophant.

Pendente Lito (Latin). Pending the suit, while the suit is going on.

Pendragon. A title conferred on several British chiefs in times of great danger, when they were invested with dictatorial power: thus Uther and Arthur were each appointed to the office to repel the Saxon invaders. Cassibelain was pendragon when Julius Caesar invaded the island; and so on. The word pen is British for head, and dragon for leader, ruler, or chief. The word therefore means summit rex (chief of the kings).

So much for fact, and now for the fable: Geoffrey of Monmouth says, when Aurelius, the British king, was poisoned by Ambros, during the invasion of Pascenius, son of Vortigern, there appeared a star at Winchester of wonderful magnitude and brightness, darting forth a ray, at the end of which was a globe of fire in form of a dragon, out of whose mouth issued forth two rays, one of which extended to Gaul and the other to Ireland." Uter ordered two golden dragons to be made, one of which he presented to Winchester, and the other he carried with him as his royal standard, whence he received the name of Uter Pendragon. (Books viii., xiv., xvi.)

Penelope (4 syl.). The wife or Shroud of Penelope. A work "never ending, still beginning," never done, but ever in hand. Penelope, according to Homer, was pasted over by suitors while her husband, Ulysses, was absent at the siege of Troy. To relieve herself of their importunities, she promised to make a choice of one as soon as she had finished weaving a shroud for her father-in-law. Every night she unraveled what she had done in the day, and so deferred making any choice till Ulysses returned, when the suitors were sent to the right-about without ceremony.

Penelope. The beggar loved by King Cophetua. (See Cophetua.)

Penelva. A knight whose adventures and exploits form a supplemental part of the Spanish romance entitled Amadis of Gaul. The first four books of the romance, and the part above referred to, were by Portuguese authors—the former by Vasco de Lobeira, of Oporto, who died 1403: the latter by an unknown author.

Penetralia. The private rooms of a house; the secrets of a family. That part of a Roman temple into which the priest alone had access; here were the sacred images, here the responses of the oracles were made, and here the sacred mysteries were performed. The Holy of Holies was the penetralia of the Jewish Temple. (Latin plural of penetralia.)

Penfeather (Lady Penelope). The lady patroness of the Spa. (Sir Walter Scott: St. Roman's Well.)

Peninsular War. The war carried on under the Duke of Wellington against the French in Portugal and Spain, between 1808 and 1812.

Penmanship. The "Good King René," titular king of Naples in the middle of the fifteenth century, was noted for his initial letters. St. Thecla, of Isauria, wrote the entire Scriptures out without a blot or mistake. St. Theodosius wrote the Gospels in letters of gold without a single mistake or blur. (See Longfellow's Golden Legend, iv.) (See Angel.)

Penmanship. Dickens says of John Bell, of the Chancery, that he wrote three hands—one which only he himself could read, one which only his clerk could read, and one which nobody could read. Dean Stanley wrote aloud as bad a hand as man could write.

Pennals [pen-cenas]. So the Freshmen of the Protestant universities of Germany were called, from the penna or inkhorn which they carried with them when they attended lectures.
Pennism. Fagging, bullying, petty persecution. The penns or freshmen of the Protestant universities were the fags of the elder students, called scholasts. Abolished at the close of the seventeenth century. (See above.)

Pennant. The common legend is, that when Tromp, the Dutch admiral, appeared on our coast, he hoisted a broom on his ship, to signify his intention of sweeping the ships of England from the sea; and that the English admiral hoisted a horsewhip to indicate his intention of drubbing the Dutch. According to this legend, the pennant symbolizes a horsewhip, and it is not unfrequently called "the whip."

Penniless (The). The Italians called Maximilian I. of Germany Pochi Dinari, (1459, 1493-1519.)

Penny (in the sense of pound). Six-penny, eighteenpenny, and pennycrown nails are nails of three sizes. A thousand of the first will weigh six pounds; of the second, eight pounds; of the third, ten pounds.

Penny sometimes expresses the decimal part, as tenpenny and elevenpenny silver—meaning silver 10-12ths and 11-12ths fine.

"One was to be tenpenny another eleven, another sterling silver. —Waverley; Secrets of the Adept.

Penny (A). (Anglo-Saxon, penning or penny.) For many hundred years the unit of money currency, hence penny-money (as money-changer). There were two coins so named, one called the greater the fifth part of a shilling, and the other called the less = the 12th part of a shilling.

My penny of observation (Lore's Labour's Lost, iii. 1). My pennyworth of wit, my natural observation or mother wit. Probably there is some pun or confusion between penetration and "penny of observation" or "pennyworth of wit."

A penny for your thoughts. See Heywood's Dialogue, pt. iv. 4. (See: Pennyworth.)

Penny-a-liner (A). A contributor to the local newspapers, but not on the staff. At one time these collectors of news used to be paid a penny a line, and it was to their interest to spin out their reports as much as possible. The word remains, but is now a misnomer.

Penny Dreadful. Penny sensational papers, which delight in horrors.

Pennyfather (A). A miser, a penurious person, who "husbands" his pence.

"Good old pennyfather was glad of his liquor." —Punch: Jests (1839).

Penny Gaff (A). A theatre the admission to which is one penny. Properly a gaff is a ring for cock-fighting, a sensational amusement which has been made to yield to sensational dramas of the Richardson type. (Irish, gaff, a hook.)

Penny Hop (A). A rustic dancing club, in which each person pays a penny to the fiddler. In towns, private dancing parties were at one time not uncommon, the admission money at the door being one penny.

Penny Lattice-house (A). A low pithouse. Lattice shutters are a public-house sign, being the arms of Fitzwarren, which family, in the days of the Henrys, had the monopoly of licensing victuallers and publicans.

Penny Pots. Pimpls and spots on the tippler's face, from the too great indulgence in penny pots of beer.

Penny Readings. Parochial entertainments, consisting of readings, music, etc., for which one penny admission is charged.

Penny Saved (A). A penny saved is twopence gained. In French, "Un centime épargné en vaunt deux."

Well, suppose a man asks twopence apiece for his oranges, and a bagger obtains hundred at a penny apiece, would he save 200 pence by his scam? I hope, let him go on wedging, and he will soon become a millionaire, or suppose, instead of paying £1000 for a bad bet, I had not wasted any money, at all, would thus have been worth £2000 to me?

Penny Weddings. Wedding banquets in Scotland, to which a number of persons were invited, each of whom paid a small sum of money not exceeding a shilling. After defraying the expenses of the feast, the residue went to the newly-married pair, to aid in furnishing their house. Abolished in 1615.

"Very true, my love, We'll be on to pay a part of penny-wedding it will prove, where all men contribute to the young folk's maintenance." —Sir Walter Scott: "Fortunes of Nigel," chap. xxi.

Penny Wisec. Unwise thrift. The whole proverb is Penny wise and pound foolish, like the man who lost his horse from his penny wisdom in saving the expense of shoeing it abroad when one of its shoes was loose.

Pennyroyal. Flea-bane, the odour being, as it is supposed, hateful to fleas.
This is a real curiosity of blundering derivation. The Latin word is pulicim, the flea destroyer, from pulex, a flea, softened into pulicium, and corrupted into the English-Latin pule-regium. "Pule," changed first into puny, then into penny, gives us "penny-regium," whence "penny-royal." The French call the herb pouniot, from vous (a louse or flea).

Pennyweight. So called from being the weight of an Anglo-Norman penny. Dwt. is d = penny wt.

Pennyworth or Pen'orth. A small quantity, as much as can be bought for a penny. Butler says, "This was the pen'orth of his thought." (Hindbrus, ii. 3), meaning that its scope or amount was extremely small.

He has got his pennyworth. He has got due value for his money.

To turn an honest penny. To earn a little money by working for it.

Pen'sion is something weighed out. Originally money was weighed, hence our pound. When the Gauls were bribed to leave Rome the ransom money was weighed in scales, and then Brennus threw his sword into the weight-pan. (Latin, pendo, to weigh money.)

Pensioners at the Universities and Inns of Court. So called from the French pension (board), prunonnaire (a boarder, one who pays a sum of money to dine and lodge with someone else).

Pentacle. A five-sided head-dress of fine linen, meant to represent the five senses, and worn as a defence against demons in the act of conjuration. It is also called Solomon's Seal (signum Salamonia). A pentacle was extendecl by the magician towards the spirits when they proved contumacious.

"And on her head, let spirits should invade.
A pentacle, for more assurance, stand."—

Rosc: Orlando Furioso, iii. 21.

The Holy Pentacles numbered forty-four, of which seven were consecrated to each of the planets Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, and the Sun; five to both Venus and Mercury, and six to the Moon. The divers figures were enclosed in a double circle, containing the name of God in Hebrew, and other mystical words.

Pentap'olin. An imaginary chieftain, but in reality the drover of a flock of sheep. Don Quixote conceived him to be the Christian King of the Garamantians, surnamed the Naked Arm, because he always entered the field with his right arm bare. The driver of a flock from the opposite direction was dubbed by the Don the Emperor Alifanfaron of the isle of Taprobana, a pagan. (Cervantes: Don Quixote, pt. I. bk. iii. 4.)

Pentap'elia. (Greek, pente polis.)
(1) The five cities of the plain: Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar; four of which were consumed with fire, and their site covered with the Lake Asphaltites, or the Dead Sea.
(2) The five cities of Cyrenaica, in Egypt: Bereni'ce, Aris'iae, Ptolema'is, Cyre'nis, and Apollo'nia.
(3) The five cities of the Philistines: Gaza, Gath, As'salon, Ash'dod, and Ekron.
(4) The five cities of Italy in the exarchate of Ravenna: Rim'i, Pesaro, Fano, Sinigaglia, and Anco'na. These were given by Pepin to the Pope.
(5) The Dorian pentapolis: Cni'dos, Cos, Lindos, Ial'yso's, and Cam'iros.

Pentateuch. The first five books of the Old Testament, supposed to be written by Moses. (Greek, pente, five; teuchos, a book.)

The Chinese Pentateuch. The five books of Confucius:—(1) The Shoo-King, or Book of History; (2) The Lee-King, or Book of Rites; (3) The Book of Odes, or Chinese Homer; (4) The 1'h-King, or Book of Changes; and (5) The Chan-Then, or Spring and Autumn Annals.

The Samaritan Pentateuch. A version of the Pentateuch in the Samaritan character. It varies in some measure from the Jewish version. Not earlier than the fourth, nor later than the seventh, century. (See Apocrypha: 2 Esdras xiv. 21-48.)

Pentecost. (Greek, pente cost; fiftieth.) The festival held by the Jews on the fiftieth day after the Passover; our Whit-Sunday.

Penthesilea. Queen of the Amazons, slain by Achilles. Sir Toby Belch says to Maria, in the service of Olivia—

"Good-night, Penthesilea [my fine woman]."—Shakspere: Twelfth Night, ii. 2.

Penthouse (2 syl.). A hat with a broad brim. The allusion is to the hood of a door, or coping of a roof. (Welsh, pently; Spanish, polvor; French, apricot, also pente, a slope.)

Pentreath (Dolly). The last person who spoke Cornish. Daines Barrington went from London to the Land's End to visit her. She lived at Mousethele.

"Hal, Mousethele! birthplace of old Dolly Pentreath. The last who jabbered Cornish, so says Daines Barrington. Peter Pindar (ode xxi. To Myself)."
Peony (The). So called, according to fable, from Pecon, the physician who cured the wounds received by the gods in the Trojan war. The seeds were, at one time, worn round the neck as a charm against the powers of darkness. Virgil and Ovid speak of its sanative virtues. Others tell us Pecon was a chieftain who discovered the plant.

"Vetustissima incipit peonia est, nomenque antiquissima, quin autem pendantion appellat, aii glycyriden."—Pliny, xxv. 10.

People. The people's friend. Dr. William Gordon, the philanthropist. (1801-1849.)

People's Charter (The). The six points of the People's Charter, formulated in 1848, are:

1. Manhood Suffrage (now practically established).
2. Annual Parliaments.
3. Vote by Ballot (established).
4. Abolition of Property.
5. Qualification for Members of Parliament (the Qualification Test is abolished). Equal Electoral Districts.

Pepper. To pepper one well. To give one a good baying or thrashing. To take pepper in the nose. To take offence. The French have a similar proverb, "La montrée au montre un maz."—The Spanish Gipsy, iv. 197.

Pepper Gate. When your daughter is stolen close Pepper Gate. Pepper Gate used to be on the east side of the city of Chester. It is said that the daughter of the mayor eloped, and the mayor ordered the gate to be closed up. "Lock the stable-door when the steer is stolen." (Albert Smith : Christopher Tadpole, chap. i.)

Pepper-and-Salt. A light grey colour, especially applied to cloth for dresses.

Peppercorn Rent (A). A nominal rent. A pepper-berry is of no appreciable value, and given as rent is a simple acknowledgment that the tenant virtually belongs to the person to whom the peppercorn is given.

Peppy Bap. A large erratic boulder, east of Leith.

Per Saltum (Latin). By a leap. A promotion or degree given without going over the ground usually prescribed. Thus, a clergyman on being made a bishop has the degree of D.D. given him per saltum—i.e. without taking the B.D. degree, and waiting the usual five years.

"They dare not attempt to examine for the superior degree but elect per saltum."—Nineteenth Century, January, 1868, p. 66.

Perceval (King). A prose romance, printed at Paris in 1528, and said to have been discovered in a cabinet hid in the massive wall of an ancient tower on the banks of the Humber, named Burtimer, from a king of that name who built it. The MS. was said to be in Greek, and was translated through the Latin into French.

It is also used for Perivale, an Arthurian knight, in many of the ancient romances.

Perceval (Sir), of Wales. A knight of the Round Table, son of Sir Pellinore, and brother of Sir Lamorack. He went in quest of the St. Graal (q.v.). Chrétien de Troyes wrote the Roman de Perceval. (1511-1596.) Menessier wrote the same in verse.

Pericinet. A fairy prince, who thwarted the malicious designs of Grog-1m, the cruel stepmother of Graciose. (Fairy Tale.)

Percy [pierce-eye]. When Malcolm III. of Scotland invaded England, and reduced the castle of Alnwick, Robert de Mowbray brought to him the keys of the castle suspended on his lance; and, handing them from the wall, thrust his lance into the king's eye; from which circumstance, the tradition says, he received the name of "Pierce-eye," which has ever since been borne by the Dukes of Northumberland.

"This is all a fable. The Percies are descended from a great Norman troop, who came over with William, and who took his name from his castle and estate in Normandy."—Sir Walter Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, iv.

Perdita. Daughter of Leontes and Hermioné of Sicily. She was born when her mother was imprisoned by Leontes out of causeless jealousy. Paulina, a noble lady, hoping to soften the king's heart, took the infant and laid it at its father's feet; but Leontes ordered it to be put to sea, under the expectation that it would drift to some desert island. The vessel drifted to Bohemia, where the infant was discovered by a shepherd, who brought it up as his own daughter. In time Florizel, the son and heir of the Bohemian king Polixenes, fell in love with the supposed shepherdess. The match was forbidden by Polixenes, and the young lovers fled, under the charge of Camillo, to Sicily. Here the story is cleared up, Polixenes and Leontes are...
Perdrix, always Perdrix. Too much of the same thing. Walpole tells us that the confesser of one of the French kings reproved him for conjugal infidelity, and was asked by the king what he liked best. "Partridge," replied the priest, and the king ordered him to be served with partridge every day, till he quite loathed the sight of his favourite dish. After a time, the king visited him, and hoped he had been well served, when the confesser replied, "Mais oui, perdrix, toujours perdrix." "Ah! ah!" replied the amorous monarch, "and one mistress is all very well, but not perdrix, toujours perdrix." "Soup for dinner, soup for supper, and soup for breakfast again." — Farquhar: The Incorruptible, p. 2.

Père Duchêne. Jacques René Hébert, one of the most profligate characters of the French Revolution. He was editor of a vile newspaper so called, containing the grossest insinuations against Marie Antoinette. (1753-1794.)

Père la Chaise, the Parisian cemetery, is the site of a great monastery founded by Louis XIV., of which his confesser, Père la Chaise, was made the superior. After the Revolution, the grounds were laid out for a public cemetery; first used in May, 1804.

Peregrine (3 syl.) ran away from home, and obtained a loan of £10 from Job Thornbury, with which he went abroad and traded; he returned a wealthy man, and arrived in London on the very day Job Thornbury was made a bankrupt. Having paid the creditors out of the proceeds made from the hardwareman's loan, he married his daughter. (George Colman the Younger: John Bull.)

Peregrine Falcon (A). The female is larger than the male, as is the case with most birds of prey. The female is the falcon of falconers, and the male the terreld. It is called peregrine from its wandering habits.

Per'eg'rine Pic'kle. The hero of Smollett's novel so called. A savage, ungrateful spendthrift; fond of practical jokes to the annoyance of others, and suffering with evil temper the misfortunes brought on by his own wilfulness.

Perfeas'tionistas. A society founded by Father Noyes in Oneida Creek. They take St. Paul for their law-giver, but read his epistles in a new light. They reject all law, saying the guidance of the Spirit is superior to all human codes. If they would know how to act in matters affecting others, they consult "public opinion," expressed by a committee; and the "law of sympathy" so expressed is their law of action. In material prosperity, this society is unmatched by all the societies of North America. (W. Hepworth Dixon: New America, vii. 20, 21.)

Perd'ale Albion! (French). The words of Napoleon I.

Per'fume (2 syl.) means simply "from smoke" (Latin, per fumum), the first perfumes having been obtained by the combustion of aromatic woods and gums. Their original use was in sacrifices, to counteract the offensive odours of the burning flesh.

Perfumed Terms of the Time. So Ben Jonson calls euphemisms.

Per'ri (plur. Perzurs). Periz are delicate, gentle, fairy-like beings of Eastern mythology, begotten by fallen spirits. They direct with a wand the pure in mind the way to heaven. These lovely creatures, according to the Koran, are under the sovereignty of Ebils; and Mahomet was sent for their conversion, as well as for that of man.

"Like peris' wands, when pointing out the road For some pure spirit to the blest abode." — Thomas Moore: Lalla Rookh, pt. i.

Pericles, Prince of Tyre (Shakespeare). The story is from the Gesta Romana, where Pericles is called "Apollo'nius, King of Tyre." The story is also related by Gower in his Confessio Amantis (bk. viii.).

Pericles' Beast. When Pericles, Tyran of Athens, was on his death-bed, he overheard his friends recounting his various merits, and told them they had omitted the greatest of all, that no Athenian through his whole administration had put on mourning through his severity—i.e. he had caused no Athenian to be put to death arbitrarily.

Perillo Swords. Perillo is a "little stone," a mark by which Julian del Rey, a famous armourer of Toledo and Zaragoza, authenticated the swords of his manufacture. All perillo swords were made of the steel produced from the mines of Mondragon. The swords given by Katharine of Aragon to Henry VIII. on his wedding-day were all Perillo blades.
The most common inscription was, "Draw me not without reason, smite me not without honour."

Perillos and the Brazen Bull. Perillos of Athens made a brazen bull for Phalaris, Tyrant of Agrigentum, intended for the execution of criminals. They were shut up in the bull, and, fires being lighted below the belly, the metal was made "red hot." The cries of the victims, reverberating, sounded like the lowing of the bull. Phalaris admired the invention, but tested it on Perillos himself. (See Inventors.)

Perillos Castle. The castle of Lord Douglas was so called in the reign of Edward I., because good Lord Douglas destroyed several English garrisons stationed there, and vowed to be revenged on anyone who should dare to take possession of it. Sir Walter Scott calls it "Castle Dangerous." (See Introduction of Castle Dangerous.)

Perion. A fabulous king of Gaul, father of "Amadis of Gaul." His encounter with the lion is one of his best exploits. It is said that he was hunting, when his horse reared and snorted at seeing a lion in the path. Perion leaped to the ground and attacked the lion, but the lion overturned him; whereupon the king drove his sword into the belly of the beast and killed him. (Amadis de Gaul, chap. i.)

Peripatetics. Founder of the Peripatetics—Aristotle, who used to teach his disciples in the covered walk of the Lyceum. This colonnade was called the peripatos, because it was a place for walking about (peripateo).

Peris. (See Perl.)

Perissas (excess; or prodigality; Greek, Perissos). Step-sister of Elisia and Mediana. These ladies could never agree on any subject. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, bk. ii.)

Periwinkle. The bind-around plant. (Anglo-Saxon, penuencer; French, perinche; Latin, perennis, to bind thoroughly.) In Italy it used to be worn around dead infants, and hence its Italian name, fior di morto.

Perk. To perk oneself. To plume oneself on anything. (Welsh, peru, to smarten or plume feathers. percs, next.) You begin to perk up a bit—i.e. to get a little fatter and more plump after an illness. (See above.)

Perkun's. God of the elements. The Slavonic Trinity was Perkunos, Rikilos, and Potimpos. (Grimm: Deutsche Mythologie.)

Peruvian Strata. So called from Peru, in Russia, where they are most distinctly developed.

Pernelle (Madame). A scolding old woman in Molière's Tartuffe.

Perpendiculares. Parties called crushes, in which persons have to stand almost stationary from the time of entering the suite of rooms to the time of leaving them.

"The night before I duly attended my mother to three fashionable crushes, and the last, though called "the best name for them, for there is seldom more standing room than standing room."—Edna Lytton: Donora, chap. 13.

Perpetual Motion. Restlessness; fidgety or nervous disquiet; also a chimerical scheme wholly impracticable. Many have tried to invent a machine that shall move of itself, and never stop; but, as all materials must suffer from wear and tear, it is evident that such an invention is impossible.

"It were better to be cut to death with rust than to be secured to nothing with perpetual motion."—Shakespeare: Henry IV, 1. 2.

Pers. Persia; called Fars. (French, Perse.)

Persecutions (The ten great). (1) Under Nero, A.D. 64; (2) Domitian, 95; (3) Trajan, 98; (4) Hadrian, 118; (5) Pertinax, 202, chiefly in Egypt; (6) Maximin, 236; (7) Decius, 249; (8) Valerian, 257; (9) Aurelian, 272; (10) Diocletian, 302.

"It would be well if there were the only religious persecutions, but alas! those on the other side prove the truth of the Founder 'I came not to send peace (on earth) but a sword' (Matt. 10:34). Witness the long and relentless persecutions of the Waldenses and Albigenses, the six or seven crusades, the wars of Charlemagne against the Saxons, and the thirty years' war of Germany, witness, the persecution of the times the Bartholomew slaughter, the wars of Louis XIV on the renunciation of the Edict of Nantes, the Brecon attacks, and the wars against the Southern blacks. Witness the latter persecutions stirred up by Luther, which spread to England and Scotland. No want of fanaticism, so tormented an religious wars. It has been no thunder line.

Persop'talis, called by the Persians "The Throne of Jam-shed," by whom it was founded. Jam-shid removed the seat of government from Balk to Istakhar.

Pers'eus (2 syl.). A bronze statue in the Loggia dei Lanzi, at Florence. The best work of Benvenuto Cellini (1500-1562).
Persian

Persian flying horse. A ship.

"Person conquered the head of Medu'ma, and did make Persian, the most swift ship, which he always calls Persian flying horse."—Destruction of Troy.

"The strong-ribbed bark through liquid mountains cut Like Persian's horse."—Shakespeare: Troylus and Cressida, i. 3.

Persevere (3 syl.) This word comes from an obsolete Latin verb, spero (to stand rigidly); hence serrus (severe or rigid). Asseverate is to stand rigidly to what you say; persevere is to stand rigidly to what you undertake till you have accomplished it. (Perr-se're.)

Persian Alexander (Thra). Sandjar (1117-1138). (See Alexander.)

Persian Bucephalos (Thra). Sheb-diz, the charger of Chosroes Parviz. (See Bucephalos.)

Person (Latin, persona, a mask; personatus, one who wears a mask, an actor). A "person" is one who impersonates a character. Shakespeare says, "All the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players" or persons. When we speak of the "person of the Deity" we mean the same thing, the character represented, as that of the Father, or that of the Son, or that of the Holy Ghost. There is no more notion of corporeality connected with the word than there is any assumption of the body of Hamlet when an actor impersonates that character.

Persona Grata (Latin). An acceptable person; one liked.

"The Count [Minister] is not a persona grata at court, as the royal family did not attend the count in Hanoverian affairs in 1739."—Truth, October 22nd, 1893.

Perth is Celtic for a bush. The county of Perth is the county of bushes.

Fair Maid of Perth. Catherine Glover, daughter of Simon Glover, glover, of Perth. Her lover is Henry Gow, alias Henry Smith, alias Gow Chrom, alias Hal of the Wynd, his armorer, foster-son of Dame Shoolbred. (See Walter Scott: Fair Maid of Perth.)

The Fire Articles of Perth were those passed in 1618 by order of James VI., enjoining the attitude of kneeling to receive the elements; the observance of Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, and Pentecost; the right of confirmation, etc. They were ratified August 4, 1621, called Black Saturday, and condemned in the General Assembly of Glasgow in 1638.

Peru. That's not Peru. Said of something utterly worthless. A French expression, founded on the notion that Peru is the El Dorado of the world.

Peruvian Bark, called also Jesuit's Bark, because it was introduced into Spain by the Jesuits. "Quinine," from the same tree, is called by the Indians quinquina. (See CINCHONA.)

Peruke or Periwig. Menage ingeniously derives these words from the Latin pulus ("hair"). Thus, pilus, pilox, pelicula, pelotica, perua, peruyne. The wigs are first mentioned in the 16th century; in the next century they became very large. The fashion began to wane in the reign of George III. Periwig is a corrupt form of the French word peruynge.

Pescocolla. The famous swimmer drowned in the pool of Charybdis. The tale says he dived once into the pool, and was quite satisfied with its horrors and wonders; but the King Frederick then tossed in a golden cup, which Pescocolla dived for, and was never seen again. (See Schiller's Diver.)

Pes's'mist. One who fancies everything is as bad as possible. (Latin, pessimus, the worst.)

Petard. Hou'z on his o'vn petard. Caught in his own trap, involved in the danger he meant for others. The petard was a conical instrument of war employed at one time for blowing open gates with gunpowder. The engineers used to carry the petard to the place they intended to blow up, and fire it at the small end by a fusee. Shakespeare spells the word petar: "'Tis the sport to have the engineer hoist with his own petar." (Hamlet, ii. 4.)

"Turning the muzzles of the guns Magdalawa, and getting a piece of lighted rope [the party] blazed away as vigorously as possible... and tried to hasten Theodore on his own petar."—Bunyan.

Petaud. 'Tis the court of King Petaud, where everyone is master. There is no order or discipline at all. This is a French proverb. Petaud is a corruption of peto (I beg), and King Petaud means king of the beggars, in whose court all are equal. (See ALBATT.)

Peter. (See Blue Peter.)

Great Peter. A bell in York Minster, weighing 10½ tons, and hung in 1845.

Lord Peter. The Pope in Swift's Tale of a Tub.

Rob Peter to pay Paul. (See ROBBING.)

St. Peter. Patron saint of fishers and fishmongers, being himself a fisherman.
St. Peter, in Christian art, is represented as an old man, bald, but with a flowing beard; he is usually dressed in a white mantle and blue tunic, and holds in his hand a book or scroll. His peculiar symbols are the keys, and a sword, the instrument of his martyrdom.

He has got St. Peter's fingers—i.e. the fingers of a thief. The allusion is to the fish caught by St. Peter with a piece of money in its mouth. They say that a thief has a fish-hook on every finger.

Peter Botte Mountain, in the island of Mauritius; so called from a Dutchman who scaled its summit, but lost his life in coming down. It is a rugged cone, more than 2,800 feet in height.

Peter Parley. The nom de plume of Samuel G. Goodrich, an American (1793-1860).

Peter Pevsner. Peter Pevsner's Laurels. In Sir Walter Scott's novel of Redgauntlet. Peter is a litigious hard-hearted drunkard, poor as a churchmouse, and a liar to the backbone. His "gangling plea" is Hogarthian comic, as Carlyle says.

Peter-Pence. An annual tribute of one penny, paid at the feast of St. Peter to the see of Rome. At one time it was collected from every family, but afterwards it was restricted to those "who had the value of thirty pence in quick or live stock." This tax was collected in England from 740 till it was abolished by Henry VIII.

Peter Pendle. The nom de plume of Dr. John Wolfe (Wodecut), of Doolbrooke, Devonshire. (1739-1819.)

Peter Porcupine. William Cobbett, when he was a Tory. We have Peter Porcupine's Gazette and the Porcupine Papers, in twelve volumes. (1762-1833.)

Peter Wilkins was written by Robert Pulock, of Clifford's Inn, and sold to Dodsley, the publisher, for £20.

Peter of Provence came into possession of Merlin's wooden horse. There is a French romance called Peter of Provence and the Fair Magalona, the chief incidents of which are connected with this flying charger.

Peter the Great of Russia built St. Petersburg, and gave Russia a place among the nations of Europe. He laid aside his crown and sceptre, came to England, and worked as a common labourer in our dockyards, that he might teach his subjects how to build ships.

Peter the Hermit (in Tasso), "the holy author of the crusade" (bk. i.). It is said that six millions of persons assumed the cross at his preaching.

Peter the Wild Boy, found 1725 in a wood near Hamein, in Hanover, at the supposed age of thirteen. (Died 1785.)

Peterboat. A boat made to go either way, the stem and stern being both alike.

Peterborough (Northamptonshire). So called from the monastery of St. Peter, founded in 653. Tracts relating to this monastery are published in Sparke's collection.

Peterloo. The dispersal of a large meeting in St. Peter's Field, Manchester, by an armed force, August 16th, 1819. The assemblage consisted of operatives, and the question was purely, or at least partially, a question of reform. The word, suggested by Hunt, is a parody upon what he absurdly called "the bloody butchers of Waterloo."

Petit-Maitre, A top; a lad who assumes the manners, dress, and affectations of a man. The term arose before the Revolution, when a great dignitary was styled a grand-maitre, and a pretensions one a petit-maitre.

Petit Serjeantry. Holding lands of the Crown by the service of rendering annually some small implement of war, as a bow, a sword, a lance, a flag, an arrow, and the like. Thus the Duke of Wellington holds his country seat at Strathfieldsaye and Apsley House, London, by presenting a flag annually to the Crown on the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo. The flag is hung in the guard-room of the state apartments of Windsor Castle till the next anniversary, when it becomes the perquisite of the officer of the guard. The Duke of Marlborough presents also a flag on the anniversary of the battle of Blenheim, for his estate at Blenheim. This also is placed in the guard-room of Windsor Castle.

Petitio Principi (A). A begging of the question, or assuming in the premises the question you undertake to prove. Thus, if a person undertook to prove the infallibility of the pope, and were to take for his premises—(1) Jesus Christ promised to keep the apostles and their successors in all the truth; (2) the popes are the regular successors of the apostles, and therefore the popes are infallible—it would be a vicious syllogism from a petticoat principi.

Petitioners and Abhorers. Two political parties in the reign of Charles II. When that monarch was first restored he used to grant everything he was asked for; but after a time this became a great evil, and Charles enjoined his loving subjects to discontinue their practice of "petitioning." Those who agreed with the king, and disapproved of petitioning, were called Abhorers; those who were favourable to the objectionable practice were nicknamed Petitioners.

Petarach. The English Petrarach. Sir Philip Sidney; so called by Sir Walter Raleigh. Cowper styles him "the warbler of poetic prose." (1554-1596.)

Petrel. The storm petrel. So named, according to tradition, from the Italian petrella (little Peter), in allusion to St. Peter, who walked on the sea. Our sailors call them "Mother Carey's chickens." They are called stormy because in a gale they surround a ship to catch small animals which rise to the surface of the rough sea; when the gale ceases they are no longer seen.

Petrifled. (3 syll.) The petrified city. Ishmonie, in Upper Egypt, is so called from the number of petrified bodies of men, women, and children to be seen there. (Latin, petra-fio, to become rock.)

Petrobrusians or Petrobrusians. A religious sect, founded in 1110, and so called from Peter Bruys, a Provençal. He declined against churches, asserting that a stable was as good as a cathedral for worship, and a manger equal to an altar. He also declined against the use of crucifixes.

Petronel. Sir Petronel Flash. A braggadocio, a tongue-doughty warrior.

"Give your scholar degrees and your lawyer his fees,
And some dice for Sir Petronell Flash."—Brit. Bibl.

Petruqello. A gentleman of Verona who undertakes to tame the haughty Katharine, called the Shrew. He marries her, and without the least personal chastisement brings her to lamb-like submission. (Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew.)

Petticoat. A woman.

"There's a petticoat will prove to be the cause of this."—Howley Smart: Struck Down, chap. xi.

Petticoat Government. Female rule.

Petticoat and Gown. The dress. When the gown was looped up, the petticoat was an important item of dress.

The poppy is said to have a red petticoat and a green gown; the daffodil, a yellow petticoat and green gown; a candle, a white petticoat; and so on in our common nursery rhymes—

1. "The king's daughter is coming to town,
With a red petticoat and a green gown"
2. "Talladilla is now come to town,
In a yellow petticoat and a green gown."

Peto. In petto. In secrecy, in reserve (Italian, in the breast.). The popes create cardinals in petto—i.e. in his own mind—and keeps the appointment to himself till he thinks proper to announce it.

"Belgium, a department of France in petto, i.e. in the intention of the people."—The Herald, 1857.

Pettiguerian Map. A map of the roads of the ancient Roman world, constructed in the time of Alexander Seve'rus (A.D. 221), made known to us by Conrad Pettinger, of Augsburg.

Peveril of the Peak. Sir Geoffrey the Cavalier, and Lady Margaret his wife; Julian Peveril, their son, in love with Alice Bridgenorth, daughter of Major Bridgenorth, a Roundhead; and William Peveril, natural son of William the Conqueror, ancestor of Sir Geoffrey. (Sir Walter Scott: Peveril of the Peak.)

Pewter. To scour the pewter. To do one's work.

"But if she usefully scour her pewter, Give her the money that is due to her."

King: Orpheus and Euridyce.

Phedria [wantonness]. Handmaid of Acrasia the enchantress. She sails about Ilde Lake in a gondola. Seeing Sir Guyon she ferries him across the lake to the floating island, where Cymoch'les attacks him. Phedria interposes, the combatants desist, and the little wanton ferries the knight Temperance over the lake again. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, ii.)

Phaeton. The son of Phoebus, who undertook to drive the chariot of the sun, was upset, and caused great mischief; Libya was parched into barren sands, and all Africa was more or less injured, the inhabitants blackened, and vegetation nearly destroyed.

"Gallop space, you fiery-footed steeds,
Towards Phoebus' mansion: such a waggoner As Phaeton would whip you to the war,
And bring in cloudy night immediately."

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 2.

Pha'eton. A sort of carriage; so called from the sun-car driven by Phaeton. (See above.) Phaetons bird. The swan. Cyenus was the friend of Phaeton, and lamented his fate so grievously that Apollo changed her into a swan, and placed her among the constellations.

Phalanx. The close order of battle in which the heavy-armed troops of a Grecian army were usually drawn up. Hence, any number of people distinguished for firmness and solidity of union.

Phala'ris. The brazen bull of Pha'laris. Perillos, a brass-founder of Athens, proposed to Phal'aris, Tyrant of Agrigentum, to invent for him a new species of punishment; accordingly, he cast a brazen bull, with a door in the side. The victim was shut up in the bull and roasted to death, but the throat of the engine was so contrived that the groans of the sufferer resembled the bellows of a mad bull. Phal'aris commended the invention, and ordered its merits to be tested by Perillos himself.

The epistles of Pha'laris. Certain letters said to have been written by Phal'aris, Tyrant of Agrigentum, in Sicily. Boyle maintained them to be genuine, Bentley affirmed that they were forgeries. No doubt Bentley is right.

Phaleg, in the satire of Aba'lon and Achito'phil, by Dryden and Tate, is Mr. Forbes, a Scotchman.

Phantom Ship. (See Carmilhan.)

"Or of that phantom ship, whose form Shoots like a meteor through the storm; When the dark scud comes driving hard, And lowered is every caspian yard. . . . And well the doomed spectators know "The harbingers of wreck and woe." Sir Walter Scott: Rob Roy, i. 11.

Pha'son. A young man greatly ill-treated by Furor, and rescued by Sir Guyon. He loved Claribel, but Philemon, his friend, persuaded him that Claribel was unfaithful, and, to prove his words, told him to watch in a given place. He saw what he thought was Claribel holding an assignation with what seemed to be a groom, and, rushing forth, met the true Claribel, whom he slew on the spot. Being tried for the murder, it came out that the groom was Philemon, and the supposed Claribel only her lady's maid. He poisoned Philemon, and would have murdered the handmaid, but she escaped, and while he pursued her he was attacked by Furor. This tale is to expose the intemperance of revenge. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, i. 4, 28.)

Pha'raond. King of the Franks and a knight of the Round Table. He is said to have been the first king of France. This reputed son of Marcemir and father of Clo'dion is the hero of one of Calprenede's novels.

Pha'rao (2 syl.). The king. It is the Coptic article P and the word awro (king). There are eleven of this title mentioned in Holy Scripture:—

i. Before Solomon's time.
(1) The Pharao contemporary with Abraham (Gen. xii. 25).
(2) The good Pharao who advanced Joseph (Gen. xli. 27).
(3) The Pharao who "knew not Joseph" (Exod. i. 8).
(4) The Pharao who was drowned in the Red Sea (Exod. xiv. 28); said to be Meneptahs or Meneptah, son of Ram'eses II.
(5) The Pharao that protected Hadad (1 Kings xi. 19).
(6) The Pharao whose daughter Solomon married (1 Kings iii. 1; ix. 16).
(7) After Solomon's time.
(8) Pharao Shishak, who warred against Rohobo'am (1 Kings xiv. 25, 26).
(9) Pharao Shabadok, or "So," with whom Hoshea made an alliance (2 Kings xvii. 4).
(10) The Pharao that made a league with Hezekiah against Sennacherib, called Tirhakah (2 Kings xviii. 21; xix. 9).
(11) Pharao Necho, who warred against Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 29, etc.).

iii. Other Pharao's of historic note.
(1) Cheops or Suphis I. (Dynasty IV.), who built the great pyramid.
(2) Cephrenes or Suphis II., his brother, who built the second pyramid.
(3) Mencheres, his successor, who built the most beautiful pyramid of the three.
(4) Memnon or A-menophis III. (Dynasty XVIII.), whose musical statue is so celebrated.

(5) Sethos I., the Great (Dynasty XIX.), whose tomb was discovered by Belzoni.

(6) Sethos II., called Proteus (Dynasty XIX.), who detained Helen and Paris in Egypt.

(7) Pharaoh Puoris or Thoris, who sent aid to Priam in the siege of Troy.

(8) Rampsinitus or Rameses Neter, the miser (Dynasty XX.), mentioned by Herodotus.

(9) Osorkon IV. or Osorkon (Dynasty XXIII.), the Egyptian Hercules.

Pharaoh, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, means Louis XIV. of France.

"If Pharaoh's doubtful success be [Charles II.] should use,
A foreign and would more incense the Jews
[English nation]."

Pharaoh who knew not Joseph. Supposed to be Menephtah, son of Rameses the Great. Rider Haggard adopts this hypothesis. After Rameses the Great came a period of confusion in Egypt, and it is supposed the Pharaoh who succeeded was a usurper. No trace of the destruction of Pharaoh and his host has been discovered by Egyptologists.

His wife was Asia, daughter of Moses. Pharaoh cruelly maltreated her for believing in Moses. He fastened her hands and feet to four stakes, and laid a millstone on her as she lay exposed to the scorching sun: but God took her without dying, into Paradise. (Sah! : 11 Koran, lxvi. note.)

Among women, four have been perfect: Asia, wife of Pharaoh; Mary, daughter of Imran; Khadijah, daughter of Khawailed (Mahomet's first wife); and Fatima, Mahomet's daughter. Attributed to Mahomet.

Pharaoh who made Joseph his Viceroy. Supposed to be Osbertsen II. There is a tableau in the sixth year of his reign which is thought to represent Jacob and his household.

Pharaoh's Chicken. The Egyptian vulture, so called from its frequent representation in Egyptian hieroglyphics.

Pharaoh's Daughter, who brought up Moses, Bathia.

"Bathia, the daughter of Pharaoh, came, attended by her maidservants, and entering the water where Pharaoh's servants were to see the loins of the Egyptians, and pitying the infant, she rescued him from death."—The Talmud.

Pharos Fields, Egypt. So called from Pharos, an island on the coast, noted for its lighthouse.

"And passed from Pharan fields to Tanan land."—Milton: Paradise lost.

Pharisees means "separatists" (Heb. parash, to separate), men who looked upon themselves as holier than other men, and therefore refused to hold social intercourse with them. The Talmud mentions the following classes:

(1) The "Dashers," or "Bandy-legged" (Nikht), who scarcely lifted their feet from the ground in walking, but "dashed them against the stones," that people might think them absorbed in holy thought (Matt. xxii. 41).

(2) The "Mortars," who wore a "mortier," or cap, which would not allow them to see the passers-by, that their meditations might not be disturbed. "Having eyes, they saw not" (Mark viii. 18).

(3) The "Bleeders," who inserted thorns in the borders of their gaberdines to prick their legs in walking.

(4) The "Cryers," or "Inquirers," who went about crying out, "Let me know my duty, and I will do it" (Matt. xix. 16-22).

(5) The "Almsgivers," who had a trumpet sounded before them to summon the poor together (Matt. vi. 2).

(6) The "Stumblers," or "Blood-browed." (Kizer), who shut their eyes when they went abroad that they might see no women, being "blind leaders of the blind" (Matt. xv. 14). Our Lord calls them "blind Pharisees," "fools and blind." (7) The "Immovables," who stood like statues for hours together, "praying in the market places" (Matt. vi. 5).

(8) "The Festive Pharisees" (Menkia), who kept themselves bent double like the handle of a pestle.

(9) The "Strong-shouldered" (Shikat), who walked with their back bent as if carrying on their shoulders the whole burden of the law.

(10) The "Dyed Pharisees," called by our Lord "Whited Sepulchres," whose externals of devotion cloaked hypocrisy and moral uncleanness. (Talmud of Jerusalem, Berakoth, ix; Sota, v. 7; Talmud of Babylon, Sota, 22 b.)

Pharos. A lighthouse; so called from the lighthouse built by Sostratus Cudius in the island of Pharos, near the port of Alexandria, in Egypt. It was 450 feet high, and could be seen at the distance of 100 miles. Part was blown down in 793. This Pharos was one of the Seven Wonders of the World.
Pharsalia. An epic in Latin hexameters by Lucan. The battle of Pharsalia was between Pompey and Caesar. Pompey had 45,000 legionaries, 7,000 cavalry, and a large number of auxiliaries; Caesar had 22,000 legionaries and 1,000 cavalry. Pompey's battle-cry was "Hercules invictus!" that of Caesar was "Veni, vidi, vici." On this occasion Caesar won the battle.

Phæasant. So called from Phasis, a stream of the Black Sea.

"There was formerly in the port of Potia a preserve of phæasants, which birds derive their European name from the river Phasis (the present Iton)."—Lent.-General Monastith.

Phœbe (2 syl.). A shepherdess. (Shakespeare: As You Like It.)

Phœlis, called the Fair. The wife of Sir Guy, Earl of Warwick. (See Guy.)

Phenomenon (plural, phæno mena) means simply what has appeared (Greek, phainomai, to appear). It is used in science to express the visible result of an experiment. In popular language it means a prodigy. (Greek, phainomai.)

Phidias. The French Phidias. Jean Goujon (1510-1572); also called the Carver of sculptors. (2) J. B. Pigalle (1711-1785).

Phigal'ian Marbles. A series of twenty-three sculptures in alto-relievo, discovered in 1812 at Phigalia, in Arcadia, and in 1814 purchased for the British Museum. They represent the combat of the Centaurs and Lapithæ, and that of the Greeks and Amazons. They are part of the "Elgin Marbles" (q.v.).

Philadelphia Stones, called Christian bones. It is said that the walls of Philadelphia, in Turkey, were built of the bones of Christians killed in the Holy Wars. This idle tale has gained credit from the nature of the stones, full of pores and very light, not unlike petrified bones. Similar incrustations are found at Knaresborough and elsewhere.

Philander (in Orlando Furioso). A sort of Joseph. (See Gabrina.)

Philandering. Corrupting a woman; paying court, and leading her to think you love her, but never declaring your preference. The word is coined from Philander, the Dutch knight who coquetted with Gabrina (q.v.).

Philanthropist (Thesp.). John Howard, who spent much of his life in visiting the prisons and hospitals of Europe. (1728-1790.) (Greek, phil- anthropos.)

Philémon and Bœeis entertained Jupiter and Mercury when everyone else refused them hospitality. Being asked to make a request, they begged that they might both die at the same time. When they were very old, Philémon was changed into an oak, and Bœeis into a linden tree. (Oral: Metamorphoses, iii. 631, etc.)

Philip. Philip, remember thou art mortal. A sentence repeated to the Macedonian king every time he gave an audience.

Philip sober. When a woman who asked Philip of Macedon to do her justice was snubbed by the petulant monarch, she exclaimed, "Philip, I shall appeal against this judgment." "Appeal!" thundered the enraged king, "and to whom will you appeal?" "To Philip sober," was her reply.

St. Philip is usually represented bearing a large cross, or a basket containing loaves, in allusion to St. John vi. 5-7.

Philip Nye (in Halbkraus). One of the assembly of Dissenting ministers, not so for his ugly beard.

Philip Quarl. A castaway sailor, solaced on a desert island by a monkey. Imitation of Robinson Crusoe. (1727.)

Philippe Égalité. Louis Philippe Joseph, Duc d'Orléans. (1717-1789.)

Philippic. A severe scolding; an invective. So called from the orations of Demosthenes against Philip of Macedonia, to rouse the Athenians to resist his encroachments. The orations of Cicero against Anthony are called "Philippics."

Philippina. A Russian sect; so called from the founder, Philip Pusto-svost. They are called Old Faith Men, because they cling with tenacity to the old service books, old version of the Bible, old hymn-book, old prayer-book, and all customs previous to the reforms of Ne kon, in the 17th century.

Philip (John) author of The Splendid Shilling, wrote a georgic on Cider in blank verse—a serious poem modelled upon Milton's epics.

"Philip, Pomona's lord, the second thou Who nobly dost. In rhyme-unlettered verse With British freedom sing the British song."—Thomson: Autumn.

"Philisides is dead."
Philistines, meaning the ill-behaved and ignorant. The word so applied arose in Germany from the Charis or Philisters, who were in everlasting collision with the students; and in these “town and gown rows” identified themselves with the town, called in our universitites “the mobs.” Matthew Arnold, in the Cornhill Magazine, applied the term Philistine to the middle class, which he says is “ignorant, narrow-minded, and deficient in great ideas,” insomuch that the middle-class English are objects of contempt in the eyes of foreigners.

Philistines (3 syl.). Earwigs and other insect tormentors are so called in Norfolk, Balliffs, constables, etc. “The Philistines are upon thee, Samson” (Judges xvi.).

Philistinism. A cynical indifference and supercilious sneering at religion. The allusion is to the Philistines of Palestine.

Phillis. A play written in Spanish by Lupercio Leonardo of Argensola. (See Don Quixote, vol. iii. p. 70.)

Philoceus, in Sidney’s Arcadia, is Lady Penelope Deveraux, with whom he was in love; but the lady married another, and Sir Philip transferred his affections to Frances, eldest daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham.

Philoctetes. The most famous archer in the Trojan war, to whom Hercules, at death, gave his arrows. He joined the allied Greeks, with seven ships, but in the island of Lemnos, his foot being bitten by a serpent, ulcerated, and became so offensive that the Greeks left him behind. In the tenth year of the siege Ulysses commanded that he should be sent for, as an oracle had declared that Troy could not be taken without the arrows of Hercules. Philoctetes accordingly went to Troy, slew Paris, and Troy fell.

The Philoctetes of Sophocles is one of the most famous Greek tragedies. Laharpe wrote a French tragedy, and Warren, in 1871, a metrical drama on the same subject.

Philomel or Philomena. (See NIGHTINGALE.)

Philomelus. The Druid bard that accompanied Sir Industry to the Castle of Indolence. (Thomson, canto ii. 34.)

Philopomen, general of the Achian league, made Epanomondas his model.

He slew Mecha’nidas, tyrant of Sparta, and was himself killed by poison.

Philosopher. The sages of Greece used to be called sophoi (wise men), but Pythag’oras thought the word too arrogant, and adopted the compound philosop’hoi (lover of wisdom), whence “philosopher,” one who courts or loves wisdom.

Philosopher. “There was never yet philosopher who could endure the toothache patiently, however they have writ the style of gods, and made a push at chance and suffrance.” (Shakespeare: Much Ado About Nothing, v. 1.)

The Philosopher. Marcus Aurelius Antonius is so called by Justin Martyr. (121, 101-180.)

Leo VI., Emperor of the East. (866, 886-911.)

Porphyry, the Antichristian. (223-305.)

The Philosopher of China. Confucius. His mother called him Little Hullock, from a knob on the top of his head. (A.D. 551-479.)

The Philosopher of Ferney. Voltaire; so called from his chateau of Ferney, near Gene’va. (1694-1778.)

The Philosopher of Malachbury. Thomas Hobbes, author of Leviathan. (1588-1679.)

The Philosopher of Persia. Abou Ebn Sina, of Shiraz. (Died 1037.)

The Philosopher of Samos’ta. Lucan.

“Just such another feast as was that of the Lapithae, described by the philosopher of Samos-ta.”—Babelon: Panegyric, book iv. 15.

The Philosopher of Sans-Souci. Frederick the Great (1712, 1740-1786).

The Philosopher of Wimbledon. John Horne Tooke, author of Diversions of Purley. (1736-1812.)

Philosopher with the Golden Thigh. Pythagoras, General Zelislaus had a golden hand, which was given him by Bolislaus III. when he lost his right hand in battle. Nual had an artificial hand made of silver by Cred.

“Quite discard the symbol of the old philosopher with the golden thigh.”—Babelon: Panegyric (Prologue to book V.)

Philosopher’s Egg (The). A preservative against poison, and a cure for the plague; a panacea. The shell of a new egg being pricked, the white is blown out, and the place filled with saffron or a yolk of an egg mixed with saffron.

Philosopher’s Stone. The way to wealth. The ancient alchemists thought there was a substance which would convert all baser metals into gold. This substance they called the philosopher's stone. Here the word stone is about equal to the word substratum, which is compounded of the Latin sub and stratus (spread-under), the latter being related to the verb stand, stood, and meaning something on which the experiment stands. It was, in fact, a red powder or amalgam to drive off the impurities of baser metals. (Stone, Saxon, stone.)

Philosopher's stone. According to legend, Noah was commanded to hang up the true and genuine philosopher's stone in the ark, to give light to every living creature therein.

Inventions discovered in searching for the philosopher's stone. It was in searching for this treasure that Bötticher stumbled on the invention of Dresden porcelain manufacture; Roger Bacon on the composition of gunpowder; Geber on the properties of acids; Van Helmont on the nature of gas; and Dr. Glauber on the "salts" which bear his name.

Philosopher's Tree (The), or Diana's tree. An amalgam of crystallised silver, obtained from mercury in a solution of silver; so called by the alchemists, with whom Diana stood for silver.

Philosophers.
The Seven Sages or Wise Men of Greece. Thales, Solon, Chiron, Pittacus, Bias, Cleobulos, Periander; to which add Sosias, Anacharsis the Scythian, Mys, the Spartan, Epimenides the Cretan, and Pherecydes of Syros.

Philosophers of the Academical sect. Plato, Socrates, Xenocrates, Polemon, Crates, Crantor, Arcesilaus, Carneades, Clitomachus, Philo, and Antiochus.

Philosophers of the Cyrenaic sect. Aristippus, Hegesias, Anniceris, Theodorus, and Dion.

Philosophers of the Eleatic or Eireian sect. Peho, Plisthenes, and Menocles of Eretria.

Philosophers of the Epicurean sect. Epicurus, and a host of disciples.

Philosophers of the Heraclean sect. Heracleitus; the names of his disciples are unknown.

Philosophers of the Socratic sect. Pyrrhus and Timon.

Philosophy. Father of Philosophy. Albrecht von Haller, of Bern. (1708-1777.)

Philotimé. The word means lover of honour. The presiding Queen of Hell, and daughter of Minnion. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, ii.)

"And fair Philotimé, the ruddy light,
The fairest wight that wondreth under sky." Book ii. canto vii.

Philoxenos of Cythéra. A most distinguished dithyrambic poet. He was invited to the court of Dionysius of Syracuse, who placed some poems in his hand to correct. Philoxenos said the only thing to do was to run a line through them and put them in the fire. For this frankness he was cast into prison, but, being released, he retired to Ephesus. The case of Voltaire and Frederick II. the Great of Prussia is an exact parallel.

"Bolder than Philoctetes
Down the veil of Truth I tear,
Amand Charlemagne Les Grandes Poésies"

Philoxenos of Leucadia. A great epicure, who wished he had the neck of a crane, that he might enjoy the taste of his food the longer. (Aristotle: Ethics, iii. 10.)

Philter (A). A draught or charm to incite in another the passion of love. The Thessalian philters were the most renowned, but both the Greeks and Romans used these dangerous potions, which sometimes produced insanity. Lucretius is said to have been driven mad by a love-potion, and Caligula's death is attributed to some philters.
administered to him by his wife, Caesarina. Brabantio says to Othello—“Thou hast practised on her [Desdemona] with foul arts.

Abused her delicate youth with drugs or nun-

That weaken motion.”

* Shakespeare: Othello, I. i.

“[Philiter,” Greek, philtron, philos, loving.)

Phoenix (2 syl.). A blind kind of Thrace, who had the gift of prophecy. Whenever he wanted to eat, the Harpies came and took away or defiled his food.

“Blind Thian’s, and blind Meamades,
And Firengus, and Phlephon, prophets old.”

Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 31.

Phis. The face, is a contraction of physiognomy.

Phiz. Hablot K. Browne, who illustrated the Pickwick Papers, etc.

Phleg’ethon. A river of liquid fire in Hades. (Greek, phlegeton, to burn.)

“Fierc’ Phlegethon, Whose waves of torrents fire infame with rage.”

Milton: Paradise Lost, ii.

Phleg’ra. in Macedonia, was where the giants attacked the gods. Enceladus was the chief of the giants.

Phlogiston. The principle or element of heat, according to Stahl. When latent the effect is imperceptible, but when operative it produces all the effects of heat from warmth to combustion. Of course, this theory has long been exploded. (Greek, phlogiston, inflammable.)

Phoenesian Despair. Desperation which terminates in victory. In the days of Philip, King of Macedon, the men of Phocis had to defend themselves single-handed against the united forces of all their neighbours, because they presumed to plough a sacred field belonging to Delphi. The Phocesiens suggested that they should make a huge pile, and that all the women and children should join the men in one vast human sacrifice. The pile was made, and everythng was ready, but the men of Phocis, before mounting the pile, rushed in desperation on the foe, and obtained a signal victory.

Pho’eion, surnamed The Good, who resisted all the bribes of Alexander and his successor. It was this real patriot who told Alexander to turn his arms against Persia, their common enemy, rather than against the states of Greece, his natural allies.

“Pho’nion the good, in public life severe,
To virtue still inexorably true.”

Thomson: Winter.

Phoebé. The moon, sister of Phæbus.

Phoebus. The sun or sun-god. In Greek mythology Apollo is called Phæbus (the sun-god), from the Greek verb phao (to shine).

“The rays divine of verbal Phæbus shine.”

Thomson: Spring.

Phoenix. Said to live a certain number of years, when it makes in Arabia a nest of spices, sings a melancholy dirge, flaps its wings to set fire to the pile, burns itself to ashes, and comes forth with new life, to repeat the former one. (See Phoenix Period.)

“‘The enchanted pile of that lovely bird,
Who sang at the last his own death-song,
And in music and perfume dies away’

Thomas Moore: Pegasus and the Phoenix,

Phoenix, as a sign over chemists’ shops, was adopted from the association of this fabulous bird with alchemy. Paracelus wrote about it, and several of the alchemists employed it to symbolise their vocation.

*A phœnix among women, A phœnix of his kind. A paragon, unique; because there was but one phoenix at a time."

*If she be furnished with a mind so rare,
She in all the Arabian lord’s*—

Shakespeare: Cymbeline, I. v.

The Spanish Phoenix. Lope de Vega is so called by G. H. Lewes.

“Insanque posta, una vez osa y presa Niniea beardless in ito var Vega.”

Phoenix Alley (London). The alley leading to the Phoenix theatre, now called Drury Lane.

Phoenix Park (Dublin). A corruption of the Gaelic Finn-tuisc (fair water), so called from a spring at one time resorted to as a chalybeate spa.

Phoenix Period or Cycle, generally supposed to be 500 years; Tacitus tells us it was 250 years; R. Stuart Poole that it was 1,400 Julian years, like the Sothic Cycle; and Lipsius that it was 1,500 years. Now, the phoenix is said to have appeared in Egypt five times: (1) in the reign of Sesostris; (2) in the reign of Amasis; (3) in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus; (4) a year or two prior to the death of Tiberius; and (5) in A.D. 334, during the reign of Constantine. These dates being accepted, a Phoenix Cycle consists of 300 years: thus, Sesostris, B.C. 866; Am-asis, B.C. 566; Ptolemy, B.C. 266; Tiberius, A.D. 34; Constantine; A.D. 334. In corroboration of this suggestion it must be borne in mind that Jesus Christ, who died A.D. 34, is termed the Phoenix by monastic writers. Tacitus mentions the first three of these appearances. (Annales, vi. 28.)
Phoebus or Pooka. A spirit of most malignant disposition, who hurries people to their destruction. He sometimes comes in the form of an eagle, and sometimes in that of a horse, like the Scotch kelpie (q.v.). (Irish superstition.)

Phorcys. "The old man of the sea." He was the father of the three Grain, who were grey from their birth, and had but one eye and one tooth common to the three. (Greek mythology.)

Porphyrion. A parasite who accommodates himself to the humour of everyone. (Terence: Phormio.)

Phrygians. An early Christian sect, so called from Phrygia, where they abounded. They regarded Montanus as their prophet, and laid claim to the spirit of prophecy.

Phryne (2 syl.). A courtean or Athenian hetaira. She acquired so much wealth by her beauty that she offered to rebuild the walls of Thebes if she might put on them this inscription: "Alexander destroyed them, but Phryne the hetaira rebuilt them." The Cnidian Venus of Praxiteles was taken from this courtean. Apelles' picture of Venus Rising from the Sea was partly from his wife Campaspe, and partly from Phryne, who entered the sea with dishevelled hair as a model.

Phylactery. A charm or amulet. The Jews wore on their wrist or forehead a slip of parchment bearing a text of Scripture. Strictly speaking, a phylactery consisted of four pieces of parchment, enclosed in two black leather cases, and fastened to the forehead or wrist of the left hand. One case contained Ex. viii. 1-10, 11-16; and the other case, Deut. vi. 4-9, xi. 13-21. The idea arose from the command of Moses, "Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart... and bind them for a sign upon your hand... as frontlets between your eyes" (Deut. xi. 18). (Greek, phylactérrion, from the verb phylaxo, to watch.)

Phylla. A country girl. (Virgil: Eclogues, iii. and v.)

Phyllis, and Brunetta, Rival beauties who for a long time vie'd with each other on equal terms. For a certain festival Phyllis procured some marvellous fabric of gold brocade to outshine her rival; but Brunetta dressed the slave who bore her train in the same material, clothing herself in simple black. Upon this crushing mortification Phyllis went home and died. (Spectator.)

Phyllis the Fair. Philandering—making soft speeches and winning faces at them. (Garth says of Dr. Atterbury—"

Phyllis and Brunetta. Who for a long time vied with each other on equal terms. For a certain festival Phyllis procured some marvellous fabric of gold brocade to outshine her rival; but Brunetta dressed the slave who bore her train in the same material, clothing herself in simple black. Upon this crushing mortification Phyllis went home and died. (Spectator.)

Physician. The Beloved Physician. Lucius, supposed to be St. Luke, the evangelist (Col. iv. 11).

Physician or Fool. Plutarch, in his treatise On the Preservation of Health, tells us that Tiberius was wont to say, "A man of thirty is his own physician or a fool."
Picnics. Dr. John Anthony derives it from the Italian piccola nicchia (a small task), each person being set a small task towards the general entertainment. (French, picque-mique.)

Picador (Spanish). A horseman: one who in bull fights is armed with a gilt spear (pica-dorada), with which he pricks the bull toadden him for the combat.

Picards. An immoral sect of fanatics in the 16th century: so called from Picard of Flanders, their founder, who called himself the New Adam, and tried to introduce the custom of living nude, like Adam in Paradise.
